LYTTELTON, GEORGE, Lord, an English writer, who was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. On his return from travel on the continent, in 1730, he obtained a seat in parliament, where he distinguished himself as a frequent speaker on the side of the opposition; on which account he became secretary to Frederick, prince of Wales, who adhered to that party. In 1744, on the resignation of Sir Robert Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the Treasury. In 1756 he became chancellor of the Exchequer; his qualifications for which office seem to have been but sufficiently small, as he is said to have been unable to master the simplest rules of arithmetic. He was raised to the peerage in 1757, and soon afterwards devoted himself exclusively to literature. His principal works are "Observations on the Conversion of St. Paul," "Dialogues of the Dead," "History of Henry II.," and Poetical Works. Dr. Johnson has included his life amongst those of the English poets written by him. He was a great patron of the modern system of landscape gardening.

Born 1709; died 1773.

LYTTELTON, THOMAS, Lord, son of the preceding, was a young nobleman of promising talents, but of dissipated manners. His death is said to have been preceded by a very extraordinary circumstance. He saw in a dream, or otherwise, a young woman whom he had seduced, who warned him of his dissolution in three days from that time. On the third day, his lordship had a party to spend the evening with him, and about the time predicted said, he "believed he should jockey the ghost;" but, a few minutes afterwards, he was taken faint, and carried to bed, whence he rose no more. The "Quarterly Review," in 1852, endeavoured to set up a claim for this young nobleman to be considered the author of the "Letters of Junius" (see JUNIUS); but the hypothesis was soon abandoned.

Born 1744; died 1779.

LYTTELTON, a seaport town at the eastern side of the province of Canterbury, New Zealand, Middle Island, on Victoria Bay, walled in by precipitous hills, nearly in the coast centre of the Middle Island. It was formerly known by the name of Port Cooper. It is 174 miles by sea from Wellington, and 190 from Otago. It is connected with Christchurch, 8 miles E., of which place it is the port, by a railway tunnelled through the hills. There is a harbour, recently much improved, and every facility for the loading of the vessels, and ships drawing under 15 feet can lie alongside the jetties. There are chapels belonging to the members of the Presbyterian and Wesleyan persuasion, also an Anglican church. Pop. 5,000.

LYTTON, EDWARD GEORGE EARLE LYTTON BULWER, Lord, lit'-ton, a celebrated English novelist and dramatic writer. He was the youngest son of General Bulwer, and studied at Cambridge, where he gained the Chancellor's prize for English versification in 1825. Immediately after leaving the university, in 1826, he commenced his literary career by the publication of a volume of poems, entitled "Weeds and Wild Flowers." His first novel, "Falkland," was published anonymously in the following year, and was followed, in 1828, by "Pelham," a witty and brilliant work of fiction, the success of which decided its author to continue his labours in the same path. The limits of our space forbid us to enumerate all the novels of which he was the author; but "Paul Clifford," "Rienzi," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "The Last of the Barons," "Harold," "The Caxtons," and "My Novel," may be mentioned as illustrating the scope and variety of his genius. His last works, "Kenelm Chillingly" and "The Parisians," were not published till after his death. He contributed to the "Quarterly" and other reviews, and constantly to "Blackwood's Magazine." As a poet, he displayed grace, feeling, and musical versification. He had a taste for publishing anonymously, in order to test public opinion uninfluenced by his literary reputation. In this way he published "The New Timon," "King Arthur," and several other works, which at once became popular. He also produced translations from Schiller and of the odes of Horace. As a playwright, he was the author, among other similar productions, of some of the most popular plays of modern days, among them "Richelieu" and "The Lady of Lyons." In 1831 he entered parliament as member for St. Ives, and attached himself to the Whig party. After a long absence from the House of Commons, he was returned as representative for Herts in 1852, whereupon he became an adherent of the political views of Lord Derby, and, on the accession of the Conservatives to power, formed a member of the ministry, as colonial secretary. A man of prodigious industry, he showed himself equal to the highest efforts in literature; fiction, poetry, the drama, all were enriched by his labours. As a politician, he could scarcely be included in the first rank, and his oratory, though sufficiently fluent and impressive, could not be deemed of the highest order. In 1844 he succeeded, on the death of his mother, to the Knebworth estates, worth £12,000 a-year, and, on that occasion, obtained the royal license to take his mother's maiden name, Lytton, for his surname, and became henceforth known as Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton. During the Melbourne administration of 1835, he was created a baronet, and, in 1856, he became lord rector of the Glasgow University. He was raised to the peerage as Baron Lytton in 1866.

Born at Haydon Hall, Norfolk, 1805; died at Knebworth, 1873.

LYTTON, EDWARD ROBERT, Earl, son of the preceding, published poems of great ability under the nom de plume of Owen Meredith. Entered the diplomatic service. In 1876 he was appointed governor-general of India, and retained that office until 1880. He was created an Earl in 1879.

Born 1831.

M.

MAAD, mad, a town of Hungary, in the Hegyalla mountains, district of Tokay, 30 miles S.W. of Zemplin. It is famous for its vineyards. There are a bathing establishment and a stone quarry. Pop. 3,400.

MAAS, NICHOLAS, mas, a celebrated Dutch painter, who excelled in portraits and genre subjects. Three of his elaborately-finished pictures are in the National Gallery.

Born at Dort, 1632; died at Amsterdam, 1693.

MAAS, or MAESE. (See MAESE.)

MAASSLUIS, or MAASLANDLUIS, mas'-sloos, a town of the Netherlands, province of South Holland, on the New Maas, 10 miles W. of Rotterdam. There are two Protestant and a Roman Catholic church, a synagogue, and an orphan asylum. There is a good harbour, and the cod and herring fisheries are carried on. There are a shipbuilding yard, a rope-walk, and several herring-curing establishments. Pop. 3,800.

MAASTRICHT. (See MAESTRICHT.)

MABANI, or UJÉ-MABANI, mai-ba'-ne, a town of Bornou, Western Africa, 70 miles S.W. of Kukawa. Pop. 10,000, of industrious habits.

MABILLON, JEAN, ma'-be-yawng, a learned French writer, a Benedictine, who assisted Father D'Acherz in compiling the historical work, "Spicilegium." The congregation of St. Maur appointed him to superintend their edition of the works of St. Bernard. He afterwards published the "Laws of the Benedictine Order." Colbert offered him a pension, which he declined, and, in 1683, sent him to Germany to search for manuscripts and other works tending to illustrate the history of France. Mabillon returned with several valuable literary treasures, of which he published an account in a relation of his journey; he afterwards went to Italy for the same purpose. Though his learning and acquirements were immense, he was extremely modest and diffident.

Born at St. Pierremont, Champagne, 1632; died at Paris, 1707.

MABLY, ABBÉ DE, ma'-ble, an eminent French writer on historical subjects, and also the author of a celebrated work,—"The Public Law of Europe, as founded on Treaties."

Born at Grenoble, 1709; died at Paris, 1785.

MABUSE, or MAUBEUGE, JOHN, ma'-boose', an artist, who was employed by Henry VIII., whose children he painted.

Born at Maubeuge, Hainault, 1499; died, it is supposed, 1562.

MACADAM, JOHN LOUDON, mak-ad'-am, a Scotch surveyor, who invented the system of road-making called after his name. For this invention, he was, in 1827, granted a sum of £10,000 by the government, and offered a baronetcy, which last honour he declined. In the same year he was appointed general surveyor to the commissioners intrusted with the management of the metropolitan roads.

Born in Scotland, 1756; died 1836.

MACAHÉ, ma-kai-ai', a seaport of Brazil, 100 miles N.E. of Rio-de-Janeiro, at the mouth of a river of the same name. There is a good harbour, defended by a fort. A large trade is carried on in coffee, sugar, dye-wood, and timber.

MACAO, ma-kow', a Portuguese settlement in China, at the south-eastern extremity of the island of Hiang-shan, in the estuary of the Canton or Pearl river, 40 miles N. of Hong-Kong. The settlement is about 8 miles in extent, and the situation is very salubrious. Here the Portuguese were allowed to build a town and form a settlement, in return for the assistance they gave the Chinese against the pirates by whom the coasts were infested. It was, at one time, a place of the greatest importance to the Portuguese, but it has greatly decayed. Its principal edifices are a collegiate church and other churches. At one end of the town is the house where Camoens composed a large portion of his "Lusiad." (See CAMOENS.) The harbour is defended by forts, but the anchorage is defective, and large vessels cannot approach within six miles of the shore. Pop. 68,000, of whom about 25,000 are Chinese. Lat. 22° 11′ N. Lon. 113° 32′ E.

MACAPA, mak-a-pa', a town of Brazilian Guiana, on the left bank of the Amazon, nearly under the equator. There is a harbour defended by a fort. The trade is large: rice, cotton, and cabinet woods being the staples. Pop. 6,000.

MACARSKA, or MARKASKA, ma-kars'-ka, a town of the Austrian empire, in Dalmatia, on a bay of the Adriatic, 29 miles S.E. of Spalatro. Pop. 7,400, chiefly engaged in agriculture and fishing.

MACARTHUR, JOHN, mak-ar'-thur, a captain in the British army, who went to New South Wales, Australia, in 1790, and gave his attention to the rearing of sheep, with such success that he is known as the founder of the wool commerce of the colony. He several times visited England, and took back with him choice animals for breeding purposes, and was besides a successful agriculturist.

Born at Plymouth, 1766; died in New South Wales, 1834.

MACARTNEY, GEORGE MACARTNEY, Earl of, ma-kart'-ne, a distinguished British nobleman, who, after receiving a liberal education, and travelling on the continent, was, in 1764, appointed envoy extraordinary to the Empress of Russia. In 1767 he was constituted ambassador extraordinary to the same court, but soon afterwards he returned, and was employed as secretary to Lord Townsend, viceroy of Ireland. In 1768 he represented Cockermouth in parliament. In 1772 he was nominated a knight of the Bath. In 1775 he went out as governor of the island of Grenada; and, in 1776, was created an Irish peer, by the title of Lord Macartney. He continued in Grenada till 1779, when, on the capture of those islands by the French, he was made prisoner and sent to France. In 1780 he was appointed governor of Madras, where his conduct obtained such universal approbation that, in 1785, he was appointed governor-general of Bengal; but this office he declined accepting, and returned to England. In 1786 he received a flattering testimony of respect from the Court of Directors, who granted him an annuity of £1,500 for life. The same year he fought a duel with Major-general Stuart, whom he had superseded in India: in this affair his lordship was slightly wounded. In 1792 he was selected to proceed on his most remarkable employment, namely, the embassy to the emperor of China, which mission occupied nearly three years. After his return, he was created an earl of Great Britain. He wrote a "Sketch of the Political History of Ireland," and a "Journal of the Embassy to China."

Born near Belfast, 1737; died at Chiswick, 1806.

MACASSAR, or MANKASSER, ma-kas'-sar, the most southern portion of the island of Celebes. It is traversed by a lofty chain of mountains. It is divided into the Dutch possessions and Macassar proper (Goa, or Goach), which is governed by a native king, who pays tribute to the Dutch government. Lat. 4° 35'—5° 50' S. Lon. 119° 25'—120° 30' E.

MACASSAR, the chief town of the Dutch settlement, is situated on the Straits of Macassar, surrounded by a stone wall, and defended by palisades and a fort. There is a safe harbour, but the entrance is difficult. There is a large trade with Singapore and Java. The chief exports are coffee, sugar, tobacco, sandal-wood, ebony, and spices. Pop. 30,000.—The Portuguese first settled here, but were supplanted by the Dutch. In 1811 the British took possession, but restored the settlement to the Dutch in 1816.

MACASSAR, STRAITS OF, the channel or arm of the sea which separates the islands of Borneo and Celebes, and contains the islands of Pulo Laut, the Little Paternosters, and Pamaroong. It is about 350 miles long, and from 70 to 200 miles wide.

MACAULAY, CATHERINE, ma-kaw'-lai, an English historian. Her principal works were, "The History of England from James I. to the Accession of the House of Hanover," 8 volumes, once very popular, but now considered worthless; "The History of England from the Revolution;" "Letters on Education," 8vo; and "Observations on the Reflections of Mr. Burke on the French Revolution."

Born in Kent, 1733; died 1791.

MACAULAY, THOMAS BABINGTON, Lord, a celebrated English historian, orator, essayist, and poet. He was the son of Zachary Macaulay, a merchant, of Scotch family, who took an active part in the movement for the abolition of slavery. His mother, whose maiden name was Mills, had been a schoolmistress at Bristol, was the daughter of a Quaker, and had been trained by Hannah More. His father's sister, having been the wife of Thomas Babington, a merchant, the future historian received those names at the baptismal font. From his birth he exhibited signs of superiority and genius, and, more especially, of that power of memory which startled everyone by its quickness, flexibility, and range. From school he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he earned reputation by his verses and his oratory, and by his youthful contributions to Charles Knight's "Quarterly Magazine," in which some of his best ballads appeared. He twice won the Chancellor's medal for poetry, and graduated B.A. in 1822, and M.A. in 1826. He had already entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and been called to the bar. His real entry into literature was through the "Edinburgh Review," his first effort being the brilliant essay on Milton. During twenty years this first contribution was followed by many others, some from books, some from life, of which the best were unquestionably those on Hastings and Clive, original efforts of his genius working on new material, the gathering of his own eye and ear in the country which they so splendidly describe. His political career was commenced in 1830, under the auspices of Lord Lansdowne, who, seeing an article on the ballot by the young barrister, at once sought him out, and introduced him to parliament as member for Calne. After the passing of the Reform Act, he sat for Leeds, in the parliament of 1832. The government made him secretary of the Board of Control for India. In 1834 he went to India as member of the Supreme Council of Calcutta; in two years and a half made a very considerable addition to his fortune, and came back to England in 1838. For a few years he united both politics and letters, representing Edinburgh in the House of Commons, and writing articles for the "Edinburgh Review." A quarrel with his constituents broke his connection with the House of Commons, and restored him to literature. It is true, the citizens of Edinburgh again chose him as their representative in 1852; but he was little more than a nominal member, for he only spoke once or twice, and then on questions of no public moment. During the last twelve years of his life his time was almost solely occupied with the "History of England," four volumes of which were completed and published. Although he was generally believed to be closely engaged with the continuation of his History, he frequently turned aside for other literary tasks; and furnished a series of biographies to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." At the time of his death he had nearly completed the fifth volume of his History, which was shortly afterwards published, though in an incomplete form; indeed, the whole work, as we have it, can only be regarded as a magnificent fragment. Besides the "History" and the "Essays," he wrote a collection of beautiful national ballads, the well-known "Lays of Ancient Rome." His parliamentary and miscellaneous speeches have also been given to the world in a more accessible form than the pages of Hansard. In 1849 he was elected lord rector of the university of Glasgow: about the same time he became a bencher of Lincoln's Inn. In 1850 he was appointed honorary professor of ancient history in the Royal Academy; three years later, he was rewarded with the Prussian Order of Merit, and, in 1857, his honours culminated in his creation as Lord Macaulay. His death occurred after a short illness. For clear brilliancy of style he is almost unrivalled among English writers, and his extensive reading in every department of literature, and marvellous memory, were remarkable in all he wrote. His power of picturesque description was great, and exhibited no less in his historical and other prose works, than in his dramatic and spirited ballads. Some objections have been made to him as partial, and even unjust, in his estimation of some famous persons, but if influenced by prejudice, he was at least unconscious of it, and was sincerely desirous to ascertain and relate the truth. In some cases where he has damaged the reputation of popular idols, it is only because he knew more about them than average readers do. He was never married, but few men have been more sincerely beloved by friends. In politics he was a staunch Whig, but was admired and respected by politicians of all parties.

Born at Rothley Temple, Leicestershire, 1800; died at Kensington, 1859.

MACBETH, mak-beth', better known as the hero of Shakspeare's great tragedy than as a real personage, was the son of the chief of Moray. His name is given in old chronicles as Macbeathad MacFinlegh. He was united in marriage to the grand-daughter of King Kenneth MacDuff, and it may be interesting to know that the maiden name of the famous Lady Macbeth was Gruoch MacBoedhe. In 1039 he rebelled against King Duncan MacCrinan, and defeated him, the king being mortally wounded, and dying soon after. Macbeth then ascended the throne, and reigned for 17 years, proving himself an able ruler, and the country prospering under his administration. In 1050 he went on a pilgrimage to Rome. Four years afterwards Malcolm, the son of Duncan, assisted by Earl Siward, of Northumberland, a relative, invaded Scotland, and Macbeth was defeated, but retained the throne. Another victory by Malcolm in 1056, was more decisive, Macbeth being killed at Lumphanan, in Aberdeenshire. Shakspeare adapted the legendary and untrustworthy narrative given in the chronicles of Holinshed, who took the Scotch chronicler, Hector Bocce.

MACCABEES, mak'-ka-bees, a Jewish family, celebrated for heroically resisting the Greek kings of Syria, in the second century before the Christian era.

MACCABEES, MATTAHIAH, or MATITHJAHU, a priest, who courageously opposed the orders of Antiochus Epiphanes, to compel the Jewish people to worship idols, and with his own hand killed the first Jew who went to the idolatrous altar, at Modiin, a place near Joppa, to which with his five sons he had retired. He incited his countrymen to revolt, and was proclaimed by them general. He died in the midst of his successes.

Died 166 B.C.

MACCABEES, JUDAS, or JEHUDAH, third son of the preceding, and his successor in military command. He continued his father's career of victory, defeated the Syrians in many engagements against immense odds of numbers, and at length became master of Judæa, and purified the temple, B.C. 164. Antiochus himself marched against Judas, but was stricken with a mortal illness on the way. Lysius, and the young king Antiochus Eupator, subsequently invaded Judæa with 100,000 foot, 20,000 horse, 32 elephants, and 300 war chariots. Judas was compelled to retreat, after a glorious battle, in which his youngest brother, Eleazar, died heroically. Judas was afterwards slain in battle with the Syrians.

Died 161 B.C.

MACCABEES, JONATHAN, brother of the preceding. (See JONATHAN.)

MACCABEES, SIMON, or TASSI, brother of the preceding, was chosen by the Jews as their leader, and was recognised in that capacity by the Romans. He took Gaza, and entered into an alliance with Demetrius Nicator, king of Syria, by which the independence of Judæa was recognised. He subsequently carried on a war against Antiochus Sidetes, whose generals he compelled to retreat from Judæa. Under his rule, the Jewish nation recovered its independence and prosperity. He was an able and conscientious administrator. He was assassinated by Ptolemy, his son-in-law.

Died 136 B.C.

MACCABEES, the name of seven brothers, of Judæa, who, with their mother, suffered martyrdom at Antioch, during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, B.C. 168. They did not belong to the same family as the preceding.

MACCHIAVELLI, NICCOLO DI BERNARDO DEI, mak'-e-a-vail'-le, a celebrated Italian politician and writer. He came of a poor but old family of the Florentine republic, and became secretary and historiographer of the republic of Florence, an office he lost in 1512, when the Medici family re-entered Florence. In 1502 he was sent on a mission to Cæsar Borgia, in 1507 to the emperor Maximilian, and he was three times employed in diplomatic missions to France. In 1513 he was accused with being concerned in a conspiracy against the Medici, and was put to the torture. He, however, declared that he had nothing to confess, and was subsequently released, according to a pardon sent from Rome by Leo X. He resided during several years in privacy, and occupied himself with the composition of most of his many works. In 1519 Pope Leo X. employed him to draw up a report on the state of Florence, and in 1521 he was again employed by the Medici on several important missions. He wrote, among other works, "The Golden Ass," in imitation of Lucien and Apuleius; "Discourse on the First Decade of Livy," a "History of Florence," and a treatise, entitled "The Prince." This last work contains the most pernicious maxims of government, founded on the vilest principles. It has been argued by some writers that the work is a satire, but that ground is evidently untenable.

Born at Florence, 1469; died at the same city, 1527.

MACCLESFIELD, mak'-kels-feeld, a market and manufacturing town and parliamentary borough of Cheshire, on the river Bollin, 15 miles S.E. of Manchester. It consists of four principal streets and some smaller ones, and has an old church, St. Michael's, founded in 1278, and recently modernized, six other churches, several chapels, a free library, opened in 1878, and a town-hall. Manf. Silk goods, for which it has a great reputation, cotton, and small wares. Slate, coal, and stone are worked in the vicinity. There are a public park and a cemetery. Pop. 37,514.—A station on the London and North Western, North Staffordshire, and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincoln railways.

MACDONALD, ÉTIENNE JACQUES JOSEPH ALEXANDRE, mak-don'-ald, duke of Tarentum, and marshal of France, who was descended from a Scotch family long settled in France. He distinguished himself at the battle of Jemmappes, and served under General Pichegru in the Low Countries. He crossed the Waal on the ice, under a severe fire, a signal feat of bravery, which ensued in the capture of the Dutch fleet. He was then appointed general of division. In 1798 he was named governor of the Roman States; subsequently he made a clever retreat before the Austrian and Russian forces under Suwarrow. Having fallen into disgrace for his defence of General Moreau, he remained for a long time without employment; but in 1809 the emperor gave him the command of a division. He performed signal service at the battle of Wagram, and was honoured with the grade of marshal of the empire, and subsequently became duke of Tarentum. He also fought at Lutzen, Bautzen, and Leipsic. After the abdication of Napoleon, he was nominated a member of the Chamber of Peers. In 1816 he became grand chancellor of the Legion of Honour. The latter portion of his life was passed in retirement, at his seat at Courcelles, near Guise, where he died.

Born at Sancene, 1765; died 1840.

MACDONALD, FLORA, a Scotch lady, memorable for the assistance she rendered to the Young Pretender when escaping after the defeat at Culloden. She was arrested, sent to London, and suffered a short imprisonment, but released under the Act of Indemnity. She afterwards married, and settled in North Carolina, America, but returned to Scotland when the American war of Independence broke out.

Born in the Hebrides, 1720; died 1790.

MACK, CHARLES BARON VON, mak, a celebrated Austrian general, who served with distinction in the Low Countries against the French, in 1792-93. In 1798 he was despatched to command the Neapolitan army against the French. Being defeated by Macdonald and taken prisoner, he was sent to Paris, whence he made his escape, and returned to Austria. In 1805 he assumed command in Bavaria, but was compelled to surrender, with his army of 30,000 men, to Napoleon. For this he was condemned to death; but the sentence was commuted to imprisonment in the fortress of Spielberg, where he remained during two years.

Born in Franconia, 1752; died at Vienna, 1828.

MACKEAN, mak-keen', a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 42,565. The capital is Smithport.

MACKENZIE, SIR ALEXANDER, ma-ken'-se, a celebrated traveller, who emigrated to Canada when a young man, and resided for eight years at the head of the Athabasca Lake, to the west of Hudson's Bay. He was afterwards despatched on an exploring expedition, discovered the great river known by his name, and reached the Great Northern Ocean in lat. 69°. In 1792 he again set out on a journey, the object of which was to reach the Pacific. He succeeded in this enterprise, and returned in safety. A narrative of his expeditions was published by himself, in 1801, under the title of "Voyages from Montreal on the River St. Lawrence, through the Continent of North America, to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans." For his services he was knighted, about the year 1802.

Born in Scotland, about 1760; died 1820.

MACKENZIE, SIR GEORGE, Scottish lawyer and politician, nephew of the earl of Seaforth. He studied at St. Andrews and Aberdeen, and at the university of Bourges, France. While yet a young man he was counsel for the Marquis of Argyle, charged with high treason, was soon afterwards made a justice-deputy, and in that capacity conducted many trials for witchcraft. He was soon afterwards knighted, entered the Scotch parliament in 1669, and was appointed king's advocate in 1677. He attained an unenviable notoriety as criminal prosecutor of the Covenantors, showing great severity, and being known among the persecuted sectarians as "bluidy Mackenzie." He was an able writer, not only on professional subjects, but as an essayist and poet, and was much esteemed by Dryden and other leading contemporary writers. He was one of the founders of the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh.

Born at Dundee, 1636; died in London, 1691.

MACKENZIE, HENRY, a Scottish writer. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and was one of the attorneys of the Scottish court of Exchequer. He afterwards went to London, where, in 1771, he published his first and best novel, "The Man of Feeling." He subsequently wrote "The Man of the World," and "Julia de Roubigné," and edited, in succession, two papers on the model of the "Spectator," called the "Mirror," and the "Lounger." He likewise produced several plays, and a volume of dramatic works translated from the German. In 1804 he obtained the appointment of comptroller of taxes for Scotland, in recognition of his services to the Tory party.

Born at Edinburgh, 1745; died at the same city, 1831.

MACKENZIE RIVER, a great river of British North America, rises in Mount Brown, and is known as the Athabasca, till, after a north-east course of 687 miles, it reaches Lake Athabasca, and then, with the name Slave River, after another course of 210 miles, reaches Great Slave Lake, and after a course of 876 miles, falls into the Frozen Ocean in lat. 70° N., and lon. 135° W. It was discovered and first navigated in 1789 by Alexander Mackenzie. The chief affluent is the Liard, which rises on the west side of the Rocky Mountains, and joins the Mackenzie after a course of 690 miles.

MACKINAC, mak'-in-aw, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 1,250 square miles. Pop. 2,000. The capital is Mackinaw.

MACKINTOSH, SIR JAMES, an eminent lawyer, politician, and historian, who at first studied medicine, at King's College, Aberdeen, and at Edinburgh, and obtained his diploma as physician and settled in London; but having a decided inclination towards politics and the law, he acted for some time as foreign correspondent of the "Oracle" newspaper, and afterwards set to work vigorously to qualify himself for practice at the bar. In 1791 he completed his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ," wherein he defended the principles of the French revolution against Burke. This work, which was highly successful, led to his becoming acquainted with Fox, Sheridan, and other leading Whigs, and he was chosen secretary to the "Association of the Friends of the People;" but although he gave much of his time to politics, he did not neglect his legal studies. In 1795 he was called to the bar. In 1799 he produced his "Introductory Discourse," relative to international law, a work which attracted towards him the notice of the highest men in the kingdom. About the same time he was granted the use of Lincoln's Inn Hall, for the purpose of delivering therein a course of lectures "On the Law of Nature and Nations." His success was triumphant. His political opinions next underwent considerable modification, and, applying himself more energetically to his profession, he soon begun to acquire the reputation of an eloquent counsel. In 1803, his speech for the defence during the action brought against M. Peltier, a French royalist, for a libel on Bonaparte, excited the greatest admiration, and, despite the efforts of the First Consul, was extensively read in France, in a French translation made by Madame de Staël. In 1804 he went to India, having received the recordership of Bombay, and been knighted on the occasion. As an Indian judge, his administration was characterised by humanity and wisdom. While in the East Indies, he founded the Literary Society of Bombay, and produced a plan for forming a comparative vocabulary of the Indian languages. On his return to England, he was offered a seat in parliament, with a prospect of high employment, by Mr. Perceval; a proposal which, together with those made later by Canning and Lord Liverpool, he respectfully declined. In 1813, however, he entered the House of Commons as member for Nairn, and, though not eminent as a parliamentary debater, nevertheless distinguished himself by several great oratorical efforts, on important and special questions, such as Roman Catholic emancipation, the abolition of slavery, municipal and parliamentary reform, and the amelioration of the criminal code. In 1818 he became professor of law and general politics at the East India College, Haileybury, an appointment he retained with much advantage to the students, until the year 1824. In was expected that when the Whigs came into power, in 1830, Sir James Mackintosh would be appointed to an important office; but, the only appointment his party could give him was that of a member of the Board of Control. In the debate on the Reform Bill he made an extraordinary speech, but, his health failing, he never again took a prominent place in debate. For many years he had maintained the intention of writing a History of England; and after arriving in England from India he commenced the preliminary labour of collecting materials for the great task. But his political employments, combined with his love of social enjoyment, left him no time to carry out his project. His Essays in the "Edinburgh Review," indeed, appear to have been a species of compromise made with his own conscience, for abandoning a duty he had imposed upon himself. After his death, his "History of the Revolution in 1688" was published. It was but a fragment of the great work, but a fine philosophical one, nevertheless. He also wrote a brief survey of English literature, and a Life of Sir Thomas More, for "Lardner's Cyclopædia;" a Dissertation on the Progress of Ethical Philosophy, for the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Born at Aldourie, near Inverness, 1765; died 1832.

MACKLIN, CHARLES, măk'-lin, a comedian and dramatic writer. His real name was MacLaughlin, which he altered to Macklin. He became a performer in the Lincoln's Inn company in 1725, and not long after was tried for killing another player in a quarrel, and found guilty of manslaughter. His features were so strongly marked, that Quin exclaimed, "If God writes a legible hand, that fellow's a villain." His greatest character was Shylock. Macklin wrote ten plays, two of which, "Love à la Mode," and "The Man of the World," possess considerable merit, and the latter is frequently performed. After his retirement from the stage he kept a tavern in Covent Garden, and lived to an extraordinary age.

Born, it is supposed, about 1690; died 1797.

MACLAURIN, COLIN, mak-law'-rin, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who received his education at the university of Glasgow, where he applied himself assiduously to the study of the mathematics. In 1717 he obtained the mathematical professorship in the Marischal College of Aberdeen, and, two years afterwards, became a fellow of the Royal Society of London. In 1724 he gained a prize from the French Academy of Sciences, and in 1725 he was chosen professor of mathematics at Edinburgh. In 1742 he published his "System of Fluxions," the most important of his works. In 1745, having taken an active part in fortifying Edinburgh against the Pretender and the rebels, he was compelled to fly, on which he took refuge with Archbishop Herring, at York. Besides the above works, he wrote several papers in the Philosophical Transactions: "Geometria Organica,"

"On the Percussion of Bodies," "A Treatise of Algebra," and an "Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries."

Born at Kilmodan, Argyleshire, 1698; died 1746.

MACLEAN, mak-leen', a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 1,132 square miles. Pop. 60,000. The capital is Bloomington.

MACLEAN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 7,800. The capital is Calhoun.

MACLENNAN, mak-len'-nan, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 960 square miles Pop. 26,934. The capital is Waco.

MACLEOD, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 504 square miles. Pop. 12,342. The capital is Glencoe.

MACLISE, DANIEL, R.A., ma-kleese', an eminent modern painter, who, from his earliest years, evinced a decided predilection for art; and, although placed in a banking-house at Cork, quitted it at the age of 16, and gave himself up to the study of drawing and painting, maintaining himself the while by selling sketches and portraits. He went to London in 1828, and entered the Royal Academy, where he rapidly advanced in his studies, and carried off the medals for drawing from the antique, for drawing from the life, and for painting the best historical picture. After spending several months in Paris, he exhibited his first picture at the British Institution in 1833, after which period he acquired, with extraordinary rapidity, the highest reputation. In 1835 he became A.R.A., and five years later he was elected a Royal Academician. His range of subjects, principally historic and dramatic scenes, was very large. Maclise was extensively employed as a portrait-painter. He painted many of the literary celebrities of his time, and his etchings (chiefly caricatures) of notable people, which appeared in "Fraser's Magazine," exhibited humour and great skill in catching characteristic expressions and attitudes. Some of the finest frescoes in the Palace of Westminster are from his hand.

Born at Cork, 1811; died 1870.

MACLURE, SIR ROBERT JOHN LE MESURIER, mak-klure', the practical discoverer of the north-west passage. He was educated by General Le Mesurier, who had adopted him as his son. After spending some time at Eton, he was, being intended for the army, transferred to Sandhurst, from which place he, with three other youths, ran away, and went to France. The general, finding that he had a strong inclination for the naval service, obtained for him the appointment of midshipman on board the Victory. Having attained the rank of lieutenant in 1836, he volunteered to serve in the exploring expedition then about to be sent to the Arctic seas. Returning from this voyage in little more than a year, he was appointed to the Hastings, and went out to Canada, where he acted for a period as superintendent of the dockyard at Quebec. In 1848 he was made first lieutenant in Sir John Ross's expedition in search of Sir John Franklin and his crew, and, on returning to England, in 1849, he was promoted to the grade of commander. In 1850 he again set out in search of Franklin, being appointed second in command of the expedition, under Captain Collinson. The Investigator, Maclure's ship, parted from the Enterprise, commanded by Captain Collinson, in a gale, in the Straits of Magellan, and never met again. The Enterprise was unable to enter Behring's Straits, and bore away to Hong Kong to pass the winter; but Maclure, shortly afterwards, succeeded in getting through, and reached Kotzebue Sound. Shortly afterwards, he was met by Captain Kellet, in the Herald, and directed to return; but Maclure resolved to proceed on his own responsibility. Beset by ice, he struggled onward, doubled Capes Bathurst and Parry, and discovered a land, upon which were high mountains and verdant valleys, which he named Baring's Island. He subsequently met, upon Prince Albert's Island, a race of aborigines, who had never hitherto held communication with Europeans. Finally, sailing up Prince of Wales Straits, he penetrated into Barrow Straits; that is to say, into the Atlantic Ocean: thus making known, in 1850, the long-sought north-west passage, which, however, Sir John Franklin had actually discovered before his sad death. Maclure was compelled to abandon his ship in the ice. On his return to England, he was knighted, and received a reward of £5,000 for his services.

Born at Wexford, Ireland, 1807; died 1873.

MACMAHON, MARIE EDME PATRICE MAURICE DE, mak-mah'-hon, marshal of France, duc de Magenta, and president of the French Republic, is descended from an Irish family, which, after living with distinction for many centuries in Ireland, risked all for the last of the Stuart kings. The present general's father, the count de Macmahon, who was an officer of high rank, a peer of France, a Grand Cross of the order of St. Louis, and a personal friend of Charles X., espoused a lady of the ducal house of Caraman, and left four sons and four daughters. Of that numerous family, the youngest is the hero of the Malakhoff and of Magenta. He was educated partly at his father's and partly at the seminary for young men destined for the priesthood in that city. He afterwards entered the military school at St. Cyr, on leaving which, in 1825, he entered the French military service, and in 1830 joined the army of Algeria, where he soon distinguished himself alike by his gallantry and his intelligence. After the combat of the Col de Terchia, in which he was aide-de-camp to general Achard, the latter said to him, "Can you carry to colonel Rullières, at Blidah, the order to change his march? As the mission is dangerous, I will give you a squadron of light dragoons as an escort." The young officer refused the escort, declaring that it was either too little or too much, and preferred going alone. On arriving at about half a mile from Blidah, he saw groups of the enemy's horsemen on each side, as well as behind him; but he went firmly on, knowing that a deep precipice, called the ravine of Blidah, was a little way in front of him. He there drove his horse, a high-blooded animal, at the tremendous chasm, and the animal, without hesitation, sprang into mid-air. The rider held his seat immovably, and escaped unhurt, but was obliged to abandon his charger, which had its fore-legs broken. Not one of the Arabs ventured to take the desperate leap, and the young officer reached Blidah in safety. He rose rapidly through the different grades, and attained that of general of brigade in 1848. For a time he occupied the position of governor of the province of Oran, and afterwards of Constantina; and in 1852 became general of division. In 1855, when general Canrobert left the Crimea, general Macmahon was selected by the emperor to succeed him in the command of a division; and when the chiefs of the allied armies resolved on assaulting Sebastopol, he had assigned to him the honourable and perilous post of carrying the works of the Malakhoff. Afterwards in the Italian campaign, his able conduct at the battle of Magenta, where, although he had received no orders to do so, he pressed forward, and arrived in time to secure the victory to the French, a piece of service which gained him the highest rank in the French army. He was nominated governor-general of Algeria in 1864, and commanded the first army corps in the Franco-German war, but was overpowered by the superior strength of the Germans at Worth, and wounded and captured at Sedan. In 1871 he was made commander-in-chief of the French army, and in May, 1873, succeeded M. Thiers as president of the Republic.

Born at Sully, 1808.

MACMINN, mak-min', a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 475 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom 2,000 are coloured. The capital is Athens.

MACMULLEN, mak-mul'-len, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,092 square miles. Pop. 400.

MACOMB, ma-komb', a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 460 square miles. Pop. 31,627. The capital is Mount Clemens.

MACON, ma'-kawng, a town of France, department of the Saône-and-Loire, on the right bank of the Saône, 38 miles N. of Lyons. It has a neat quay, bordered with good buildings, along the bank of the river, which is crossed by a bridge of 12 arches, erected in the 9th century. The chief buildings are the town-hall, a cathedral, the hôtel de ville, and the hôtel de prefecture. A statue of Lamartine was inaugurated in 1878. Manf. Watches and jewellery, woollen covers, earthenware, and agricultural implements. Pop. 19,600.

MACON, ma'-kon, a county of Alabama, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 18,000, two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Tuskegee.

MACON, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 353 square miles. Pop. 12,000, about three-fourths being coloured. The capital is Lanier.

MACON, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 549 square miles. Pop. 31,000. The capital is Decatur.

MACON, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 828 square miles. Pop. 26,000. The capital is Bloomington.

MACON, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 8,000. The capital is Franklin.

MACON, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 260 square miles. Pop. 9,000. The capital is Lafayette.

MACON, a city of Georgia, United States, capital of Bibb county, on both sides of the river Ocmulgee, which is crossed by a fine bridge. It is a very handsome city, and a great railroad centre. A large amount of cotton is shipped here. Pop. 12,000.

MACON, a city of Missouri, United States, 170 miles N. W. of St. Louis. Pop. 4,000.

MACOUPIN, ma-koo'-pin, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 864 square miles. Pop. 38,000. The capital is Carlinville.

MACPHERSON, JAMES, mak-fer'-son, a Scotch poet. He studied at King's College, Aberdeen, and afterwards became a village schoolmaster. In 1760 he published a few poems purporting to be translations from the Gaelic, and being helped with funds by the Faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh, he made a tour in the Highlands to collect more materials, and in 1762 he published in London a book described as a translation of poems attributed by him to Ossian, entitled "Fingal," followed in the next year by "Temora." These poems certainly possessed great beauty; but their authenticity was disputed by Dr. Johnson and other writers, and as zealously maintained by the editor and Dr. Blair; it is now, however, generally admitted that the poems were not genuine. In 1773 Macpherson published a translation of the "Iliad" into heroic prose, a work of little value. He was also the author of an "Introduction to the History of Great Britain and Ireland," "A History of Great Britain, from 1660 to the Accession of the House of Hanover," and of some political pamphlets in defence of Lord North's administration, for which he obtained a place as surveyor-general of the Floridas, and afterwards another lucrative appointment as agent to the Nabob of Arcot, and in 1780 was returned to the House of Commons for Camelford, which he represented for ten years. He died in Scotland, but was buried by his own request, and at his own expense, in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Ruthven, Inverness-shire, 1738; died 1796.

MACQUARIE, -mak-qua'-re, a county of New South Wales. Area, 2,800 square miles. Pop. 12,828.

MACQUARIE, known as BREWONGLE, a seaport, capital of the above county, at the mouth of the Hastings, 195 miles, N.E. of Sydney. Only small vessels can enter the harbour, but there is good anchorage outside. Pop. 800. Lat. 31° 25′ S., lon. 152° 57′ E.

MACQUARIE, a river of eastern Australia, formed by the junction of the Fish and Campbell rivers, and, after a course of 280 miles, losing itself in marshes, in lat. 30° 45′ S., lon. 147° 10′ E.

MACREADY, WILLIAM CHARLES, mak-ré'-de, a celebrated actor, son of the manager of a provincial company, but educated at Rugby. He first appeared on the stage at Birmingham, as Romeo, in 1809, and in London in 1816, rising gradually to a very high position. In 1826 he went to the United States, and two years afterwards to Paris, where he was greatly admired. In 1837 and the following year he was manager of Covent-garden, and afterwards for three seasons at Drury-lane. At each theatre he produced standard and original plays in a splendid manner, and greatly exerted himself to purify the stage, but his efforts resulted in pecuniary loss. In 1849 he again visited the United States, and at New York the jealousy of an American actor led to a riot, in which several lives were sacrificed, Macready himself barely escaping. He finally retired from the stage in 1851, and was entertained at a farewell banquet, attended by most of the celebrities in literature and art. He retired to Sherborne in Dorsetshire, and devoted the remainder of his life to forwarding the work of education in rural districts. He was an actor of marked genius, combining the intensity of the realistic school with much of the stateliness of the famous actors of the previous generation. Among his finest Shakspearian characters were Macbeth, Lear, Hamlet, Iago, King John, Richard the Second, and Henry the Fifth, and he "created" the great modern parts of Virginius, William Tell, Werner, and Claude Melnotte. His "Reminiscences and Diary," was published a year after his death.

Born in London, 1793; Died 1873.

MACRI, mak'-re, a small port of Asiatic Turkey, province of Anatolia. Lat. 36° 37' N. Lon. 29° 9' E.

MACRINUS, MARCUS OPELIUS, ma-kri'-nus, Roman emperor, born of humble parentage, but attracting the notice of Septimius Severus, held several appointments in the Imperial household. He plotted the assassination of Caracella, on whose death he was proclaimed emperor. Elagabalus claiming the throne, Macrinus marched against him, but was defeated at Antioch, and fled to Chalcedon, where he was betrayed, and he was afterwards put to death.

Born in Mauritania, 164; died in Cappadocia, 218.

MACROBIUS, AMBROSIUS AURELIUS THEODOSIUS, ma-kro'-be-us, a Latin writer on grammar, is supposed to have been a Greek, but whether a Christian or pagan is unknown. He wrote a commentary on Cicero's "Dream of Scipio;" "Saturnalia, or Miscellanies," and a work on Greek and Latin verbs, some fragments of which remain.

Lived in the 5th century.

MADAGASCAR, mad-a-gas'-car, a large island of the Indian Ocean, off the coast of Africa, from which it is separated by the Mozambique Channel, about 120 miles across in the narrowest part. It is 1,031 miles long, and the greatest breadth is 350 miles. The most remarkable physical feature is the great central mountain mass, which rises into lofty hills at the northern extremity of the island, but sinks towards the southern cape. The rise from the eastern coast is by a grand succession of terraces, leading to the broad central plateau of Imerina. There are less striking terraces descending to the western coast, and to the north-west are four steppes, each about 800 feet higher than the next, and each having a distinct pass. In the north these terraces unite in a lofty mountain mass, and in the south they are crossed about lat. 22° S. by a range crossing the island, beyond which the surface sinks to a level plain. The plateau of Imerina and its southern continuation, the Betsileo province, are bounded by huge mountain masses, chiefly of volcanic origin. The Ankarat mountains, on the south-west, cover a space of 600 square miles, and the five central peaks, covered with broken lava, but exhibiting no distinct craters, attain a height of from 8,000 to 8,950 feet above the sea level. Farther south are at least 100 extinct volcanos. The plateau of Imerina is the most beautiful and fertile part of the island, although there are ranges of granite hills and barren moors in the eastern part. It is about 110 miles long, and 90 miles broad. In it are the capital, ANTANANARIVA, and hundreds of villages. The adjoining Betsileo province has but few fertile or well cultivated spots, but the scenery is very fine. The southern part is known as Iarindrano ("full of water"), from the many streams. Silianka province, farther north, occupies a depression in the midst of hills, with large swamps in the centre. The climate of the island is moist in the northern and eastern parts; but generally temperate and healthy, except near the coast. In some of the mountain districts are fine forests, and a belt of vegetation skirts the shore. On the north-eastern shore are several good inlets and harbours, the more important being Diego Suarez, a large bay with fine harbours; and farther south, Port Luguez, Port Leven, Vohemare, Antongil Bay, and Tamtare, near the centre of the island, and the most frequented port on the east coast. There are many bays and prominent headlands on the west coast. Cape Amber is the extreme northern point of the island: between that and Cape St. Andrew, about five degrees further south, are the bays of Chimpaika, Passandava, Narinda, Mazamba, and Bembatooka. In the southern part of the west coast, to the south of Cape St. Vincent (the most westerly point of the island) Murderers' Bay, and the Bay of St. Augustine. Majunga, on the north side of Bembatooka Bay, is the principal port of the island.

Rivers and Lakes.—The chief rivers are the Betsiboóka, flowing through a beautiful valley on the north-west side of the island, and falling into the Bay of Bembatooka, by an estuary 30 miles wide; the Matsiatra, in Betsileo province, formed by the union of many mountain streams, and falling into the Indian Ocean; the Manartavana, rising in the great mountain mass of Ambondrombe, in Iarindrano, and falling into the Mozambique Channel; the Ikiopa and Betelboka, draining Imerina, and flowing in a north-west direction; and the Mánankázo, or "wooded river," also flowing in a north-westerly direction. A very large river, the Yonghelaké, of which little is known, also falls into the Mozambique Channel. The best known lakes, small in size, but generally remarkable for the beauty of the surrounding scenery, and containing islands, are Lakes Kazamba and Itaog, in Imerina; and Alaoutra, 37 miles long, in Silianka province. On the eastern side is a chain of lakes, extending for 150 miles, along and near to the coast.

Pro.—Rice, cotton, sugar, and hemp are cultivated; ginger, pepper, and indigo grow wild; bamboos, tamarinds, mangoes, and palms, grow luxuriantly.

Zoology.—The only known wild animals are the ounce, wild dog, wild cat, and bushy-tailed fox. In most of the rivers are crocodiles; and snakes of great size, but not commonly venomous, are met with. There are many varieties of monkeys and bats. Small birds with beautiful plumage are numerous, and wild ducks, storks, herons, and flamingos, are common. Scorpions, centipedes, poisonous spiders, and, at certain seasons, locusts, abound. The chief domestic animals are cattle, with humps like those of the Indian species, and fat-tailed sheep.

Area.—225,000 square miles.

Pop.—4,000,000, divided into three tribes, the Hovas (by far the most numerous), the Betsimasarakas, and the Sakalavas. Malagasy is the name generally given to the entire population. They exhibit many Malay characteristics, and in their language are many Malay words. A great resemblance to the Japanese has been traced in some of the inhabitants of the west coast. Some of the natives are clever mechanics, especially as silversmiths, gunsmiths, and weavers.

Lat. 11° 57'—25° 42' S. Lon. 43° 10'—50° 25' E.

Government.—A monarchical hereditary despotism; females are allowed to reign.

History.—The English established a factory at St. Augustine's, on the western coast, in 1644, but the climate and the hostility of the natives compelled them to abandon it two years afterwards. The French made attempts to colonise the eastern coast in 1642, 1745, and in 1773, but in 1816 the English, having obtained possession of the Mauritius, claimed the French Madagascar settlements, which were considered to belong to the Mauritius. The native king, Radama, a man of considerable ability, sent his brothers to be educated in the Mauritius, and on their return, he abolished infanticide, discouraged the fetishism and superstitious observances, and formed a regular army, by means of which he subdued the whole of the island. He began to form roads, and encouraged missionaries. He died in 1828, and his widow, so far from carrying out his views, closed the schools he had established, drove out the missionaries, and cruelly persecuted the native Christians. She died in 1861, and was succeeded by her son, Radama II., who was more tolerant and humane; but he was strangled two years after he came to the throne. The present queen, Ranavalona, is a Christian, and soon after her accession, publicly burnt the idols. In 1867 she liberated all the slaves in the island, in conformity with a treaty with England.

MADAMPE, ma-dam'-pe, a town of Ceylon, district Galle, on a river of the same name, in a beautiful and fertile country. Pop. 4,000.

MADAPOLLAM, mad'-a-pol-lam', a maritime town of British India, in Madras, 38 miles N.E. of Masulipitam, on the right bank of the southern branch of the Godavery, at its outlet. Manf. cotton cloth.

MADARAS, mad'-a-ras', a market-town of Hungary, circle of Kuber Thiess, 37 miles S.W. of Debreczin. Pop. 4,600.

MADAWASKA, ma'-daw-as'-ka, a new county of New Brunswick, dominion of Canada. Area, 1,500 square miles. The capital is Edmundston.

MADDALENA, LA, mad-da-lai'-na, an island off the north coast of Sardinia, at the entrance of the Straits of Bonifacio. It has a small town, with a good harbour. Pop. 2,200.

MADDALONI, mad-da-lo'-ne, a town of Italy, province of Terra di Lavoro, 14 miles N.E. of Naples. It has a college, and several fine palaces and churches. Pop. 19,104.

MADDEN, SIR FREDERIC, mad'-den, an eminent antiquarian writer, who, in 1826, entered the library of the British Museum, and rose to the grade of keepership of the department of Manuscripts in 1837. Both alone and in conjunction with others he produced many valuable works, the chief of which are: an edition of the earliest English version of the Bible, made by Wycliffe and his followers; an abridged translation of M. Silvestre's "Universal Paleography," and several of the old metrical romances of the 13th century. He became a knight of the Hanoverian order in 1832.

Born at Portsmouth, 1801; died 1873.

MADEIRA, ma-deer'-a,—Portuguese for "timber," a name descriptive of the forests formerly covering a large part of the island,—the largest island of a group belonging to Portugal, off the W. coast of Africa, in the Atlantic Ocean, 280 miles N. of the Canaries. The other islands, Porto Santo, and the Desertas, are small and unimportant. Madeira is 34 miles long and 12 broad, and consists of a collection of lofty mountains, the highest, Pico Ruivo, upwards of 6,000 feet. There are several other peaks over 4,000 feet in height. There are some remarkable valleys, with steep sides, one of them, the "Cumal," having a depth of more than 2,000 feet. The coasts are steep and precipitous, with few bays or landing places, but with deep narrow gorges in the cliffs, which in some parts are 2,000 feet high. On the declivity of the mountains all the productions of the island are raised. Vines form the chief object of cultivation, but wheat, barley, oats, coffee, sugar, and arrowroot, are produced in the lower parts of the island, where tropical fruits grow freely. Goats and hogs abound, and the rabbit is very common in the mountainous districts. Bees are plentiful, and the honey they produce is very delicate. On account of the salubrity of its climate, the island is much resorted to by invalids. The exports consist chiefly of wine. There is also an export trade in sugar, citron, embroidery, salt beef, and hides. FUNCHAL is the capital.

Pop.—130,584, (including the small adjacent islands), of mixed Portuguese, Moorish, and Negro descent.

History.—The group of islands was known to Roman geographers as the Purpurariæ Insulæ. They were colonised by the Portuguese in 1431; but there is a tradition that Madeira was discovered in 1344 by an English mariner, who was driven there by a storm, and afterwards escaped to Portugal in a canoe which he had made. The British took possession of the island in 1801, and again in 1807, and held it for the royal family of Portugal, who had emigrated to the Brazils. It was restored to the Portuguese in 1814. In 1852 the vines were destroyed by disease, and for several years none of the famous wine was produced; but the manufacture has been recently resumed.

MADEIRA, or MADERA, or CAYARA, a large river of Brazil. It is formed by the junction of the Beni Mamore, Madalena, and Stanez, about lat. 10° S. From this point it flows in a north-easterly direction for 800 miles, the first 200 miles being obstructed by cataracts, and enters the Amazon in lat. 3° 25′ S.; lon. 59° 45′ W. The total length from the head waters of the Mamore, the chief affluent, is 1,500 miles.

MADELEY-MARKET, mad'-le, a market-town of Shropshire, near the Severn, 13 miles S.E. of Shrewsbury. It has a church, market-house, and an iron bridge across the Severn. Manf. Porcelain. In the vicinity are ironworks and coal-mines. Pop. 9,211.—A station on the Great Western railway.

MADHAVA-ATCHARY, mad'-ha-va'-at'-cha-re, Hindoo scholar, known by his commentaries on the Vedas, and several philosophical treatises. He was prime minister to several of the kings of the Deccan. He lived to the age of 90.

Born 1119; died 1209.

MADIOEN, or MADIEN, mad'-e-on, a maritime province of Java, undulating, very fertile, and well watered by the Madion, Solo, Koepan, Loerak, Poengoel, and other rivers. Rice, cotton, coffee, and indigo are cultivated and exported. Pop. 270,000. The district came into possession of the Dutch in 1830.

MADISON, JAMES, fourth president of the United States of America, studied law, and commenced his political career as a member of the Virginian convention in 1776. In the first congress after the constitution in 1779, he was a member, and became leader of the Republican party. In 1801 he was appointed secretary of state, and became president in 1809, an office he filled during two terms. He retired to his estate at Montpelier, Virginia, and became rector of the university of that state.

Born at King George, Virginia, 1751; died 1836.

MADISON, a city of Indiana, United States, capital of Jefferson county, on the Ohio, 60 miles S.W. of Cincinnati. Manf. Woollen, cotton, and iron. Pork-packing is largely carried on, and there is a flourishing trade. Pop. 8,945.

MADISON, the capital of Wisconsin, United States, 80 miles W. of Lake Michigan. There are the state capitol, lunatic asylum, university, and eight churches. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 10,324, including many Norwegians.

MADISON, capital of Morgan county, Georgia, United States. There are two colleges, one for females. Pop. 3,600.

MADISON, the name of 19 counties in the United States:—

ALABAMA.—Area, 760 square miles. Pop. 38,000, half being coloured. The capital is Huntsville.

ARKANSAS.—Area. 800 square miles. Pop 11,455. The capital is Huntsville.

FLORIDA.—Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 14,798. half being coloured. The capital is Madison.

KENTUCKY.—Area, 434 square miles. Pop. 22,052. nearly one-third being coloured. The capital is Richmond.

LOUISIANA.—Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 13 906. about 8,000 being coloured. The capital is Richmond.

MISSISSIPI.—Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 25,866. three fourths being coloured. The capital is Canton.

MISSOURI.—Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 8,876. Frederick is the capital.

MONTANA TERRITORY.—Area, 5,100 square miles. Pop. 3,915. The capital is Virginia City.

OHIO.—Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 20,129. The capital is London.

TENNESSEE.—Area, 265 square miles. Pop. 30,874.; nearly one-half being coloured. The capital is Jackson.

TEXAS.—Area, 336 square miles. Pop. 5,395. one-third being coloured. The capital is Madisonville.

VIRGINIA.—Area, 276 square miles. Pop. 10,562. more than one-third being coloured. The capital is Madison Courthouse.

MADISON'S RIVER, one of the three head streams of the Missouri, which it joins in lat. 45° 22′ 34″ N.

MADJICOSUNA ISLANDS. (See BABUYANES.)

MÄDLER, JOHANN HEINRICH, mæd'-ler, Prussian astronomer, having obtained a reputation by assisting in the production of a map of the moon, the best then known, was, in 1836, appointed director of the Berlin Observatory, and in 1840, director of the Russian Observatory at Dorpat. He has published many works and separate papers on astronomical and mathematical subjects, but is best known by his announcement of the discovery of a central sun around which all the visible stars revolve.

Born at Berlin, 1794; died at Hanover, 1874.

MADOC, ma-doc' (the son of Owain Gwynnedd), a Welsh prince, who is said to have gone to sea in 1170, and it is supposed he reached the American continent. According to the chronicle of Caradoc, he returned to Wales, and equipped another and larger fleet, with which he sailed, and was never afterwards heard of. It is said there was a tribe of white Indians on the northern branches of the Missouri river, whose language greatly resembled the Welsh.

MADONIAN MOUNTAINS, ma-dō'-ne-an, a group in the island of Sicily, between the rivers Grande and Pollina.

MADOX, THOMAS, mad'-ox, an English antiquary and historiographer royal, who published, in 1702, a "Collection of Ancient Charters and Instruments of divers kinds, taken from the Originals, from the Conquest to the Reign of Henry VIII." In 1711 appeared his "History and Antiquities of the Exchequer." His last work was the "Firma Burgi; or, Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England."

Died 1736.

MADRAS, ma-dras', a province (commonly described as a presidency) of British India, occupying a considerable portion of the eastern and southern part of the peninsula, bounded N.W. by Bombay, N. by the Nizam's dominions and Central Provinces, N.E. by Bengal, and E. by the Bay of Bengal and Indian Ocean. It extends between lat. 8° 5′ N. and 20° 18′ N., has an extreme length of 950 miles and breadth of 450 miles. Portions of the Eastern and Western Ghauts and the Neilgherry Hills traverse the province. The coast, 1,730 miles long, is generally low and marshy, and most difficult of approach; but on the northern part, on what is known as the Orissa coast, it rises into rocks of moderate elevation. There are extensive forests of teak, ebony, and other valuable timber, and tropical fruits and vegetables grow abundantly. The climate varies considerably. On the east coast the heat is, on the average, greater than in any other part of India, but in the Neilgherry and other elevated districts, the air is delightfully cool and salubrious. The French settlements of Pondicherry, Karial, Yanaon, and Mahé are within the province.

Rivers.—The Godavery, Kistnah, Pennar, Carvery, and Vygay, all flowing eastward into the Bay of Bengal and Indian Ocean.

Pop.—34,213,353, mostly Hindoos in religion and of the Tamil race.

Government.—The governor, appointed by the crown, is assisted by a council of three members, and there is a legislative council.

Divisions.—There are three divisions or commissionerships, North, Central, and Southern, and 21 districts. In the south-west, the allied states of Cochin and Travancore are administered under the superintendence of the Madras government.

MADRAS, called by the natives CHENNAPATAM ("city of Chennapa," a native prince), a maritime city and fortress of British India, and the capital of the above province. It is very badly situated on a flat sandy shore, where the surf runs with extreme violence, and where it is surrounded by salt-water creeks or rivers, which prevent the introduction of a stream of fresh water into the town, which extends (including suburbs) 9 miles along the coast, and has an average breadth of 3½ miles. Near the centre is Fort St. George, a strong citadel, within the limits of which are comprised several public offices. The most important buildings are St. George's Cathedral, which contains some fine monuments by Flaxman and Chantrey; and eight other episcopal churches; a fine Scotch church, St. Andrew's; a university, with good museum and library; the Government House, two orphan asylums, various literary and scientific societies, and the Madras Club. The native, or Black town, is nearly a mile to the north of the fort. It lies low, being defended against the sea by a stone sea-wall. There are some good streets and bazaars, and seven wells from which pure water, a great desideratum, is obtained. Madras is an episcopal see, the first bishop having been appointed in 1835, and there is also a Roman Catholic bishop. The trade is considerable with Europe, the United States, China, Ceylon, Peru, the Isle of France, and different parts of India; but, owing to the want of a navigable river, and the difficulty of landing goods on account of the heavy surf, it labours under great disadvantages. The chief exports are coffee, rice, cotton, and hides, amounting to more than £7,000,000 in annual value. The climate of Madras is very hot.

Pop.—405,848, mostly Hindoos, less than 1,500 being British-born residents.

Lat. 13° 5′ N. Lon. 80° 16′ E.

History.—The site of this city formed the first acquisition of the British in India, who, in 1639, obtained permission to erect a fort here. The French took possession of Madras in 1746, and entirely destroyed the Black town and every building which stood within 300 yards of the fort. Out of the ruins they constructed an excellent glacis. The city was restored to the British at the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1749.

MADRID, ma-drid', a central province of Spain, formerly a portion of New Castile. The whole surface is elevated, and in the northern part it is covered by ranges of the Sierra de Guadarrama. There are only a few fertile districts, the greater portion of the province being a bleak barren tableland.

Rivers.—The Tagus, which forms part of the southern boundary; the Tajuna, Henares, Torote, Jarama, Manzanares, and Guadarrama.
Minerals.—Lead, copper, iron.
Area.—1,315 square miles.
Pop.—594,546.
Chief Towns.—MADRID, the capital; ALCALA, and Colmenar.

MADRID, the capital of Spain, in the province of the same name, on the left bank of the river Manzanares, a small stream, which joins the Jamara, an affluent of the Tagus, about 300 miles from the sea on each side, on a table-land nearly 2,000 feet in elevation. It is surrounded by a wall, with 16 gates, the finest of which are the Puerta de Alcala, on the east, and the Puerta de Toledo, on the south, the latter erected in 1813 to commemorate the war of independence. The Puerta del Sol, once the eastern gate, is now in the centre of the city. The old streets are narrow and crooked, but many others are wide, straight, and regular; and some of them equal those of the finest cities in Europe. There are about 70 squares, most of them are very small; the best are the Plaza Mayor, the Plaza de Oriente, and the Plaza de las Cortes, and the small square named after the Puerta del Sol. From the last named run the finest streets, the Calle de Alcala, lined with houses, and the Calle Mayor, traversing the city from east to west, and crossed by the fashionable thoroughfares. The Calle de Montera and the Calle de las Carretas, running north and south. Another fine street, the Carrera de Geronimo, has been recently constructed. The Plaza Mayor is 434 feet long and 334 feet wide, surrounded by arcades, with an equestrian statue of Philip III. in the centre. Public executions and autos da fé formerly took place here. The Plaza de Oriente is more to the west, facing the royal palace, and adorned with 40 statues of Gothic kings as well as kings of the Asturias, Leon, Castelle, and Aragon. The Plaza de las Cortes has a colossal statue of Cervantes in the centre. Some other squares are used as market-places. The most remarkable churches are St. Jerome's, with a portal richly ornamented with Gothic sculpture; the church of St. Isidore, with a fine front; the church of San Francisco, one of the finest in the city; that of the Mendicant Friars and the church of the Incarnation. The monument of the bishop of Placencia, in the chapel called del Obispo; the silver tabernacle, in the church of St. Martin; the altar and monument of Joan of Austria, in the church of the Franciscan nuns, are worthy of notice. There about 20 nunneries, the most important being the Salesas Viejas, or convent of the Salutation, occupying with its grounds 88 acres, in the north-eastern part of the city, and built in 1758 by queen Barbara; the marble of the high altar is very handsome. Of the other public buildings, the finest are the Palace of the Cortes, on the Plaza de las Cortes; the Palace of the Council, a classic edifice, built in the 16th century; the Audience, or court of appeal; the custom-house, a very fine building; the post-office, erected in 1768, and the town-house, built in the beginning of the 16th century. The war office and a military museum are in the Buenavista Palace, built by the duchess of Alva about the end of the last century. The Palacio Real is of a square form, 470 feet long on each side, 100 feet high, and enclosing a court 240 feet square, and includes the Museo, one of the finest picture galleries in the world, containing paintings by the best masters of Flanders, Italy, and Spain; also the crown jewels and other regalia; a public library, and a superb collection of armour. The Buen Retiro, on the eastern side of the city, a palace built by Philip IV., has very extensive gardens open to the public, and also a large collection of paintings. The new palace of the duke of Salamanca is a superb building, with a fine picture gallery. Of the public walks, the principal is the Prado ("meadows") which runs along a great part of the east side of the city. It forms a broad walk, planted with trees, for carriages, and an alley on each side for pedestrains. Madrid enjoys almost always a cloudless sky, and a pure and serene atmosphere; but the air is extremely keen, from its elevated site and the vicinity of the snowy mountains of Guadarrama. The great school of Madrid occupies a building which formerly belonged to the Jesuits. There is a botanical garden; also a chemical school, classes for engineering, for anatomy, and the practice of medicine; academies for the study of history, painting, sculpture, and architecture; also for the Spanish language. There are seven theatres, and an immense Plaza de Toros, or arena for bullfights, outside the Alcala Gate. The charitable institutions are numerous, among them three hospitals and an asylum for foundlings. Manf. Carpets and porcelain, paper, jewellery, hats, and silks. Pop. 397,816. History.—The old name was Majerit; it was taken by Ramiro II., king of Leon, in 932, and captured by Alfonso VI. of Castile, from the Moors in 1083. In 1560 Philip II. made it the residence of the court. It was occupied early in 1808 by the French troops, who were finally obliged to quit it in 1812. The French troops, under the duke d'Angoulême, again entered it in May 1823.

MADRID, NEW, a town of Missouri, United States, near the bank of the Mississippi. Pop. 2,000.

MADRIDEJOS, ma'-drid'-ai-hose, a town of Spain, province of Toledo, 40 miles S.E. of the city of that name, near the Amarguillo, crossed by two bridges. Manf. Serges and woollens generally. Pop. 5,100.

MADURA, ma-door'-a, an ancient city, and capital of a district of the same name, on the river Vygat, in the south of India, 33 miles from Dindigal. There are several good public buildings, including a fine palace, now falling to decay, and an immense temple, with four pyramidal porticoes. Pop. 73,810; of the district, 2,168,680.

MADURA, an island of the Malay Archipelago, situate off the north-east coast of the island of Java, from which it is separated by a narrow channel, called the Strait of Madura. A long chain of hills, in no part over 1,400 feet in height crosses the island, and the rivers are small. The country throughout is fertile and tolerably cultivated; but it is, on the whole, inferior in this respect to Java. There are three states—Madura, in the west; Sumanap, in the east; and Pamakasan, in the centre; the last is directly under the rule of the Dutch, to whom the princes of the other divisions are tributary. The exports are sugar, tobacco, indigo, cocoa-nut oil, horses, and horned cattle. Pop. 670,000, of whom about 5,000 are Chinese, and 9,000 Arabs and other Eastern people. Area, 1,300 square miles. The Dutch invaded this island about the year 1747, and made slaves of a great number of the inhabitants.

MÆANDER, me-an'-der, the ancient name of a river of Asia Minor, now the Meinder.

MÆCENAS, CAIUS CILNIUS, me-sé'-nas, the intimate friend of Augustus, and so liberal a patron of men of letters, that his name has been proverbialised to express persons of the same disposition, and it was chiefly to him that Virgil and Horace owed the means which enabled them to devote themselves to poetry. According to Horace, he was descended from the kings of Etruria. Augustus appointed him administrator of all Italy. He was the great friend of Virgil and Horace, who immortalised him in their works. He distinguished himself also in the field, particularly at the battles of Modena and Philippi. When Augustus and Agrippa went to Sicily, Mæcenas had the administration of the government, though he was not a man of ambition. He was a gross sensualist, and famous for entertainments of the most epicurean kind, and he wrote some tragedies, which are lost. He died childless, and left his property to Augustus.

Died, 8 B.C.

MAELAR, LAKE, ma'-lar, a lake of Sweden, running inland from the Baltic about 81 miles, with an average breadth of 12 miles. It is surrounded by the districts of Stockholm, Nykoping, Upsal, and Westeras. It contains upwards of 1,200 islands, and the shores are very attractive, many charming residences, with lawns and woodlands, being near the lake, the waters of which are discharged into the Baltic, near Stockholm.

MAESE, MAAS, or MEUSE, mai'-se, the German name of a river of Europe, which rises in the French department of Haute-Marne, passes through Belgium and Limburg, and enters the Netherlands to the north of Charleville. At Dordrecht it divides into two branches, the Nieuwe Maas and the Oude Maas, enclosing the island of Ysselmonde, again uniting and entering the North Sea, after a course of 552 miles, draining an area of 19,000 square miles. It is navigable for 430 miles, as high as Verdun, and the chief affluents are the Sambre and Diez on the left bank, and the Ourthe, Roer, and Niers, on the right.

MAESEYCK, mai'-sai'-eck, a town of Belgium, on the left bank of the Meuse, 17 miles N.E. of Maestricht. Manf. Tobacco, hats, and earthenware. Pop. 4,600.

MAESTRICHT, maise'-treecht, a town of the Netherlands, and capital of Dutch Limburg, on the left bank of the Maese, where that river is joined by the small stream of the Jaer, 110 miles from Amsterdam. It communicates with the suburb of Nijk, on the opposite side, by means of a stone bridge 500 feet in length, with 9 arches, and defended by small fortified islands. The market-place and the place d'armes are two handsome public squares. Of the public buildings, the principal are the large town-hall, the church of St. Gervais, Roman Catholic, Lutheran, and other churches, the college, once occupied by the Jesuits, the theatre, and the citadel, which is built on a mountain, where are found some remarkable petrifactions. Maestricht is one of the strongest places of the Netherlands. It is surrounded by walls and deep and wide canals. Manf. Leather, flannel, stockings, woollens, soap, pins, sugar, and hardware goods, and there are extensive breweries and distilleries. Pop. 29,925. This town was taken by the French in 1794; and from 1795 till 1814 it was the capital of the French department of the Lower Meuse.

MAFFEI, FRANCESCO SCIPIONE, maf-fai'-e Marchese, Italian author, student in the Jesuit College of Parma, and saw military service under his brother, a distinguished soldier. He preferred literature as a pursuit, and contributed to a journal at Verona, intended to familiarise his countrymen with foreign literature. In 1713 he published at Modena, "Merope," a tragedy, which attained great popularity, and a successful comedy, "La Ceremonia," speedily followed. He devoted much time to researches into the language and literature of ancient Greece, and published a valuable work, "Verona Illustrata."

Born at Verona, 1675; died 1755.

MAFRA, ma'-fra, a town of Portugal, province of Estremadura, 18 miles N.W. of Lisbon. There is an immense royal palace, with convent attached, built early in the 17th century; the edifice is 780 feet long, and 690 wide, and contains 866 rooms and a superbly fitted library, 300 feet long. Pop. 3,500.

MAGADOXO or MUKDISHA, mag-a-dox'-o, an Arabian town of Eastern Africa, the principal entrepôt between the river Juba and Cape Gardafui, belonging to the Imaum of Muscat. It is inclosed by strong walls, but is very unhealthy. Pop. about 5,000. Lat. 2° 2′ N. Lon. 45° 25′ E.

MAGALHAENS, commonly called MAGELLAN, FERNANDO DE, ma-gel'-lan, a famous Portuguese navigator. In 1510 he served under Albuquerque, in the East Indies, and distinguished himself by his bravery, and by his exact knowledge of the Indian seas. On his return to Portugal he aspired to the rank of commander, but, being disappointed, he entered into the service of the emperor Charles V., and proposed a scheme for reaching the Moluccas by a western route. The king gave him the command of a fleet, with which, in 1520, he discovered the straits called by his name, at the extremity of South America and the South Pacific Ocean, after which he took possession of the Philippine islands, in the name of the king of Spain. He was slain at those islands in a skirmish with the natives. Of this expedition, only one vessel, with 18 men, returned to Europe, and was the first that made a voyage round the world.

Born 1470; died 1521.

MAGALHAENS, STRAIT OF, separates South America from Terra del Fuego. It is 300 miles long, with a breadth varying from 5 to 30 miles. The navigation is dangerous.

MAGDALEN ISLANDS, mag'-da-lene, a group of 11 islands, belonging to British North America, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The largest are Coffin's, Amherst, Wolf, and Saunders.

MAGDALEN RIVER, mag'-da-lon, a river of Canada, falling into the St. Lawrence.

MAGDALENA, mag-da-lai'-na, a large river of Colombia, South America, rising on the frontier of Ecuador, in lat. 2° N., and lon. 76° W., and, after a course of 900 miles, enters the sea in lat. 11° N., lon. 75° W.

MAGDALENA, the most northern state of the republic of Colombia, South America. It is bounded on E. by Venezuela, on W. by the Magdalena river, S. by the State of Santander, and N. by the Caribbean Sea. The western, southern, and north-eastern portions of the State are mostly plain country; on the north-east the Sierra de Santa Marta, which is totally unconnected with the South American mountain system, rises to a height of 16,000 feet, this being above the snow line. The chief town is Santa Marta.

Area.—26,950 square miles.
Pop.—167,000. The Guajiros and Arracos Indians dwell near the coast; the former are famous for breeding small useful horses; the latter follow agricultural and industrial pursuits.

MAGDALENA, SANTA, a bay on the N.E. coast of Malta, 4 miles from Valetta.

MAGDALENA, the most southern of the Marquesas islands, in the Pacific Ocean, 33 miles in circumference. It is mountainous, rising to 3,700 feet, and densely populated.

MAGDEBURG, mag'-de-boorg, a fortified city of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the left bank of the Elbe, 80 miles from Berlin. It is one of the strongest fortresses in Germany, being surrounded by a number of outworks, and having a citadel on an island in the river, with an arsenal and storehouses. Of its squares, or open spaces, the principal are the Cathedral square, which has a number of neat houses; the Old market, and the Prince's market, adjoining to the public walks. There is one wide thoroughfare the Breite Weg, or "broadway," but the streets are generally narrow. The principal public buildings are,—the royal exchequer, the ducal palace, the regency-house, the government house, the new and old arsenals, and the cathedral, built in the 13th and 14th centuries, with two spires, and containing several interesting historical monuments. There are, besides, numerous churches, convents, hospitals, and schools, several public libraries and collections of paintings. In front of the town-house is a monument of Otho the Great, erected in 973. Manf. Woollens, linens, gloves, ribbons, stockings, hats, leather, tobacco, chicory, soap, and wax, besides extensive breweries and distilleries. The transit trade is considerable, and there are annual wool and other markets. Pop. of the district, 937,305; of the city, 114,052, having been mentioned in history in the reign of Charlemagne. In 907 Pope John XIII. made it the see of the primate of Germany. It suffered greatly in the Thirty Years' War, and was besieged for 28 weeks by the Imperialists under Tilly. When taken it was sacked and nearly destroyed, and 30,000 of the inhabitants were slain. In 1806 it was taken by the French, and annexed to their kingdom of Westphalia, but restored to Prussia in 1814.

MAGELLAN. (See MAGALHAENS.)

MAGENDIE, FRANÇOIS, ma-zhen'-de, a celebrated French physician and physiologist, who, after a brilliant career as a student, became, in 1818, physician to the Hotel-Dieu. He was elected member of the Academy of Sciences in 1819, and, in 1831, he obtained the appointment of professor of anatomy in the College of France. His contributions to medical literature were very numerous: his "Elements of Physiology" was a standard text-book, during many years, in France, Germany, and England. He pointed out that non-nitrogenous substances were devoid of nutrition; proved that the veins were organs of absorption; that strychnia acts upon the spinal cord and destroys the nerves of respiration, by paralysis; that prussic acid was a remedy for certain forms of cough; and finally, like Sir Charles Bell, demonstrated the precise functions of the spinal nerves. In recognition of his great services to science, he was made commander of the Legion of Honour.
Born at Bordeaux, 1783; died 1855.

MAGENTA, ma-jain'-ta, a town of Italy, province of Milano, 12 miles W. of Milan. Pop. 6,500. Here, in June, 1859, a great battle was fought between the French and Austrians, in which the latter were defeated.

MAGEROE, ma'-ge-ro-e, an island at the northern extremity of Norwegian Finmark, in the Arctic Ocean. It is very irregular in shape, 22 miles long and 15 miles broad, terminating in North Cape, 970 feet high, the most northern point of Europe, and inhabited by a few Lapps and Norwegians. Lat. 71° 10′ N. Lon. 26° 50′ E.

MAGGIORE, LAGO, mad'-je-or-ai, a large lake, for the most part in Italy, but partly in the canton of Ticino, Switzerland. It is 36 miles long, and 8 in greatest breadth, 650 feet above the sea level, and in some parts 1,800 feet deep. The river Ticino flows through it. The scenery on the shores is very beautiful. The Borromean Islands are in a south-western expansion of the lake.

MAGHAIBEE, mag-ai-bee', a town of Scinde, on the left bank of the Piniaree, a branch of the Indus. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 51,000.

MAGINDANAO or MINDANAO, ma-hin-da-na'-o, the most southern of the Philippine Islands, in the Asiatic archipelago. In shape it is nearly a triangle, with sides nearly 300 miles long, but almost divided into two portions by Tligan Bay on the north and Illano Bay on the south. The coast has many bays and headlands. The interior is intersected by lofty chains of mountains with numerous volcanos, with intervening plains, which afford pasture for vast herds of cattle. The country is also well wooded, and, in many parts towards the seacoast, is covered with impenetrable jungle and forests abounding in monkeys, among them the ourang-outang, enormous snakes, civet and musk cats.

Rivers.—The largest is the Batuen. There are many lakes, the principal being Malanao, or Lano, near the centre of the island, a stronghold of the pirates who infest the islands.
Pro.—Gold-dust and ship-timber, coffee, cocoa, rice, spices, wax, and honey.
Divisions.—The Spaniards occupy in the north the provinces of Caraga and Misamis, and a small tract, Samboange, at the south-western extremity. Nearly all the south, and a considerable portion of the east coast, belongs to the sultan of Mindanao, whose nominal subjects (but really independent) are the piratical tribes mentioned above.
Pop.—76,500, in the Spanish portions; but no estimate has been formed of the native population. The Illanos, or pirates, are brave, energetic, and ferocious, and are supposed to have a considerable infusion of the Malay race. In the interior the aborigines are inoffensive and lazy savages.

MAGINN, WILLIAM, LL.D., ma'-gin, one of the most fertile and versatile writers of modern times, entered Trinity College, Dublin, when only 10 years of age. Having tried his powers as an author by contributing various papers to the "Literary Gazette," and, under a feigned name, to "Blackwood's Magazine," he settled for nearly three years in Edinburgh, and contributed to "Blackwood" under the pseudonym of "Sir Morgan O'Dcherty." He visited London for the first time in 1823, and became sub-editor of the "Standard." He also contributed voluminously to "Fraser's Magazine," in which he wrote a caustic review of a "fashionable" novel, entitled "Berkeley Castle." The author, the Hon. Grantley Berkeley took offence, and, in company with a friend, committed a violent assault on Mr. Fraser. Aroused by this ill-treatment of his friend and publisher, Dr. Maginn offered the offended author satisfaction, and a hostile meeting took place accordingly. The duel proved a bloodless one. In the later years of his life, Dr. Maginn was involved in serious pecuniary difficulties.
Born at Cork, 1793; died Aug. 20, 1842.

MAGLIABECHI, ANTONIO DA MARCO, mal'-ye-a-baik'-ke, a learned Italian, who acquired such a store of knowledge and reputation for extensive learning as to be appointed librarian to the grand-duke of Tuscany. He corresponded with most of the learned men in Europe, and astonishing things, bordering on the marvellous, are told of his memory. His delight was wholly in books and manuscripts, and he refused preferment and riches. An old cloak served him for a garment by day and a covering by night. He had one straw chair for his table and another to sleep on. He bequeathed his large library to that of Florence, where it formed the nucleus of the great free library bearing his name.

Born at Florence, 1633; died 1714.

MAGNENTIUS, FLAVIUS POMPILIUS, mag-nen'-she-us, Emperor of the West, a German, who rose, from being a private soldier, to the first employments in the empire. The emperor Constans had a great esteem for him, and, in a mutiny among the troops, delivered him from the fury of the soldiers, by covering him with his robe. Magnentius murdered his benefactor in 350, and assumed the title of emperor; but Constantius II. avenged the death of his brother, and, after a bloody battle, Magnentius was defeated; whereupon he killed himself.

Died 353.

MAGNETICAL ISLAND, mag-net'-i-kal, lies in Halifax Bay, off the north-east coast of Australia. Lat. 19° 8′ S. Lon. 146° 40′ E.—It was discovered by Captain Cook, in 1770.

MAGNUS, ALBERTUS. (See ALBERT.)

MAGNUSSEN, FINN, mag-noos'-sen, Icelandic scholar and archæologist, at the age of 16 began the study of law in the University of Copenhagen, and practised for several years in Iceland, but returned to Copenhagen in 1812, and devoted himself to archæological researches. Three years afterwards he was appointed professor of literature. In the later years of his life he represented Iceland and the Faroe Islands in the Danish Parliament, and was keeper of the royal archives. He was the author of elaborate and valuable works on the early history of the Caucasian races, translation of the Scandinavian Eddas, the history and antiquities of Greenland and Russia, and of annotations on the early literature of the northern races.

Born at Skabholt, Iceland, 1781; died at Copenhagen, 1847.

MAGOFFIN, ma-gof'-fin, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 6,944. The capital is Salyersville.

MAHABALIPOORAM, ma-ha-bal-i-poor-am', an ancient and ruined city of India, 35 miles S. of Madras, remarkable for seven Hindoo temples, or pagodas, dedicated to Vishnu. There are singular caves, with grotesque sculptures. It is supposed that the old town occupied a large extent of ground now covered by the sea.

MAHADEVA, ma-ha'-de-va, in Hindoo theology, one of the names of the god Siva.

MAHADEVA, a Buddhist teacher, of great ability, considered a heretic by orthodox Buddhists, he founded the sect known as Purvasaila.

Lived in the 4th century.

MAHAKASYAPA, ma-ha-kas'-ya-pa, a renowned Buddhist, who arranged and annotated some of the sacred writings, and, it is stated, founded one of the leading schools of Buddhist philosophy. Many legends are connected with him, and the date at which he lived is uncertain.

MAHANOY CITY, ma'-ha-noy, a town in Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, 56 miles N.E. of Harrisburg, situated 1,200 feet above the sea level, in a mining district, rich in anthracite. Pop. 7,181.

MAHANUDDY or MAHANADI, ma-ha-nud'-de, a river of India, rising on the south-west border of Bengal, and, after a course of 520 miles, falls, by several mouths, into the Bay of Bengal, in lat. 20° 20′ N., lon. 82° E. It is navigable for 300 miles.

MAHASKA, ma-has'-ka, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 25,000. The capital is Oskaloosa.

MAHAVELLIGUANGA, ma'-ha-vel-le-gan'-ga, the principal river of Ceylon, rising a little south of the centre of the island, and entering the Indian Ocean by several mouths at Trincomalee. The entire length is about 160 miles.

MAHAVIRA, ma-ha'-vē-ra, in Indian mythology, the last of the deified saints of the Jainas. He is believed to have made several appearances in the world, the last about the 5th century, B.C.

MAHE, ma-hai', a town and fort of India, 40 miles N.W. of Calicut, one of the French settlements. Pop. 7,200. Lat. 11° 42′ N. Lon. 75° 36′ E.

MAHE, a mountainous island of the Seychelle archipelago, in the Indian Ocean. It is 17 miles long, 4 broad, rises to an elevation of 2,000 feet, and is bordered by coral reefs. Lat. 4° 48′ S. Lon. 55° 30′ E.

MAHEDIAH, ma-he-dī'-a, a seacoast town of Tunis, on Cape Africa. It is strongly fortified, is an ancient town, and occupies the site of the ancient Aphrodisium.

MAHMUD, ma'-mood, the founder of the Gasnevide dynasty, obtained from Ileh-khan the Empire of Khorassan, in 997. He extended his territories by conquest, and formed a vast kingdom, extending from the banks of the Ganges to the Caspian Sea. He held his court at Balkh and Ghisni, and was the first eastern potentate who took the title of sultan (emperor) instead of emir (commander), which had been previously borne by his predecessors.

Died 1030.

MAHMUD I., sometimes called Mahomet V., sultan of the Ottoman Turks, was son of Mustapha, and ascended the throne at Constantinople, in 1730. He, however, interfered but little in the government of his kingdom, choosing rather to live a life of luxury, while the cares of state devolved upon his ministers.

Born 1696; died 1754.

MAHMUD II., sultan of Turkey, was placed upon the throne by Mustafa Bairaktar, chief of the janissaries, in 1808. In 1812, Bessarabia was ceded to Russia by the peace of Bucharest. Between the years 1812 and 1817, Servia, Moldavia, and Wallachia were evacuated, and the Ionian islands proclaimed their independence. In 1820, Greece broke out into insurrection, and, after a struggle of eight years, threw off the Turkish yoke. A fresh war next broke out between Turkey and Russia, and the latter power was only prevented from taking possession of Constantinople by the intervention of the European powers, which brought about the peace of Adrianople, in 1829. During this time, Ali, pacha of Janina had defied the Sultan, and Mehemet Ali, pacha of Egypt had rendered himself independent. The extermination of the janissaries in 1826, and the introduction of some details of civilization, weakened the Turkish power, but did not benefit Mahmud. In 1833 he was thrice defeated by the Egyptians, and the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi left him at the mercy of Russia. He was about to engage in a new war with Mehemet Ali, when his death took place. He possessed great energy and ability, and endeavoured to promote science and art and to facilitate commercial intercourse with the western nations.

Born 1785; died 1839.

MAHOMED-KHAN-KA-TANDA, a town of British India, in Scinde, on the right bank of a branch of the Indus, 22 miles S.E. of Hyderabad. It is a thriving town, with good manufactures and trade.

MAHOMET, in Arabic MOHAMMED, mah-ho-met, or mo-ham'-med, the founder of the Mussulman religion. He came of the noble family of Koreish. Losing his father in his infancy, his guardianship devolved on his uncle, Abou Taleb, who employed him to go with his caravans from Mecca to Damascus. In this employment of camel-driver he continued till he was 25 years of age, when he married Chadidja, a rich widow, in whose service he had been as a camel-driver, becoming thereby one of the wealthiest men in Mecca. When about 40 years of age, he made himself remarkable for his religious zeal; and having observed in his travels the infinite variety of sects which prevailed, he conceived the project of reforming the religion of his country, and uniting the various sects into the worship of one God. He accordingly spent much of his time in a cave near Mecca, seemingly alone, and employed in meditation and prayer; but in reality he called to his aid a Persian Jew, well versed in the history and laws of his persuasion, and two Christians, one of the Jacobite and the other of the Nestorian sect. With the help of these men, he framed his "Koran," or "Alcoran," or the book which he pretended to have received at different times from heaven, by the hands of the angel Gabriel; and he publicly assumed the prophetical character, calling himself the apostle of God. At first he had only his wife and eight other followers; but in three years his disciples were considerably more numerous. On these he imposed the most marvellous tales, but well adapted to deceive ignorant and superstitious minds. He pretended to have passed into the highest heavens in one night, on the back of a beautiful ass called Al Borak, and accompanied by the angel Gabriel. There he had an interview with Adam, Abraham, Moses, David, and Jesus Christ, who acknowledged his superiority, which was confirmed to him by the Deity himself. This romance staggered even some of his best friends; and a powerful confederacy being formed against him, he was forced to quit Mecca, and to seek a refuge in Medina (called from that circumstance "the city of the prophet"). This retreat occasioned the foundation of his empire and of his religion. The Mohammedans adopt it as their chronological standard, calling it the Hegira, that is, the Flight or Persecution, being the 16th day of our July, 622 A.D. Mahomet had still a number of disciples, upon whom he inculcated this principle, that they were not to dispute for their religion by word, but by the sword. This was a doctrine well adapted to a lawless and wandering people, and was soon carried into practice by them. The Jewish Arabs were the first who experienced its effects. Mahomet committed upon them the most shocking cruelties, put numbers to death, sold others for slaves, and distributed their goods among his soldiers. A faith thus propagated could not but succeed in a country like Arabia. He rewarded his adherents by plunder, and held out to them a certain happiness of the most sensual kind hereafter. In 627 he made a treaty with the inhabitants of Mecca, which two years afterwards he violated, and stormed the place with fire and sword. Having made himself master of Arabia, he extended his conquests into Syria, where he took several cities, and laid some of the princes under tribute. While engaged in this victorious career, a Jewess poisoned some meat which was laid before him, and of which he and his companions ate heartily. One of them died immediately, but the prophet lingered some time. When the woman was examined, she declared that she had perpetrated the deed on purpose to try whether he was really a true prophet. Of the effects of this poison he died. After the death of Chadidja he had several wives and concubines, by whom he had many children, but left only a daughter, named Fatima, who married his successor, Ali. The time is now past when Mahomet was considered a vulgar impostor. That he was enthusiastic on some points to the verge of insanity, and weakly superstitious, must be allowed; but that he was sincere in endeavouring to restore a worship of the one God, and his belief in the validity of his own vivid impressions, there can be little doubt.

Born at Mecca, 570; died 632.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED I., emperor of the Turks, was the son of Bajazet I., and succeeded his brother Mousa in 1413. He re-established the glory of the Ottoman empire, which had been ravaged by Tamerlane, and fixed the seat of government at Adrianople.

Born 1374; died 1421.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED II., surnamed Bujuh, or "the Great," founder of the Ottoman empire in Europe, succeeded his father, Amurath II., in 1450. He was the first who assumed the title of grand signior. One of his first public acts was the murder of his two brothers, and three years after his accession he prepared to besiege Constantinople. He assembled a force of 258,000 men and a fleet of 320 ships, and, notwithstanding a determined resistance, made himself master of the town, the emperor Constantine XIII. being killed in the breach. He then conquered the Morea and Trebizond, and attempted the invasion of Hungary; but the brave John Hunyada defended Belgrade so successfully, that Mahomet was compelled to raise the siege, with the loss of nearly all his vessels in the Danube and his enormous battery train. He next invaded Epirus, but was three times repulsed by Scanderberg, on whose death, however, the country was annexed to Turkey. The subjugation of the Khan of the Crimea was his next exploit. He was repelled at Rhodes by the Knights of St. John. He was able, sagacious, and learned, speaking four languages; but ferocious and treacherous. His letters, translated into Latin, were published in 1520.

Born at Adrianople, 1430; died at Nicomedia, 1481.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED III., succeeded his father, Amurath III., in 1595. He commenced his reign by strangling nineteen of his brothers, and drowning ten of his father's wives. He entered Hungary, took Agram by capitulation, and then massacred the whole garrison. The archduke Maximilian marched against him, and nearly obtained a complete victory, when Mahomet, who had made a false retreat, suddenly returned to the charge, and routed the imperialists. He was afterwards less successful, and obliged to sue for peace to the Christian princes whose states he had ravaged.

Born 1566; died 1603.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED IV., became sultan in 1649, after the death of his father, Ibraham I. The Turks were at this time engaged in a war with the Venetians, and made themselves masters of the isle of Candia in 1669, after losing 100,000 men. Mahomet marched in person against Poland, and, having taken several places, made peace with that country, on condition of an annual tribute being paid to him. John Sobieski, irritated at this treaty, raised an army, and the year following defeated the Turks near Choczim. He also obtained a number of other advantages over them, and a peace was concluded, favourable to Poland, in 1676. In 1683 the Turks laid siege to Vienna, on which Sobieski marched to its relief, and routed the besiegers. The year following, a league was entered into against the Turks, between the emperor, the king of Poland, and the Venetians. The janissaries, attributing their misfortunes to the indolence of the sultan, deposed him in 1687, and gave the sceptre to his brother Solyman III., who sent him to the same prison whence he had himself been taken, and there he died.

Born 1642; died 1691.

MAHOMET V. (See MAHMUD I.)

MAHON. (See PORT MAHON.)

MAHONING, ma-hone'-ing, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 422 square miles. Pop. 42,871. The capital is Canfield.

MAHRATTAS. (See INDIA.)

MÄHRISCH (NEUSTADT), ma(e)r-rish, a town of the Austrian empire, on the Oskawa, 14 miles N.W. of Olmütz. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 3,500.

MÄHRISCH (TRUBAU), a town of the Austrian empire, on the Trübauerwasser, 29 miles N.W. of Olmütz. There are a castle and college. Manf. Woollens and linen. Pop. 3,600.

MAI, ANGELO, mai, Cardinal, Italian scholar, was educated by the Jesuits, and afterwards obtained an appointment in the Ambrosian library, Milan, where he made many important discoveries of palimpsests, or rewritten manuscripts. He was invited to Rome by Pius VII., and entrusted with the charge of the Vatican library, and in that capacity performed great services to classical and ecclesiastical literature by arranging and editing ancient manuscripts.

Born at Schilparie, Lombardy, 1782; died at Albano, 1851.

MAIDA, mai'-da, a town of Italy, in Calabria Ulteriore, 7 miles from Nicastro. It is noted for the defeat of the French by the British, in an action near it, in 1806. Pop. 4,000.

MAIDENHEAD, mai'-den-hed, a municipal borough and market-town of Berkshire, on the right bank of the Thames, 26 miles W. of London. Pop. 8,219.—A station on the Great Western railway.

MAIDENS, mai'-dens, a cluster of rocks on the E. coast of Ireland, 6 miles from Larne. They are surrounded by dangerous reefs. The two highest of the rocks have lighthouses on them. Lat. 54° 55′ N. Lon. 5° 44′ W.

MAIDSTONE, maid'-stone, the county town of Kent, a parliamentary and municipal borough and market-town, on the right bank of the Medway, 8 miles S. of Rochester. The town consists chiefly of four principal streets, which cross each other in the market-place, with some smaller ones branching off at right angles. The principal public buildings are the large church, All Saints, built 1400, in the perpendicular style, four other churches in the town; assize courts, town-hall, corn exchange, lunatic asylum, and hospitals. Here are, also, barracks, handsome and commodious assembly-rooms, a philosophical society, mechanics' institute, library and museum, and several banks. There is a cemetery on the Sutton road, a mile south of the town. There was a college or hospital of All Saints, founded in 1260 for the benefit of pilgrims going to Canterbury, by Archbishop Courtenay, and the remains of which are very picturesque. The principal produce of the neighbourhood is hops; and Maidstone is the first hop-market in the kingdom. There is also an important grain-market. Manf. Linen thread, paper, oil, sacking, and twine. Pop. 29,638. —A station on the South-Eastern and London, Chatham and Dover railways.

MAIMACHIN. (See KIACHTA.)

MAIMONIDES, MOSES, mai-mon'-i-dees, or MOSES BEN MAIMON, a celebrated Jewish rabbi of Spain. He is commonly called Moses Ægyptus, because he lived in Egypt as physician to the sultan. Previously he had, with all his family, pretended to adopt the Mahometan religion, in consequence of the terrible persecution of the Spanish Jews by the Moors. He was versed in several languages and sciences, but particularly mathematics and medicine. He was also learned in theology, collected the scattered writings of the Midrath and Talmuds, and wrote comments on them, interpreting them by principles of rational criticism. His writings are very voluminous, and his reputation among Christians as well as Jews unparalleled by that of any scholar of his time; and the Jews account him as second only to Moses the legislator. He wrote a "Commentary upon the Old Testament," a "Digest of the Hebrew Laws," and other valuable works.

Born at Cordova, Spain, 1135; died 1204.

MAIN, main, a river of Germany, the largest affluent of the Rhine, is formed by the union of two branches, the White and Red Main, 4 miles below Kulmbach, in Bavaria, and, after a westward course of 300 miles, joins the Rhine at Mainz. The scenery throughout the entire course is very picturesque. The Ludwig canal connects it with the Danube.

MAINA, mai'-na, a portion of the province or nomarchy of Laconia, in the Morea, Greece, occupying a peninsula between the bays of Kolokythia and Koron. Pop. 60,000, a wild and warlike race.

MAINE, main, the most N.E. state of the United States, one of the five New England States, bounded N.W. and N. by Canada, E. by New Brunswick, S.E. and S. by the Atlantic, and W. by New Hampshire. The surface is diversified, and crossed by a range from the White Mountains of New Hampshire, attaining an elevation in Mount Kalahdin, near the centre, of 5,383 feet. The coast-line is very irregular, and indented by numerous bays, the principal being Penobscot, Machias, Gaco, and Passamaquoddy, giving a coast-line of not less than 2,480 miles; and there are numerous islands, the largest of which is Mount Desert, 90 square miles. There are large forests, containing maple, pine, and spruce trees. Timber is largely exported, and about one-third of the ship-building of the United States is carried on here. The climate is very variable, ranging from 100° in summer, to 30° below zero in winter.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Penobscot, Kennebec, Saco, Androscoggin. The falls of some of the rivers furnish most valuable water-power for factories. There are many lakes in the northern part of the state, the largest, Moosehead (whence issues the Kennebec river), being 35 miles long.

Minerals.—Granite (chiefly found near the coast), limestone, and slate.

Area.—31,766 square miles.

Pop.—648,936.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 16 counties. AUGUSTA is the capital; and other important towns are Portland, Bangor, and Bath.

History.—The district was settled in 1621, and the early history is a record of continual encounters with the Indians, and terrible massacres. It was a part of Massachusetts until 1820.

MAINE, an old province in the W. of France, now comprised in the departments of Mayenne and Sarthe.

MAINE-ET-LOIRE, main-ai-lwawr', a department of the north-west of France, bounded W. by Loire-Inférieure, and on the E. by Indre-et-Loire. The surface is diversified by hills and plains, and the soil is fertile. There are extensive vineyards, and large quantities of red and white wine are made.

Minerals.—Iron, coal, granite, marble, and slate.

Manf.—Cotton, woollen, and linen goods.

Area.—2,782 square miles.

Pop.—523,491.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 5 arrondissements and 380 communes. ANGERS is the capital, and Baugé, Chalet, Saumur, and Segré, are other chief towns.

MAINLAND OF SHETLAND, or ZETLAND, main'-land, the largest of the Shetland islands. (See SHETLAND.)

MAINTENON, FRANÇOISE D'AUBIGNÉ, Marquise de, man'-te-nawng, the mistress, and afterwards wife, of Louis XIV. She was born in the prison at Niort, where her father was imprisoned, and when a child went to Martinique, in the West Indies, where he died when she was 10 years old. She returned to France with her mother, after the death of whom she was taken care of by her aunts, and educated in a convent, where she was, though not without much difficulty, made to forsake the Protestant faith in which she had been educated. When only 16 years of age she married the celebrated comic poet Scarron, who taught her the Latin, Spanish, and Italian languages. In 1660 she became a widow in very narrow circumstances; but by means of her old friend Madame de Montespan, the king's mistress, she obtained a pension. By the command of his majesty she undertook the education of the children he had by Madame de Montespan, which trust she discharged with great fidelity. In this situation she acquired an ascendancy over the mind of the king, who, in 1674, purchased for her the estate of Maintenon, which name she assumed, and she completely supplanted her benefactor, Madame de Montespan. In 1684 the king made her his wife; but the marriage was never publicly avowed. On the death of Louis, over whom she exercised a remarkable influence, she retired to St. Cyr, an institution she had herself founded for poor girls of good family.

Born 1635; died 1719.

MAINZ, or MAYENCE. (See MENTZ.)

MAINZER, JOSEPH, main'-zair, a distinguished musician, who introduced the system of teaching that is known by his name, began life as apprentice to mining engineering in the coalfield of Dutweiler and Saltzbach, but was obliged to quit this pursuit from ill-health. He then devoted himself to the study of music, for which he had always had a predilection, and after studying under various masters, and in different parts of the world, returned to Trèves, his native place, and turned his attention to the development of his new system of teaching music, which he had long before conceived, and which soon began to attract attention in Germany. In 1830 he went to Paris, then in all the excitement of the second revolution, where he soon found a field for his plan of teaching and popularising music; but the police became jealous of his popularity, and invited him to close his school, an invitation which he could not safely decline. During his residence in Paris, Mainzer was a constant contributor to the Revue des Deux Mondes, the Revue du Nord, La Balance, published by Böerne, and for six years was the rédacteur of the musical department of the Nationel. In 1844 he went to England. Soon afterwards he established himself in Scotland, and in 1848 definitely took up his abode in Manchester, where he laboured with great assiduity and success till his death. He left a great number of works in almost every style of composition.

Born 1801; died 1851.

MAIRE, JAMES LE, a Dutch navigator, who sailed from the Texel in 1615, with two vessels. In the following year he discovered the straits which bear his name, in South America. After visiting New Guinea, he sailed to Batavia, where he was made prisoner, and the only vessel he had left was confiscated, under the pretence of his having infringed on the rights of the Dutch East-India Company. He died on his passage to Europe.

Died 1616.

MAIRENA, mai-e-rai'-na, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 13 miles N.E. of Seville. Pop. 3,700.

MAISTRE, JOSEPH, Compte de, maistr, French diplomatist and writer. He was descended from a noble French family settled in Savoy, and was in 1792 a member of the Senate when Savoy was occupied by the French. He withdrew from the country, and in 1799 accompanied the king in his retreat to the island of Sardinia. He was ambassador at St. Petersburg from 1803 to 1817, when he was recalled to become a member of the ministry. As early as 1796 he published "Considerations on France," and at a later period wrote essays on the Papacy, the Gallican Church, an examination of the philosophy of Bacon and other works.

Born in Chambéry, 1753; died at Turin, 1821.

MAITLAND, SIR RICHARD, Scottish lawyer, historian, and poet. He studied at St. Andrews and in France, and afterwards filled various political appointments in his own country. In 1552 he was knighted, and became a lord of the court of session, and in 1562 was appointed Lord Privy Seal. He lived to a great age, but was blind for the last 27 years of his life. His verses, which lament the unfortunate condition of Scotland, were chiefly written in his later years. He commenced a collection of Scotch poetry, the manuscript of which is now in the Pepysian Library, Magdalen College, Oxford. The antiquarian Maitland Club was so named in memory of him.

Born 1496; died 1586.

MAITLAND, WILLIAM, known as secretary Lethington, from the name of his ancestral estate, the son of the above. He was educated at St. Andrews and on the continent, and at the age of 30 adopted the Protestant religion, notwithstanding which he was appointed secretary of state in 1558, and in 1561 an extraordinary lord of session. He probably again changed his opinions, for in 1563 he conducted the prosecution of Knox for high treason, and in the following year held a vigorous debate with him on the political claims of the Reformed Church. Having taken part in the death of Rizzio, he was proscribed and remained hidden for several months. It is stated that he was privy to Bothwell's scheme for the murder of Darnley, and that he offered his services to Mary, when a prisoner in Loch Leven, and secretly aided her escape, although he fought against her at Langside. He attended the conferences at York, with the Regent Murray, and is said to have proposed the union of the Duke of Norfolk with Mary. In 1569 he was arrested at Stirling by the Scottish lords, and on his liberation became the leader of the queen's party, for which he was deprived of his offices and estates by the Regent Morton, and was besieged in Edinburgh Castle, surrendering after a long resistance. He was imprisoned in Leith, where he died, it was thought at the time, from the effects of poison. He was the subject of Buchanan's severe satire in "The Chameleon."

Born 1525; died 1570.

MAITLAND, JOHN. (See LAUDERDALE.)

MAITLAND, the second town in New South Wales, Australia, in the county of Northumberland, 93 miles N. of Sydney, on the Humber river, in the midst of the most productive grain-growing district of the colony. It is divided into East and West Maitland, the latter the more important of the two divisions. The public buildings are good, and an active trade is carried on. Pop. 8,000.

MAITREYA, mai-tre'-ya, in Buddhist mythology, a pre-eminent saint, known as "the Unconquered," and in Tibet he is named Jampa.

MAIXENT, ST., maix'-a, a town of France, department Deux-Sèvres, on the Sèvre-Niortaise, 13 miles N.E. of Niort. It is surrounded with old walls, and is irregularly built. Manf. Serge, worsted, and woollen hosiery. Pop. 4,000.

MAJORCA, ma-jor'-ka (Span. MALLORKA, mal-yor'-ka), the principal of the Balearic Isles, in the Mediterranean, lying about 107 miles to the east of Spain, and subject to that crown. It is 64 miles long from east to west, and 48 miles broad from north to south, and mountainous in the north-eastern part. It is very irregular in shape, and the coast is deeply indented. The chief bays are Alcudia and Pollenzia on the north-east, and Palma on the south-west. The climate is usually temperate. There are a number of salt marshes. Coral is found, and game is plentiful. The horned cattle are diminutive; but the sheep and hogs are large. A great quantity of sheep and goat-milk cheese is made and exported to Spain. The soil produces grain, flax, hemp, oranges, vines, olives, and other fruits, which rival those of Portugal, and good wine is made. The wool of Majorca is, in general, of good quality. They have few manufactures. Pop. 200,000. The chief town is PALMA.

MAKADISHU, or MAGADOXO, mak-a-di'-shu, a town on the east coast of Africa, belonging to the Sultan of Muscat, once considered the capital of a kingdom. It consists of two adjoining parts, Hamarwin, and Shangani, the latter a collection of huts clustered round some edifices with minarets, supposed to be royal tombs. In Hamarwin, the houses are of stone and of a better character. Pop. 3,500. Lat. 2° 2′ N. Lon. 45° 20′ E.

MAKALLAH, or MACULLAH, mak-al'-la, a seaport-town of Arabia, in a small bay on the south-east coast, about 300 miles N.E. of Aden. It is the most commodious station on this coast for shipping to obtain supplies of provisions. There is a trade in gums, hides, senna, coffee, and other native produce, and there is a large slave market. Pop. 4,500, including foreigners. Lat. 14° 30′ N, Lon. 49° 6′ E.

MAKARIEW, mak'-a-rief, a town of European Russia, government of Kostroma, on the Unja. There are three churches, a convent, and a handsome market house. Manf. Leather and vitriol. Barges are built and an active trade is carried on. Pop. 4,700.

MAKARIEW, a town of European Russia, on the left bank of the Volga, 50 miles S.E. of Nijni Novgorod. There is a large monastery, and a very large fair is held in July. Pop. 1,700.

MAKO, ma'-ko, a market town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Maros, 16 miles S.E. of Szegedin. It is the residence of a bishop, and there are a Roman Catholic, a Protestant, and a Greek united church. Pop. 30,063, including many Jews.

MAKOW, ma'-kof, a town of Russian Poland, on the right bank of the Orzik, 63 miles N.E. of Plock. Pop. 6,000.

MAKRIZI, TAKI ADDIN ABU AHMAD MOHAMMAD, Arabic historian and geographer, who studied the sciences at Cairo, where he held several public offices. He was the author of a topographical history of Egypt, a history of the Mameluk Sultans, and treatises on coins and weights and measures.

Born near Baalbec, 1360; died 1442.

MAKUNG, ma'-koong, a town of the Chinese empire, on the south-west side of Pong-kou island, W. of Formosa. There is a good harbour defended by forts.

MALABAR, mal'-a-bar, a maritime district of India, province of Madras, bounded W. by the sea, and E. by Coimbatore. It is very mountainous, the Neilgherry hills being in the eastern part, and a considerable portion being included in the Western Ghauts. Teak timber, sandal-wood, cocoa-nuts, black pepper, tobacco, cotton, rice, ginger, coffee, and sugar. Minerals. Iron ore is found in the hills. Pop. 2,365,035, comprising Hindoos, Mussulmans, Christians, and Jews. Lat. 10° 15′—12° 18′ N. Lon. 75° 15′—76° 55′ E.

MALACCA, ma-lak'-ka, a maritime settlement, belonging to Great Britain, on the south-west coast of the Malay peninsula. It is 40 miles long and 25 broad. The surface is flat and marshy near the coast, but farther inland the hills attain an elevation of nearly 4,000 feet. The climate is very salubrious. A considerable portion is yet under jungle, but in other parts, rice, sago, pepper, rattans, timber, and cocoa-nuts are cultivated, and the fruits are excellent and plentiful; but grain is but scantily produced. Game is also scarce.

Minerals.—Tin and gold-dust.
Area.—1,000 square miles.
Lat. 2°—3° N. Lon. 102°—103° E.

History.—Formerly this country was ruled chiefly by numerous petty states, and wars were frequent. In this turbulent system, usurpation and all kinds of violence were habitually practised. The influence of these causes, joined with seafaring and piratical habits, formed a character which rendered the Malays the terror of Asia. The Papuas, or oriental negroes, inhabit the interior. Malacca, in 1824, was exchanged, by the Dutch, for Bencoolen, from the British, and placed under the Bengal presidency. In 1867, Malacca, together with Singapore and the Prince of Wales Island, were transferred from the Indian government to the colonial department.

MALACCA, a seaport, the capital of the above settlement, is situate on the west coast, at the mouth of the small river Malacca, upon the straits which bear its name. The principal public buildings are the church of Our Lady del Monte, where St. Francis Xavier laboured, a court-house, town-house, gaol, barracks, and hospitals. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 2° 10′ N. Lon. 102° 4′ E.

MALACCA, STRAIT OF, a narrow sea between the island of Sumatra and the Malay peninsula, from the equator to lat. 5° N. Length, 520 miles; breadth, from 25 miles at the south-east, to 200 miles at the north-west. Singapore and Penang are in this strait.

MALACHI, mal'-a-ki, the last of the twelve minor prophets. Regarding his personal history nothing is known. He lived in the time of Nehemiah, in the reign of Artaxerxes Longomanus, about 420 B.C., and is said to have died young.

MALACHY, IMAR, archbishop of Armagh, was born in the latter part of the 11th century. His reputation for great learning was without parallel at that time. He was made archbishop of Armagh, but afterwards wished to resign his see, and went to Rome for that purpose. He returned as legate, but visited France in 1147. During his sojourn with his friend St. Bernard, at Clairvaux, he was taken ill and died.

Born 1094; died 1148.

MALAGA, mal'-a-ga, a maritime province of Spain, bounded N. by Cordova, E. by Granada, W. by Cadiz, and S. by the Mediterranean. It is rugged and mountainous, being traversed by offsets of the Sierra Nevada. There are forests of oak, poplar, pine, cork, and other trees, on the mountain sides, and the valleys are very fertile and well cultivated, producing abundantly grain, fruits, vegetables, and the sugar-cane. There are many vineyards and olive plantations. There are many remarkable caverns in the limestone of the mountains. The capital is Malaga.

Rivers.—The Guadaljore, Genil, Guadiaro, Verde, and Velay, mostly small streams in the dry season, but torrents during the rains.

Area.—2,786 square miles.

MALAGA, a city and seaport of Spain, capital of the above province, on the coast of the Mediterranean, at the inland extremity of a deep bay, 70 miles N.E. of Gibraltar. The town is commanded by an old Moorish fortress, called the Gibralfaro, and is of an oval form. There are some remains of the old fortifications. In the older part of the town, the streets are narrow and winding, and the houses mean; but there are many new and fine houses in the squares, and along the public walks. The chief squares are the Plaza Mayor, in the centre, surrounded with fine buildings; the Plaza de Riego, with a fountain in the centre; and the Plaza de la Puerta del Mar, occupying a site once covered by the sea, which is receding, the chief promenade of the town, the Alameda, having been, not more than a century ago, covered with water. The principal public buildings are the custom-house, in the Italian style; the municipal buildings, on the Plaza Mayor; the consulado, with a portico of black marble; a college, theatre, various charitable institutions, and three old Moorish castles. The cathedral is very large, and is partly of Roman and partly of Moorish architecture, though erected in the 16th century, but disfigured by modern alterations. The interior is finished with exquisite taste. The bishop's palace is in front of the cathedral. The harbour of Malaga is capable of containing about 450 merchant vessels. A fine mole, of 700 yards in length, runs out into the sea, and two smaller ones have been subsequently built. The rivers Guadalmedina and Guadaljore discharge their waters at this place into the ocean. The great export is fruit and wine, the finest of which are called "Mountain" and "Lagrimas," and sugar. Manf. Linen, woollen, sailcloth, paper, rope, hats, leather, and soap. Pop. 115,882. Lat. 36° 43′ 5″ N. Lon. 4° 26′ E.—Malaga was founded by the Phœnicians, 3,000 years ago. It fell into the hands of the Moors in 714, and was not wrested from them until 1487, when Ferdinand the Catholic took it. In 1810 it was taken by the French, and remained in their possession till the year 1812. It has, at different times, suffered severely by the plague, but is now considered a healthy resort for invalids, as there is no winter, so called. The climate is very dry, and weather bright. It is the see of a bishop.

MALAGON, mal'-a-gon, a town of Spain, province of Ciudad Real, on the Cambron, 6 miles N. W. of Ciudad Real. It is a small place, possessing several flour and oil mills. Pop. 3,800.

MALANG, ma-lang', a town of Java, province of Passoeroean, 48 miles S.W. of Soerbaya, in an elevated and fertile valley, surrounded by mountains, among them the volcano Semiroo, 12,550 feet high, the loftiest mountain in Java. There is a spacious square, surrounded by handsome houses in the midst of pleasure-grounds. Coffee is cultivated in the vicinity.

MALATESTA MALATESTI, Lords of Rimini, mal-a-tais'-ta, a great Italian family during the middle ages, and the head of the Guelph party at Rimini. The tragedy which occurred in the household of one of this family forms one of the finest episodes in Dante's "Inferno." After being despoiled of their possessions by Pope Clement VII., in 1528, the family retired to Venice, and their names were afterwards recorded in the annals of that republic.

MALATIYEH, or MALATIA, mal'-a-ti-a, a decayed town of Asiatic Turkey, on the right bank of the Euphrates, 105 miles N.E. of Maresh. There are a handsome gate and two large mosques. It occupies the site of the ancient Militene, once the capital of Armenia.

MALAUCENE, ma'-lo-saine, a town of France, department Vaucluse, 23 miles N. of Avignon. There are remains of the old wall, a fine church, and an ancient chapel. Manf. Woollens, worsted, silk, linen, paper, cutlery, iron and copper ware, and pottery. Pop. 3,000.

MALAY PENINSULA, ma-lai', the most southern portion of continental Asia, and of the south-eastern peninsula of Further India, separating the Gulf of Siam and the China Sea, on the east, from the Bay of Bengal and the Strait of Malacca on the south and south-west. It is traversed throughout its centre by a mountain chain, rising to 6,000 feet, and well watered. The most important productions are, fine timber, areca, bamboos, caoutchouc, sago, cinnamon, tobacco, coffee, sugar, cloves, cotton, indigo, gums, and resins. Lat. 1° 20′—13° N. Lon. 98°—104° E.

Rivers.—The rivers are short mountain streams. The principal discharging on the west and south-west coasts are the Muda, Carrian, Perak, Birna, Sappan, Moro, Socio, and Johore; on the east, the Calantan and Tringanu.

Zoology.—Among the wild animals are elephants, rhinoceroses, tigers, leopards, several species of monkeys, alligators, vampire bats, and snakes. There are deer of small size, argus pheasants, peacocks, and humming-birds.

Minerals.—Abundant in some parts, but tin of excellent quality is chiefly worked.

Area.—50,000 square miles.

Pop.—375,000, consisting of Malays and the aboriginal tribes. The latter, known as Samangs, are small of stature, resembling in features the African negroes, and are in a savage condition. The Malays profess Mahometanism, but, like others of the race, are fierce, daring, and addicted to piracy and gambling.

Divisions.—As far south as lat. 7° N. belongs to Siam, except the British province of Tennasserim on the north-western shore. The remainder of the peninsula contains various native states, more or less dependent on Siam, and the British settlements of Wellesley and Malacca.

MALAY ARCHIPELAGO. (See INDIAN ARCHIPELAGO.)

MALCHIN, mal'-shin, a town of Germany, in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 33 miles S.E. of Rostock. It is walled, and has a Gothic church. Manf. Linen, soap, and copper wares. Pop. 5,200.

MALCOLM I., mal'-kom, king of Scotland, succeeded Constantine MacAodh in 944. He was killed—some authorities say, murdered—while suppressing an insurrection in the north of Scotland.

Died 958.

MALCOLM II., MACKENNETH, grandson of the preceding, succeeded to the crown in 1003. It is supposed that he also was murdered.

Died 1033.

MALCOLM III., MACDUNGAN, or CANMORE, became king on the death of Macbeth (see MACBETH), in 1056. He married about 1066, Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling, who had taken refuge in Scotland after the successful invasion of England by William the Norman, and was induced by Edgar to cross the English border and make forays. William, in retaliation, sent an expedition into Scotland in 1072, and compelled Malcolm to acknowledge him as liege lord. In the reign of William Rufus, another war broke out, and in 1093 Malcolm again crossed the border, but was defeated and killed at Alnwick.

Born 1024; died 1093.

MALCOLM IV., "the Maiden," grandson of David I., whom he succeeded in 1153, when only 12 years of age. During his reign there were continual revolts.

Born 1141; died at Jedburgh, 1165.

MALCOLM, SIR JOHN, G.C.B., a celebrated British officer, and author of the "History of Persia." He went to India at the age of 13, and, after serving with distinction in both political and military capacities, was appointed, in 1802 and 1809, minister plenipotentiary to Persia. On his return to England, in 1812, he was knighted, and three years afterwards he published his "History of Persia," a most valuable contribution to literature, derived from native sources. He returned to India in 1817, and acted as second in command in the campaigns against the Mahrattas and Pindarees, in which he greatly distinguished himself. On the conclusion of this war he was nominated to the civil and military command of Central India, which, during his administration became tranquillised and prosperous. He returned to England in 1821, but again went out to the East in 1827, as governor of Bombay. He finally left India in 1830, and soon afterwards entered parliament. He was the author of a "Life of Lord Clive," "Political History of India," and a "Memoir on Central India."

Born in Scotland, 1769; died 1833.

MALDAH, mal-da', a district of British India, in Bengal. An alluvial tract, with a gentle slope in a south-eastern direction towards the Ganges. There are large forests of banyan and mango. Rice, wheat, barley, indigo, and the mulberry are cultivated. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 710,448. The capital, of the same name, a wretched and decayed town, is on the left bank of the Mahanunda, at the confluence of a branch of the Ganges, 170 miles N.W. of Calcutta.

MALDEGHEM, mald'-gem, a village of Belgium, province of East Flanders, 17 miles N.W. of Ghent. Manf. Tobacco and beer, and there are calico printing works and oil-mills. Pop. 6,000.

MALDEN, mal'-den, a township of the United States, Massachusetts, connected with Charlestown by a bridge over the Mystic river. Manf. India-rubber overshoes, enamelled leather, coach trimmings, and iron pipes. Pop. 12,017.

MALDIVE ISLANDS, mal'-dives, a cluster of small islands, of coral formation, in the Indian Ocean, about 400 miles W.S.W. of India. They are divided into 17 groups, separated from each other by narrow channels, which are unsafe for ships of burthen. The greatest breadth of the chain is from 60 to 80 miles. Length 500 miles. They are estimated as 50,000 in number. They are well wooded and fertile. The islands carry on a considerable trade with each other, and also with India. The climate is intensely hot, and unhealthy for Europeans. Pop. about 150,000 civilised, and generally expert sailors. Lat. 0° 40′ S.—7° 6′ N. Lon. 72° 48′—73° 48′ E. The inhabitants of these islands live under a sultan who pays an annual tribute to the British government in Ceylon.

MALDON, mawl'-don, a municipal and parliamentary borough, market town, and seaport, in Essex, on the right bank of the Blackwater, near the confluence of the Chelmer, 9 miles E. of Chelmsford. The public buildings are—the principal church of All Saints; St. Mary's church, a spacious building, said to have been built before the year 1056; St. Peter's, now united to All Saints, near which is the town-hall, a large old brick building of the 15th century. The harbour affords safe anchorage to small vessels; a productive fishery, and oysters of good quality are taken. Manf. Bricks, ironwork, and crystallised salt. There is a large trade. Pop. 5,586.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

MALDON, a town of Victoria, Australia, 84 miles N.W. of Melbourne, in the centre of a rich gold mining district. Pop. 2,809.

MALEBRANCHE, NICOLAS, mal'-branzh, one of the most illustrious disciples of Des Cartes, whose philosophy he devoted his life to propagate and explain. His works were numerous, and of the highest excellence. His famous work is "De la Rechertre de la Verité," published in 1674, investigating the nature of truth. His system of idealism was strongly opposed.

Born at Paris, 1638; died at Paris, 1715.

MALESHERBES, CHRÉTIEN GUILLAUME DE LAMOIGNON DE, mals'-hairb, an eminent French lawyer and statesman. He was educated at the Jesuits' College, became counsellor to the parliament of Paris in 1744, and succeeded his father in the presidentship of the Cour des Aides, in 1750, which post he held with great reputation for upwards of 20 years, and then was banished to his paternal estate. In 1774 he was recalled from his retreat, and made minister of state for the interior. Under his administration, prisons were visited, and numerous abuses removed, but in 1776 he resigned. At the beginning of the Revolution he conceived a hope that it would have been productive of good, but the illusion soon vanished. He voluntarily pleaded the cause of the unfortunate Louis XVI., and defended him with all the ardour of conscious rectitude. Thenceforth he was a marked man, and was condemned to death, with his daughter and her husband, M. de Chateaubriand, brother of the author, by the revolutionary tribunal, in 1794. He wrote a treatise on "Rural Economy," "Thoughts and Maxims," and two "Memoirs on the Civil State of the Protestants," and was one of the originators of the "Encyclopédie."

Born 1721; died 1794.

MALI or MOHL, mole, the principal island of the Maldive group, about 7 miles in circumference. It is the residence of the sultan, and is fortified. Pop. about 2,000.

MALIBRAN, mal'-e-bran, MARIA FELICITA, a celebrated soprano singer. She was daughter of Manuel Garcia, and made a name at a very early age. She married a Frenchman, in New York, to save her father from ruin; but her husband becoming bankrupt, she returned to the stage, and was enthusiastically received everywhere. Her first marriage was dissolved, and, in 1836 she wedded M. De Berist, a famous violinist. She was most popular in private life, and very talented.

Born in Paris, 1808; died at Manchester, 1836.

MALINES, a town of Belgium. (See MECHLIN.)

MALLET, DAVID, mal'-let, a Scotch poet. He was tutor to the sons of the duke of Montrose, with whom he travelled, and on his return settled in London, where he became an author by profession. In 1740 he published a "Life of Lord Bacon," which is a very insignificant work, and totally unworthy of the subject. The duchess of Marlborough left him a legacy of £1,000 to write the life of her husband; on which it was observed, that as he had forgot Bacon was a philosopher, so he would probably omit to notice Marlborough as a general: of this life, however, he never wrote a line. Frederick, prince of Wales, appointed him his undersecretary. Lord Bolingbroke left him his philosophical works, which he published after the author's death. His poetical works were collected and published by himself in 1759. He was the author of the popular ballad "William and Margaret."

Born in Perthshire, 1700; died 1765.

MALLET, ma-lai', CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, a French Revolutionary general, who formed a scheme for overturning Napoleon I., while he was in Russia, and escaping from prison, promulgated a report of the emperor's death. Supported by a battalion of troops he released some prisoners, and attempted to kill the commandant of Paris. He was shot in 1812.

Born 1754.

MALMESBURY, WILLIAM of, an old English historian, a native, it is supposed, of Somersetshire, whose father was a Norman, his mother being an Englishwoman. He was early in life placed in the monastery, by the name of which he is known, and became its librarian. He wrote "The History of the Kings of England," "The History of the Prelates of England," and many less important works. His history of the kings terminates at the year 1142. He is regarded as one of the most truthful and impartial of the early historians.

Born about 1095; died about 1143.

MALMESBURY, JAMES HARRIS, first earl of, an English diplomatist, was son of the celebrated James Harris, author of "Hermes." (See HARRIS, James.) He was appointed ambassador to the court of Frederick II. of Prussia, in 1772, and subsequently filled the same post in Russia and at the Hague. In 1794 he negotiated the marriage between the prince of Wales and Caroline of Brunswick; and many valuable details of the mission were afterwards published by him in his "Diary." His last employments were in 1796-7, at Paris and Lille, for the purpose of obtaining a treaty of peace with the French republic. His "Diaries and Correspondence" were published in 1844.

Born at Salisbury, 1746; died 1820.

MALMESBURY, a parliamentary borough and market-town of Wiltshire, near two tributary streams of the Avon, 20 miles N. of Bath. Its castle is demolished; but there are some remains of its abbey-church. There are a new town-hall and a market-house. Manf. Wool, ribbons, lace, and leather. Pop. 3,133.

MALMÖ, mal'-me(r), a district of Sweden, occupying its S.W. extremity. It is level, and one of the most fertile provinces of the kingdom. Large quantities of grain are exported, and excellent cheese is made. The finest horses and cattle in Sweden are reared here. Pop. 354,042.

MALMÖ, the principal town of the above district, stands on the Sound 16 miles from Copenhagen. It has a citadel and an artificial harbour, and was as early as 1259 an important place. In 1523 the treaty between Gustavus Vasa and the Danes was signed here. Manf. Stockings, soap, woollens, sugar. Pop. 43,243.

MALO, ST., mal'-lo, a seaport of France, department Ille-et-Vilaine, on the small island of Aron, which communicates with the continent by means of a mole, 40 miles N.W. of Rennes. The entrance to the town at the end of the mole is strongly defended by bastioned walls and a castle. There are also ramparts around the town; and on the north side it is inaccessible, in consequence of rocks and fortifications. The principal public buildings are the cathedral, a large Gothic structure, modernized; the town-hall, the episcopal palace, communal college, exchange, theatre, chamber of commerce, school of hydropathy, and a naval arsenal. The harbour is large, and has a floating and building docks.—A creek separates St. Malo from the town of St. Servan. Manf. Rope, fishing-nets, hosiery, snuff, and soap. It has an active trade both in fish and provisions. Pop. 10,700.

Born at Bologna, 1628; died at Rome, 1694.

MALPLAQUET, mal'-pla-kai, a village of France, department Nord, near the Belgian frontier. It was the scene of a sanguinary battle, in 1709, between the French under Villars and the allies, commanded by the duke of Marlborough and the Prince Eugene. The capture of Mons was the immediate result of the battle.

MALTA, mal'-ta, an island of the Mediterranean, nearly opposite to the S. angle of Sicily, from which it is distant about 55 miles, one of the most important of the British possessions. It is strongly fortified, and garrisoned by British line regiments, and the Malta Fencible artillery, a native corps. There is a large dockyard and also an arsenal. It has an extensive trade in corn from Russia. The island is 17 miles long, with a breadth of 8 at its widest part. Its coast is in general steep and rugged, and well fortified throughout. The most important bays are those formed by the peninsula on which VALETTA, the capital, stands, on the northern side of the island, those of Marsa and Scirocco on the south-east, and St. Paul's and Melleha, on the north-east. The two small islands of Gozo and Comino are separated from it only by a narrow channel. Every spot is cultivated with the greatest care, and the soil, when deficient, is supplied in ship-loads from Sicily: hence, it may be considered as wholly artificial. The climate is healthy. Most of the productions, both of Europe and the tropical climates, which have been tried here, have succeeded. Indigo, saffron, and sugar are cultivated, and also cotton, which has been exported to a great extent. The honey of Malta is in high repute. The birds are remarkable for their plumage.

Manf.—Coarse cottons, jewellery, cabinet work, salt, and soda. There are quarries of alabaster and marble.

Area.—98 square miles.

Pop., including Gozo and Comino, 149,780, excluding the military, who number about 6,000.

Lat. of Cape Valetta, on the N. side, 35° 53′ 8″ N. Lon. 14° 31′ 2″ E.

Administration.—There is a governor, who is also commandant of the garrison, and is aided by a council of 16 members, half officials and half elected.

History.—Malta was possessed by the Carthaginians, Romans, and afterwards by the Saracens, who were driven from it by the Normans. They retained it till its occupation, in the 16th century, by the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who fortified it, and participated in all the attacks made upon the Turks by the Christian powers, both by sea and on the coast of Africa. In 1565 it was besieged by the Turks: after losing four months in reiterated attacks, and sacrificing a great part of their army, they were obliged to re-embark, and, from that time, they forebore from all further attempts on the island. In 1798 it surrendered to Bonaparte, and received a French garrison. Being afterwards blockaded by a British squadron, it was forced to surrender, through famine, in 1800; and by the treaty of Paris, in 1814, was confirmed to Britain.

MALTE-BRUN, KONRAD, mal'-te-bru(r)n (or MALTHE BRUN), a celebrated Danish geographer. He studied at Copenhagen, and at the outbreak of the French revolution, adopted the cause with great ardour, commencing his literary career by writing poems and treatises in favour of liberty, for which he was exiled in 1800. After taking refuge in Sweden for a short time, he went to Paris, where he was engaged as foreign editor of the "Journal des Débats," and published a number of highly-important geographical works, the chief of which are "Geography, Mathematical, Physical, and Political," "Summary of Universal Geography," and "Annals of Voyages and Travels." He was secretary to the Geographical Society of Paris.

Born at Jutland, 1775; died at Paris, 1826.

Born 1816.

MALTHUS, REV. THOMAS ROBERT, mal'-thus, an English clergyman of the established church, who wrote several works on population and on political economy, which then, and since, attracted considerable attention. He was educated at, and became at Fellow, of Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1799 he commenced a tour through the principal countries of Europe, observing the political and social condition of each. He had previously published an essay on population, which he greatly enlarged in subsequent editions. It is by this that he is best known, and his theories, known as "Malthusian," have greatly influenced later writers on political economy. He wrote other works of a similar character.

Born near Dorking, Surrey, 1766; died at Bath, 1836.

MALTON, mal'-ton, a parliamentary borough and market-town of the North Riding of Yorkshire, on the Derwent, which is here crossed by a spacious stone bridge, 18 miles N.E. of York. The bridge joins it to its suburban Norton. There are two old churches, and places of worship for various denominations. The remains of the castle are still visible, and there are also ruins of a priory, built in the 12th century. Large quantities of corn, butter, and bacon-hams are exported to Hull. Pop. 8,750!—It is a station on the Midland and North-Eastern railway.

MALVERN, GREAT, mal'-vern, a fashionable watering place in Worcestershire, on the south-eastern side of the Malvern Hills, 8 miles S.W. of Worcester. It is noted for its mineral springs, which are the means of drawing many invalids to its neighbourhood, and there are several large establishments for hydropathic treatment. It has a very fine church, the remains of its once celebrated Benedictine priory. Pop. 5,847.

MALVERN HILLS, a range of hills in the counties of Worcester and Hereford, extending from north to south, about 10 miles. Near their centre is an ancient British fortress, called Herefordshire Beacon, 1,444 feet above the level of the sea.

MALWAH, mal'-wa, an old province of Central Hindostan, N. of the Nerbudda and S.W. of the Ganges, now comprised in the states of Bhopaul, Gwalior, Indore, and others. It is an open table-land, diversified with conical-shaped hills, and is the region in which the Nerbudda, Chumbul, and other rivers have their rise. The savage tribe called Bheels are numerous in this territory. Malwa is officially combined with Nimar. Pop. of the two, 3,139,558.

MALWAN, or SOONDEROOG, mal'-wan, a town and fortified island of India, 200 miles S. of Bombay, to which presidency it belongs. It was formerly a great resort of pirates. Lat. 15° 53′ N. Lon. 73° 47′ E.

MAMADYCH, ma-ma-ditch', a town of Russia, government of Kazan, on the right bank of the Viatka, 90 miles N.E. of Kazan. Pop. 3,800.

MAMERS, ma'-mair, a town of France, department Sarthe, on the Dive, 25 miles N.N.E. of Le Mans. It is well built, and has an elegant Gothic church, modernized in 1831. Manf. Woollens, linen, mother-of-pearl buttons, cottons, and hempen goods, beer, and leather. Pop. 5,000.—The fortifications were demolished by the English in 1428.

MAMIANI, COUNT TERENZIO, ma-me'-an-e, an Italian philosopher, who was compelled to leave Italy after Gregory XVI. became pope. He accepted the unconditional pardon of Pius IX., and became a statesman of the Holy See; but he resigned, and, on the fall of Rome, went to Genoa. In 1856 he was returned as member of the Sardinian parliament. In 1860 he became minister of instruction under Cavour. He went as minister to Greece in 1861, and to Switzerland in 1865. He is the author of many works, and editor of a review.

MAMMOLA, mam'-mo-la, a town of Italy, province of Reggio, on the Locano, 8 miles from Gerace. Pop. 8,300.

MAMORE, ma'-mo-rai, a river of Bolivia, South America. After a course of 600 miles it enters the Madeira, in lat. 11° 55′ S.

MAMUN, ABUL ABBAS ABDALLA AL, ma-moon', a caliph of Bagdad, son of the celebrated Haroun Alraschid. He became caliph in 813. He was the most learned of his race, and established observatories. His reign was disturbed by rebellion.

Born 786; died 834.

MAN, ISLE OF, MONA, or MENAVIA, an island of Great Britain, in the Irish Sea, nearly equidistant from the coasts of England, Scotland, and Ireland. It is about 30 miles long and 12 broad, terminating in a sharp point towards the north. On the south is a small island, called the Calf of Man. The coast is bold and picturesque, especially in the south, where is a very prominent headland, Spanish Head. The interior and central part is mountainous, Snaefell attaining an elevation of 2,000 feet. The towns and villages are almost all situate along the coast; and the interior is mostly divided into small farms, or left in a state of nature, covered with heath and gorse. The soil is rather unproductive, but agriculture has progressed of late. Wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, and flax are cultivated. Large numbers of cattle are fattened for exportation, and butter forms an article of commerce. Poultry of all kinds are numerous; also eggs and fish. Immense numbers of sea-fowl breed among the rocks, especially on the Calf of Man; and there is a small but excellent breed of horses. The antiquities of the island are very interesting.

Minerals.—Lead, iron, zinc, and copper. There are also quarries of slate and stone.

Manf.—Coarse hats, cotton goods, and linen cloth, are made in different parts of the island. The fisheries are extensive and profitable. Liverpool is the port of England in which nearly all the trade of the Isle of Man centres.

Area.—227 square miles.

Pop.—54,000. The natives are known as Manx men, and are allied to the Celts.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The island is divided into 6 sheadings. The chief towns are CASTLETON (the capital), DOUGLAS, PEEL, and RAMSEY.

Government.—The Isle of Man is ruled by a governor, a council of public affairs, and the House of Keys, the representatives of the people, now a self-elected body. The whole island is under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of a bishop, attached to the province of York, who is styled bishop of Sodor and Man, and is, besides, sole baron of the isle, and possesses other important privileges. The Manx church is quite independent.

History.—The island was conquered by the Danes, and in the 13th century Magnus of Norway sold it to the Scotch, and afterwards it was taken by the English in 1307. The earls of Derby formerly possessed it, and by marriage it descended to the Athol family. The duke of Athol was then lord proprietor of this island; but, in 1806, the sovereignty was purchased of him by the English government for the British crown, and, finally, in 1826, certain remaining privileges were given up by the duke, on receiving £416,000. This island was a great station of the Druids, of whose circles it contains numerous remains. In its schools the Manx, a dialect of the Celtic, as well as the English, is taught.

MANAAR, man-ar', an island off the N.W. coast of Ceylon, 18 miles long, by 2½ broad. There is a neat town of the same name on the southern side of the island. Lat. 9° 6′ N. Lon. 79° 58′ N.

MANAAR, GULF OF, an inlet of the Indian Ocean, between the south extremity of India and the island of Ceylon. It is between 80 and 200 miles wide, the greatest width being at the S.W. extremity.

MANACOR, man'-a-kor, a town of the island of Majorca, 30 miles E. of Palma. It is situate in a fertile plain, and is a bishop's see. Manf. Brandy, oil, and wine. Pop. 10,600.

MANAGUA, man-a-gua', capital of Nicaragua, Central America, on south shore of the lake of the same name. It is the seat of government, in a fertile district. Pop. 12,000.

MANAGUA, LAKE, in Nicaragua, separated from the Pacific Ocean by a ridge of land about 15 miles broad. The lake is 40 miles long and 16 miles wide. There are unhealthy marshes on the northern and eastern shores.

MANASSEH, ma-nas'-sa, king of Judah, succeeded his father, Hezekiah, at the age of 12 years, B.C. 699. The commencement of his reign was disgraced by a series of crimes and idolatrous abominations, and "innocent blood filled Jerusalem from one end to the other." In 677 B.C. Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, invaded his dominions, and carried Manasseh captive to Babylon, where his misfortunes produced repentance. After a long captivity, the king of Babylon gave him his liberty, and restored him to his kingdom. On his return to Jerusalem, he established the worship of the true God. There is a fine prayer by him in the Apocrypha.

Died 643 B.C.

MANATEE, man-a-tee', a county of Florida, United States. Area, 4,070 square miles. Pop. 3,544. The capital is Manatee, or Pine Level.

MANAYUNK, man-a-yunk', a town of Pennsylvania, United States, on the left bank of the Schuylkill. It is generally considered a suburb of Philadelphia. Manf. Woollens, jeans, and cotton. Pop. 4,000.

MANBY, GEORGE WILLIAM, man'-be, inventor of the life-saving apparatus. Served in the militia, and was appointed a barrack-master at Yarmouth, where he first began to study his subsequent inventions. He received two parliamentary grants for his apparatus, and was rewarded by foreign governments. His system has now been superseded, but he saved hundreds of lives.

Born 1765; died 1854.

MANCHA, LA, man'-cha, an old province in the central part of Spain, to the S. of Old Castile, and now comprised in the provinces of Ciudad Real, Toledo, Cuenca, and Albacete. It is almost entirely surrounded by mountains, forming parts of the Sierra de Oca, the Sierra de Alcaraz, and the well-known Sierra Morena.

MANCHA REAL, or MANCHUELA DE JAEN, rai'-al, a town of Spain, province of Jaen, and 8 miles N.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Woollen and linen goods, oil, and earthenware. Pop. 4,000.

MANCHE, LA, manch, a maritime department of France, bounded W. and N.E. by the English Channel (La Manche, from which it is named), S.E. by the department of Calvados, and S. by that of Ille-et-Vilaine. It comprises the western part of Normandy, and, although marshy in some parts, is nevertheless fertile, producing grain, hemp, lint, and apples. Its cattle are excellent. Great attention is paid to dairy produce, and the horses are the best in France.

Rivers.—The Douve, Tienne, Celune, Vire, and Taute.
Minerals.—Lead, iron, granite, marble, and limestone.
Area.—2,263 square miles.
Pop.—526,377.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 6 arrondissements and 643 communes. The chief towns are ST. LÔ, the capital; AVRANCHES, CHERBOURG, COUTANCES, MORTAIN, and VALOGNES.

MANCHESTER, man'-ches-ter, a city, parliamentary and municipal borough of Lancashire, the first city and third town, in respect of population, and the most important manufacturing centre of Great Britain, is situated on the east side of a small stream, the Irwell, at its confluence with two other small streams, the Medlock and the Irk. It is 188 miles N.N.W. of London, by the most direct railway route, and 32 miles E. of Liverpool. On the opposite side of the Irwell is the borough of SALFORD, and the adjoining towns of HULME, CHORLTON-ON-MEDLOCK, ARDWICK, CHEETHAM, and BROUGHTON, are topographically suburbs of Manchester, being connected with it by almost uninterrupted lines of buildings. These places are described under the proper headings. The Irwell, a foul, narrow stream, into which the refuse of many manufactories is discharged, is crossed by 10 bridges, some of them very handsome structures, especially the Victoria bridge, Blackfriars bridge, the iron bridges of Strangeways and Springfield-lane, and Broughton suspension bridge. Among the finest streets are Piccadilly and Market streets (continuation of the London road), Moseley-street, which runs at right angles to Piccadilly from the south; Oxford-street, which runs nearly parallel to the London road; and Dean's-gate, the prolongation of the old Chester road, only a few years since a narrow lane, but which has been recently widened and improved, so that it is now one of the finest streets out of the metropolis. Most of these and other leading streets are lined with magnificent warehouses, as architecturally striking as commercially convenient, where a considerable portion of the staple trade of the town is carried on. Outside the town, at Bowdon, Ashton, Eccles, Higher Broughton, Prestwich, Cheetham Hill, Victoria Park, and on the road to Didsbury, are hundreds of noble mansions, the residences of the wealthy merchants of the town. The cathedral, or "old church," stands on a slightly elevated site, near the point where the Irk joins the Irwell. The older part of the building dates from 1422, when Lord de Warr established a collegiate church here, on the site of a church of remote antiquity. This collegiate church was partially restored in 1814 and 1828; and in 1845 a work of restoration and rebuilding was commenced, which has left a small part only of the old building intact. The tower was rebuilt in 1864; new choir stalls, an episcopal throne, and a new reredos have been erected; and altogether nearly £40,000 has been spent on the edifice. The interior is very handsome, and the general style of the building is perpendicular Gothic. There are in Manchester (exclusive of Salford and the suburban towns) a large number of churches, of which the finest are St. Anne's, a Grecian structure, near the centre of the town; St. Peter's (at the junction of Moseley and Oxford-streets), another building in the Grecian style, with a fine altar-piece by Antonio Caracci; St. Mary's (near Dean's-gate), with an elegant spire; St. John's (near Dean's-gate), in the later English Gothic, and containing some beautiful monuments; and St. Matthew's, a beautiful modern Gothic building, designed by Barry, with a lofty spire, in the same locality. There are besides about 100 places of worship for Roman Catholics and Dissenters of almost every denomination. The public buildings of Manchester are among the finest in the kingdom. The Assize Courts, acknowledged to be unsurpassed for arrangement, and adapted to the purposes for which the building is required. It consists of a centre with two wings, is in the Gothic style, 270 feet long and 140 deep, and the tower, with spire, rises to a height of 210 feet. The great central hall is 100 feet long, 48 feet wide, and 75 feet high. There are two large courts connected by wide corridors, grand-jury rooms, library, and convenient offices. The architect was Mr. Waterhouse, and the building was opened in 1864. In the rear is a large gaol, erected by the same architect, and completed in 1867. The Town-hall is in Albert-square, between Mosley-street and Dean's-gate, also erected from the designs of Mr. Waterhouse, and completed in 1877. It has four façades, and an interior courtyard surrounded by corridors 750 feet in length. The Albert-square frontage is 310 feet long. The principal hall is 110 feet long and 50 feet wide, and there are altogether about 250 rooms in the building, some of large size. The cost of the building was about £250,000. In front of the building is the Albert Memorial, a statue by Mr. Noble, under a canopy, erected at a cost of £6,250. The new Royal Exchange, at the end of Market-street, near the cathedral, is a spacious building in the Italian style, from the designs of Messrs. Mills and Murgatroyd, opened in 1871. The great room is 206 feet long and 192 feet wide, larger than Westminster-hall. There are three domes, the larger 60 feet in diameter, the height from the floor to the crown of the dome being 125 feet. The Commercial Buildings, including the Stock Exchange and the Corn Exchange, has a handsome front of six Ionic columns. The Free Trade Hall, the principal place for great public meetings and concerts on a large scale, was built in 1856, at a cost of £40,000. It stands in Peter-street, which connects Oxford-street and Dean's-gate, near the scene of the famous conflict between the yeomanry and radical reformers in 1819, described at the time as the "massacre of Peterloo." The building is in the Lombardo-Venetian style, and the large hall is 134 feet long, 78 feet wide, and 53 feet high. It will hold 5,000 persons. One of the most conspicuous buildings is the Royal Infirmary, in Piccadilly. It forms three sides of a quadrangle, with a fine Ionic portico; and there is a cupola with a clock tower in the centre of each. In connection with this institution are two "convalescent homes" in the suburbs. In front are memorial statues of the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, Dalton the chemist, and James Watt. The chief of the educational institutions of Manchester is Owens College, which originated in a munificent bequest, in 1846, by Mr. John Owens, a wealthy merchant of the town. The work of the college was begun in 1851, and in 1867 a large sum was subscribed for the purpose of increasing the value of the foundation. A new building was begun in 1870, the architect being Mr. Waterhouse; and two years afterwards was completed, at a cost of £90,000. The Manchester Medical School, the Museum of Natural History, and the collection of the geological society, are now connected with the college, the value of which has been increased by noble gifts and endowments. There are, besides, the Cheetham Hospital and Library (the latter free), with a school, founded by Sir Humphrey Cheetham in 1665; and a grammar school, founded by Bishop Oldham, of Exeter, in 1519. Among other places of a scientific or educational character are the Royal Institution in Mosley-street, to which a school of Art is attached; the Manchester Athenæum, built by Sir Charles Barry in 1837; a Mechanics' Institute; and a Free Library, established by Sir John Potter in 1851. There are several hospitals and dispensaries in the town and suburbs. The Cobden Memorial, St. Anne's-square, a statue of the eminent political leader, was inaugurated in 1857. A statue of Oliver Cromwell was erected in 1875. There are in the town political and social clubs, established in buildings which almost vie with the magnificent club-houses of London. The principal are the Union, the Clarendon, the Prince's, the Reform, and the Conservative. There are a concert-hall, three theatres, an amphitheatre, and several music-halls. The chief places of public resort are the Horticultural and Botanical Gardens, Peel Park (see SALFORD), Queen's Park, at Harpurhey, to the north-east of the town; Alexandra Park, Moss Side; Victoria Park, a beautifully laid-out park of 140 acres, to the south-east, between the London and Oxford roads; and Philip's Park, two miles east of the Exchange in a district inhabited chiefly by the working-classes, and the Bellevue Zoological and Pomona Gardens. The are four public markets and a cattle-market, with a large market-hall, built in 1858. The meat and fruit-market, in the London road, was erected in 1862; more than four acres in extent, and covered in. The city is supplied with water brought 20 miles in pipes from the Lancashire side of Blackstone edge.

Manf.—Of these, the principal, and the source of most of the rest, is that of cotton. There are in the city, exclusive of suburbs, more than 200 cotton mills. It is the general depôt from which the raw material is distributed through all parts of the district, and in which all this scattered merchandise is again collected, when finished, into a centre, to be again expanded over a wider circle; to be sent to Hull, Liverpool, and London, and thence all over the world. The principal articles are velvets, fustians, dimities, calicoes, checks, tickings, jeans, shirtings, ginghams, quiltings, handkerchiefs, nankeens, diapers, muslinets, muslins, cambrics, and almost every kind of fancy cotton and cotton and silk goods. The spinning trade is most extensive, and considerable quantities of yarn are annually exported. Weaving by power-looms, or looms worked by machinery, is also carried on to a great extent, and the erecting and keeping up of the various and complicated machinery, which is constantly at work, is, in itself, a source of very great business in and around Manchester. This gives rise to great iron-foundries, and other works of a similar kind, and to the invention even of new machines to facilitate its operations. Besides the weaving and spinning, the printing, dyeing, and bleaching businesses are largely pursued. The hat manufacture is also very extensive, and there are large chemical-works, engine and machine works, iron-foundries, and paper-mills, besides a great number of other manufactories.

Pop.—Of the municipal borough, 341,508; but Salford and other outlying portions form only one town.

Railways.—Manchester is in direct communication with all the leading lines of the kingdom, and there are stations of the Great Western, London and North-Western, Midland, Great Northern, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, North Staffordshire, and other leading lines.

History.—In the year 79 the Roman general, Agricola, erected a fortified camp at the confluence of the Irwell and Medlock, to which he gave the name Mancunium, or Manutium, an obvious corruption of the British "meyne," or stone of refuge, there having been a privilege of sanctuary at the old Druidical altar. The Saxons modified the name into Mancestre. In 920 Edward, king of Mercia, having expelled the Danes, repaired and garrisoned the old castle. A charter conferring the privileges of a borough, was conferred in 1301. As early as the 14th century, the place had a reputation for the manufacture of a coarse woollen cloth, and about the same time a colony of Flemings introduced the manufacture of broad cloth. The wonderful development of the cotton manufacture in the 18th century, was the origin of the manufacturing and commercial greatness of Manchester; and the political agitation of the early part of the present century, and the great Free Trade agitation of which it was the centre, gave its present political importance to the town. The following are the dates of some of the leading events of Manchester history:—

First export of cotton goods	1760
Riots against machinery	1779
Exchange and commercial buildings erected	1809
The conflict between yeomanry and reformers (Peterloo)	1819
Chamber of commerce established	1820
Manchester and Liverpool railway opened	1830
Made a parliamentary borough, to return two members, by the Reform Act	1832
Incorporated by the Municipal Reform Act	1835
Received a charter of incorporation	1838
Anti-Corn-Law League founded here	"
Made a bishopric	1847
Gazetted as a city	1853
Great exhibition of art treasures	1857
A third member given by the new Reform Act	1867

MANCHESTER, a city of Hillsborough county, New Hampshire, United States, on both banks of the Merrimac, crossed by five bridges, 18 miles S. of Concord. It is well laid out, with broad streets, planted with trees, and fine public squares. There are 14 churches, and 40 public schools. Manf. Cotton, stockings, shirtings, hosiery, flannels, barèges, paper, boots and shoes, edge tools, locomotive engines, machinery, starch, and earthenware. The falls of the river give valuable water power. Pop. 32,630, including about 8,000 foreigners.

MANCHESTER, a town of Hartford county, Connecticut, United States, 5 miles E. of Hartford.

Manf. Silk, woollens, ginghams, paper, and carriages. Pop. 6,462.

MANCHOORIA, man-choo'-re-a, an extensive region of eastern Asia, forming a great division of the Chinese empire, bounded N. and E. by the Amoor and Ousouri, separating it from the Russian territory, S. by the Corea and the Yellow Sea, and W. by Mongolia. The interior of the country is little known. It is traversed by vast mountain chains, and there are forests in the north, and fertile grain-producing districts in the south. The vine is cultivated, but not very successfully, the cold in winter being intense. There are three provinces, Chin-King, Kirin, and Tsi-tsi-kar, and the chief towns are respectively, Moukden, Kirin, and Tsi-tsi-kar. Pop. 12,000,000. Lat. 40°—53° N. Lon. 118°—133° E.

MANCINI, Olympe, man-che-'ne, the second of five sisters, daughters of the sister of Cardinal Mazarin, all noted for their beauty, and most of them for licentiousness. The eldest, Laure, became Duchess de Mercœur, and the mother of the famous Duke de Vendome. Olympe was a mistress of Louis XIV., who was also enamoured of her next sister Marie. In 1657 she married Eugene de Carignan, of the house of Savoy, afterwards created Count de Soissons, by whom she had eight children. He died suddenly in 1673, and she was suspected, perhaps unjustly, of having poisoned him. She fled to Spain, where she incurred the suspicion of poisoning the queen of Charles II. of Spain. Prince Eugene of Savoy was one of her sons.

Born 1639; died 1708.

MANCINI, Marie, younger sister of the preceding, was sent to a convent by her uncle the Cardinal, to remove her out of the way of Louis XIV., whose marriage with Maria Theresa of Austria was planned by the Cardinal. Marie afterwards married the Prince Colonna of Rome, who deserted her, and she being left destitute, went with her sister Hortense in male attire to Marseilles. She afterwards led a wandering and adventurous life.

Born 1640; died 1715.

MANCINI, Hortense. (See Mazarin, Duchess de.)

MANCINI, Marie Anne, the youngest of the five sisters. She was married when very young to the Duc de Bouillon, a nephew of Turenne, from whom she was soon separated. Like her sister Olympe she was supposed to be associated in the practice of the poisoner Voisin, and she dabbled in necromancy. Having rejoined her husband, she patronised literature, and her house was a place of meeting for literary celebrities, including Molière and Corneille. In 1680 she was compelled to leave Paris, but was permitted to return two years afterwards.

Born 1649; died 1714.

MANCO-CAPAC, man'-ko ka'-pak, founder and first inca of the empire of Peru. He civilised and reunited the different tribes of Peruvians, to whom he pretended that he was born of the sun. After his death, he was worshipped as a deity. His dynasty endured 500 years, but became extinct soon after the conquest of Peru by Pizarro.

Lived, it is supposed, in the 11th century.

MANCO CAPAC, Inca of Peru. He held the throne at first under the protection of Pizarro, the Spanish conqueror, against whom, however, he soon excited the nation to arms, and in 1536 attacked the town of Cuzco, a great part of which he destroyed, but was compelled by scarcity of provisions to raise the siege, after five months. He was afterwards defeated by Almagro, and thenceforth led a life of irregular warfare, and was at last killed by a party of Spaniards who had taken refuge in the Peruvian camp.

MANDAL, man'-dal, a seaport of Norway, at the mouth of a river of the same name, 22 miles S.W. of Christiansand. There is a good, but small, harbour of refuge, and shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. of the province, 75,121.

MANDARA, man-da'-ra, a state of Central Africa, lying to the S. of Bornou. It is a mountainous country, but in many parts very fertile, inhabited by Mahometans, whose principal manufacture consists of iron wares.

MANDAVI, man-da'-vi, a seaport of Cutch, British India, on the gulf of that name. Pop. variously estimated, probably 70,000. Lat. 22° 50' N. Lon. 69° 18' E.

MANDE, St., man-dai', a town of France, department Seine, near the forest of Vincennes, 4 miles S.E. of Paris. There are many charming villas and places of amusement. Manf. Coloured glass, paper, and varnish. Pop. 4,500.

MANDETIVOE, or LEYDEN, man-dei'-e-vo, an island off the N.W. coast of Ceylon. The principal place is Kayts.

MANDEVILLE, Sir John, man'-de-veel, an English traveller, who spent 34 years in visiting various countries, travelling in Palestine, Egypt, and a large portion of Asia. He lived for three years at Pekin, and on his return published a relation of his voyages, in Latin, English, and French, which abounds in much curious matter, but blended with the most extravagant fictions. The first English edition of his travels was printed by Wynkin de Worde, at Westminster, in 1499.

Born at St. Albans, 1300; died at Liège, 1372.

MANDINGO, or MANDING, man-din-go, a mountainous territory in W. Africa, bounded E. by Bambarra, N. by Fooladoo, S. and W. by Gadou and Jallonkadoo. Desc. Rocky and barren, and contains no towns of any consequence, except Kamalia. The whole region is watered by the Niger in its early course. The Mandingoes have now spread themselves over most of Africa, and this country is supposed to be their cradle. They are a well-formed fine race of people, fond of trading, and capable of civilisation to a high degree. They are Mussulmans in religion. Lat. between 10° and 14° N. Lon. between 13° and 16° W.

MANDU, (man-doo'), a deserted city in Malwa, British India, 15 miles N. of the Nerbudda, in the state of Dhar. Said to have been founded in 313 A.D. There are several very magnificent ruined buildings, including a mosque and mausoleum.

MANDURIA, man-doo'-re-a, an ancient town of Italy, province of Terra d'Otranto, 6 miles from Cassan. There are two wells, of which one is celebrated by Pliny. Pop. 8,300.

MANES, mai'-nes, a name given in the Etruscan and Roman mythologies to the souls of the dead. They were reckoned among the infernal deities, and were worshipped with great solemnity, particularly by the Romans. Virgil introduces his hero as sacrificing to the infernal deities, or to the Manes, a victim whose blood was received in a ditch.

MANETHO, mai-ne'-tho, an Egyptian historian, who flourished in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphas, at Mende, or Heliopolis. Very little is known respecting him, but his books have been handed down. He belonged to the priestly caste, and composed, in Greek, a History of Egypt, of which a fragment only has come down to us; there is, however, a complete work by him on the Influence of the Stars.

Lived in the 3rd century, B.C.

MANFREDO, man'-fredo, king of Naples and Sicily, was a natural son of the emperor Frederick II. After the death of his brother Conrad, he became regent of the kingdom, during the minority of Corradino, his nephew. Pope Innocent IV. exciting a revolt against him, he was driven from his kingdom; but he reconquered it a year afterwards, and caused himself to be crowned in 1258. Pope Urban IV. excommunicated him, but Manfred invaded the papal dominions and conquered Tuscany. He was again excommunicated, and the pope bestowed his kingdom on Charles of Anjou. Manfred treacherously perished in a desperate battle with the latter near Benevento. His widow and children were barbarously treated, but his body had a monument erected over it, which was called the "Rock of Roses."

Born 1233; died 1266.

MANFREDONIA, man-frai-dō'-ne-a, a town of Italy, province of Capitanata, on a bay of the Adriatic, 20 miles N.E. of Foggia. It is surrounded by walls, and its port is sheltered by a mole. This town was in the 13th century founded by Manfred. Pop. 7,800. There are salt lakes in the neighbourhood.

MANGALORE, called also COURIAL BUNDER, man-ga-lor', a seaport and fortress of British India, on the east shore of the Indian Ocean. The harbour is not good. Pop. about 32,099, exclusive of the military. Lat. 12° 52′ N. Lon. 75° E.

MANGEIA, or MANGEEA, man-gī'-a, an island of the South Pacific Ocean, 30 miles in circumference. It was discovered by Captain Cook. Pop. 2,000. Lat. 21° 57′ S. Lon. 158° W.

MANHATTAN ISLAND. (See NEW YORK.)

MANI, or MANICHÆUS, ma'-ne, founder of the heretical sect known as Manichæans. He was a native of Persia. Little is known of his early history. Mani was exiled by order of Sapor, king of Persia, for failing to cure his son. He was well received by Hormuz after Sapor's death, but was subsequently flayed alive by Behram, successor of Hormuz, in 277 A.D.

MANIAGO, man-e-a'-go, a town of Italy, province of Venetia, 25 miles N.W. of Udine. Manf. Iron, steel, and fine cutlery. Pop. 4,200.

MANIKPOOR, ma'-nik-pore, a town of British India, on the left bank of the Ganges, 35 miles N.W. of Allahabad. It extends for about a mile along the river, and consists chiefly of wretched huts, interspersed with the remains of handsome edifices. Pop. 2,000.

MANILIUS, MARCUS, ma-nil'-i-us, a Latin poet in the time of Tiberius. His "Astronomicon" was discovered by Poggius in the 16th century.

Lived in the 1st century.

MANILLA, ma-nil'-la, a town of the island of Luzon, and the capital of the Spanish settlements in the Philippines, situate on the south-west coast of a bay of the same name. It is the residence of the Spanish viceroys. The city proper communicates with the suburb Binondo, the seat of most of the trade, by a bridge over the river Passig. It contains the cathedral, the palace (built in 1690), a hall of audience, the archbishop's residence, and many handsome private houses, and, notwithstanding the frequent earthquakes, it has some magnificent churches. The largest and best part of the town is occupied by monasteries and convents; but it has a university, a missionary college, and a large number of schools and hospitals. There is also a government cigar-manufactory. The Calzada (promenade) is the favourite evening resort. Binondo is of greater extent than Manilla, but less regular; numerous canals run through it. The bay and harbour are magnificent and commodious, and the port is one of the four open to foreign ships. The chief exports are cordage, resinous substances, pitch and tar, cloths, rushes, rattans, indigo of an excellent quality, rice, cotton, copper, and cochineal, with a large proportion of treasure.

Pop.—Number of inhabitants enumerated 11,101, which probably refers to Europeans only.

Lat. 14° 36′ N. Lon. 121° E.

History.—In the year 1645, great part of this city was destroyed by an earthquake, and, in 1762, it was taken by the English, and a million sterling was exacted for its ransom. A violent hurricane in October, 1875, destroyed 3,800 houses, and killed 250 persons.

MANIN, DANIELE, ma'-nin, an illustrious Italian patriot, president of the Venetian republic in 1848. The son of a distinguished advocate, he was educated for the profession of the law, and graduated at Padua, where he was admitted doctor of laws when only 19 years of age. About 1825 he married, and went to reside at Mestre, a small town near Venice. There he practised as an advocate, and occupied his leisure with historical studies, and at an early age was recognised as one of the leaders of liberal opinions. In 1847 he took an active part in the discussions on political economy at the meeting of the scientific congress; at the beginning of 1848, was imprisoned for the liberal opinions expressed by him as advocate during several trials. A few months later, the Austrians were driven from Milan; the insurrection quickly spread throughout the Italian peninsula, and at Venice, Count Zichy, the Austrian governor, was forced to surrender. Manin here stepped forth, and exhorted his countrymen to act like men who were worthy of freedom. He organised a government, at the head of which he was placed, with Tomaseo; formed a committee of defence, created ten battalions of garde mobile, and improvised a corps of artillery. When Charles Albert took the field against the Austrians, in the name of Italy, the Venetians agreed to a fusion with Lombardy and Piedmont, under the name of a kingdom of Northern Italy. The defeat of the Piedmontese, however, destroyed that compact, and left Venice to defend herself alone against Austria; thereupon a republic was proclaimed, Manin being named chief triumvir, and the military command confided to the Neapolitan general Pepé. Venice was besieged by the Austrians in August, 1848, but held out heroically until the end of the same month in the following year, and did not surrender before it had been subjected to a fearful bombardment. Manin retired to Paris, where he supported himself in honourable independence by giving lessons in Italian.

Born at Venice, 1804; died at Paris, 1857.

MANISSA, man'-is-sa (ant. Magnesia), a town of the Turkish empire in Asia Minor, on the south bank of the Sarabat, 28 miles N.E. of Smyrna. There are numerous public buildings, including 18 mosques. Many remarkable cave tombs are in the vicinity. Manf. Cotton and silk. Pop. about 50,000.

MANISTEE, man-is-te', a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 12,532. The capital is MANISTEE.

MANISTEE, a city and capital of the preceding, at the mouth of the Manistee river, on the eastern side of Lake Michigan. It is one of the chief lumber depôts on the lake. Pop. 6,930.

MANITCH, or MANYTCH, ma-nich', a river of Russia, rising from the salt lakes of Chaki, in the government of Astracan, and after a course of 300 miles joins the Don, near Old Tcherkask.

MANITOBA, man-it'-o-ba, a lake of British America, 120 miles long, and 26 miles wide, divided by peninsulas into two nearly equal parts. There are many small islands, on the northern side of one of which is a perpendicular cliff with many caverns. The echoes produce a peculiar sound as the waves beat upon the beach, which have made the island an object of superstition to the Indians. Lat. 50° 25'—51° 50' N. Lon. 98°—100° W.

MANITOBA, a province of Western Canada, formerly a part of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company. The principal rivers are the Assiniboine and Red River. The capital is WINNIPEG. Area, 13,923 square miles. Pop. 65,954. Lat. 49°—50° 30' N. Lon. 96°—99° W.

MANITOU, man-e-too', a county of Michigan, United States, comprising the Beaver, Fox, and Manitou Islands, on the lake. Area, 100 square miles. Pop. 1,000. The chief town is St. James, on Big Beaver island.

MANITOULIN ISLANDS, man-i-too'-lin, a chain in Lake Huron, North America. Great and Little Manitoulin (Sacred and Cockburn Isles,) belong to Great Britain, and Drummond Isle to the state of Michigan. They contain large pine forests. Great Manitoulin is 90 miles long, and from 5 to 30 broad; Drummond Isle, 20 miles long, and 12 miles in greatest breadth. Pop. 2,000, nearly all Indians.

MANITOWOC, man-e-to-wok', a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 612 square miles. Pop. 37,505. The capital is MANITOWOC.

MANITOWOC, a city and capital of the county, on Lake Michigan, at the mouth of Manitowoc river. There is a good harbour, and a large trade is carried on. Pop. 6,367, about half foreigners.

MANKASSER. (See MACASSAR.)

MANKATO, man-ka'-to, a city and the county seat of Blue Earth county, Minnesota, United States, on the right bank of the Minnesota river, 76 miles S.W. of St. Paul. Manf. Linseed oil, agricultural implements, woollens, and joinery. Pop. 6,500.

MANKORE, or MANKAWR, man-kore', a town of British India, in Bengal, 22 miles N.W. of Burdwan. There is a considerable trade in rice. Pop. 8,700.

MANLIUS, man'-le-us, a township of Onondaga county, New York, U.S., 10 miles from Syracuse. Pop. 6,500.

MANLIUS CAPITOLINUS, MARCUS, kap-i-to-li'-nus, a celebrated Roman consul and commander, who, when Rome was taken by the Gauls, retired into the Capitol, and preserved it from a sudden attack made upon it in the night. The dogs which were kept in the Capitol made no noise; but the geese, by their cry, awoke Manlius, who had just time to repel the enemy. Geese from that period were always held sacred among the Romans, and Manlius was honoured with the surname of Capitolinus. He afterwards endeavoured to obtain the sovereignty of Rome, for which he was thrown from the Tarpeian rock.

Died, 384 B.C.

MANLIUS TORQUATUS, tor-kwat'-tus, a famous Roman, who displayed great courage in his youth as military tribune. In a war against the Gauls he accepted a challenge given by one of the enemy, and having slain him, took his chain (torques) from his neck; on which account he assumed the name of Torquatus. He was the first Roman advanced to the dictatorship without being previously a consul. But he tarnished his glory by putting his son to death for engaging in single combat with an enemy contrary to his order. This gave great disgust to the Romans, and, on account of his severity in his government, all edicts of extreme rigour were called "Manliana Edicta."

Lived in the 4th century, B.C.

MANN, HORACE, LL.D., American statesman. He was educated in Massachusetts in 1827, and advocated religious liberty, temperance, and the introduction of railways. He was elected senator for Boston, and became president of the state. He subsequently gave up politics for the cause of education. In 1848 he was elected to Congress, and was president of Yellow Spring College. He wrote several exhaustive reports, and a book on slavery.

Born 1796; died 1859.

MANNHEIM, man'-hime, a town in the grand-duchy of Baden, at the confluence of the Neckar and the Rhine, 18 miles below Spires, on a low site, protected from inundation by a dyke. The Rhine is crossed by a bridge of boats, and the Neckar by a chain bridge. The palace belonging to the grand-duke occupies the side next the Rhine, and was erected in 1720. It contains several handsome apartments, with a gallery of paintings, cabinets of antiquities and natural history, and a large library. The observatory is a noble building, with a curious tower 108 feet in height. The custom-house resembles a palace, and is surrounded with colonnades, under which are shops. The other public buildings are the convents of the Augustines and Capuchins, now both secularised; the arsenal, the merchants' hall, the theatre; the Lutheran, the Calvinist, and Catholic churches, hospitals, the workhouse, the orphan-house, and the church that belonged to the Jesuits. It has a gymnasium, with drawing and music schools; also a mercantile school, and other literary institutions, and a botanic garden. Pleasure grounds occupy the site of the old fortifications. Manf. Tobacco, ribbons, shawls, linen, carpets, and playing-cards; there are also bleaching grounds and tanneries. An important trade is carried on. Pop. 61,370. Mannheim was formerly the capital of the Rhenish Palatinate. It suffered terribly from wars between France and Germany. Pop. of district, 426,728.

MANNING, HENRY EDWARD, Cardinal and Catholic archbishop of Westminster. He was educated at Harrow and Baliol College, Oxford, and, having taken orders in the Church of England, was appointed rector of Lavington and Graffham, in Sussex. In 1842 he was appointed archdeacon of Chichester. He became a prominent member of the Puseyite, or High Church party, and in consequence of the famous Gorham decision, resigned his preferments. In 1851 he was received into the Roman Catholic church, in which he was ordained priest in 1857. He succeeded Cardinal Wiseman as archbishop of Westminster in 1865, and was raised to the dignity of cardinal in 1875.

MANNUS, man'-nus, in German mythology, the son of the earth-born god Tuisco, and progenitor of the three great German tribes, the Ingavones, Iskavones, and Hermanones. The name is apparently derived from the Aryan man, to think, from which is also derived the name of the Hindoo god Manus.

MANOEL, FRANCESCO, DON, Portuguese poet. Having offended the Inquisition, he was compelled to fly, and went to Paris. His odes and lyric pieces are greatly admired.

Born at Lisbon, 1734; died at Paris, 1819.

MANOEL (ALVES-SEPTENTRIONAL), man-o'-el, a river of Brazil, rising in the mountain between the provinces of Pernambuco and Piauhy, and, after receiving many affluents, joins the Tocantino, near the town of São Pedro d'Alcantara. The entire length is 400 miles.

MANONO ISLAND, ma-no'-no, one of the Navigator Islands, in the South Pacific. Pop. 1,100. Lat. 13° 50′ S. Lon. 172° W.

MANOSQUE, ma-nosk', a town of France, department of Basses-Alpes, 29 miles S.W. of Digne. It is a thriving place, with a chamber of commerce, and a considerable trade in silk, wool, olive oil, and brandy. Manf. Silk, linen, yarn, serge, and grape syrup. Pop. 6,000.—The town was formerly the property of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, and the body of Gerard, the founder, was long preserved here.

MANRESA, man-rai'-sa, a town of Spain, in the province of Barcelona, on the left bank of the Cardoner, 30 miles N.W. of Barcelona. It is walled, has a castle and a church, a barracks, and various schools. Manf. Silk and cotton fabrics, broadcloths, ribbons, gunpowder, cutlery, hardware, leather, earthenware, soap, and brandy. Pop. 18,537.

MANS, LE, ma, a town of France, capital of the department Sarthe, near the Sarthe, 40 miles from Angers. The streets are airy and clean. The only public buildings or institutions worth notice are, the cathedral, an ancient Gothic structure, containing the tomb of Berengaria, queen of Richard I., the old church of Notre Dame, and other churches, the public library, the museum, and the hospitals. Manf. Linen, lace, flannel, serge, and druggets, leather, gloves, paper, soap, and wax candles. Pop. 49,155.—Here the final struggle between the Vendean troops and the French republicans took place, in 1793, and it was the scene of a battle in the Franco-Prussian war, 1870-1, when the French were defeated.

MANSEL, REV. HENRY LONGUEVILLE, man'-sel, professor of Moral Philosophy at Oxford. In 1855 he was appointed reader in moral philosophy, in 1859 Waynflete professor, and regius professor of ecclesiastical history in 1867, and in 1868 dean of St. Paul's, London. He was canon of Christ's Church. His Bampton Lectures gave rise to many controversies. His writings were numerous and elegant.

Born 1820; died 1871.

MANSFIELD, mans'-feeld, a market-town of Nottinghamshire, 14 miles N.W. of Nottingham, in Sherwood Forest. It has a church, in the later Gothic style, a handsome town-hall, and a union workhouse Manf. Cotton-spinning, hosiery, lace, silk, tobacco, and mustard. There are quarries of building stone in the vicinity. Pop. 13,651.—A station on the Midland railway.

MANSFIELD, the capital of Richmond county, Ohio, United States, 65 miles N.E. of Columbia. It is a great railroad centre. Manf. Agricultural and other machinery, woollens, and paper. Pop. 10,000.

MANSFIELD, WILLIAM MURRAY, Earl of, lord chief justice, was the fourth son of the earl of Stormont. He received his education at Westminster School, whence he was elected student of Christ Church, Oxford. After taking his degree as M.A., in 1730, he went abroad, and on his return, entered of Lincoln's Inn, where he was called to the bar in 1731. His eloquence and legal acquirements soon gained him an extensive practice, and when he pleaded the court was crowded. Pope, with whom he was intimate, complimented him with the appellation of "silver-tongued Murray." In 1743 he became solicitor-general, and was elected member of parliament for Boroughbridge. In his official capacity, 1746, he prosecuted the rebel Lords Lovat, Kilmarnock, and Balmerino. In 1754 he was made attorney-general, and in 1756 chief justice of the King's Bench; soon after which he was created Baron Mansfield. In 1776 his lordship was created an earl. His conduct on the bench at the trials of the publisher of Junius's letters, and of Wilkes, caused him to become very unpopular, and during the famous riots of 1780 his house in Bloomsbury-square was burnt down by the mob, who also threatened his life. By that disaster he lost many valuable manuscripts and books; yet, when the House of Commons voted him a compensation for the injury, he refused to accept it. After filling his high office with great dignity for many years, he resigned it on account of his infirmities, in 1788. His reputation is that of a forcible speaker, but not a very erudite lawyer, an upright man, and elegant scholar. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey.

Born at Perth, 1704; died 1793.

MANSFIELD ISLAND is in Hudson's Bay, British North America. Its length is estimated at about 70 miles.

MANSURAH, man-soo'-ra, a town of Lower Egypt, on the right bank of the Damietta branch of the Nile, 35 miles S. of Damietta. A fourth part of it is in ruins; but it contains several mosques and a government cotton-factory. Pop. Unascertained.

MANT, RICHARD, bishop, commentator, and poet. He was the son of a Wiltshire clergyman, and was educated at Winchester and Oxford, where he carried off the chancellor's prize. He was ordained in 1802, and having held several preferments, and distinguished himself by several original works, and by co-operating with Dr. D'Oyley in the preparation of the well-known Family Bible, with notes, he was in 1820 consecrated bishop of Killaloe, and was in 1823 translated to the see of Down and Connor. His writings are very voluminous.

Born at Southampton, 1776; died at Ballymoney, Antrim, 1848.

MANTCHURIA. (See MANCHOORIA.)

MANTELL, GIDEON ALGERNON, man'-tel, a distinguished English geologist, who, while pursuing his profession as surgeon at Lewes, studied the geological formations of Sussex with the greatest assiduity and success. In 1822 he published "The Fossils of the South Downs," which was followed by

"Illustrations of the Geology of Sussex." For his great discoveries of the iguanodon and its colossal allies, the Geological Society, in 1835, awarded him the Wollaston medal and fund. In 1825 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and this learned body also marked its sense of his discovery of the iguanodon by awarding him the royal medal. In 1839 he went to reside at Clapham. About the same time the trustees of the British Museum purchased his collection of fossils for £5,000. His "Wonders of Geology," and "The Medals of Creation," are works deservedly held in the highest esteem. Dr. Mantell was also an industrious contributor to scientific transactions; and in the "Zoology and Geology" of Agassiz and Strickland no less than 67 articles have been attributed to him.

Born at Lewes, Sussex, 1790; died in London, 1852.

MANTES, mants, a town of France, of great antiquity, department Seine-et-Oise, on the Seine, 30 miles N.W. of Paris. There are a fine Gothic church, with two lofty towers, and a beautiful Gothic tower, the remains of the old church of St. Maclou. The town was taken by William the Conqueror in 1087, and here he met his death. Manf. Saltpetre; and trade is carried on in wheat and hides. Pop. 5,300.

MANTEUFFEL, BARON OTHO THEODER VON, Prussian statesman, was educated at Halle, went to Berlin in 1827, and in 1848 was appointed minister of the interior. In December, 1850, he became chief of the cabinet and minister of foreign affairs, and in 1852 he was made president of the council of ministers. In his endeavour to hold the balance between the Liberals and the Revolutionists, he gained the respect of all parties. He represented Prussia at the Peace Congress of Paris in 1856, and in 1858 he retired from office.

Born at Lübben, in Brandenburg, 1805.

MANTUA, man'-tu-a (Ital. MANTOVA, man'-to-va), a fortified city of N. Italy, province of Mantova, situate partly on two islands formed by the waters of the Mincio, and partly on the mainland, 22 miles S.W. of Verona. Mantua is, both by nature and art, one of the strongest places in Europe, but unhealthy. It is one of the fortresses of the Quadrilateral. It is entered by five gates, is very strongly fortified, and is built on a plan of tolerable regularity, and communication between the islands and the mainland is afforded by several bridges, the principal being the very fine Ponte di San Giorgio. Most of the streets are broad, regular, and well paved; the houses of stone, and in general well built; and the public squares are spacious and elegant, including Piazza di Virgilio, used as a promenade, with Virgil's monument, a column of marble, in the centre; the Piazza delle Erbe, a market-place; the Piazza or Esplanade de San Petro, and the Piazza del Argine. The principal public edifice at Mantua is the cathedral of San Pietro, built by Giulio Romano, a beautiful building, with a fine campanile, and adorned in the interior with rows of Corinthian pillars and a number of frescoes. Other very interesting churches are those of San Martino, Sant' Egidio, both very ancient, Santa Barbara and San Sebastiano. The other most conspicuous buildings are the Castello di Corte, the old palace of the Gonzagas, a large and strong pile, now used for public offices and as a state prison; the superb edifice, begun by Buonacolse, the feudal lord of Milan, early in the 14th century. There are a magnificent suite of state apartments, and nearly 500 other rooms, the vast building, an antique castellated structure, with lofty pointed arches and Gothic windows, including the Palazzo Imperiale, the Palazzo Vecchio, and the Corte Imperiale, or provincial tribunal; several old towers, including one which has a cage in which criminals were formerly exposed; two handsome markets, built by Giulio Romano; the Palazzo Colloredo, with a façade supported by caryatides; museum, lyceum, gymnasium, a large library, and various hospitals and other charitable endowments. By far the busiest part of the city is the Ghetto, or quarter occupied by the Jews, who are very numerous. Manf. Silk, woollen, linen fabrics, leather, paper, parchment, and cordage. Pop. 28,048.—Mantua can boast of an antiquity almost equal to that of Rome. It shared the prosperity of that metropolis, suffered under her disasters, experienced all the vicissitudes of the middle ages, and, like other Italian cities, emerged from them into liberty and independence. It was surrendered to the French under Bonaparte in February, 1797; was taken by the allies in 1799; again ceded to the French in 1801, from whose possession it was taken in 1814, but relinquished by Austria to Italy after the war of 1866. Under the French, it was the capital of the French department Mincio.

MANTUA, or MANTOVA, a province of northern Italy, formerly included in the Venetio-Lombardo kingdom. It consists of an extensive plain, for the most part damp and insalubrious, but of great fertility. Area, 855 square miles. Pop. 304,966.

MANUA, or OMANOOAU, man'-oo-a, one of the Navigator Islands, in the South Pacific. It rises precipitously from the shore, and assumes the shape of a vast dome. It is about 16 miles in circumference, and the vegetation is luxuriant, the principal settlement is on the western side. The inhabitants are a fine race, and nearly all profess Christianity. Lat. 14° 15′ S. Lon. 169° 26′ W.

MANUEL I., COMNENUS, man'-u-el, emperor of the East, was the fourth son of John Comnenus, whom he succeeded in 1143, to the prejudice of Isaac, his eldest brother, whom his father had disinherited. The Crusaders passed through his dominions in 1147. Roger, king of Sicily, invaded the empire in his reign; peace was concluded, after varied success, in 1155, and then turned his arms against Dalmatia and Hungary. He also marched into Egypt, which country he would have conquered, had he not been betrayed by Amaury, king of Jerusalem, his ally.

Born 1120; died 1180.

MANUEL, PALÆOLOGUS, emperor of Constantinople, was the son and successor of John Palæologus. The Turks having invaded his dominions, he applied to the Latins for succour, but without effect, on which he resigned his sceptre to John Palæologus II., his son, and took a religious habit.

Born 1349; died 1425.

MANUTIUS ALDUS, ma-nu'-she-us (THEOBALDO MANUZIO), a celebrated printer of Venice. His editions of the classics, known as the Aldine editions, were long held in great estimation. He introduced the form still called Italic printing.

Born at Bassiano, 1449; died at Venice, 1515.

MANUTIUS, or ALDUS, PAULUS, or PAOLO, son of the preceding, had for some time the care of the Vatican library at Rome, and acquired by reading Cicero often, an elegant Latin style. He wrote Commentaries upon that author, and published several other works, the best of which is his treatise "De Legibus Romanorum."

Born 1511; died 1574.

MANUTIUS, ALDUS, brother of Paulus, was also a learned printer, and had the care of the Vatican press, notwithstanding which, he died poor. He wrote a "Treatise on Orthography;" "Commentaries on Cicero;" three books of Epistles; the Lives of Cosmo de' Medici and Castruccio Castricani.
Born 1547; died 1597.

Lived in the 16th century.

MANZONI, ALESSANDRO, man-zo'-ne, Italian poet and novelist, of noble parentage; after completing his education at Milan and Pavia, he went to Paris, in 1803. While in the French capital, at the age of 21, he produced a poem in blank verse, of strongly deistical opinions, but after his return to Italy, in 1807, he became a zealous Roman Catholic, and his subsequent poetical works were imbued with a devotional feeling. He is known throughout Europe as the author of a fine historical novel, called "I Promessi Sposi," "The Betrothed Lovers," which has been translated into English, French, and German, and is allowed to be worthy of taking rank with the best productions of Sir Walter Scott. He also wrote an ode to Napoleon. After the death of his first wife, in 1833, Manzoni continued to live in retirement near Milan.
Born at Milan, 1784; died 1873.

MAOUNA, TUTUILA, or MASSACRE ISLAND, ma-oo'-na, one of the Navigator Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean. It is 17 miles long, about 5 broad, of rugged appearance, with precipitous ridges, and a peak rising to 2,300 feet. The vegetation is luxuriant. Lat. 14° 19' S. Lon. 171° 37' W.—This island takes its name from the fact of eleven of the companions of La Perouse, the French navigator, having been massacred upon it.

MAPES, or MAP, WALTER, maips, an old English poet, who studied at Paris, and was afterwards chaplain to Henry II., by whom he was despatched on a mission to the court of Louis VII. of France. He wrote some satirical and convivial poems in Latin. He was also the author of several prose works, both in Latin and Norman-French, from which a large portion of the romance of the Round Table is said to be taken. Mapes rose to high posts in the church; but, after he became archdeacon of Oxford, in 1196, no further mention is made of him.
Born, probably in Herefordshire, about the middle of the 12th century; died about 1210.

MARAT, JEAN PAUL, ma-ra', a French revolutionist, who spent a few of his earlier years in Great Britain, teaching languages in London and Edinburgh. He abstracted some valuable medals from Oxford, for which he was punished, and afterwards returned to Paris, where he studied physic, and set up as an empiric, selling his nostrums at an extravagant price. On the first outbreak of the Revolution, in 1789, he became a leader among the most violent of the revolutionary factions. In his first journal, the "Publiciste Parisien," he attacked Necker, and other eminent men. This was followed by his "Ami du Peuple," in which he excited the troops against their generals, the people at large against their king, and declared in print that France could never become happy until 270,000 heads had been struck off by the guillotine. Named deputy of the department of Paris in the Convention, he appeared there armed with pistols, and excited the greatest detestation. In 1793 he obtained the law against "suspects," and thousands were imprisoned. He with Robespierre and Danton then ruled France—"The Reign of Terror." The most atrocious murders were committed by his means, and he appeared to delight in nothing but the effusion of blood, when he was assassinated, in the midst of his career, while taking a bath, by Charlotte Corday. (See CORDAY.) After this still worse atrocities were perpetrated, and Marat's likeness was placed in a court of the Louvre, and his corpse received honours of interment in the Pantheon, whence it was cast out in 1795. Marat published a work on Man, or "Principles of the Reciprocal Influence of the Soul and Body," and tracts on Electricity and Light, in which he attacked the Newtonian system.

Born at Baudre, near Neufchâtel, 1744; assassinated, 1793.

MARCELLINUS, mar-sel-lī'-nus, a pope and saint, succeeded Caius in 296. He signalised himself by his courage in a severe persecution. The Donatists charged him with having sacrificed to idols; from which he was vindicated by Augustine.

Died 304.

MARCELLO, BENEDETTO, mar'-sail-lo, an eminent Italian composer, equally eminent as a poet, philosopher, and musician. His compositions in music were numerous. His principal prose work was his "Teatro alla Moda" (the Fashionable Stage), intended as a ludicrous criticism on modern operas.

Born at Venice, 1686; died 1739.

MARCELLUS I., ST., mar-sel'-lus, Pope, succeeded Marcellinus in 308. The emperor Maxentius banished him from Rome for excommunicating an apostate.

Died 310.

MARCELLUS II. (Marcello Servini), was secretary to Paul III., who made him a cardinal, and one of the presidents at the council of Trent. He succeeded Julius III., but died a few weeks after his election.

Died 1555.

MARCELLUS, MARCUS CLAUDIUS, a famous Roman general, who, after the first Punic war, had the command of an expedition against the Gauls, where he obtained the spolia opima, by killing with his own hand, Viridomarus, the king of the enemy; soon after he was intrusted to oppose Hannibal in Italy, and was the first Roman who obtained any advantage over him. Marcellus, in his third consulship, was sent with a powerful force against Syracuse. He attacked it by sea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, the invention of the philosopher Archimedes baffling all the efforts and destroying all the great and stupendous military engines of the Romans, during three successive years. (See ARCHIMEDES.) The perseverance of Marcellus, aided by treachery, at last gave him the victory. After the conquest of Syracuse, Marcellus was called upon to oppose Hannibal a second time. He displayed great military talents in his operations against this general, but was not, however, sufficiently vigilant against the snares of his adversary. He imprudently separated himself from his camp, and was killed in an ambuscade.

Died B.C. 208.

MARCET, JANE, mar'-set, maiden name Haldimand, wife of a physician at Edinburgh, and authoress of "Conversations on Chemistry," and other well-known elementary works on scientific subjects.

The soil is fertile, but the malaria is most unhealthy. Some improvement has been effected by drainage. It formerly contained several of the most flourishing Etruscan cities.

MARENGO, or MARENGO SPINETTA, ma-ren'-go, a village of northern Italy, on the right bank of the Bormida, 3 miles from Alessandria. It stands in the midst of forests. On the 14th June, 1800, Bonaparte defeated here the Austrians under General Melas.

MARENNES, ma-ren', a town of France, department Charente-Inférieure, one mile from the Bay of Biscay, 23 miles S. of Rochelle. It has a brisk traffic in salt (from the marshes in the neighbourhood), wine, and brandy. Pop. 4,400.

MARGARET, daughter of Valdemar III., king of Denmark, and wife of Haco VIII., king of Norway, was placed on the throne of both kingdoms, on the death of her son, Olaf IV., in 1387. The Swedes, dissatisfied with their king Albert, offered their crown to Margaret, who accepted it, and defeated Albert. Three years afterwards, the states of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway passed a law, known by the name of the Union of Calmar, by which the three kingdoms were united, and the monarchy limited. She was a lady of vigorous constitution, and beautiful in person, and has been styled "the Semiramis of the North."

Born 1353; died 1412.

MARGARET, daughter of René of Anjou, king of Sicily, and wife of Henry VI., king of England. In the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, she displayed the character of a heroine, and virtually governed England. Her husband being taken prisoner, in 1455, by the earl of Warwick, she levied forces, set Henry at liberty, and entered London in triumph. But, in 1460, her army was defeated at Northampton, and Henry again became a prisoner; the queen, however, escaped into Scotland, and collected another army, with which she marched against the duke of York, who fell in the battle of Wakefield. She next defeated Warwick at the second battle of St. Alban's; but being routed at Towton, she fled to France, to implore succour from Louis XI., who refused her any assistance. This intrepid woman then returned to England, where she was joined by several of her party, but was defeated at Hexham. In 1471 she was taken prisoner and sent to the Tower, and, in 1475, purchased her liberty by a large ransom obtained from Louis XI. of France. She then returned to France, where she died at the château of Dampierre, in Anjou.

Born 1425; died 1482.

MARGARET, Countess of Richmond and Derby. She married Edmund, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son, who became king of England, by the title of Henry VII. After being a widow some time, she married Sir Henry Stafford, on whose death she united herself to Thomas, Lord Stanley, created earl of Derby in 1485. The countess was a liberal patron of learning, and founded two colleges at Cambridge,—Christ's and St. John's. She also instituted in that university a theological professorship, and endowed a school at Torrington, in Devonshire. She translated from the French a work entitled "The Mirroure of Golde for the Sinful Soule," also the fourth book of Thomas à Kempis' "Imitation."

Born 1441; died 1509.

MARGUERITE DE VALOIS, mar-ga-reet', queen of Navarre, and sister to Francis I., king of France, was the daughter of Charles of Orleans, duke of Angoulême. She was highly educated, being a mistress of several foreign languages, and of most attractive manners. In 1509 she married Charles, duke of Alençon, two years after whose death, in 1526, she became the wife of Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, by whom she had Jeanne d'Albret, mother of Henry IV. Margaret assisted her husband in improving his dominions, and she greatly encouraged the Protestants, although, in her later years, intimidated probably by the threats of the Catholic party, she professed to conform to their church. Besides other works, she wrote the "Heptameron," a collection of tales, after the manner, and with more than the licence, of Boccaccio.

Born at Angoulême, 1492; died in Bigorre, 1549.

MARGARITA, SANTA, mar-ga-ré-ta, a town of Sicily, 42 miles N.W. of Girgenti. Pop. 7,900.

MARGARITA, or NUEVA SPARTA, mar'-ga-ri-ta, an island in the Caribbean Sea, belonging to Venezuela, from which it is separated by an arm of the sea, formerly famous for pearl-fishing, hence the title, 40 miles long, with a breadth of between 5 and 20. Fertile in the interior, but barren along the coasts. Maize, coffee, sugar, cotton, and bananas are cultivated. A great deal of poultry and large stock are reared, and the fishery is extensive. Area, 441 square miles. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 11° N. Lon. 64° W.

MARGATE, mar'-gait, a seaport, municipal borough, and popular watering-place of England, at the mouth of the Thames, and north-eastern extremity of the coast of Kent, 16 miles E. of Canterbury, on the Isle of Thanet. Its principal buildings are a modern church, the old church, an almshouse, infirmary, national-school, assembly-rooms, town-hall, market-house, baths, &c. The vicinity abounds with agreeable walks and rides. There is a fine stone pier, 900 feet long and 60 feet wide, built at an expense of £100,000; and the promenade has a handsome raised and enclosed walk on it; and there is also a jetty, 1,000 feet long, and 18 feet wide. Margate is chiefly supported by the numerous visitors who resort hither in summer, and the business which their residence occasions. It carries on also a considerable trade in corn and fish sent to the metropolis, in coals imported from Newcastle and Sunderland, and in timber, iron, tar, tin, and hemp, from Memel and Riga. Pop. 15,889, but during the season it accommodates at least 80,000 visitors. It has the reputation of being the most healthy watering-place in England. It is in constant communication with London by steamboats, and is a station on the South-Eastern and London, Chatham and Dover railways.

MARIA CHRISTINA, chris-té'-na, the ex-queen-dowager of Spain. She married Ferdinand VII., and is mother of Isabella II. and the duchess of Montpensier. A civil war broke out in 1833, as Don Carlos, the brother of Ferdinand, claimed the throne. The queen-mother had meantime contracted a morganatic marriage with Don Fernando Muñoz, her chamberlain, by whom she has ten children. A conspiracy nearly proved fatal to Muñoz, and in 1840 she resigned the regency and retired to France. She returned to Spain in 1843, and was publicly wedded to Muñoz the next year. She was disliked by the liberal party of Spain, and a revolution caused her retirement from Spain in 1854; she returned in 1864, and left the country again in 1868.

Born 1806.

MARIA LOUISA, empress of France, daughter of Francis I. of Austria, and second wife of Napoleon. A year after her marriage she gave birth to a son, known first as the king of Rome, and afterwards as the duke de Reichstadt. On the abdication of Napoleon she retired to Schönbrunn, and in 1816 received the duchies of Parma, Placenza, and Guastalla, and afterwards married morganatically Count von Neipperg.

Born 1791; died at Vienna, 1847.

MARIA THERESA, tai-rai'-sa, archduchess of Austria, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, and empress of Germany, was the daughter of the emperer Charles VI. and of Elizabeth Christina, of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel. Her father having lost his only son, the archduke Leopold, constituted Maria Theresa the heiress of his estates. In 1713 was formed the famous Pragmatic Sanction, by which, in default of male issue, the succession passed to the eldest of his daughters. She married, in 1736, Francis Stephen of Lorraine, afterwards emperor Francis I. In 1740 her father died, which event plunged Europe into war. Frederic of Prussia invaded Silesia, to which conquest he added Moravia. The elector of Bavaria aspired to the crowns of Bohemia and the empire, and was supported by France, in violation of the Pragmatic Sanction. He was crowned emperor at Frankfort, in 1742. Meanwhile, Maria Theresa appealed to her Hungarian subjects. A powerful army was formed, with Kevenhuller at its head, which recovered several important places. Maria formed a treaty with England, which supplied her with money and troops, and, what was of greater consequence, detached the Prussian monarch from the league, by letting him keep Silesia and Gratz. Maria Theresa was crowned queen of Bohemia, at Prague, in 1743; and, in June of the same year, the king of England and his son, the duke of Cumberland, in person, gained a great victory at Dettingen. The king of Sardinia now declared himself for the queen of Hungary, who, in 1745, had placed the imperial crown on the head of her husband, at Frankfort. After eight years of war, in 1748 a peace was concluded at Aix-la-Chapelle, by which Maria Theresa was secured in her rights. (See FREDERICK II.) She employed the interval of peace in organising her armies, repairing or constructing fortifications, regulating and encouraging commerce, founding military schools, and in erecting colleges of learning. She also caused observatories to be built at Vienna, Gratz, and Tyrnau, which she supplied with the best instruments. The wounded and infirm soldiers found an asylum in hospitals, and the widows and children of officers were liberally provided for. In 1756 this calm was disturbed by the king of Prussia, who marched into Saxony and Bohemia; Count Daun, however, eventually forced the Prussians to raise the siege, by gaining the victory of Chotzemitz. On this occasion, Maria Theresa instituted the military order called by her name. After many engagements, peace was concluded in 1763, leaving Austria and Prussia with the same boundaries as before the war. Her husband died in 1765, and she never put off her mourning attire till her death. In 1772 she, somewhat unwillingly, joined the king of Prussia and the empress Catherine in the dismemberment of Poland. By the death of Maximilian Joseph, elector of Bavaria, in 1777, war was rekindled between Austria and Prussia, but was terminated in 1779, by the peace of Teschen, which added to the former state a small portion of Bavaria. Maria Theresa was one of the most energetic and noble of rulers. She suppressed the Inquisition in Milan, and the order of Jesuits, maintained the rights of her kingdom, and corrected many abuses in the church. She was nevertheless a strict Roman Catholic; and so well and wisely had she governed her people, that she descended to the grave earning, and fully meriting, the name of mother of her country.

Born at Vienna, 1717; died at Vienna, 1780.

MARIAMNE, ma-ri-am'-ne, the wife of Herod the Great, by whom she had two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, and two daughters. Herod passionately loved Mariamne, but she had little affection for him, especially after he put to death her brother Aristobulus. When Herod went to Rome to court the favour of Augustus, he left secret orders with Josephus and Sohemus to destroy Mariamne and her mother, if any misfortune should happen to him. Mariamne having obtained this secret from Sohemus, upbraided Herod, at his return, with his inhumanity, for which he put both her and Sohemus to death.

Died B.C. 28.

MARIANA, JUAN, ma-re-a'-na, Spanish historian, who, at the age of 17, entered the order of the Jesuits, and was at an early age a teacher in the school at Rome, and afterwards in Sicily, at Paris, and at Toledo. He distinguished himself, in 1599, by a famous book, entitled "De Rege et Regis Institutione," in which he justified the assassination of heretical princes: it was burnt at Paris by order of parliament. His greatest work is "The History of Spain," written first in Latin and afterwards in Spanish, in 30 volumes, down to the year 1516. Besides the above, and several other learned works, he wrote a "Treatise on Weights and Measures," and another on the "Faults of Government and Society," in Spanish.

Born at Talavera, 1537; died 1624.

MARIANNA, a town of Brazil, province of Minas-Geraes. It stands in a plain upwards of 3,000 feet above the level of the sea, and has a cathedral, seven other churches, convents, an episcopal palace, and several good educational institutions. Pop. 8,000.

MARIANNE ISLANDS. (See LADRONES.)

MARIAS LAS TRES, ma-re'-as las trais, "the Three Marys," three small islands in the North Pacific, off the coast of Mexico. The largest has a length of 15 miles and a breadth of 8. They are uninhabited, except when visited by seamen. Lat. 21° 10′ N. Lon. 106° 15′ W.

MARIA-THERESIOPEL, tai-rai'-sa-o-pel, a town of the Austrian empire, in the Banat, on Lake Banitsch, near the frontiers of Hungary. It consists of a royal free town and 16 suburbs. There are a high church, a fine Greek church, and several other churches, a monastery, town-house, and barracks. Manf. Linen, leather, boots and shoes. Four markets are held annually, and there is a large trade in horses, cattle, sheep, hides, and wool. Pop. 61,367.

MARIAZELL, or ZELL, ma'-re-a-tsel', a market-town of Styria, near the limits of Austria, 59 miles from Vienna. It is noted for a shrine and an image of the Virgin, which attract hither about 250,000 pilgrims annually, who spend their nights in the woods in riot and debauchery. Pop. 1,200.

MARICOPA, ma-re-ko'-pa, a newly-formed county of Arizona Territory, United States. Area, 14,500 square miles. Pop. 5,689. The chief place is Phœnix.

MARIE ANTOINETTE, JOSÉPHINE JEAN, ma'-re an'-twoi-net, queen of France and archduchess of Austria, was the daughter of the emperor Francis I. and of Maria Theresa. In 1770 she married the dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XVI. At the celebration of the ceremony, in May of that year, two tremendous thunderstorms happened; and at the fête given by the city of Paris, a few weeks afterwards, above 1,200 persons perished by the falling of a building erected for letting off fire-works, and a great number of spectators fell into the Seine and were drowned. The dauphiness, on that melancholy occasion, sent all the money she possessed to the lieutenant of police, for the relief of the distressed. At the death of a monarch in France, it was the custom for the people to pay a tax to the new queen; this she caused to be dispensed with, when, by the demise of Louis XV., in 1774, she ascended the throne. In 1785 she became unpopular, in consequence of the diamond necklace affair, but modern researches have quite vindicated her reputation. (See LAMOTTE.) When the Revolution burst forth, in 1789, the public fury was directed against her, and her life was attempted at Versailles by a band of assassins; but she supported herself, amidst the vilest indignities and brutal scenes, with unshaken fortitude. On the famous 6th of October, when the frantic mob led the royal family in triumph from Versailles to Paris, and uttered dreadful exclamations against the queen, she presented herself before them alone, when her intrepid air for a period disarmed their malice, and turned their menaces into applause. On that memorable journey the mob carried before the carriage the heads of two of the king's guard on pikes. The courage of the queen, after being arrested at Varennes and conducted back to the Tuileries, remained unshaken. In the Temple her behaviour was marked by heroic fortitude. In July, 1793, she was separated from her son, which excited in her the most affecting grief; and in August she was conducted in the night to the Conciergerie, where she was confined in a dark and damp dungeon. In October she was brought to trial on the charge of having embezzled the public property, corresponded with foreign enemies, and transmitted large sums to the emperor. Accusations of crimes the most unnatural were also produced; to which she opposed a spirit and resolution of conscious innocence. Though nothing was proved, sentence of condemnation was passed against her, which she heard with triumph. On the 16th of the same month she was conducted in a cart to the scaffold, where she suffered the fatal stroke. Her body was thrown into a grave and consumed by quicklime. Marie Antoinette possessed great personal beauty and an accomplished mind; she spoke the French language with purity, and the Italian as her own tongue. She also understood Latin. She was kind-hearted and honest; thoughtlessness was perhaps the greatest vice that could be attributed to her; and it caused her to be most unjustly slandered on several occasions. She left a son, who died in prison. (See LOUIS XVII.)

Born at Vienna, 1755; died 1793.

MARIE-AUX-MINES, or ST. MARKIRCH, o-meen', a town of Germany, in Upper Alsace, 24 miles N.W. of Colmar. Manf. Cotton goods and hosiery, worsted, and leather. Pop. 12,500.

MARIE DE' MEDICI, méd'-e-che, daughter of Francis I., grand-duke of Tuscany, married Henry IV. of France, in 1600. The union was rendered unhappy in consequence of the jealous, obstinate, and violent character of the queen; but, although she was constantly quarrelling with Henry, and under the influence of disreputable favourites, the most reliable historians acquit her of the odious charge with which some writers have sought to brand her,—that of being privy to the king's murder. On the death of Henry IV. in 1610, she was named regent; but her administration was disgraced by the countenance she afforded to unworthy favourites. She even quarrelled with her son, afterwards Louis XIII., who was compelled to quit the court. A reconciliation was, however, effected between them by Richelieu, against whom she afterwards intrigued, and failing, was imprisoned at Compiègne, whence she escaped to Brussels in 1631. The remainder of her life was spent in exile, in England, Belgium, and Germany. Her death took place at Cologne, where she was almost without the common necessaries of life, and is said to have died in a hayloft.

Born at Florence, 1573; died 1642.

MARIE GALANTE, ma'-re ga-lant', one of the French West India islands, 20 miles N. of Dominica. The shores are steep and rocky, and there are dense forests. Coffee, sugar, cotton, and cocoa are cultivated, and cattle and horses are bred. The chief town is Grandbourg, or Marigot, on the south-west coast. Area, 60 square miles. Pop. 13,000. It was, in 1493, discovered by Columbus, who gave it the name of his ship.

MARIENBAD, ma-re'-en-bad', a Bohemian village, celebrated for its cold chalybeate and saline baths. It is situate in a valley lying 30 miles N.W. of Pilsen, and is nearly 2,000 feet above the sea level. Pop. 1,600; in the season there are nearly 10,000 visitors.

MARIENBERG, ma-re'-en-bairg, a town of Saxony, circle Zwickau, 38 miles S.W. of Dresden, in the centre of a mining district. Manf. Steam-engines. Pop. 5,600.

MARIENBURG, a town of Prussia, province of Prussia, on the Nogat, 26 miles S.E. of Dantzic. Its castle, a singular surface, in the Gothic style (restored in 1820), was long the seat of the grand master of the Teutonic order, who came here from Venice in 1300. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton goods. There are also extensive distilleries and breweries. Pop. 8,300.

MARIENWERDER, ma'-re-en-vair'-der, a town of Prussia, the capital of the province of Prussia, near the Vistula, 47 miles S.E. of Dantzic. It has an old castle, a cathedral, a school of arts and agriculture, and an hospital, and is the residence of many government officials. Manf. Woollens; and there are breweries and distilleries. Pop. 7,200.

MARIENWERDER, a district of the province of Prussia. The surface is generally flat, and there are many large lakes and extensive forests. Large numbers of cattle, sheep, and horses are reared. Area, 6,000 square miles. Pop. 836,717.

MARIESTAD, ma'-re-stat', a town of Sweden capital of a lan, or province of the same name, on the south-eastern shore of Lake Wener, 157 miles S.W. of Stockholm. There are a fine church and good public buildings on a small island formed by the river Tida. There are the ruins of an old episcopal castle. Pop. 2,500.

MARIETTA, ma-re-et'-ta, a town of Ohio, United States, on both sides of the Muskingum, at its junction with the Ohio, 90 miles S.E. of Columbus. There is a suburb, Harmar. This is the oldest town in the state, and there are remarkable remains of one of the prehistoric cities of America. Pop. 5,500.

MARIGNANO, MELEGNANO, or MALAGNANO, ma-reen-ya'-no, or mel'-en-ya'-no, a town of Italy, province Milano, on the Lambro, 10 miles S.E. of Milan. It is a handsome town. Pop. 4,100.—Here, in the month of June, 1859, a brilliant action took place between the allied French and Sardinian troops and those of the Austrians, in which the latter were defeated.

MARIN, ma-rin', a county of California, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 11,328. The capital is San Rafael.

MARINDUQUE, ma-rin-dú'-que, an island of the Indian Archipelago, belonging to the Philippines. It is 33 miles long, 20 broad. Pop. 20,000.

MARINGUES, ma-ring', a town of France, department Puy-de-Dôme, at the confluence of the Morge with the Allier, 15 miles N.E. of Clermont. Manf. Chamois leather. Pop. 4,100.

MARINEO, ma-ré'-ne-o, a town of Sicily, province of Palermo, 11 miles S. of Palermo. Pop. 8,400.

MARINI, GIOVANNI BATISTE, ma-ré'-no, an Italian poet. His father having discarded him for refusing to study the law, he became secretary to the grand admiral of Naples, after which he went to Rome, where he was patronized by Cardinal Aldobrandino. His principal poem was entitled "Adonis," dedicated to Louis XIII., at the time when Marino was at Paris, whether he had been invited by Marie de' Medici. He afterwards retired to his native city, where public celebrations were held in his honour. His early poems were greatly disfigured by grossness, which he afterwards regretted. He was the founder of a school of florid and overstrained poetry, known as Marinist.

Born at Naples, 1569; died 1625.

MARINO, a market-town of Italy, near Lake Albano, 12 miles S.E. of Rome. It is surrounded by strong walls, with towers, has a cathedral with a fine piazza, and a handsome street, the Corso. Pop. 6,000.

MARINO FALIERO. (See FALIERO.)

MARINO, SAN, a small but independent state in the north-east of Italy. It is one of the smallest and most ancient states of Europe. It consists of a rocky mountain, upwards of 2,000 feet high, among the lesser ranges of the Apennines, and a small territory. The population are chiefly occupied with rural pursuits, but manufactures of silk are carried on. The government is Republican, with an executive, composed of 12 members, selected from the sovereign grand council of 60, of whom one-third are nobles. There are two captains-regent, one chosen from the nobles, who hold office only for six months. Area, 21 square miles. Pop. 7,600. Lat. 43° 50′ N. Lon. 12° 21′ 24″ E.

MARINO, SAN, the capital of the above state, stands on the side of the mountain, 12 miles from Rimini. It has several churches, a governor's palace, convents, and hospitals, and three small castles, besides other fortifications. Pop. 8,000.—This town is built round a hermitage, founded in the 4th century, by Marinus, a native of Dalmatia, and is accessible only by one road.

MARIO, GIUSEPPE, Marquis di Candia, Italian vocalist. At the age of 20 he entered the Sardinian army, but having incurred some blame, threw up his commission, and went to Paris, where his remarkable musical abilities attracted attention, and having studied at the Conservatoire, appeared at the opera in 1838, and at once attained the very highest rank, and his career, until his retirement in 1871, was one long career of triumph. For beauty of voice, exquisite taste, and tender, yet vigorous acting, he has never had a superior. He married the great singer Giula Grisi.

Born at Turin, 1810. Died 1883.

MARION, ma'-re-on, the name of 17 counties in the United States:—

ALABAMA.—Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 9,364. The capital is Pikeville.

MARIUPOL, or MARIAMPAL, ma'-re-oo-pol, a seaport of European Russia, at the mouth of the Kalmuis, in the Sea of Azof, government of Ekaterinoslav, 60 miles W. of Taganrog. There is a considerable export of wheat, linseed, wool, and hides. Pop. 8,000.

MARIUS, CAIUS, ma-ri-us, a celebrated Roman, who was seven times consul. He was of obscure origin, and in his youth was a husbandman; which employment he quitted for the army, and became a centurion under Scipio. After this, he served against the Cimbri and other barbarous nations who had invaded Italy; but he tarnished the glory of his victories by the basest cruelties to the vanquished, especially the women. In his sixth consulate he had Sulla for his rival, who marched to Rome with his army, and obliged Marius to quit the city. After wandering some time, he was recalled to Rome by Cinna, with whom he was chosen consul, in which year he died, of excessive drinking.

Born near Arpinum, 157 B.C.; died 86 B.C.

MARIVAUX, PETER CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN DE, ma'-re-vo, a celebrated French writer, whose comedies and romances are distinguished by their moral tendency. His best works are "The Poor Philosopher," "Marianne," "Le Paysan Parvenu," "Pharsamon." He also wrote a work entitled "The French Spectator."

Born at Paris, 1678; died 1763.

MARK, ST., mark, the Evangelist, was the nephew of Barnabas, and accompanied St. Paul on his travels. He wrote his gospel for the use of the Roman Christians, about A.D. 72. He is said to have founded the church of Alexandria, and to have suffered martyrdom, his body being transported to Venice, which chose him for its patron saint.

MARK, a pope and saint, succeeded Sylvester I. in 336. There passes under his name an epistle addressed to St. Athanasius.

MARK ANTONY. (See ANTONIUS.)

MARKET DRAYTON, drai'-ton, a market-town of Salop, on the Terne, 18 miles N.E. of Shrewsbury. It has a church, erected in the reign of King Stephen. Manf. Paper and haircloth. Pop. 5,954.

It has an old church of St. Mary, displaying various styles of architecture; St. Peter's (restored in 1863) is adorned by a lofty square tower, with battlement and pinnacles; a grammar-school, and a proprietary college, an important establishment, partly built on the site of an old castle. Manf. Sacking and ropes. Pop. 3,343. A station on the Great Western railway.

MARLBOROUGH, formerly a province of New Zealand. The fine sheep runs known as the Wairu Plains, are in the south-eastern part. The northern part is densely wooded. There are two noble inlets, Queen Charlotte's Sound, 25 miles long, and Pelosus Sound, which is larger. The chief port is Picton, at the head of Queen Charlotte's Sound, connected with Blenheim, the capital, by a line of railway. Area 4,250 sq. m.

MARLBOROUGH, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 505 square miles. Pop. 20,598. half being coloured. The capital is Bennettsville.

MARLBOROUGH, a town of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, United States, 25 miles W. of Boston. It is built on several hills, and within the limits of the town is Lake William, covering 160 acres. Manf. Boots and shoes. Pop. 10,127.

MARLBOROUGH, JOHN CHURCHILL, duke of, an illustrious English general and statesman. He received but an indifferent education, for his father, Sir Winston Churchill, a royalist gentleman of ancient family, took him to court at the age of 12 years, where he became page to the duke of York, and, in 1666, obtained a commission in the guards. His first service was at the siege of Tangier, against the Moors, and, on his return to England, he became the favourite of the duchess of Cleveland, who gave him £5,000, with which he purchased an annuity for life. He served afterwards in the Netherlands, from 1672 to 1677, under the great Turenne, who was so pleased with his person and bravery, as to call him the "Handsome Englishman," and further declared that he would one day prove a master in the art of war. He distinguished himself so gallantly at the siege of Maestricht, that the king of France publicly thanked him at the head of the regiment. On his return to England he was made lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bedchamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, who had taken Arabella Churchill, John's sister, for his mistress. He attended that prince to Holland and Scotland, and about this time married Miss Sarah Jennings, maid of honour to Princess, afterwards Queen Anne. In 1682 he was made a peer, by the title of Baron Eymouth, in Scotland, and when James came to the crown, he was sent to France to notify the event. In 1685 he was created Lord Churchill of Sandridge, and, soon afterwards, materially assisted in suppressing Monmouth's rebellion. He continued to serve King James with great fidelity till the arrival of William of Orange; whereupon he went over to that prince, an act of treachery which has been stigmatised by several writers, perhaps unjustly, as fraught with base ingratitude. His own apology was a regard for the religion and constitution of his country; and it may not unfairly be presumed that although at first induced to support his old patron, he became gradually disgusted at his baseness, and his vigorous mind saw that it was useless to oppose the determination of the great majority of Englishmen to change the dynasty. King William created him earl of Marlborough in 1689, and appointed him commander-in-chief of the English army in the Low Countries. He next served in Ireland, and reduced Cork, with other strong places. But in 1692 he was suddenly dismissed from his employments, and committed to the Tower; whence, however, he was soon released. After the death of queen Mary, he was restored to favour; and at the close of that reign he had the command of the English forces in Holland, and was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the States, who chose him captain-general of their forces. On the commencement of Queen Anne's reign, he recommended a war with France and Spain, which advice was adopted. In the first campaign of 1702 he took a number of strong towns, particularly Liège. He returned to England the following winter, and received the thanks of both houses, and the honour of a dukedom from the queen. In 1704 he joined prince Eugene, with whom he fought the French and Bavarians at Blenheim, and obtained a complete victory, taking Marshal Tallard prisoner. Just before this event he had been created a prince of the empire. In the winter he returned to England, bringing with him Marshal Tallard, and 26 other officers of rank, 121 standards, and 179 colours. He again received the thanks of parliament, and the grant of the manor of Woodstock, with the hundred of Wotton. In 1706 he fought the famous battle of Ramilies, in which his life was frequently in the most imminent danger, a cannon-shot taking off the head of Colonel Bingly as he was helping the duke to remount. This victory accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places. He arrived in England in November, and received fresh honours and grants from the queen and parliament. A bill was passed to settle the titles upon the male and female issue of his daughters; and Blenheim House was ordered to be built to perpetuate his gallant services. He had also a pension of £5,000 a year granted him. The following campaign presented nothing worth recording; but the ensuing one was pushed with such vigour, that the French king was glad to enter into a negotiation for peace, which, however, had no effect. In 1709, Marlborough defeated Marshal Villars at Malplaquet; for which victory a general thanksgiving was solemnised. In the winter of 1711 he returned to England, having added considerably to his laurels; but soon after he was dismissed from his employments. To add to this disgrace, a prosecution was commenced against him for applying the public money to his private purposes. Thereupon he went into voluntary banishment, accompanied by his duchess, and remained abroad till 1714, when he landed at Dover, amidst the acclamations of the people. Queen Anne was just dead, and her successor restored the duke to his military appointments, making him commander-in-chief of the forces, but his infirmities increasing, he retired from public employment, having survived his intellectual faculties. After his death, his remains were interred with great pomp in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Devonshire, 1650; died 1722.

MARLBOROUGH, SARAH, Duchess of, wife of the preceding, was a lady of strong mind, but overbearing passions. At a very early age she entered the service of the Duchess of York, and for a long time she exercised over the weak and easy nature of Queen Anne a most commanding influence. The queen threw off all royal etiquette when corresponding with the haughty duchess. In this romantic affair, Queen Anne was simply "Mrs. Morley," while the duchess was styled as "dear Mrs. Freeman." In the end, however, the queen felt her yoke to be intolerable, and after a long struggle for power, the duchess was dismissed the court (being supplanted by Abigail Hill, afterwards Mrs. Masham). She outlived the duke several years, and when she died left a fortune of £3,000,000 sterling. Her only son died young, and the title passed to the descendants of her daughters.

Born 1660; died 1744.

MARLOW, GREAT, mar'-lo, a borough and market town of Buckinghamshire on the left bank of the Thames, here crossed by an iron suspension bridge, 29 miles N.W. of London. The church is a large and ancient building, and there are another church, several chapels, and a spacious market-house. Manf. Paper, lace, silk, baby linen, and wire. It has a trade in coals and timber; also in meal and malt. Pop. 6,600.—A station on the Great Western railway.

MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER, an English dramatic writer. He studied at the university of Cambridge, and took there a M.A. degree in 1587. It is said he subsequently became a writer for the stage, and, perhaps, an actor. He led a wild life, and he met his death in a disgraceful tavern quarrel. His best known plays are,—"Dr. Faustus;" "Edward the Second;" "The Jew of Malta;" "Tamburlaine the Great;" "Lust's Dominion;" "Dido, Queen of Carthage;" and "The Massacre at Paris." He possessed a splendid genius, and in strength, vivid imagination, and occasional beauty of diction, almost rivalled Shakespeare.

Born at Canterbury, 1565; died 1593.

MARMANDE, mar'-mand, a town of France, department Lot-et-Garonne, on the right bank of the Garonne, 50 miles above Bordeaux, with which it carries on an important trade. It has a town-hall, commercial college, and court house. Manf. Linens and woollens, hats, and brandy. Pop. 5,400.

MARMAROS, mar'-ma-ros, a county of Hungary, circle Thither Theiss, bounded N. and N.E. by Galicia and Bukowina, and S. by Transylvania. It is very mountainous, being traversed by the Carpathians. The Theiss rises here, and is divided into two streams, the Black and White Theiss, which traverses the county. Min. Silver, iron, precious stones (especially Hungarian diamonds), and rock salt. The capital is SZIGETH. Area, 3,998 square miles. Pop. 221,000, including about 20,000 Jews.

MARMONT, AUGUSTUS FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS VIESSE DE, mar'-mont, Duke of Ragusa and marshal of France, received his education at the college-school of Châlons, and, after entering the army, attracted, at Toulon, the favourable notice of Bonaparte, who made him his aide-de-camp. He accompanied that general to Italy in 1796, and fought in almost every subsequent engagement, winning high honour for his great skill, bravery, and readiness of resource, till, at length, he was selected by Bonaparte to carry to Paris the twenty-two colours captured from the enemy. In the Egyptian campaign he was a general of brigade, and, in 1799, he was one of the officers that accompanied Bonaparte in his hasty flight from Egypt. Between the years 1805—1814 he was one of the most conspicuously skilful and courageous of all Napoleon's subordinates. At Ulm, during the conquest of the province of Styria; at Wagram; as the successor to Massena in Portugal; and at Bautzen, Dresden, and Leipsic, he bore a distinguished part. Against an allied force of Austrians, Russians, and Prussians, numerically four times greater than his own, he obstinately defended Paris, in 1814. But when the enemy's artillery began to sweep the city from the heights of Montmartre, he received instructions from Joseph Bonaparte which permitted him to evacuate the French capital. He then went over to the allies with his entire force, thus deserting the cause of the emperor for ever. He was subsequently employed by Louis XVIII. and Charles X., the latter of whom commanded him to repress the revolt of 1830: he was, however, defeated by the people, and became an object of odium with his countrymen. His name was struck off the rolls of the French army, and he was banished from his native country. He spent the remainder of his life away from France, chiefly at Vienna, and devoted his leisure to the composition of some excellent treatises upon military science. His Memoirs appeared at Paris in 1856.

Born at Châtillon-sur-Seine, 1774; died at Venice, 1852.

MARMONTEL, JEAN FRANÇOIS, mar'-mon-tel, a celebrated French writer. In early life he was professor of philosophy at Toulouse. In 1746 he went to Paris, to which he was invited by Voltaire, and Madame Pompadour procured him a pension and a secretaryship at Versailles, and also the management of a journal called the "Mercure;" but, having written a satire against a nobleman of distinction, he was sent to the Bastile. On obtaining his release, he recommenced his literary career, and wrote some tragedies and an opera; but his fame rests principally, if not wholly, upon his "Moral Tales," a work universally known and esteemed. A chapter on "Toleration," in his romance "Bélisaire," excited a furious hostility, the clergy denouncing the book as heretical and blasphemous. The French Academy appointed him perpetual secretary in 1789. During the Revolution he led a retired life, and though reduced to destitution, remained secure amidst all the violent scenes of that event. In 1797 he was chosen deputy of the Council of Ancients by the department of Eure. Besides his dramatic pieces and "Moral Tales," he wrote "The Literary Observer," "The Charms of Study," an epistle; a French translation of Lucan's "Pharsalia," "Poétique Françoise," "The Incas, or, the Destruction of the Empire of Peru," "Essay on the Revolutions of Music," "Elements of Literature," and several articles in the French "Encyclopédie."

Born in Limousin, 1723; died 1799.

MARMORA, or MARMARA, SEA OF, (the Propontis of the ancient geographers), between Asiatic and European Turkey. It is about 170 miles long and 55 broad. By the channel of Constantinople, or the Bosphorus, it communicates with the Black Sea, and by that of the Dardanelles, or Hellespont, with the Mediterranean. There are several islands, among them Marmora, where are fine quarries of marble and alabaster.

MARMORICE, mar'-mo-reece, a seaport town of Anatolia, in Asiatic Turkey, with a fine harbour, 28 miles N. of Rhodes. In the highest part there are the ruins of a castle. A good export trade is carried on. Lat. 36° 51′ N. Lon. 28° 19′ E.

MARMOUTIER, or MAUERS MUNSTER, mar-mou'-tee-air, a town of Germany (formerly in the French department of Bas-Rhin), 17 miles N.W. of Strasburg. There is a fine and curious church, part of which dates from the 9th century. Manf. Earthenware. Pop. 2,400.

MARNE, marn, a river of France, rising in the department of Haute Marne, and, after a course of upwards of 200 miles, joining the Seine on the right, at Charenton, 4 miles above Paris. A canal, completed in 1851, connects the river with the Rhine.

MARNE, a department in the north-east of France, contiguous to the departments of the Ardennes, the Meuse, and the Aube. A considerable portion consists of sandy plains, which have been planted with Scotch firs, and thus rendered profitable. The dry and chalky soil in the northern part is very favourable to the production of the finest champagne. Sheep of a Spanish breed are extensively reared.

Minerals.—Stones for making millstones.
Manf.—Woollens, and wine, of which nearly 16,000,000 gallons are made annually.
Area.—3,174 square miles.
Pop.—421,800.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 5 arrondissements and 665 communes. The chief towns are CHALONS-SUR-MARNE, the capital; EPERNAY, REIMS, SAINTE-MÉNEHOULD, and VICHY-LE-FRANÇOIS.

MARNE, HAUTE, a department in the north-east of France, to the south-east of the department Marne. The surface is elevated and mountainous in the northern and eastern parts. About one-third is covered with forests. The vine is cultivated, and a very large amount of wine is produced.

Rivers.—The Marne, Meuse, and the Aube.
Minerals.—Iron, the mines of which are amongst the most important in France.
Manf.—Cutlery, cotton-spinning, and weaving.
Area.—2,414 square miles.
Pop.—254,876
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 3 arrondissements and 550 communes. The chief towns are CHAUMONT-EN-BASSIGNY, the capital; LANGRES, and VASSY.

MARNES, marns, a town of France, in the department of the Two Sèvres. Pop. 2,200.

MAROCCO. (See MOROCCO.)

MAROCHETTI, CARLO, Baron, mar-o-ket'-ti, an eminent modern sculptor, who, having commenced the practice of his profession at Turin, went to Paris, and afterwards to London. The English public became acquainted with him during the Great Exhibition of 1851, when he contributed his colossal model of Richard Cœur-de-Lion, which was placed in the open air on the western end of the Crystal Palace, and is now in front of the House of Lords. He was afterwards extensively employed by the royal family and the highest nobility to carve busts, &c.

Born at Turin, 1805; died 1867.

MAROMME, ma-rom', a town of France, department Seine-Inférieure, on the right bank of the Cailly, 4 miles N.E. of Rouen. Manf. Cotton, paper, leather, and gunpowder. Pop. 3,000.

MARONY, or MAROWYNE, ma-ro'-ne, a river of South America, forming the boundary between Dutch and French Guiana. It flows, with many windings, generally in a northerly direction, and falls into the Atlantic, after a course of 300 miles, in lat. 5° 52′ N.; lon. 55° 50′ N.

MAROS, ma'rosh, a river of Austria, in Transylvania, rising near the frontier of Moldavia, and, after a course of nearly 400 miles, joining the Theiss opposite Szegedin.

MÁROS, a seaport of Spain, province of Corunna, on the north side of a bay of the same name, 30 miles W. of Santiago. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 4,800. Lat. 42° 48′ N.. Lon. 6° 58′ W.

MAROS-VASARHELY, vas-ar-hai'-le, a market-town of the Austrian empire, in Transylvania, on the Maros, 55 miles N.E. of Hermanstadt. There are a fine Gothic church, a castle, and a large public library. Pop. 13,000.

MAROSTICA, ma-ros-te'-ka, a town of Italy, province of Vicenza, at the foot of Mount Rovereo, 15 miles N.E. of Vicenza. It is walled and flanked with towers. Manf. Straw hats. The corn-market is important. Pop. 3,500.

MAROT, CLEMENT, ma-ro', French poet, valet to Francis I., whom he accompanied to Italy. He was wounded and made prisoner at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, and on his return to Paris was imprisoned on a charge of heresy, at the instigation, it is supposed, of Diana de Poitiers. He afterwards resided at the court of Queen Margaret of Navarre, but having abjured reformed doctrines, returned to Paris. But he was again charged with heresy, and in 1543 fled to Geneva, and afterwards went to Turin, where he died in great poverty. His metrical translation of the Psalms, satires, and lyrical poems, were very popular, and exhibit considerable poetical power.

Born at Cahors, 1495; died 1544.

MAROZIA, mar-o-ze'-a, a Roman lady, who married, about 906, Alberic, count of Tusculum and marquis of Camerino. Becoming a widow while still young, she exercised, by her beauty and intriguing spirit, great influence over the most powerful nobles of Rome, and during many years set up or deposed popes almost at her mere whim. She made herself mistress of the city, and caused, in succession, the election of Sergius III. in 904, Anastasius III. in 911, and Landon in 913. In 928 she deposed John X., who had been elected through the influence of Theodora, her sister and rival, and put him to death, with the assistance of Guido, duke of Tuscany, her second husband. In 931 she seated in the pontifical chair her son, under the title of John XI. In the following year she married her third husband, Hugh of Provence, who became king of Italy; but that monarch having struck Alberic, eldest son of Marozia, he, out of revenge, roused the Roman youths, and massacred the guards of his father-in-law, who sought safety in flight. Marozia was imprisoned in the castle of St. Angelo, where she died.

MARPLE, mar'-pel, a township of Cheshire, 5 miles from Stockport. Pop. 3,500.

MARPURGH, FREDERIC WILLIAM, mar'-poorg, an eminent German writer on the theory of music. Of his personal history scarcely anything authentic is known, further than that he was either counsellor of war to Frederick II., or secretary to one of his ministers. His "Manual of Harmony and Composition" is so correct and sound that it has earned the title of the "Musical Euclid." He was also the author of several other, but less important works.

Born in Prussia, 1718; died 1795.

MARQUESAS, or MENDANA ISLANDS, mar-kaï'-sas, a group in the South Pacific Ocean, four of which were discovered by Mendana, a Spanish navigator, in 1595, and the rest by Captain Cook in 1774. They have since been visited by several navigators. The islands were named after Marquesas de Mendoza, viceroy of Peru. They are 13 in number, and the principal of them, named Noukahwah, has a circumference of 70 miles. The islands are mountainous but fertile, and producing pulse, sugar-cane, bamboos, yams, cotton, nuts, and swine. They are governed by native chiefs, under the protection of the French, to whom they submitted in 1842. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 5,777. Lat. 7° 30′—10° 30′ S. Lon. 138°—140° 20′ W.

MARQUETTE, mar-ket', a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 3,425 square miles. Pop. 25,394. The capital is MARQUETTE.

MARQUETTE, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 8,500. The capital is Montelle.

MARQUETTE, the capital of the county of the same name, Michigan, on Lake Superior, 320 miles N. of Chicago. It is the chief depôt of an iron mining district, and the place of shipment of the ore. There are several blast furnaces. Pop. 5,500.

MARQUETTE, JACQUES, French explorer, a Jesuit, went to Canada as a missionary in 1666. In company with Louis Joliet, he explored, in open canoes, the whole course of the Mississippi. He died on the return journey, his death being hastened by fatigue and privations.

Born at Laon, 1637; died 1675.

MARRAST, ARMAND, mar-rast', an eminent modern political writer, who, after completing his education, went to Paris, where he soon distinguished himself by his attacks upon the government of Charles X. In 1830 he started "La Tribune," in which Louis Philippe and his ministry were subjected to an unceasing flow of the most pungent satire. He subsequently became sub-editor, and afterwards editor of "Le National," and therein contributed, in no slight degree, to bring the government of Louis Philippe into contempt, as well as to produce the great crisis of 1848. After the fall of the Lamartine administration, Marrast retired into private life. "Le National" was suppressed under the government of Louis Napoleon.

Born in France, 1802; died 1852.

MARRYAT, FREDERICK, mar'-re-ăt, English novelist. He was the son of a West India merchant, and after receiving some education at various schools in the vicinity of London, he entered the navy at the age of 14. His first ship was the famous Impérieuse, 44 guns, commanded by that brilliant seaman Lord Cochrane, afterwards earl of Dundonald. Under this celebrated chief, the young sailor fought in upwards of fifty engagements, between the years 1806—1809. The reputation for bravery and skill which he had acquired under his first commander was continued, and increased during his after career. On five occasions he rescued sailors from drowning by leaping overboard to their assistance. After various services, he was gazetted commander in 1815; in 1823 he sailed in command of the Larne, 18 guns, to the East Indies, where he co-operated in the attack on Rangoon. For his services he received the thanks of the governor-general, and, after his return home, became C.B.; a further honour was bestowed upon him by the Royal Humane Society, which awarded its gold medal to him, in token of his efforts at saving seamen's lives. He served with the channel fleet during the interval 1828—1830. At the age of 40 he took up the novelist's pen, and produced, in rapid succession, a series of excellent works of fiction, most of them depicting life at sea, and, in many parts, irresistibly humorous. To enumerate a few of them will suffice for the present purpose:—"Peter Simple," "Jacob Faithful," "The King's Own," "Japhet in Search of a Father," "Midshipman Easy," "Rattlin the Reefer," "Poor Jack," the "Pirate and Three Cutters," "Masterman Ready." In 1837 he produced a most valuable work, entitled "A Code of Signals for the use of vessels employed in the merchant service," for which Louis Philippe bestowed upon him the cross of the Legion of Honour. The code is now in use both in the English and foreign navies. For several years before his death he was incapacitated from literary labour by shattered health. It must be mentioned that the sole reason why this bold and skilful seaman did not rise in his profession, was that he had given free utterance to his opinions against the practice of impressment. He was a fellow of the Royal Society.

Born in London, 1792; died in Norfolk, 1848.

MARS, mars, in Roman mythology the god of war, was son of Jupiter and Juno, or, according to Ovid, of Juno alone. The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was seized by Otus and Ephialtes, and confined for fifteen months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. During the Trojan war, he took the side of the Trojans, and defended the favourites of Venus with uncommon activity. His temples were not numerous in Greece, where he was known as Ares; but in Rome he received unbounded honours, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they esteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the first of their monarchs.

MARS, ANNE FRANÇOISE HYPPOLYTE BOUTET, mar, a French actress, who at the age of 14 made a great impression by her performance of a deaf and dumb character. She rose to be the greatest actress of comedy on the French stage, and amassed a large fortune.

Born 1799; died 1847.

MARSALA, mar-sa'-la, a fortified seaport of Sicily, in the Val di Mazzara, at the western extremity of the island, 15 miles S.W. of Trapani. It exports wine to a considerable amount, oil, wheat, and barilla. Pop. 40,000.—This is the ancient Lilybœum, for a long period the capital of the Carthaginian dominions in Sicily. The name is from the Arabic "Mar-sa Alla," the port of God. The harbour is now nearly filled up.

MARSDEN, WILLIAM, mars'-den, a distinguished Orientalist, who was educated at various schools in Dublin, with the view of proceeding to Trinity College, and entering the church. His father was, however, induced to send him out to India when he had attained his 16th year. He reached Bencoolen in 1771, and entered the civil service of the government. After residing at Sumatra during eight years, he returned to England, and, in 1782, he published his excellent "History of Sumatra." The success of this work was very decided; and the author became second secretary and afterwards chief secretary to the Admiralty. In 1807 he retired upon a pension of £1,500 per annum; and five years afterwards he produced his "Grammar and Dictionary of the Malay Language," which was followed, after several years' interval, by a "Translation of the Celebrated Travels of Marco Polo." His other important works were "Numismata Orientalia; or, Description of Eastern Coins," and some treatises on the Polynesian or East Insular Languages. In 1831 he voluntarily gave up his pension to the public; an act of liberality which elicited the warmest thanks of the House of Commons. At his death he bequeathed his collection of coins and medals to the British Museum, and his library to King's College.

Born at Dublin, 1754; died 1836.

MARSEILLAU, mar'-sai-yo, a parish and town of France, in the department of Herault, 15 miles from Beziers. Near it are salt-works. Pop. 4,000.

MARSEILLES, mar-sails' (Fr. mar'-sail), a commercial city, and the first seaport of France, the capital of the department of Bouches-du-Rhone, on the Mediterranean, and on the east coast of the Gulf of Lyon. It is inclosed by a succession of rocky hills, extending in the form of a crescent, until each extremity reaches the sea. On these hills are vineyards and olive gardens, and many elegant villas. The town is defended by a citadel and other works, and divided into the Old and New Towns. The former, to the north of the harbour, composed of narrow and dirty streets, but a wide street has recently been made through the centre. The new town is equal in beauty to any town of France, and separated from the other by an avenue, known as the Rue d'Aix, Rue de Grand Cours, and Rue de Rome, forming together one of the finest streets in Europe. The chief public buildings are the Hôtel-de-Ville; the arsenal, constructed in 1690; the ancient church of La Major, a Gothic edifice, said to have been built on the ruins of a temple of Diana; a theatre; the church of St. Victor, to the south of the harbour, and further south, on a prominent rocky hill, is the church of "Notre Dame de la Garde," a new building on the site of an old church; many religious houses, numerous hospitals, the Hôtel de Ville, and the large prefecture. The literary institutions are, an academy of sciences, a medical society, a college, a new museum, and a navigation school. The public library is large, and there are a cabinet of natural history, botanical garden, and an observatory, from which a most picturesque view of the town, the port, and the surrounding country is obtained. The port of Marseilles may be called a small salt-water lake, completely sheltered from all winds. The old harbour will accommodate 200 vessels, and in the new harbour is a series of docks, extending for a mile, and having an area of 100 acres. Around the docks are splendid new warehouses. About 10,000 vessels annually enter Marseilles on the packet station, for Italy and the East. The entrance does not exceed a hundred yards, being confined by two projecting rocks, one on each side; on which are situate two forts for its defence. It is further protected by other works, and is completely surrounded by quays. The roads are protected by the fortified islands of If (on which there is a castle, the "Château d'If," formerly a state prison), Pomegne and Ratonneau.

Commerce.—Marseilles has long enjoyed a large share of the foreign trade of France, and its harbour is the most commercial in the empire. It exports light woollens, silk, and colonial produce to the Levant and the north coast of Africa. Being a central point for the trade with Spain and Italy, it sends to the latter the woollens of Languedoc and Dauphiny, linens, liquors, oil, hardware, and lead. It has, also, extensive transactions with Holland, England, the Baltic, North America, and the West Indies. To England, and other northern countries, the exports consist of wine, brandy, olive-oil, preserved fruit, soap, silks, gloves, French shawls, &c.

Manf.—The most important are soap, coral articles, silk, and embroidered stuffs, woollens, cotton and chintz, plain and coloured linen, hats, cups, leather, and sail-cloth; also china, earthenware, alum, sulphur, vitriol, salt, and lead. There are, besides, large iron works, refineries for sugar, and manufactures of vinegar and liquors. Another branch of industry is the pickling and preparing for exportation of capers, olives, and other fruits, as well as large quantities of fish.

Lat. 43° 17′ N. Lon. 5° 22′ E.

History.—Marseilles is one of the most ancient towns of France, having been founded by the Phoceans, about 600 B.C. It long preserved its liberty under the Romans, and was celebrated for the cultivation of the arts and letters. It was one of the most important of the Greek settlements in the western Mediterranean; was taken by Julius Cæsar, and was nearly destroyed by the Arabs in the 8th century. In 1482 it was united, with the rest of Provence, to the crown of France. In 1649 it was visited by the plague, and again by it in 1720, 1721, and 1722, when it carried off 50,000 of the inhabitants.

MARSHALL, mar'-shal, capital of Calhoun county, Michigan, United States, on the Kalamooza river, 70 miles E. of Lake Michigan; there are 10 churches and many manufacturing establishments. Pop. 5,500.

MARSHALL, the name of 9 counties in the United States:—

Alabama.—Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 14,585, of whom 1,500 are coloured. The capital is Warrenton.

Illinois.—Area, 445 square miles. Pop. 15,055. The capital is Lacon.

Indiana.—Area, 440 square miles. Pop. 23,414. The capital is Plymouth.

Iowa.—Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 23,752. The capital is Marshalltown.

Kansas.—Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 26,136. The capital is Marysville.

Kentucky.—Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 9,647. The capital is Benton.

Mississippi.—Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 30,000, more than half being coloured. The capital is Holly Springs.

Tennessee.—Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 19,259, one-fourth being coloured. The capital is Lewisburg.

West Virginia.—Area, 230 square miles. Pop. 18,840. The capital is Moundsville.

MARSICO NUOVO, mar'-se-ko, a town of Italy, in an elevated situation, 18 miles S. of Potenza. Pop. 6,500.—In 1857 this place was nearly destroyed by an earthquake.

MARSIGLI, Luigi Ferdinando, Count, mar'-seel-ye, an Italian general geographer, and naturalist. He served with reputation in the imperial army, and in 1683 was taken prisoner by the Tartars, who sold him to the Turks. The year following he was ransomed, and obtained a colonel's commission. He was afterwards advanced to the rank of marshal; but when the Count d'Arco was condemned, for giving up the fortress of Brisach to the duke of Burgundy, Marsigli, who commanded under him, was dismissed the service. He then retired to Bologna, where he formed a museum, and erected a printing-office; the first he bequeathed to the senate, and the last to the Dominicans. He also founded the Academy of Arts and Sciences at that place. Count Marsigli was a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London. He wrote, among other important works, "A Philosophical Essay on the Sea," "A Description, Historical, Geographical, &c., of the Danube," and "A Treatise on the Bosphorus."

Born at Bologna, 1658; died 1730.

MARSIVAN, mar-si'-van, a town of Asiatic Turkey, pashalic of Sivas, 28 miles N.W. of Amasia. Pop. 20,000.

MARSTON, JOHN, mar'ston, an English dramatic writer of the time of Elizabeth and James. He is said to have been a student of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and an intimate friend of Ben Jonson; but beyond these facts, nothing is known of the circumstances of his life. Nine of his plays have been printed separately: one of them, "The Malcontent," is a very fine production: it is said, however, to have been altered from Webster. He also assisted Ben Jonson and Chapman in writing "Eastward Hoe."
Born 1570; died 1634.

MARSYAS, mar'-si-as, in Greek legend, a celebrated piper of Celenæ, in Phrygia. He was so skilful in playing on the flute, that he was generally deemed the inventor of it. Marsyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nysa, where he had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his skill as a musician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated should be flayed alive by the conqueror. Each exerted his utmost skill, and the victory, with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo: the god, upon this, tied his antagonist to a tree, and flayed him alive.

MARTA SANTA, a seaport of Colombia, Central America, on the Caribbean Sea, 105 miles N.E. of Cartagena. There is a good harbour, defended by a castle and batteries. There is a foreign trade in dyewoods. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 11° 15′ N. Lon. 74° 16′ W.

MARTABAN, mar-ta-ban', a seaport in the province of Pegu, British Burmah, on the banks of the river of the same name; near its mouth is the Gulf of Martaban. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 16° 32′ N. Lon. 97° 35′ E.

MARTANO, mar-tan'-no, a town of Italy, province of Lecce, 18 miles S.E. of Lecce. Pop. 3,200.

MARTE, mar'-te, a town of Bornow, Western Africa, near the south western extremity of Lake Tchad. Pop. 4,000.

MARTEL, CHARLES. (See CHARLES MARTEL.)

MARTHA'S VINEYARD, an island off the south coast of Massachusetts, United States. It is 21 miles long and 6 wide. Very numerously attended camp meetings are held annually on the island. The chief town is Edgartown, settled in 1642 by emigrants from Southampton, England. Pop. 3,800.

MARTIAL, MARCUS VALERIUS, mar'-she-al, a Latin epigrammatic poet. From some hints contained in his own works, it is ascertained that he went to Rome when young, and remained there during 35 years, after which he retired to his native place, Bilbilis, in Spain. The emperors Titus and Domitian conferred on him many favours, and raised him to the office of tribune. Martial, in return, complimented them as more than human; but, after their deaths he painted their enormities in glowing colours. His epigrams are very pointed and severe.
Born 43; died 104.

MARTIGNY, or MARTINACH, mar-teen'-ye, a small town of Switzerland, canton Valais, on the Drance, 24 miles S.E. of the lake of Geneva, on the Simplon road to Italy, and at the point where the routes to the Vale of Chamouni and the Great St. Bernard branch off the town is visited by a large number of tourists. Pop. 2,400.

MARTIGUES, LES, mar'-teeg, a town of France, department Bouches-du-Rhone, on three islands in the Lake of Berre, 16 miles N.W. of Marseilles. It has fisheries on the lake, boat-building, and a trade in wine. Pop. 5,700.

MARTIN, ST., an island in the West Indies, the southern portion belonging to the Netherlands, and the northern to France. It is hilly in the interior, and the coast is indented with bays. Sugar, cotton, tobacco, maize, and other West Indian produce are cultivated: salt is exported, and large numbers of cattle are reared. Area, 30 square miles. Pop. of the Dutch portion, 3,000; of the French, 3,500. Lat. 18° 4′ N. Lon. 63° 8′ W.

MARTIN I., Pope, succeeded Theodore in 649. He held a council at Rome, in which the heresy of the Monothelites was condemned. This giving offence to the Emperor Constantius, he caused Martin to be sent to Constantinople, whence he was removed to the Crimea, where he died of ill-usage.
Died 655.

MARTIN II., succeeded John VIII. in 882. He condemned Photius, patriarch of Constantinople.
Died 884.

MARTIN III., a Roman, succeeded Stephen VIII. in 942. He founded many churches and charitable institutions.
Died 946.

MARTIN IV., (NICHOLAS DE LA BRIE), a Frenchman of noble birth, succeeded Nicholas III. in 1281. He excommunicated the emperor Michael Palæologus, and Peter III., king of Aragon, and gave the kingdom of the latter to Charles de Valois, son of Philip the Hardy, king of France. His free use of the censures of the church is supposed to have greatly restored the temporal power of the Papacy.
Died at Perugia, 1285.

MARTIN V. (OTHO COLONNA) was elected pope in 1417, after the abdication of John XXIII. and of the anti-popes Benedict and Gregory. His inauguration was very pompous, and he was attended, in a submissive manner, by the emperor and the elector-palatine. He persecuted the followers of Huss in Bohemia, and presided at the council of Constance, in 1418, and at the council of Basel, in 1431.
Born 1368; died 1431.

MARTIN, JOHN, a modern English painter, of considerable originality. Having in early life evinced a desire to become an artist, his father apprenticed him to a Newcastle coachmaker, for the purpose of learning herald-painting; his indentures were, however, cancelled after a short time, and he was placed in the studio of Bonifaccio Musso, an enamel painter. In 1806 he went to London with his master, who obtained employment for him as a painter in china and glass. In 1812 he resolved to paint a large picture; he set to work, and in a month produced "Sadak in search of the Waters of Oblivion." This obtained a place in the Royal Academy Exhibition, and was purchased for 50 guineas. Thus encouraged, the painter worked diligently, and became, for a period, the most generally popular artist in his native country. He produced a number of striking works, which, as depicting awe-inspiring subjects, in a manner characterized by fervid imagination and a feeling for the grandeur of nature, and stupendous masses of architecture, captivated the general public, and caused Martin to be regarded as possessing a "sublime style." To enumerate some of his most attractive pictures, these were "Belshazzar's Feast," "The Seventh Plague," "The Fall of Nineveh," "The Eve of the Deluge," "The Destruction of Herculaneum," and "Pandemonium." He outlived the extravagant popularity which greeted his first efforts, and his last pictures, illustrative of the "Last Judgment," were coldly received. He devoted considerable time to projects for the sanitary improvement of the metropolis, published some pamphlets on the subject, and took out patents for sewer-pipes, &c. At one time, his services were eagerly sought by publishers as an illustrator of books; and for one set of drawings,—those made for an edition of Milton's poems, he is said to have been paid 2,000 guineas.

Born near Hexham, Northumberland, 1789; died 1854.

MARTIN, CLAUDE, a Frenchman, who attained the rank of major-general in the English service in India. He received a good mathematical education at a public school, and at the age of 20 entered the army with one of his brothers. His regiment was sent to India with General Lally, and in the war of 1756 he behaved with great gallantry; but, being ill-treated, he deserted into the English service, in which he signalised himself by many acts of bravery. Being employed to make a map of the estates of the nabob of Oude, he recommended himself to his patronage. The nabob encouraged the European arts, in which he was assisted by Martin, who opened a profitable bank and other commercial institutions under his protection, and thereby gained prodigious wealth. Having settled at Lucknow, he built there a magnificent but curious work, in a style of his own, and in which he could enjoy all the mildness and coolness of a European climate, with the fervour of the Asiatic. He also erected another on the banks of the Ganges, which was fortified in the European manner. He formed a large museum of natural history; constructed an immense garden, stocked with a prodigious variety of plants; and built an observatory, which he furnished with the best astronomical instruments. At his death, his great wealth was distributed principally in charity. He founded at Lyons a school of commerce and industry, which is called La Martinière, after him.

Born at Lyons, 1732; died 1800.

INDIANA.—Area, 340 square miles. Pop. 13,475. The capital is Dover Hill.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Area, 420 square miles. Pop. 13,140, about half being coloured. The capital is Williamston.

MARTINEAU, HARRIET, mar'-te-no, an eminent modern authoress. She was descended from a family of French extraction, which, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, commenced and carried on, during several generations, the business of silk manufacturers at Norwich, and were prominent members of the Unitarian body. In early youth she displayed great earnestness of character, and an unremitting eagerness to acquire knowledge. Her talent for literary composition was also very decided. Her father becoming embarrassed in his commercial affairs, Harriet, the youngest of eight children, resolved to support herself by literature. She commenced accordingly by publishing, in the year 1823, a volume of "Devotions for Young People," which was succeeded by her "Christmas Day" and "The Friend," in the two following years. Some tales and tracts occupied her pen up to 1830, when she published a more ambitious work entitled "Traditions of Palestine." About the same time she gained the prizes offered by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for three tracts on the "Introduction and Promotion of Christian Unitarianism among the Roman Catholics, the Jews, and Mahometans." Her next efforts were the "Illustrations of Political Economy," which proved a most decided success, but marked her out as an object of unscrupulous vituperation by Giffard, in the Quarterly Review. "Illustrations of Taxation" and "Poor-Law and Paupers" appeared next; and in 1837 she gave to the world her "Society in America," which was the result of her visit to the United States. "Deerbrook" and "The Hour and the Man" were the subsequent productions of her pen; but, although two excellent novels, they did not attain great popularity. Between the years 1839-44, her health was exceedingly delicate, and she wrote "Life in the Sick-room," which attracted considerable attention on account of her attributing her recovery from a painful malady to mesmerism. On her recovery she took up her pen with her former energy, and produced "Forest and Game-Law Tales," "The Billow and the Rock," and "Eastern Life, Past and Present," which last contained her travelling impressions of Syria and the Holy Land. This she esteemed as her best work. Mr. Charles Knight having been compelled to relinquish the composition of "The History of England during the Thirty Years' Peace," Miss Martineau undertook the task, and was generally allowed to have produced a most interesting and valuable contribution to historical literature. In 1851, she published, in conjunction with Mr. Atkinson, "Letters on Man's Nature and Development," a volume containing opinions relative to religious belief, which astonished the world by her profession of Atheism. An alienation from some of her relations was the result. About 1856 she went to reside at a pleasant cottage she had built for herself at Ambleside. Her pen was next employed in the service of the "Westminster" and other reviews, and in leaders, and biographical literary articles in the Daily News. One of her last works of importance was a condensed reproduction of "Comte's Positive Philosophy." Twenty years before her death, when expecting that her illness would have a fatal termination, she wrote a sketch of her life, criticising her own writings with remarkable impartiality, and occasional censure. This sketch was, in accordance with her own desire, published in the Daily News the day after her death. Her full "Autobiography," was published in March, 1877.

Born at Norwich, 1802; died 1876.

MARTINEAU, JAMES, brother of the preceding, eminent Unitarian preacher. He was for several years professor of moral and mental philosophy at Manchester, and in 1868, after a long ministry in London, was appointed principal of the New College, at Manchester. He was an accomplished scholar, and a powerful preacher, and has exercised a great intellectual influence.

Born at Norwich, 1807.

MARTINENGO, mar-tin-an'-go, a town of Italy, province of Bergamo, 10 miles S.E. of the town of that name. It is walled, and has good buildings. Manf. Silk. Pop. 3,100.

MARTINI, MARTIN, mar-te'-ne, a Jesuit, who resided many years in China, of which country he wrote some curious memoirs. He returned to Europe in 1651, but is said to have again visited China. He wrote "China Illustrata;" a history, in Latin, of the wars of the Tartars against China, and "Relation of the Number and Quality of Chinese Christians."

Born 1614; died 1661.

MARTINIQUE, MARTINICO, or MADIANA, mar-te-neek', an island in the West Indies, and one of the largest of the Windward group. It is 40 miles long and 12 broad, of an oval form, with deeply indented coast, and very mountainous in the interior, the highest peak, Mount Pelée, being 4,000 feet above the sea. There are six large extinct volcanoes. The cultivated portion is chiefly near the coast. Sugar, coffee, cassia, cotton, indigo, cocoa, ginger, &c., are the chief products. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 167,120, nearly two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Fort-la-France, formerly Fort-Royal. Lat. between 14° 24′ and 14° 53′ N. Lon. between 60° 50′ and 61° 18′ W.—This island was, in 1493, discovered by the Spaniards. In 1635 a French colony was founded on it, and in 1762 it was taken by the English, but restored in the following year. In 1794 it was again taken by the English, and held till 1809. In 1815 it was finally relinquished by them, and now belongs to France.

MARTINSBURG, capital of Berkeley county, West Virginia, United States, 78 miles W. of Baltimore. There are large railway works. Pop. 6,000.

MARTIUS, CARL FRIEDRICH PHILIPP VON, mar'-she-us, German traveller and naturalist. He studied medicine at Erlangen, and having distinguished himself by botanical knowledge, was employed on a scientific expedition to Brazil, sent out by the Austrian and Bavarian government. He gave great attention to other investigations besides those of a botanical character, and the works he published on his return exhibit great literary power. He was appointed professor of botany, and director of the botanic garden at Munich.

Born at Erlangen, 1794; died 1861.

MARTORELL, mar-to-rel', a town of Spain, province of Barcelona, on the left bank of the Llobregat, 15 miles N.W. of Barcelona. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen goods, paper, soap, wine, and oil. Pop. 3,000.

MARTOS, mar'-tose, a town of Spain, in the province of Jaen, and 16 miles from the town of that name. It stands on a hill, and has several churches and an old castle. The mineral waters are in great repute. Pop. 14,654.

MARTYN, JOHN, mar'-tin, an eminent English botanist, who, in 1720, translated Tournefort's "History of the Plants growing about Paris," which induced him to make a similar catalogue of the plants about London. He co-operated with Dillenus in forming a society of botanists, which continued till 1726. About this time he read botanical lectures in London, and on the death of Bradley was chosen professor of botany at Cambridge. He became, in 1727, a member of the Royal Society. He practised physic in the city, and afterwards at Chelsea, but, in 1752, he retired to Streatham. His principal works were several treatises in Latin on botany; a translation of the Georgics and Bucolics of Virgil, with notes; a translation of Boerhaave's treatise on the Powers of Medicine; Harris on the Diseases of Infants; and an abridgment of Philosophical Papers from the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Paris.

Born in London, 1699; died at Chelsea, 1761.

MARTYR, PETER, mar'-tir, an Italian diplomatist, who was employed by Ferdinand V., king of Castile and Aragon, in the education of his children. He also obtained some ecclesiastical benefices, and wrote a history of the discovery of America, in Latin, also a curious relation of his embassy to Egypt, in 1500, and a collection of letters relating to the history of Spain.

Born 1455; died 1523.

MARTYR, PETER, a celebrated Protestant divine, whose family name was Vermilius; but his parents gave him that of Martyr, from one Peter, a martyr, whose church stood near their house. After receiving a private education, he entered an Augustine monastery at Fiesoli. He became a distinguished preacher, and held an appointment in the cathedral of Naples, which he relinquished after reading the writings of Luther and other reformers. This change in his religious sentiments rendering it expedient for him to quit Italy, he went to Strasburg, where he married a nun, who, having adopted the principles of the Reformation, had fled from her convent. On the invitation of Edward VI. he went to England, and was made professor of divinity at Oxford, and canon of Christ Church. But in the succeeding reign he was obliged to leave the kingdom; on which he went to Switzerland. His wife died at Oxford, and, in the reign of Mary, her remains were taken up and buried beneath a dunghill; but when Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, they were honourably interred in Christ Church. Peter Martyr wrote some pieces against the errors of the church of Rome, and commentaries upon the Holy Scripture.

Born at Florence, 1500; died at Zurich, 1561.

MARVEJOLS, mar-ve-zhole', a town of France, department Lozère, on the left bank of the Cologne. Manf. Serge and other woollens, leather, and bricks. Pop. 5,000.

MARVELL, ANDREW, mar'-vel, an English poet and politician, was the son of the master of the Hull grammar school. At the age of 13 he was sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, and, in 1657, he became assistant to Milton, as Latin secretary. In the parliament which met at the Restoration, he was chosen to represent his native town. He distinguished himself by his integrity as a senator, and by his wit as a writer against the corruptions of the court. Charles II. delighted in his conversation, but could never prevail upon him to support his measures. He was a man of simple and frugal habits, and many anecdotes are related of his incorruptibility. He died at the age of 58 years, not without strong suspicions, (as his constitution was active and vigorous) of having suffered under the effect of poison, administered by some of the unscrupulous adherents of the Duke of York, afterwards James II. Although his fame as a wit, satirist, and poet, was considerable during his time, it is as a man of great political integrity that he is remembered. He had great power of satire, as exhibited in his "Rehearsal," and his burlesque description of Holland is well known.

Born at Hull, 1620; died 1678.

MARY, mair'-e, the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, was of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal house of David. She espoused Joseph, but, when betrothed, she miraculously conceived by the Holy Ghost, agreeably to the declaration of the angel Gabriel. When delivered, she went into Egypt with the child, and afterwards settled at Nazareth. Little is said of her in the Gospels, and nothing after the ascension of our Saviour, but that she resided with St. John the Evangelist, to whose care she was entrusted by our Lord. The Roman church pretends that she was immaculate, and ascended to heaven without passing through death; whence it holds the feast called the Assumption of the Virgin.

MARY MAGDALENE, or MARY OF MAGDALA, mag-da-lé-ne, distinguished in the New Testament as a woman who, having been the victim of demoniac possession, was restored by Jesus, and was afterwards one of his most faithful followers, watched at the sepulchre, and was the first to whom he appeared after the resurrection. She is sometimes identified with the "woman who had been a sinner," who anointed the feet of Jesus, but the Gospel narratives afford no ground for this supposition.

MARY I., queen of England, was the daughter of Henry VIII., by Catharine of Aragon, his first wife. Her education was liberal, and she acquired so great a knowledge of the Latin language as to undertake a translation of the paraphrase by Erasmus on St. John's gospel, which, however, she did not complete. During the life of her father she experienced many marks of his fierce temper; and the treatment which her mother had experienced contributed much towards increasing her dislike to Henry, and to the alterations which he introduced into the Church. During the reign of Edward, she could not be prevailed upon to join in communion with the Protestant divines; on this account, that amiable prince was persuaded by his minister, the duke of Northumberland, to set aside his sisters from the succession, and to declare Lady Jane Grey his heir. At his death, in 1553, that lady was proclaimed queen; but her reign lasted only a few days. The partisans of Mary became numerous, and she entered London without opposition. In putting to death Lady Jane and her husband, Lord Dudley, she betrayed that sanguinary and revengeful temper which was soon displayed in a violent persecution of the Protestants; even Cranmer, to whom she is said to have been indebted for her life, could not escape her bigotry and cruelty. In 1554 she married Philip of Spain, eldest son of Charles V., with whom she lived on indifferent terms. A disappointment, occasioned by a supposed miscarriage, and aggravated by the loss of Calais, produced a fever, of which she died, and with her ended the domination of the papal power in England. She suffered continually from bad health, which, acting on an excitable and morbid temperament, led her to sanction acts, from a mistaken sense of duty, which were opposed to her better nature, for personally she was not destitute of kindly and charitable feelings, and had an affectionate nature doomed to be bitterly disappointed.

Born at Greenwich, 1517; died 1558.

MARY II., queen of England, the wife of William III., was the daughter of James II., by Ann Hyde, daughter of the earl of Clarendon. At the age of 15 she was married to William, prince of Orange, with whom she went to England, in 1689. The same year, parliament having declared the crown vacant by the abdication of James, conferred it upon William and Mary. She was a beautiful and kind-hearted woman, devoted to her husband, and did not interfere in matters of government, except when he was absent. (See WILLIAM III.) She died of the small-pox, without issue.

Born 1662; died 1694.

MARY STUART, stu'-art, "Queen of Scots," the daughter of James V., king of Scotland, by his second wife, Mary of Lorraine, daughter of the duke of Guise. She was only eight days old when her father died; on which she became heiress to the throne. Henry VIII. of England endeavoured to unite the two kingdoms, by a marriage between his son Edward and the infant queen of Scots; but his offer being rejected, he sent his troops into Scotland, where they took and plundered Edinburgh, but were soon obliged to return. In 1548, Mary was contracted to Francis, dauphin of France, at which court she afterwards resided, and acquired those accomplishments which rendered her an object of universal admiration; and there, also, she imbibed those prejudices which proved the source of her misfortunes. In 1558 the marriage was celebrated, and, by the direction of their father-in-law, Mary and her husband assumed the title of king and queen of England, on the supposed ground of the illegitimacy of Elizabeth; an act of ridiculous ambition, which was afterwards fatal to Mary. In 1559, Henry II. died, and Francis became king of France; but, in less than two years, he left Mary a widow; on which she returned to her native country, after an absence of nearly thirteen years, and, says Robertson, "a stranger to her subjects, without experience, without allies, and almost without a friend." Scotland was at that time a prey to fanatical zeal. The Presbyterian party, goaded to desperation by the fierce intolerance of the Roman Catholic clergy, carried the work of reformation to the extreme, by destroying abbeys, cathedrals, libraries, and even the monuments of the dead. Such was the state of the kingdom at the landing of Mary, who, the first Sunday after her arrival, ordered mass to be said in her chapel; an act which gave great offence to the people. Mary, nevertheless, proclaimed that any attempt towards a change or subversion of the established church should be treated as a capital offence. Several offers of marriage were made to Mary, who rejected them, and bestowed her hand on Henry, Lord Darnley, son of the earl of Lennox, a young nobleman of prepossessing appearance, but weak and impetuous in mind and temper, and mean and intemperate in his habits. This inauspicious marriage soon ended in disgust, and the enemies of both took the advantage of widening the breach. They persuaded Darnley that David Rizzio, an Italian musician, whom the queen had appointed as her foreign secretary, had supplanted him in her affections. A conspiracy was formed, and one night, while the queen was at supper with the countess of Argyle, Henry conducted his confederates to the royal apartment, where Rizzio was murdered in the presence of Mary, who was then advanced in pregnancy. The next favourite at the court of Scotland was James Hepburn, Earl Bothwell, a man of considerable talents, but of unprincipled mind. By his arts he gained an ascendancy over the mind of Mary, who appointed him lieutenant of the Marches. In 1566 she was delivered of a son, afterwards James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. Darnley was soon afterwards seized with a strange distemper, while staying at his father's house at Glasgow. He returned to Edinburgh; but, instead of proceeding to Holyrood Palace, went to a solitary house, which was blown up ten days afterwards, the body of the king being found in the garden, without any marks of violence upon it. This deed occasioned universal horror, and as it left no doubt that Bothwell was the principal cause, he was brought before the privy council, but, after a mock trial, was acquitted. His influence over Mary increasing, he laid aside the mask, and, 1567, seized the queen, and carried her to the castle of Dunbar, where, by entreaties and force, he prevailed on her to marry him. A confederacy of the most powerful lords in the kingdom was formed against Mary and Bothwell; but, after a time, the queen abandoned the earl, and was taken first to Edinburgh, and afterwards to the castle of Lochleven. The lords of the confederacy forced her to sign a renunciation of her crown in favour of her son, and he was accordingly crowned at Stirling. After this, the enemies of Mary, who had suffered Bothwell to quit the kingdom, caused different persons to be executed for being concerned in Darnley's murder. Mary, after nearly a year's confinement, escaped from her prison in the island of Lochleven, and raised a large army; but the regent Murray marching against her, the royal party was defeated. On this, Mary fled into England, and implored the protection of Elizabeth, who acted with great duplicity for some time, and at length declared that no assistance could be afforded her unless she submitted to a legal trial. After some difficulties this was agreed to, and the cause was to be determined at York, by a commission, which finally removed to London, where it was declared that "nothing had been produced whereby the queen of England could conceive or take any evil opinion of her good sister, for anything yet seen." Mary was, notwithstanding, kept in close confinement. The duke of Norfolk formed the design of marrying Mary, in which he was encouraged by several of the English nobility, and also by the regent Murray; but this being discovered by Elizabeth, the duke was sent to the Tower, whence he was not released till he promised to renounce all correspondence with the queen of Scotland; but afterwards renewing his ambitious project, he was tried and executed. After a long confinement at Coventry, Mary was removed to Fotheringay Castle, where she was to undergo the mock formality of a trial, on the charge of fomenting conspiracies against Elizabeth. When brought before the commissioners, she disclaimed their authority and asserted her innocence: but though no proof appeared of the charges, she was declared guilty of conspiring against the life of Elizabeth. Mary received the tidings with complacency, being wearied by her unparalleled persecutions. Many foreign powers interested themselves in her behalf, and her son James endeavoured to save her life, but in vain. She was beheaded in the castle of Fotheringay, after praying to God to forgive all who had thirsted for her blood. Her remains were interred in Peterborough Cathedral, whence they were removed by her son, after he had ascended the English throne, and deposited in Henry VII.'s chapel, Westminster Abbey. She was possessed of great personal beauty and many accomplishments, writing pleasing verses in French and Italian.

Born 1542; died 1587.

MARY, queen of Hungary, was sister to the emperor Charles V., and married, in 1521, Louis, king of Hungary, who soon after was killed at the battle of Mohatz. His widow was appointed governor of the Low Countries in 1531, and in that station behaved with great courage and prudence. She headed the troops in several actions, and was so fond of hunting as to be called Diana and the Huntress. She favoured the Protestants, and had a taste for literature. Between her and Henry II., king of France, there was a great animosity, and she committed considerable ravages in the French provinces. Henry, on his part, invaded Flanders, and destroyed the palace of Mary, who, in return, carried devastation into Picardy. The Spanish soldiers called her the mother of the camp. She resigned the government in 1555.

Died in Spain, 1558.

MARY, Princess of England, was daughter of Henry VII., and married Louis XII. in 1514. Becoming a widow in the following year, she was united to the duke of Suffolk.

Born 1497; died 1534.

MARY, an Anglo-Norman poetess in the 13th century, was born in France, but resided chiefly in England. She was the authoress of a collection of fables, entitled "Ysopet" (the Little Æsop). M. Legrand d'Aussy published her fables in modern French prose.

MARY, ST., an island, 31 miles long and 3 broad, off the north-east coast of Madagascar. It is thickly wooded, and the soil is very fertile. There is a trade in a coarse strong cloth, shells, wax, and turmeric. Pop. 5,800.

MARY'S RIVER, ST., or ST. MARY'S STRAITS, a river or strait of North America, about 60 miles long, connecting lakes Huron and Superior, and containing four large and several smaller islands.

MARYBOROUGH, mair'-e-bur-o, a leading town of Queensland, exhibiting much progressive prosperity and all the evidences of energy and enterprise which distinguish the best of the colonial cities settled by the British people. Pop. 11,000.

MARYLAND, mair'-e-land, one of the United States, bounded N. by Pennsylvania, E. by Delaware and the Atlantic, S.W. and W. by Virginia. It is intersected from north to south by Chesapeake Bay, along which, on each side, it extends 180 miles in length. On the eastern side of the Chesapeake, with the exception of a small part of the northern extremity, is an extensive plain, low and sandy, and much intersected by rivers and creeks, having but few springs, and abounding in many places with stagnant water. The Maryland part of the peninsula, included between the Delaware and Chesapeake bays, is much lower and more uniformly level than the Delaware part; it is also more intersected by rivers and creeks, and the land is of better quality. The country on the western shore, of the Chesapeake, below the falls of the rivers, is similar to that on the eastern shore. Above these falls the country becomes gradually uneven and hilly, and, in the western part of the state, it is mountainous, rising to the Alleghanies.

Rivers.—The Potomac and the Susquehanna.

Pro.—Wheat, Indian-corn, hemp, flax, cotton, sweet potatoes, honey, maple-sugar, wool, silk, apples, pears, peaches, plums, and cherries, of which there is an abundance. Large quantities of oysters are exported.

Minerals.—Copper, iron, coal, lead, cobalt, lime, alum, silicates and hydrates of magnesia, and some gold.

Manf.—Cotton and woollen goods; and there are extensive iron-works, besides breweries, distilleries, tanneries and shipbuilding yards.

Area.—9,860 square miles.

Pop.—934,943. Being one of the states wherein negro slavery formerly most prevailed, the proportion of the population of colour is very large.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 23 counties. The capital is ANNAPOLIS; BALTIMORE, CUMBERLAND, HAGERSTOWN, and FREDERICKTOWN, are other large towns.

History.—Maryland was settled by a colony of English Roman Catholics, under a grant to the Earl of Baltimore, in 1632, and was named in honour of the English queen Henrietta Maria. It was afterwards a place of refuge for Puritans and others persecuted for religious opinions. It was organised as a State in 1776.

MARYLAND-IN-LIBERIA, a colony of free blacks, on the W. coast of Africa, founded by the state of Maryland, in the United States. It is partially peopled by emigrants from the United States.

MARYLEBONE. (See LONDON.)

MARYPORT, mair'-e-port, a market-town and seaport of Cumberland, at the mouth of the river Ellen, which divides it into two parts, 28 miles S.W. of Carlisle. The inhabitants are mostly employed in trade and fisheries. There are a floating-dock and two patent slips. The place is greatly resorted to for sea-bathing. Manf. Iron and leather. Large quantities of coal and coke are exported, and shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 8,177.—A station on the London and North-Western, and North-Eastern railways.

MARYSVILLE, a city of California, United States, on the north bank of the Yuba river, 50 miles N. of Sacramento, in the midst of a gold-mining district. Pop. about 4,500 on the average, but variable.

MASACCIO, THOMAS, ma-sa'-che-o, a celebrated Italian painter. He was accounted the principal artist of the second age of modern painting, from its revival under Cimabue. Fuseli says of him, "Masaccio was a genius, and the head of an epoch in the art. He may be considered as the precursor of Raffaelle, who imitated his principles, and sometimes transcribed his figures." His most perfect works are the frescoes of S. Pietro del Carmine, at Florence, where vigour of conception, truth, and vivacity of expression, are supported by surprising harmony of colour.

Born 1401; died 1443.

MASAFUERO, ma'-sa-fwa'-ro, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, west of Juan Fernandez, wooded and uninhabited. Ext. 12 miles in circumference. Lat. 33° 49' S. Lon. 80° 54' W.

MASANIELLO, ma'-san-e-el'-lo, real name Tommaso Aniello, a fisherman of Naples, who, in 1647, headed an insurrection of his countrymen, besieged the viceroy, the duke of Arcos, in his palace, and compelled him to capitulate. During seven days, Masaniello was master of Naples, palaces were destroyed, and many obnoxious persons executed; but, at the end of that time, he was assassinated by some emissaries of the viceroy, in a riot provoked by his arrogance and excesses.

Born at Amalfi, 1620; died 1647.

MASAYA, mas'-a-ya, a town of Nicaragua, Central America, 12 miles N.W. of Granada, near a lake and active volcano of the same name. Pop. 15,000, including a large number of Indians, who follow industrial pursuits.

MASBATE, mas-ba'-tai, one of the Philippine islands, lying south of the island of Luzon. It is 60 miles long, with an average breadth of 20. The chief product is rice. Pop. 17,171.

MASCAGNI, PAUL, mas-kan'ye, a celebrated Italian anatomist, who was professor at Siena, Pisa, and Florence, and was elected an associate of the College of France. He completed the fine collection of anatomical preparations contained in the Museum of Florence. Several learned works were produced by him; among the rest, "Universal Anatomy."

Born in Tuscany, 1732; died 1815.

MASCALI, mas-ka'-le, a town of Sicily, Val di Demone, at the foot of Mount Etna, 17 miles N.E. of Catania. It has an active trade in wine, corn, timber, fruit, and lava. Pop. 4,000.

MASCALUCIA, mas-ka-loo'-she-a, a town of Sicily, province of Catania, on the southern slope of Mount Etna. It has suffered greatly from eruptions and earthquakes. Pop. 2,900.

MASCARA, mas-ka'-ra, a town of Algeria, 45 miles S.E. of Oran. Manf. Carpets. Pop. 10,000.

MASCARENE ISLES, or MASCARENHAS, mas-ka-reen', a name given to the islands of BOURBON and MAURITIUS, in the Indian Ocean.

MASCAT. (See MUSCAT.)

MASCHERONI, LORENZO, mas-kai-ro'-ne, an Italian mathematician, who published notes on the "Integral Calculus" of Euler, and assisted in the experiments performed by the Institute of Bologna, with a view of proving the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. The invention, however, which has rendered his name conspicuous, was his celebrated Geometria del compasso, "the compass geometry."

Born at Bergamo, 1750; died at Paris, 1808.

MASENA, mas'-e'-na', a decayed town of Bagarmi, Central Africa, 100 miles S.E. of Lake Tchad. It is walled and occupies a large area, but is only partially inhabited. Lat. 11° 35' N. Lon. 16° E.

MASERES, FRANCIS, ma'-sair, an eminent English mathematician, who was descended from an old French family. He was educated at Cambridge, and adopted the law as his profession. After spending some years in America as attorney-general for Canada, he returned to England in 1773, and afterwards became cursitor-baron of the Exchequer, deputy-recorder of London, &c. At his own expense, he reprinted many valuable works relating to mathematics. His own works were, "Elements of Plane Trigonometry," "Principles of the Doctrine of Life Annuities," and an "Appendix to Friend's Principles of Algebra." Between the years 1791—1807 he published, at his own expense, a collection of works on Logarithms, in 6 large volumes, entitled, "Scriptores Logarithmici." At a later period, he produced reprints of the optical treatises of James Gregory, Descartes, Huygens, Barrow, and Halley.

Born in London, 1731; died at Reigate, 1824.

MASHAM, MRS. ABIGAIL, mash'-am, the favourite of Queen Anne. She was the daughter of a London merchant named Hill and cousin of the duchess of Marlborough, by whose influence she was placed in the queen's service as waiting-maid. (See MARLBOROUGH.) She subsequently supplanted the duchess, and obtained a powerful influence over the queen. Harley, afterwards earl of Oxford, entered into an alliance with her, and the pair, during some time, virtually ruled at court. Her husband, Mr. Masham, was raised to the peerage, and both took a large share in the secret negotiations with France for placing the Pretender on the English throne. After the death of the queen, she retired into private life.

MASHAM, a market-town of the North Riding of Yorkshire, on the Ure, 16 miles from Richmond. Manf. Woollen yarns and flax. Pop. 3,000.

MASIUS, ANDREW, ma-si'-us, a learned grammarian, who became counsellor to the duke of Cleves. His principal works are, "A Syriac Lexicon and Grammar," and "A Commentary on the Book of Joshua."

Born 1516; died 1573.

MASKELYNE, REV. NEVIL, mas'-ke-line, an eminent English astronomer. He was educated at Westminster School and at Cambridge, and, in 1755, took orders; but becoming acquainted with Bradley, the astronomer, he assisted him in his scientific labours. In 1758 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1761 made a voyage to St. Helena, to observe the transit of Venus, and, in 1763, to Barbadoes, to test the chronometer newly invented by Harrison. Fours years afterwards, he became astronomer royal, and, in 1767, commenced the publication of the world-famous "Nautical Almanack." In 1790 he gave to the world some of the results of his official labours at the Greenwich Observatory, in a work entitled "A Standard Catalogue of Stars."

Born in London, 1732; died 1811.

MASKINONGE, mas-kin-on'-ge, a town of Quebec province, dominion of Canada, on the left bank of the St. Lawrence, 55 miles N.E. of Montreal. Pop. 4,000.

MASKINONGE, a county of Quebec province, Canada. Area, 3,221 square miles. Pop. 17,300, nearly all of French origin. The capital is Rivière du Loup.

MASNOW, mas'-now, a town of Spain, province of Barcelona, in the Mediterranean, 8 miles N.E. of Barcelona. There are a large church, with a lofty tower; a handsome modern town-house, and three old Moorish towers. Manf. Linen, cotton, and woollen fabrics, cables, sails, and ropes. There are shipbuilding yards. Pop. 3,500.

MASON, WILLIAM, mai'-son, an English poet and divine, who, in 1748, published a poem, entitled "Isis," which being considered as an attack on the university of Oxford, was answered by Mr. Warton in another called "The Triumphs of Isis." In 1754 he entered into orders, was appointed chaplain to the king, and presented to the living of Aston, in Yorkshire. He also obtained the precentorship of York cathedral, and, directing his mind to church music, composed a book on that subject. Gray, the poet, appointed him one of his executors; and Mason wrote the life, and published the letters, of his friend. He also composed the epitaph on Gray's monument in Westminster Abbey. In the American war, Mr. Mason showed himself a warm defender of the rebels, as they were termed; for which he was struck out of the list of royal chaplains. The horrors of the French revolution are said to have caused an entire change in his political opinions. His "Elfrida," and "Caractacus," two dramas on the Greek model, are esteemed the best of his works. He also wrote a poem, entitled "The English Garden," and translated into English verse Du Fresnoy's "Art of Painting," to which Sir Joshua Reynolds added valuable notes.

Born 1725; died 1797.

MASON, SIR JOHN, an eminent English statesman. Becoming a favourite with Henry VIII., he was employed in several embassies, and made a member of the privy council. He afterwards served Edward VI., and contrived to hold his places under Mary. Queen Elizabeth made him treasurer of her chamber, and he was chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford. His favourite maxim was, "Do, and say nothing."

Born at Abingdon, Berks, about 1500; died 1566.

MASON, the name of 6 counties in the United States:—

ILLINOIS.—Area, 580 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is Havana.

KENTUCKY.—Area, 236 square miles. Pop. 22,200, about one-fifth being coloured. The capital is Maysville.

MICHIGAN.—Area, 460 square miles. Pop. 10,065. The capital is Père Marquette.

WEST VIRGINIA.—Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 22,293. The capital is Point Pleasant.

MASQUE DE FER, mask-de(r)-fair, or the "Iron Mask," the name of an unknown person in France, who was conveyed in the most secret manner to the castle of Pignerol in 1666, whence he was transferred to the isles St. Margaret in 1686. He was a man taller than ordinary, and extremely well made. His accomplishments were evidently great, and he had a fine taste for music. He always wore a mask, according to some, of velvet, while others assert it to have been of steel, furnished with springs, which was so constructed as to allow him free liberty to eat and drink. His keepers treated him with the greatest respect. At Pignerol he was intrusted to the charge of an officer named St. Mars, on whose appointment as lieutenant of the isles, this unknown personage accompanied him, as he finally did to the Bastile, where he died in 1703, and was buried under the name of Marchiali. Two gentlemen, who were prisoners in the room over him, contrived to hold some conversation with him by means of the chimney, and found that he was a man of general learning; but he informed them that a discovery of his name and rank would be death both to him and them. Numerous conjectures have been formed and dissertations written, on this historical subject, which, nevertheless, still remains in impenetrable obscurity. It has been conjectured that he might have been the Count de Vermandois, son of the Duchess de la Vallière, thus imprisoned for having given a blow to the Dauphin; or a twin-brother of Louis XIV., so disposed of to prevent rivalry between the two brothers. This last opinion is that of Voltaire, and would appear to have some support in the Memoirs published by the Duke de Richelieu in 1790; but speculation is still rife as to the identity of the person, and several elaborate enquirics have been recently published.

MASSA-CARRARA, mas'-sa-kar-ra'-ra, a central province of the kingdom of Italy, formerly a duchy. Area, 680 square yards. Pop. 174,411.

MASSA DI CARRARA, or MASSA DUCALE, du-kai'-le, formerly capital of the duchy, 58 miles S.W. of Modena. It is beautifully situated, amid olive grounds and orchards. There are a cathedral, a ducal palace, and a public library. Pop. 20,000.

MASSA LUBRENSE, lu-brens', a town of Italy, on the sea coast, 17 miles S. of Naples, in a position remarkable for the beauty of the scenery. It was founded by the Greeks, and there are many interesting remains. Pop. 8,200.

MASSACHUSETTS, mas'-sa-chu'-sets, one of the United States of America, is bounded N. by Vermont and New Hampshire, E. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. by the Atlantic, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, and W. by New York. It includes the islands of Nantucket and MARTHA'S VINEYARD. The surface is diversified, the western parts being intersected with different ranges of mountains, some attaining an elevation of nearly 4,000 feet; the middle part is agreeably varied with hill and dale, and the coast indented with bays, studded with islands. The soil is exceedingly various, comprising every description, from the most fertile to the most unproductive. There are extensive forests of pine, oak, walnut, maple, and other valuable timber. The climate is liable to extremes of heat and cold.

Rivers.—The Connecticut, Housatonic, and Merrimac.

Pro.—Indian corn, rye, wheat, oats, barley, peas, beans, buckwheat, potatoes, hops, flax, and hemp. Beef, pork, butter, and cheese are abundant in most parts of the state, and of excellent quality. Orchards, in which are grown apples, peaches, pears, quinces, plums, cherries, and currants. The bays and rivers abound with salmon, mackerel, and other kinds of fish

Minerals.—Salt, slate, iron, and granite.

Manf.—These consist of almost every article of domestic use in metals, wood, cotton, and woollen goods; boots and shoes, carpets, iron, nails, and machinery. Shipbuilding is active. The whale-fishery is also carried on with great activity and success by the inhabitants of Nantucket.

Area.—7,800 square miles.

Pop.—1,783,085. Being founded upon the basis of one of the earliest and most energetic English settlements, the population is large in proportion to area.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 14 counties. The chief towns are BOSTON, the capital, CAMBRIDGE, CHARLESTON, LAWRENCE, LOWELL, NEW BEDFORD, NEWBURYPORT, PLYMOUTH, SALEM, and WORCESTER.

History.—Maryland was discovered by Cabot, in 1497. In December, 1620, the Mayflower, with a small body of Puritans from England, arrived and made a settlement at Plymouth, which suffered greatly from attacks by the Indians, who destroyed villages and massacred the white population. The great American war of independence, commenced in this State, which is the oldest of the New England States, and one of the 13 original states of the Union.

MASSACHUSETTS BAY is on the coast of the United States, between Cape Ann on the N. and Cape Cod on the S. It is 70 miles long, with a breadth of 20, includes Plymouth Bay, Cape Cod Bay, and numerous islands.

MASSAFRA, mas'-sa-fra, a town of Italy, province of Terra d'Otranto, 11 miles N.W. of Taranto.

MASSAROONY or MAZARUNI, ma'-zaroo'-ne, a river of British Guiana, rising near lat. 4° 30′ N. and lon. 60° W., and entering the estuary of Essequibo. It has been explored 400 miles, and has numerous rapids.

MASSENA, ANDRÉ, mas'-se-na, prince of Essling, duke of Rivoli, and marshal of France. He began active life on board a small ship, and afterwards served for 14 years in the Sardinian army, but being refused promotion, on account of his low birth, joined a French regiment, and distinguished himself in the first wars of the Revolution. In 1793 he was promoted to the rank of general of division, and bore a glorious part in the Italian campaigns of Bonaparte. In 1798 he was placed at the head of the army charged to establish the republican government in the Papal States; but both his own soldiers and the inhabitants of the subjected states complaining of his insatiable avarice, he was compelled to resign his command. He remained unemployed until the following year, when he was given the command of the armies of the Danube and Switzerland, and defeated the Russians at the battle of Zurich; thus saving France from invasion. He was next sent to defend Genoa from the attacks of an Austrian army and the English fleet. In 1804 he was made marshal of France and duke of Rivoli, and, in the following year, received the command-in-chief of the army of Italy, when he succeeded in driving the archduke Charles before him, and effecting a junction with Napoleon. In 1806 he accompanied Joseph Bonaparte to Naples; and, by defeating the insurgent Calabrians, enabled the latter to take possession of the throne. He commanded the fifth corps in Austria in 1809, and decided the victory at Essling, for which Napoleon created him prince of Essling. He was charged, in 1810, with the task of driving the duke of Wellington out of Portugal, but met a signal failure against the lines of Torres Vedras; and, after a masterly retreat into Spain, he was recalled in 1812. Ill-health prevented his taking part in the Russian campaign; and, in 1814, while commanding a division at Toulon, he declared his adhesion to the Bourbons. After the Hundred Days, he became commander-in-chief of the National Guard of Paris. He was chosen a member of the council of war before which Ney was arraigned, but formed one of the number who pronounced the court to be incompetent. He soon afterwards retired into private life. This remarkable general, who was called by Napoleon "the favoured child of Victory," was one of the ablest tacticians of Napoleon's subordinates; but although he possessed in the field all the best qualities of a commander, his talents were obscured by an avarice which was apparently without limit. Napoleon himself described him as "a robber."

Born at Nice, 1758; died 1817.

MASSERA, mas'-se-ra, an island off the south-east coast of Arabia. It is 40 miles long, with an average breadth of 15. There are valuable copper mines. Lat. 20° 30′ N. Lon. 30° E.

MASSILLON, JOHN BAPTISTE, mas'-see-yawng, a famous French prelate. At the age of 18, he entered the congregation of the Oratory. He acquired a superiority over all the preachers of his time; and Louis XIV. once said to him, "Father, when I hear other preachers I go away much pleased with them; but when I hear you I go away much displeased with myself." In 1717 he was appointed Bishop of Clermont, and, in 1719, admitted a member of the French Academy.

Born at Hières, 1663; died 1742.

MASSILLON, mas-sil-lon, a town of Ohio, United States, 180 miles N.E. of Cincinnati. Manf. Woollens, machinery, and iron. There is an active trade in grain, flour, and wool. Pop. 6,836.

MASSINGER, PHILIP, mas'-sin-jer, a celebrated English dramatic author. He was the son of one of the Earl of Pembroke's retainers, and was sent to St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, in 1602. By some means, the reason of which is uncertain, he lost his patron's favour, and, quitting the university without a degree, went to London in 1606, where he engaged in dramatic composition until his death. At the outset he appears to have assisted others in writing plays, but in 1622 he produced the "Virgin Martyr," an exquisite play, but containing gross comic scenes, supposed to have been inserted by Dekkar, or other contemporary dramatist. Some of the best of his remaining extant plays are "A New way to Pay Old Debts," the "Maid of Honour," the "Fatal Dowry," the "City Madam," and the "Bashful Lover." He is buried in St. Saviour's, Southwark, in the registry of which he is entered as "a stranger."

Born at Salisbury, 1584; died 1640.

MASSON, ANTOINE, mas'-son, a celebrated French engraver, who excelled in portraits. His print of the "Disciples at Emmaus," by Titian, is pronounced to be the best engraving after that master. He likewise executed the portraits of the most distinguished men during the reign of Louis XIV.

Born at Loury, near Orleans, 1636; died at Paris, 1700.

MASSOWAH, or MASUAH, mas'-soo-a, the principal seaport of Abyssinia, but belonging to Egypt, situate on a small island in the Red Sea, separated from the continent by a narrow channel. Some of the houses are of stone, but they are, in general, built of poles, and bent grass. Its intercourse is chiefly with Mocha, Jidda, and Bombay. The imports consist of spices, piece-goods, lead, iron, copper, tin, and European manufactures. The exports are gold, ivory, honey, shaves, and wax. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 15° 36′ N. Lon. 39° 21′.

MASULIPATAM, ma-su-le-pa-tam, a district of the province of Madras, British India. The south-western boundary is marked by the river Kistnah, and the Godavery traverses the district. For about 50 miles from the shore the surface is very low. Cotton, tobacco, and indigo are cultivated. Area, 5,000 square miles. Pop. 521,000.

MASULIPATAM, a seaport of British India, in the province of Madras, with a good harbour, 220 miles from Madras. There is a strong fort. The place has been long celebrated for the fineness and brilliant colours of its cotton cloths, called chintzes, but it was overwhelmed by a storm-wave in 1864, which, occurring in the night, drowned the inhabitants in bed to the number of 30,000. Pop. 36,000. Lat. 16° 10′ N. Lon. 81° 10′ E.

MATAGORDA, mat-a-gor'-da, a seaport of Texas, United States, at the mouth of the Colorado, on a large bay of the same name, in the Gulf of Mexico, 80 miles S.W. of Galveston. There is a large export trade in cotton, sugar, and rice. Pop. 2,000.

MATAGORDA, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,334 square miles. Pop. 3,500, more than half being coloured. The capital is MATAGORDA.

Calico, laces, silks, and cotton stuffs, velvets, ribbons, and silk twist, esparto, pottery, soap, canvas, leather, and iron. Bay-salt is collected along the shore. Pop. 18,000.

MATCHIN, or MACZIN, mat'-chin, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, 87 miles N.E. of Silistria, on the right bank of the Danube. It is important as a strategical position, and has been several times besieged. Pop. 3,000.

MATELICA, ma-tai'-le-ka, a town of central Italy, 30 miles from Ancona. It is inclosed by walls, and has several churches. Manf. Coarse woollen cloths. Pop. 7,500.

MATEO, SAN, ma'-tai-o, a town of Spain, province of Castellon-de-la-Plana. It is walled, and has a fine church, with two towers. Manf. Linen and hempen fabrics, leather, and oil. Pop. 2,600.

MATERA, ma-tai'-ra, a town of Italy, province of Basilicata, on the Gravina, 37 miles N.W. of Taranto. It has a cathedral, episcopal palace, a college, and convent. Manf. Leather and arms. Pop. 14,500; many in a very degraded condition, afflicted with cretinism and dwelling in caverns.

MATHER, INCREASE, D.D., mai'-ther, an American puritan divine, who was educated at Harvard College, Massachusetts, and Trinity College, Dublin. He was for more than 60 years a pastor of a church in Boston, in 1684 was chosen president of Harvard College, and in 1688 was sent to England to negotiate a new charter for the colony. He was a very voluminous author, wrote "Remarkable Providences," a "Brief History of the Wars with the Indians in New England," and "Divine Right of Infant Baptism."

Born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, 1639; died at Boston, 1723.

MATHER, COTTON, American divine, was the son of the last-mentioned. He studied at Harvard College, became assistant to his father, and distinguished himself by his piety and learning. In 1710, the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D.D., and, in 1714, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society of London. He wrote a number of books; among which are, an "Ecclesiastical History of New England;" "The Christian Philosopher;" "The Wonders of the Invisible World, being an Account of the Trials of several Witches lately executed in New England;" &c. In this last work, he showed an astonishing degree of credulity. He greatly stimulated the cruel persecution of the supposed witches, but, on the other hand he may be credited with helping to introduce the practice of inoculation for the small-pox into America.

Born at Boston, 1663; died 1728.

MATHEW, REV. THEOBALD, known as "Father Mathew," ma-thu, the "Apostle of Temperance," was the son of an illegitimate member of the Llandaff family, and was educated at Kilkenny College, and afterwards for the Roman Catholic priesthood, at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth. In 1814 he took priest's orders in the Capuchins, and was appointed missionary at Cork, where he acquired the greatest respect and consideration from all classes, and established religious societies for visiting the sick and poor. At a later period, he became president of a temperance association at Cork. He then devoted himself to the task of inducing spirit-drinkers to "take the pledge" of abstinence. In a few months, he converted no less than 150,000 in Cork alone. He afterwards made a progress through Ireland, visited Dublin, Liverpool, Manchester, and London, where the same success greeted his philanthropic efforts. A striking proof that he disregarded his temporal interests in the cause he had espoused, was afforded by the fact that a large distillery, owned by his brother, and from which he himself drew almost his whole income, was shut up in consequence of his crusade against alcoholic liquids. In recognition of his services, he was granted a pension of £300 per annum, and a private subscription was made on his behalf.

Born at Thomastown, Tipperary, 1790; died 1856.

MATHEWS, CHARLES, comedian, was the son of a London bookseller, and in opposition to the wishes of his friends, appeared on the stage when only 17 years old. For forty years he was one of the most popular of English entertainers, and his extraordinary powers of mimicry enabled him to give entertainments in which were many characters, all sustained by himself. His son, Charles, inherited his talent and was for many years the first of English comedians and performers of eccentric comedy. He died at Manchester in 1878.

Born in London, 1776; died at Plymouth, 1835.

MATHIAS, SAINT, ma-thi'-as, one of the twelve apostles, and elected after the death of Judas. He is said to have preached the gospel in Ethiopia, where he suffered martyrdom.

MATHIAS CORVINUS, called the Great, king of Hungary and Bohemia, was the son of John Hunniades, or Hunyady. The enemies of his father confined him in prison in Bohemia; but, on regaining his liberty, he was elected king of Hungary, in 1458, when only 15 years of age. His election, however, was opposed by many of the Hungarian lords, who offered the crown to Frederick III. The Turks, profiting by these divisions, invaded the country, but were expelled by Mathias, who compelled Frederick to yield to him the crown of St. Stephen, of which he had obtained possession. He made successful war against his father-in-law, Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, and in the course of a seven years' war, took from him Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia. The war was afterwards renewed, and Mathias, overrunning Austria, took Vienna and Neustadt; on which the emperor was obliged to make peace, in 1485. Mathias reformed many abuses, particularly with respect to duels and lawsuits, and patronized literature and the arts. He was preparing an expedition against the Turks, when he died of an apoplexy.

Born 1443; died at Vienna, 1490.

MATHILDA, mat'-hil-da, daughter of Boniface, count of Tuscany, was conspicuous for her support of Pope Gregory VII. in his long contest with the emperor Henry IV., and after the death of the pope, carried on the war alone. She gave all her possessions to the church, although after her death, the emperor forcibly made himself master of a portion.

Born 1046; died 1115.

MATHURA, mat-hoo-ra', a town of British India, North West Provinces, division of Agra, on the left bank of the Jumna. It is a great resort of Hindoo pilgrims, and there are about 190 places of prayer. Among the many Mahometan mosques is the splendid mosque of Aurengzebe. Pop. 60,000, of whom more than 50,000 are Hindoos, including 15,000 Brahmins and fakirs.

MATIGNON, JAMES DE, mat'-teen-yawng, prince of Montagne, and count of Thorigni, a famous general of France. He displayed great courage when young, in several battles, and in 1572 commanded the royal army in Normandy. In 1579 he was made a marshal of France, and assisted as constable at the coronation of Henry IV.

Born 1525; died 1597.

MATILDA, or MAUD, ma-til'-da, the daughter of Henry I., king of England, and wife of Henry IV., emperor of Germany, was nominated by her father, in 1135, successor to the English throne; but, in her absence, Stephen, the nephew of Henry, usurped the title. Arriving in England with a large army, in 1139, she defeated Stephen, and was acknowledged queen by a parliament held in 1141. Stephen afterwards defeated the empress; on which the people declared for him, and Matilda was obliged to leave the kingdom. On the death of the emperor, she married Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, by whom she had a son, afterwards Henry II., king of England.

Born 1100; died 1167.

MATILDA-CAROLINE, queen of Denmark, the daughter of Frederick-Louis, prince of Wales and father of George III. She was married at the age of 15 to Christian VII., king of Denmark; but, having been accused of an intrigue with the minister, Struensee, was divorced and sent into exile.

Born 1751; died at Zell, Hanover, 1775.

MATLOCK, or MATLOCK BRIDGE, mat'-lok, a village of England, in Derbyshire, on the Derwent, 15 miles N.W. of Derby, on the side of a steep hill. Matlock Bath is about a mile and a half distant. It is beautifully situated and famous for the mineral springs, which are much resorted to. There are also hydropathic establishments. Manf. Cotton and ornamental articles of spar. Pop. 5,220.—A station on the Midland railway.

MATSUMAI, mat-su-mai, a large town, the capital of the island of Jesso, or Yesso, Japan. It stands on the south coast, at the mouth of a river 60 miles W. of Hakodadi. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 41° 30′ N. Lon. 140° E.

MATSYS, QUINTIN, mat'-sis, an eminent painter, of the Dutch school. He is stated to have been brought up as a blacksmith, which trade he abandoned on falling in love with a young lady, to claim whose hand he studied painting, and became an excellent artist. A "Descent from the Cross," in the cathedral of Antwerp, is his masterpiece, and there is a celebrated picture by him, called "The Two Misers," at Windsor Castle.

Born at Antwerp, 1460; died in the same city, 1529.

MATTEUCCI, CARLO, mat-teu'-che, Italian statesman, graduated at the university of Bologna in 1828, and distinguished himself by his researches in physical science. Professor of physics at Pisa, in 1840. In 1849 he became connected with the great political movements for establishing liberty in Italy, and in 1862 was appointed minister of public instruction in the Ratazzi administration; and his labours in establishing schools and a system of national education were unwearying. He also held several high offices in connection with scientific institutions.

Born at Forli, 1811; died 1868.

MATTHEW, ST., or LEVI, ma'-thew, the son of Alphæus, an apostle of Jesus Christ, before which he had been a publican (i.e., a tax-gatherer, or receiver of tribute). His gospel is supposed to have been written A.D. 64. Some critics think that it was originally written in Hebrew or Syriac, whence it was translated into Greek; but this is mere conjecture. Matthew is said to have been put to death in Parthia, where, and in Persia, he had propagated Christianity with zeal and success.

MATTHEW CANTACUZENUS, kan'-ta-ku-se'-nus, the son of John, emperor of the East, and his associate in the empire in 1347. John abdicated the throne some time after, on which Matthew remained emperor, with John Palæologus. These princes at length disagreed, and had recourse to arms. A battle was fought between them in Thrace, and Matthew being taken prisoner, was compelled to renounce the throne to his rival. He then retired to the monastery of Mount Athos, where he composed commentaries on the Song of Solomon.

Lived in the 14th century.

MATTHEW of Westminster, an English monk and historian, who wrote a chronicle entitled "The Flowers of History," which he commences with the creation of the world; but the most valuable portion is that which he devotes to the chronicle of English events from the Conquest to the end of Edward I.'s reign. Nothing is known of his personal history.

Lived in the 14th century.

MATTHIAS, math-thi'-as, emperor of Germany, was the son of Maximilian II., and appointed governor of the Low Countries in 1578, and of Austria in 1595. He compelled his brother Rodolph, in 1608, to cede to him Hungary, Austria, and Moravia, and was crowned king of Bohemia in 1611. He was elected emperor in 1612. The empire was then at war with the Turks, with whom Matthias concluded a peace in 1615; but the war was renewed in 1618, and continued during thirty years.

Born 1557; died at Vienna, 1619.

MATTHIEU, Pierre, mat'-ye(r), a French historian and poet. He was a zealous partisan of the League, and attended Louis XIII. to the siege of Montauban. He wrote "A History of Memorable Events in the Reign of Henry the Great," the history of the death of that monarch, "The History of St. Louis," "The History of France, from Francis I. to Louis XIII."

Born 1563; died 1621.

MATTHISSON, Friedrech, math'-thi-son, a German poet and prose-writer, who held an appointment as travelling companion to the princess of Anhalt-Dessau. One of his poems, named "An Elegy in the Ruins of an Old Castle," is as popular in Germany as that of Gray with ourselves. He produced, in 1807, a valuable work in 20 volumes, containing extracts from more than 200 writers, entitled "A Lyrical Anthology."

Born near Magdeburg, 1761; died near Dessau, 1831.

MATTO-GROSSO, mat'-to-gros'-so (the name meaning a thick forest), a province of Brazil, bordering on Bolivia. It is mountainous in the centre, and, in many parts, covered with immense forests.

Rivers.—The Paraguay, Cuyaba, Guapore, Tapajos, and Xaigu; all of which have their rise in this province, and are tributaries of the Amazon, La Plata, and Araguaya.

Minerals.—Diamonds and gold are abundant.

Pop.—70,000, mostly Indians.

Lat. 7°—24° S. Lon. 50°—62° W.

MATURIN, Rev. Charles Robert, mat'-u-rin, an Irish divine, the descendant of a Huguenot family, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He produced several successful novels, and, in 1816, brought out a tragedy, entitled "Bertram," at Drury-lane theatre. Other less successful tragedies followed.

Born at Dublin, 1782; died 1824.

MATURIN, a state of the republic of Venezuela, South America (including the territory of Marino). The capital is Cumana, consisting mostly of extensive uncultivated plains, covered with innumerable herds of cattle. Pop. 45,000.

MATY, Matthew, mat'-te, an eminent physician, who took his doctor's degree at Leyden, and, in 1740, settled in England. In 1750 he commenced a periodical work, printed at the Hague, called "Le Journal Britannique," giving an account of the principal productions of the English press. In 1758 he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to which, in 1765, he became secretary. He also rose to be librarian of the British Museum. The life prefixed to the "Memoirs of the Earl of Chesterfield," and many smaller works, were written by him.

Born near Utrecht, 1718; died 1776.

MAUBAN, mo'-ban, a town of Luzon, Philippine islands, 60 miles S. of Manilla. Pop. 6,000.

MAUBEUGE, mo'-be(r)ge, a fortified town of France, department Nord, on the Sambre, 13 miles from Mons. Manf. Firearms, iron and steel goods, soap, sugar, and leather. Pop. 11,000.

MAUCHCHUNK, mauch-chunk', capital of Carbon county, Pennsylvania, United States, 70 miles N.W. of Philadelphia, in the midst of a busy mining locality, and is situated in a narrow gorge between mountains. There are several blast furnaces. Pop. 5,200.

MAUCHLINE, mawk'-lin, a town of Scotland, in the county of Ayr, 10 miles from Ayr. Mauchline castle is in the vicinity, and the place is associated with Burns, who resided at Mossgiel farm, near the town, which he makes the scene of several adventures in his poems. Manf. Cotton goods and ornamental articles of wood. Pop. of town, 1,500.

MAUGUIO, mau-zhwe'-o, a town of France, department Hérault, 6 miles N.E. of Montpellier. Pop. 2,600.

MAUI, or MOWEE, mau'-e, an island in the North Pacific, one of the Sandwich groups, to the north-west of Hawaii. It is divided into two oval-shaped peninsulas, connected by a low isthmus. East Maui rises to a height of 10,000 feet, and there is a crater 2,700 feet deep. West Maui has many peaks and ridges, the greatest height being 6,100 feet, with beautiful valleys opening out to extensive plains on the coast. There are many beautiful cascades. Sugar-cane thrives, and there are some fertile tracts. The chief town is Labaina, on a bay of the same name on the western side of West Maui. Pop. 6,000.

MAULE, mawl, a province of Chili, lying between the departments of Concepcion and Colchagua. The land is extremely fertile, and abounds with fine timber. The chief town is Cauquenes. Area, about 3,990 square miles. Pop. 133,000.

MAULE, a river of the above province, entering the Pacific Ocean in lat. 35° 20′ S. after a course of 130 miles.

MAULMAIN. (See Moulmein.)

MAUNDWA, maund-wa', a town of British India, province of Gujerat, on the right bank of the Norbuddae. There is a trade in timber, which is floated down the river. Pop. 5,000.

MAUPERTUIS, Pierre Louis Moreau de, mo'-pairt-we, French mathematician, was some time in the military service, which he quitted, and devoted himself to scientific pursuits. In 1723 he became a member of the French Academy, and, about four years after, was chosen fellow of the Royal Society of London, an honour chiefly due to his support of the Newtonian philosophy against Descartes. In 1736 he was sent, with other academicians, to the north, to ascertain the measurement of a degree of longitude, which service they performed with perfect success. At the invitation of the prince of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great, he went to Berlin in 1740, and was appointed president and director of the Academy. He accompanied that king in his campaigns against the Austrians; but exposing himself too much at the battle of Molwitz, he was made prisoner, and sent to Vienna, where he was well received by the emperor. He was soon permitted to return to Berlin, after receiving several marks of the imperial favour. He was of a vain and irritable temper, and had a dispute with Koenig, and another with Voltaire, who exerted his satirical talents against him. Frederick ordered the satire to be burnt by the executioner, upon which Voltaire quitted Berlin; but Maupertuis felt the attack so keenly that he returned to France, and afterwards settled at Basel. His chief works are,—"The Figure of the Earth Determined," "The Measurement of a Degree of Meridian," "Discourse on the Figure of the Stars," "Elements of Geography," "Nautical Astronomy," "Elements of Astronomy," "Reflections on the Origin of Languages," &c.

Born at St. Malo, 1698; died 1759.

MAUR, ST., mor, a disciple of St. Benedict, and abbot of Glauseuil, in Anjou. At the beginning of the 17th century was founded a congregation of Benedictines of St. Maur, which has produced many learned men.

Died about 584.

MAUR, DON CARLOS LE, brigadier in the Spanish army, and director-general of the engineers. He was an excellent mathematician and mechanic, and constructed several canals and other great works. His "Treatise on Dynamics" and his "Elements of Mathematics" are held in great esteem.

Died 1785.

MAURA, SANTA. (See SANTA MAURA.)

MAUREPAS, JEAN FREDERIC PHELYPEAUX, COUNT DE, mor'-pa, a French statesman, who, in 1715, was appointed secretary of state. In 1723 he was made superintendent of the marine, and, in 1738, minister of state. By the intrigues of Madame de Pompadour, he was exiled to Bourges in 1749. He was not recalled till 1774, when Louis XVI. entrusted the public affairs to his management. He entirely remodelled the marine department of his native country, and was a liberal encourager of the sciences; but the part he took in assisting America against England is a reflection on his political prudence. His memoirs, by himself, are curious, but carelessly written.

Born 1701; died 1781.

MAURIAE, maur'-re-a, a town of France, department Cantal, 21 miles north of Aurillac. There are two fine old churches, hotel-de-ville, and other public buildings. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 3,300.

MAURICE OF NASSAU, Prince of Orange, mor'-ice, was the son of William I., after whose assassination, in 1584, he was elected stadtholder of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, being then only 18 years old. He evinced, however, great courage and talents; and being named captain-general of the United Provinces, established that liberty which his father had begun. He made himself master of Breda in 1590, and this was followed by the capture of Zutphen, Deventer, Hulst, Nimeguen, Gertruydenburg, and Gröningen. He defeated the archduke Albert in 1597, and, in the same year, compelled the Spaniards to abandon the Low Countries. In 1600 he was forced to raise the siege of Dunkirk, but he soon afterwards obtained a great victory over Albert near Nieuport. This was followed by numerous conquests, and, in 1609, the independence of the United Provinces was acknowledged by Spain. In 1619, aiming at the sovereignty of Holland, he was opposed by Barneveldt, who was sent to the scaffold for resisting the ambition of Maurice. He was one of the greatest captains of his age, but his cruelty to those who opposed his aspirations to absolute power has cast a stain upon his memory.

Born at Dettenburg, 1567; died at the Hague, 1625.

MAURICE OF SAXONY. (See SAXE, Marshal.)

MAURICE, REV. FREDERICK DENISON, a modern English divine. He was son of a Unitarian clergyman, and was sent to the university of Cambridge, where, although he did not take a degree, he passed his examinations with considerable distinction. After leaving Cambridge, he went to London, and was employed to write for the "Athenæum." He likewise produced, at the same period, a novel, entitled "Eustace Conway." His religious views next undergoing considerable modification, partly by the influence of Coleridge's writings, he went to Oxford, took his degree there, and became a clergyman of the Church of England in 1828. He wrote largely on theological matters, and contributed treatises on moral and metaphysical philosophy to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." He was one of the promoters of the Christian Socialist movement, which had for its object the abolition of the system of competitive labour, and the association of the working-classes into small communities, which should undertake work in common, and divide the proceeds. As founder and president of the Working Man's College, he considerably advanced the cause of general education. He was chaplain of Lincoln's Inn for many years. He held the professorship of divinity in King's College, but resigned upon the authorities raising objections to his religious views, especially as regarded the eternity of punishment, as developed in his theological essays. In 1866 he became professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge.

Born 1805; died 1872.

MAURICE, ST., a river of British North America, rising in lake Oskelanaio in lat. 48° 40′; lon. 74° 30″ W., and, after a course of 200 miles, in which are many cascades and lakes, with islands, joins the St. Lawrence at Three Rivers.

MAURICIUS, FLAVIUS TIBERIUS, maurish'-e-us, Byzantine emperor. He was descended from an ancient Roman family, and in 578 was appointed by the emperor Tiberius to the command of an expedition against the Persians, in which he was completely successful. In 582 he succeeded Tiberius, whose daughter he had married, and the Persians invading his territories, a war ensued, which lasted eight years, resulting in the dethronement of the Persian king, Khusru II., by his own subjects. He appealed for help to Mauricius, who generously assisted him to regain his throne, in return for which Khusru ceded some important fortresses. A war afterwards broke out with the Arabs, and 12,000 Byzantine soldiers were made prisoners, and as Mauricius refused to ransom them they were massacred. This led to a revolt of the army, who chose Phocas for emperor, marched upon Constantinople, and put Mauricius and all his family to death.

Born in Cappadocia, 539; died 602.

MAURITANIA, mor-e-ta'-ne-a, the ancient name of the north-western part of Africa, including the present sultanate of Morocco, and the western part of Algeria.

MAURITIUS, or ISLE OF FRANCE, maw-rish'-e-us, an island in the Indian Ocean, about 600 miles to the east of Madagascar, and forming a colony of Great Britain. It chiefly consists of rugged and irregular mountains, rising usually into points or pinnacles; the best known of which is the Peter Botte, the famous cone with a rock poised on the summit. A great portion of the island is volcanic, and the coast is encircled by coral reefs. The climate is remarkably fine; and the scenery, particularly in the southern part, or La Savanne, is very beautiful. The chief productions are wheat, maize, yams, and especially sugar; but it depends for provisions almost entirely upon Bourbon, which is considered as its granary; while it is, on the other hand, the port of Bourbon. The exports consist of coffee, cotton, indigo, raw sugar, and cloves. The chief towns are PORT LOUIS (where spacious docks have been constructed), the capital, and Grande Porte, or Mahébourg.

Pop.—360,400, including the adjacent small islands of Seychelles, and Rodrigues. More than two-thirds of the inhabitants are Indian coolies.
Lat. 19° 58′—20° 33′ S. Lon. 57° 17′—57° 46′ E.
History.—In 1505, this island was discovered by the Portuguese, and, in 1598, was taken by the Dutch, who, in honour of Prince Maurice, gave it its present name. The French formed an establishment here in 1644, after it had been abandoned by the Dutch; and, in 1810, it came into the possession of the British. It is the scene of the tale of "Paul and Virginia," by St. Pierre.

MAURO, FRA, mo'-ro, an Italian geographer, a monk in a monastery near Venice, who constructed by far the best map of the world produced in the 15th century. Little is known of his personal history.
Died 1459.

MAUROLICO, FRANCIS, mo-ro-le'-ko, an Italian mathematician, who was abbot of Santa Maria del Porto, in Sicily, and publicly taught mathematics at Messina. He produced an edition of the "Spherics of Theodosius," and wrote treatises on astronomical instruments, the sphere, music, arithmetic, and cosmography.
Born at Messina, 1494; died 1575.

MAURS, mors, a town of France, department Cantal, 20 miles S.W. of Aurillac. Several important fairs are held. Pop. 5,200.

MAURUS, TERENTIANUS, maw'-rus, a Latin poet and grammarian, who flourished under Trajan, and is alluded to with respect by St. Augustine. The only work by him which has survived, is a dissertation on the Art of Poetry.

MAURY, JEAN SIFFREIN, Cardinal, mor'-e, a distinguished French orator, who, after pursuing his theological studies at Avignon, went to Paris in his 18th year, to gain a livelihood by the exercise of his talents. His writings and eloquence in the pulpit attracted considerable attention. A partisan of the aristocracy, his eloquence was constantly brought to bear against Mirabeau, whose most formidable antagonist he became. Upon the closing of the National Assembly, he left France, and went to Italy, when Pope PIUS VI. nominated him cardinal and bishop of Montefiascone. In 1804 he was permitted to return to France, and from that period he became the devoted servant of Napoleon. The latter made him archbishop of Paris in 1810, a dignity he retained until the fall of his master, in defiance of the pope's commands to the contrary. The events of the year 1814 compelled him to again seek refuge in Italy; whereupon the pope, for his former disobedience, imprisoned him for some months.
Born in France, 1746; died at Rome, 1817.

MAURY, MATTHEW FONTAINE, a distinguished American hydrographer, who, at the age of 19, entered the United States navy as midshipman, and made a voyage round the world, which lasted four years. While on this voyage he began a treatise on navigation, which is now a text-book. After his return, he passed his examination, and was appointed, with the grade of lieutenant, to the Falmouth. Subsequently, he was charged with the astronomical department of an expedition dispatched to the South Sea. He was next placed at the head of the hydrographical department of the United States Naval Board. In this last position he constructed his "Wind and Current Charts," a work deduced from a great number of nautical journals and logs, and of the highest utility to the seaman. Of a similarly excellent character is his work entitled "The Physical Geography of the Sea," which has been translated into all the European languages, and is full of the most important details. His great services were acknowledged by all countries having maritime traffic. He was a member of many learned bodies, and received a gold medal from the emperor of Austria. He assisted in the compilation of sailing charts of great value. In 1855 he published an account of the Amazon and Atlantic slopes of South America. In the great war of secession he held a commission in the Confederate navy, and was afterwards a commissioner to Europe.
Born in Virginia, 1806; died 1873.

MAURY, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 40,000, of whom about 17,000 are coloured. The capital is Columbia.

MAUVEZIN, mo'-vai-za(n), a town of France, department Gers, on the Arratz, 16 miles N.E. of Auch. There are the remains of a strong castle. Pop. 2,700.

MAUWO, mau-wo', a town of Kanem, Western Africa, 50 miles N.E. of Lake Tchad. Pop. 4,000.

MAVERICK, mav'-rik, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 2,000. The capital is Eagle Pass.

MAVROCARDATO, ALESSANDRO, mav'-ro-kar-da'-to, Prince, Greek diplomatist and statesman, grandson of the Hospodar of Wallachia. He promoted the Greek war of independence, and was president of the first executive council in 1822, and gallantly defended Missolonghi, in 1823. He formed an intimate acquaintance with Byron. After the accession of king Otho, he was several times ambassador to foreign courts, and in 1843 was president of the assembly, which established a constitution.
Born at Constantinople, 1787; died 1865.

MAXENTIUS, MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS, max-en'-she-us, Roman emperor, was the son of Maximianus Herculius, and declared himself A[illegible]. He was opposed by Galerius Ma[illegible] who was defeated, and slew himself. Maxentius then marched into Africa, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelties. Constantine afterwards defeated him in Italy, and he was drowned in crossing the Tiber.
Died 312.

MAXIMIANUS, MARCUS AURELIUS HERCULIUS, max-im-i-ai'-nus, a Roman emperor, who, from being a common soldier, was associated in the government by Diocletian, in 286. He distinguished himself by his military skill and bravery against the barbarians, and defeated Aurelius Julius, who had assumed the imperial title in Africa. When Diocletian abdicated the crown, in 286, he compelled Maximianus, much against his will, to do the same; but about a year afterwards, he resumed the dignity, and opposed his son Maxentius. The troops, however, mutinied against Maximianus, who fled into Gaul, where he was put to death by order of Constantine.

Died 310.

MAXIMIANUS, GALERIUS VALERIUS, emperor of Rome, was originally a shepherd in Dacia, afterwards a soldier, and raised to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, who also gave him his daughter in marriage. He conquered the Goths and Dalmatians, but was defeated by the Persians, over whom he afterwards gained a complete victory. He compelled Diocletian to abdicate the throne; but his cruelty soon rendered him odious to the Romans, who raised Maxentius to the throne. He was a bitter persecutor of the Christians, whose God he implored for relief in his last illness, after vainly seeking aid from the heathen deities.

Died 311.

MAXIMILIAN I., max-i-mil'-yan, emperor of Germany, was son of Frederick III., married the daughter of Charles the Bold, of Burgundy, and was created king of the Romans in 1486. Upon the death of his father, in 1493 he became emperor. He engaged in several wars with France, in most of which he was successful. He was married a second time, the bride being Bianca Sforza, daughter of the duke of Milan. Forming the design of making himself pope, he, to further his purpose, assumed the ancient title of the Roman emperors, Pontifex Maximus, and endeavoured to prevail upon Julius II. to admit him as coadjutor. He united with England against France, and served under Henry VIII. in 1513. In 1499 Switzerland was lost to the German empire, but the marriage of the son and daughter of Maximilian with the Infant and Infanta of Spain, led to the union of that country with Austria. He wrote some poems, besides works on architecture, hunting, and other subjects, and the memoirs of his own life.

Born 1459; died 1519.

MAXIMILIAN II., emperor of Germany, was the son of the emperor Ferdinand I., and elected king of the Romans in 1562. He was chosen king of Hungary and Bohemia, and succeeded his father in 1564. He was a tolerant ruler and a lover of peace, and greatly encouraged the arts and sciences.

Born 1527; died at Ratisbon, 1576.

MAXIMILIAN, duke of Bavaria in the 17th century, was named, on account of his courage and success, the Defender of Germany, and, for his singular prudence, he acquired the name of Solomon. He zealously opposed the Protestants, and was considered as one of the principal supporters of the Catholic religion. In 1620 he gained the battle of Prague, against Frederick, prince palatine, who had been elected king of Bohemia. For these services Maximilian was named an elector of the empire.

Born 1581; died 1651.

MAXIMILIAN-EMANUEL, e-man'-u-el, elector of Bavaria, rendered great service to the emperor Leopold. He signalized himself at the siege of Neuhausel, in 1685; at that of Buda, in 1686; and, the year following, in the battle of Mohacz. He commanded, about this time, the army of Hungary, and took Belgrade, sword in hand, in 1689. He was afterwards governor of the Low Countries; but, taking part with France in the war of the Spanish succession, he was put under the ban of the empire, and, in 1706, deprived of his estates, regaining them at the general peace.

Born 1662; died at Munich, 1726.

MAXIMILIAN-JOSEPH, jo'-sef, king of Bavaria, succeeded his uncle, Charles-Theodore, in 1799. Attaching himself to the fortunes of Napoleon, he gave his daughter in marriage to Eugene Beauharnais, in 1806. In the same year his duchy was erected into a kingdom. In 1813, however, he formed a member of the league against the emperor, and, by that proceeding, retained his throne after the fall of Napoleon. His reign was marked by a great number of reforms in the administration of his kingdom.

Born 1756; died 1825.

MAXIMILIAN II., JOSEPH, king of Bavaria, son of Ludwig II., succeeded his father on his abdication, in 1848, and distinguished himself by the encouragement he gave to literature and art.

Born 1811; died 1864.

MAXIMILIAN, FERDINAND JOSEPH, emperor of Mexico, and brother of Francis Joseph, the present emperor of Austria, ascended the imperial throne of Mexico in 1864, being summoned thither by the nobles of that country, and having the promise of material support from Napoleon III. The French troops, however, that had been sent to Mexico prior to the coming of Maximilian, were withdrawn in 1866, and the emperor, after a vain effort to assert his authority, was betrayed by treachery, captured, and shot at Queretaro by order of Juarez. (See JUAREZ.)

Born at Schoenbrun, 1832; died 1867.

MAXIMIN, ST., max'-i-ma, a town of France, department Var, 22 miles N.W. of Toulon. It is walled, and has a noble Gothic church of the 13th century. Manf. Principally woollen cloths. Six annual fairs are held. Pop. 3,300.

MAXIMINUS I., CAIUS JULIUS VERUS, max-i-mi'-nus, emperor of Rome, was the son of a Thracian peasant, and having displayed great courage in the Roman armies, he rose to command. On the death of Alexander Severus, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, 235. He was a great persecutor, and put to death above 4,000 persons, on suspicion of their being concerned in a conspiracy against him. His stature and strength were very extraordinary, and his disposition proportionably brutal. The most extraordinary stories are related of his appetite and physical powers. Capitolinus, in his "Historia Augusta," relates that forty pounds of meat and eighteen bottles of wine were his ordinary allowance for a day. His strength was such that he is said to have stopped a chariot in full speed with one of his fingers. He was killed in a revolt of his soldiers.

Died 237.

MAXIMINUS II., emperor of Rome, made Cæsar on the abdication of Diocletian, in 305, and three years afterwards proclaimed himself emperor. He invaded Thrace in 313, but was defeated and fled, dying soon afterwards.

Died 313.

MAXIMUS I., MARCUS CLODIUS PUPIENUS, max'-i-mus, Roman emperor, elected after the murder of Gordianus II., 238, but was shortly afterwards murdered by the Prætorians.

Died 238.

MAXIMUS II., MAGNUS CLEMENS, emperor of Rome, 383, conquered Italy, 387, but was defeated and beheaded by Theodosius, 388.

MAXIMUS III., PETRONIUS, caused the murder of Valentian, who had dishonoured his wife, and succeeded him, marrying his widow, 456. He fled from Rome at the approach of the Vandals, and was killed by his own troops.
Born 395; died 455.

MAXIMUS, MAGNUS, a Spaniard, was general of the Roman army in Britain, when he proclaimed himself emperor, 383. Having made himself master of Gaul, Britain and Spain, he marched into Italy, where he committed dreadful cruelties. Eventually his soldiers delivered him up to Theodosius, who ordered him to be beheaded.
Died 388.

MAXIMUS, TYRIUS, a Platonic philosopher, who visited Rome in 146, but died in his own country in the reign of Commodus.
Lived in the 2nd century.

MAXIMUS THE CYNIC, and tutor of Julian the Apostate, was a native of Ephesus. He professed magic, and was put to death by the emperor Valens.
Died 366.

MAXWELL, LORD ROBERT, max'-wel, one of the lords of the regency that governed Scotland in 1536, while James V. was absent in France upon a matrimonial expedition. At a subsequent period, taking offence at the appointment of Oliver Sinclair to the command of the army, he, with many of the Scottish nobility, surrendered to the English at Solway Moss. After the death of James V. he was ransomed, and returned to his native country, where, in 1543, he carried a bill for the authorisation of the Scriptures to be read in the vulgar tongue.
Died 1546.

MAXWELTOWN, max'-wel-town, a borough and barony of Scotland, in Kirkcudbright, on the Nith, opposite the town of Dumfries, with which it communicates by two bridges. Manf. Damask, iron and cordage. Pop. 4,300.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

MAY, THOMAS, an English dramatic poet and historian, was educated at Cambridge, after which he entered of Gray's Inn, where he wrote some plays, and translated several authors, particularly Lucan's "Pharsalia." Charles I. employed him in writing two historical poems, but in the Civil War May joined the Parliament, and was appointed their secretary and historiographer.
Born 1595; died 1650.

MAY, THOMAS ERSKINE, LORD FARNBOROUGH, commenced his public career as Librarian to the House of Commons at Westminster, to which office he was appointed in 1831. Having been called to the bar in 1838, he was subsequently appointed Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills and Taxing Master of the House. In 1856 he was appointed Clerk-Assistant, and fourteen years afterwards he became Clerk. He wrote numerous books on the law and practice of Parliament, which have become standard references. He was created Companion of the Bath in 1860, and Knight Commander in 1866. As Sir Erskine May he continued his public career of fifty-five years until April 15, 1886, when he resigned. The next day the House passed a vote of thanks in testimony to his valuable public services, and he was soon afterwards gazetted a peer under the title of Baron Farnborough. He never lived to take his seat in the House of Lords, for the illness which impelled him to resign continued to incapacitate him, and terminated fatally on the 17th of the ensuing month.
Born 1815; died 1886.

MAYAGUEZ, mai'-a-gwai, a town and port on the western side of the island of Porto Rico, West Indies, 70 miles from St. Juan de Porto Rico. An adventurer, Ducondray, took this town in 1822, and made the attempt to establish an independent republic.

MAYBOLE, mai'-bole, a Scotch burgh of regality, county of Ayr, 9 miles S. of Ayr. Near the town are the ruins of the famous abbey of Crossraguel. Shoemaking and weaving are carried on. Pop. 6,628.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western railway.

MAYEMME, mai-yem-me', a city of Bokhara, capital of a Khanate of the same name, 200 miles N. of Herat. It is built chiefly of mud, but occupies an important position.

MAYEN, mi'-en, a town of Prussia, Rhine province, 15 miles W. of Coblentz. Manf. Woollen cloth, red leather, earthenware, and paper. Pop. 5,500.

MAYENCE, mai'-yence. (See MENTZ.)

MAYENNE, mai'-yen, a department of France, bounded by the departments of the Orne, Sarthe, Maine, and Loire. Generally flat, but fertile. The vine is cultivated to a small extent, and cider and perry are extensively made. Lint and hemp are grown, and the forests abound with excellent timber; but the chief occupations of the inhabitants are the breeding of cattle and sheep.
Rivers.—The Mayenne, the Oudon, and the Erve.
Minerals.—Iron, coal, slate, and marble.
Area.—1,996 square miles.
Pop.—344,881.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 3 arrondissements and 274 communes. The chief towns are MAYENNE, the capital, CHATEAU-GONTIER, and LAVAL.

MAYENNE, chief town of the above department, on the right bank of the Mayenne. The streets are steep and narrow, but there are good squares, with fountains. An old fortress is on the summit of a lofty rock. Manf. Cotton and linen. Pop. 8,200.

MAYENNE, or MAINE, a river of the north-west of France, rising in the department of Orne, and joining the Loire near Angers. The affluents are the Varenne, Calmont, Ernée, and Oudon on the right bank, and the Jouanne and Ouette on the left.

MAYENNE, CHARLES of Lorraine, Duke of, second son of Francis of Lorraine, duke of Guise. He displayed great courage at the sieges of Poitiers and Rochelle, and at the battle of Moncontour; he also defeated the Protestants in Guienne, Dauphiny, and Saintonge. When his brothers were killed, at the meeting of the States at Blois, he declared himself head of the League, and assumed the title of lieutenant-general of France. He proclaimed the cardinal of Bourbon king, by the name of Charles X.; but was defeated by Henry IV. at the battle of Arques, and again at Ivry. In 1599 he was reconciled to the king, who made him governor of the Isle of France.
Born 1554; died 1611.

MAYER, TOBIAS, ma'-er, German astronomer, who was self-taught, and, by his own application, acquired a knowledge of the Latin language. In 1750 the university of Göttingen appointed him mathematical professor. Mayer made several discoveries in geometry and astronomy, and published some excellent works, the chief of which are his "Table of Refractions," "Theory of the Moon," and "Astronomical Tables and Precepts;" for which last the English Board of Longitude gave his widow £3,000.

Born at Würtemberg, 1723; died at Göttingen, 1762.

MAYER, JULIUS ROBERT, German physical philosopher, who studied medicine at Tübingen, and afterwards at Munich and Paris, famous for his investigations regarding the mechanical theory of heat. In 1871 he received the Copley medal of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Heilbronn, Würtemberg, 1814.

MAYERNE, THEODORE TURQUET DE, ma'-ern, physician, who studied at Geneva, Heidelberg, and Montpelier, and settled in Paris, where he achieved great reputation, but was involved in difficulties with other physicians in consequence of his introduction of new and simple remedies, and with the Jesuits from his Huguenot opinions. In 1611 he came to England, and was appointed first physician to James I. He was the most accomplished physician of his time, and his chemical knowledge was unusually great.

Born at Geneva, 1573; died at Chelsea, 1665.

MAYNE, JASPER, main, an English divine and poet, educated at Westminster school and Christ Church, Oxford, of which he became student. In 1646 he was created D.D., and two years afterwards was deprived of his studentship for his loyalty. At the Restoration he was promoted to a canonry of Christ Church. Mayne was a man of considerable wit and humour, which he often carried to some excess, particularly in his will, wherein he left his servant-man, who was fond of tippling, an old trunk, in which, says he, there is something to make him drink. The man eagerly sought for his legacy, and, on opening the trunk, found a red herring. Dr. Mayne wrote some poems, now obsolete, sermons, and two plays, called the "City Match," and the "Amourous Warre," the latter of which was a satire upon the Puritans.

Born in Devonshire, 1604; died at Oxford, 1672.

MAYNOOTH, mai-nooth', a neat, modern-built town of Ireland, county of Kildare, 15 miles N.W. Dublin. It has a college, instituted in 1795, for the education of the Irish Roman Catholic clergy. It accommodates 500 students, 250 of whom, intended for the priesthood, receive a money stipend. The new buildings are by Pugin, in the Gothic style. Pop. 2,100.—A station on the Midland Great Western Railway.

MAYO, mai'-yo, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, bounded S. by Galway, N. and W. by the Atlantic Ocean, and E. by Sligo and Roscommon. The surface varies greatly, from the bleak and rugged mountain, to the fertile and cheerful plain. The greatest elevations are Croagh Patrick, 2,610 feet, and Nephin, 2,646 feet. The best lands are almost exclusively occupied in grazing. The lakes are Lough Mask, Lough Cullin, and Lough Conn; besides numerous smaller ones, which, in a district less watered, would be deemed considerable. There is a coast line of about 250 miles, with good harbours and bays, the chief of which are Killery, Blacksod, and Newport Bays. There are many interesting antiquities.

Rivers.—Moy, the Owen Errive, the Deel, the Owenmore, the Awenmore, and the Ayle.

Minerals.—Ironstone, marble, and slate.

Area.—2,132 square miles.

Pop.—243,030, nearly all Roman Catholics, a large number speaking the Irish language.

Chief Towns.—CASTLEBAR, the capital, BALLINA, BALLINROBE, and WESTPORT.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

MAYO, one of the Cape de Verd islands, 21 miles in circumference. It abounds in salt, but water is extremely scarce. There is a small town of the same name, inhabited by a few negroes. Lat. 15° 10′ N. Lon. 23° 8′ W.

MAYOTTA, ma-yot'-ta, one of the Cormoras islands, in the Indian Ocean, at north-eastern entrance of the Mozambique channel. It is about 30 miles long by 20 broad, of a volcanic character, and surrounded by reefs. There are fertile valleys and plains. Pop. including some small, adjacent islands, about 18,000.

MAYSVILLE, mais'-vil, capital of Mason county, Kentucky, United States, on the Ohio, 63 miles S.E. of Cincinnati. It is the largest hemp mart in the States. There are a city hall, and other good public buildings. Manf. Cotton, hemp, tobacco, iron, and coal-oil. Pop. 4,800.

MAZAMET, ma'-za'-mai, a town of France, department Tarn, on the left bank of the Arnette, 10 miles S.E. of Castres. Manf. Woollens, flannel, worsted, moleskins, and paper. Pop. 14,000.

MAZAN, ma'-za(n)', a town of France, department Vaucluse, 5 miles E. of Carpentras. It is famous for the sweet wine known as Grenache. Pop. 3,600.

MAZANDERAN, ma-zan-de-ran', a province of Persia, lying along the southern shore of the Caspian Sea. It is flat and swampy near the coast, but elevated farther inland. The soil is fertile, and cotton, sugar, rice, and many fruits are cultivated The capital is Sari. Pop. 150,000.

MAZARIN, JULES, or GIULIO MAZARINI, maz'-a-ri(n), cardinal and minister of state to Louis XIV. of France. He studied law at Rome, and in Spain, and afterwards served in the papal army. Accompanying a papal legate to France, he acquired the friendship of Richelieu and the confidence of Louis XIII. In 1641, pope Urban VIII. made him cardinal, and, on the death of Richelieu (having become a naturalised Frenchman), Louis appointed him minister of state. He was also nominated one of the executors of the king's will, and had the principal management of affairs during the minority of Louis XIV.; but at length the murmurs of the people rose so high against him, that he found it expedient to quit the kingdom, and take refuge in the Netherlands, and a price was set on his head. He afterwards recovered his power, and continued to render the state important services, the principal of which was the restoration of peace between France and Spain, in 1659; but in his financial administration he was unsuccessful. He was privately married to Anne of Austria, the mother of the king, and accumulated an immense fortune. His application to business produced a disease, which caused his death.

Born in Italy, 1602; died 1661.

MAZARIN, HORTENSE MANCINI, Duchess of, niece of the preceding, famous for beauty and wit. In 1661, she married the Duke de la Meilleraie, from whom she soon separated, and went to England, where she became one of the reigning beauties of the dissolute court of Charles II., and one of the many mistresses with whom that king was similarly associated.

Born 1646: died in London, 1699.

MAZARRON, or ALMAZARRON, ma-zar'-ron, a seaport of Spain, province of Murcia, on the Mediterranean, 27 miles S.W. of Cartagena. Silver ore and alum are found in the vicinity, and there are extensive remains of what is supposed to have been a Carthaginian settlement. Pop. 7,000.

MAZATLAN, ma-zat'-lan, a seaport of Mexico, at the mouth of a river of the same name, in the Gulf of Mexico. There is a good harbour, and the town is well-built, and there is a considerable export trade. Pop. 14,000, chiefly of mixed Indian, Spanish, and negro races.

MAZEENA, ma-zee'-na, a fort of Afghanistan, 15 miles from Jellalabad, near which the Afghans were defeated by the British in 1842.

MAZEPPA, JAN, ma-zep'-pa, was the son of Polish gentleman, and became a page at the court of John Casimir, king of Poland. After his return to his native province of Podolia, he engaged in an intrigue with the wife of a neighbouring lord, who surprised him and caused him to be bound naked upon the back of his horse, which carried him home, which comparatively prosaic fact appears to be the sole foundation of the exciting story which represents Mazeppa to have been bound to a wild horse, which carried him to the distant country of the Ukraine—a story made memorable by the genius of Byron, Horace Vernet (the painter), and Victor Hugo. Mazeppa really fled to the Ukraine, joined the Cossacks, and rose to the rank of their hetman, in 1687. In that capacity he displayed great energy and talent, and succeeded in gaining the esteem of the Czar Peter, who appointed him prince of the Ukraine. Being desirous, however, of rendering himself independent, Mazeppa fought against the Czar, and enlisted his forces under the banner of Charles XII., at the battle of Pultawa. After the defeat of the Swedish king, he took refuge first in Wallachia, and afterwards at Bender.

Born about 1645; died at Bender, 1709.

MAZERE, ma-zair', a town of France, department Ariège, on the left bank of the Lers, 20 miles N.E. of Foix. Manf. Leather; there is a trade in wool. Pop. 3,700.

MAZZA, ANGELO, mat'-sa, an eminent Italian poet, a native of Parma, in the university of which city he was afterwards professor of Greek literature. He translated the odes of Pindar, and Akenside's "Pleasures of Imagination;" and, having attained a high degree of literary reputation, was admitted into the Arcadian Academy at Rome.

Born 1740; died 1817.

MAZZARA, mat-sa'-ra, a town of Sicily, on the sea shore, 25 miles S. of Trapani. It has a cathedral, numerous churches and convents, bishop's palace and college. Cotton is grown in the neighbourhood. Pop. 13,000.

MAZZARINO, mat-sa-ré'-no, an inland town of Sicily, 15 miles S.E. of Caltanisetta. It has a college, and there are sulphureous springs. Pop. 13,066.

MAZZHINGI, JOSEPH, count, mat'-sen-je, a distinguished composer, the descendant of an eminent Tuscan family, was born in England, of an English mother. He was very early noted for his musical ability, and so diligently did he pursue his studies that he was considered qualified for the post of director of the opera house when but little more than eighteen years of age. "The Blind Girl," "The Turnpike Gate," "Paul and Virginia," and a long list of other once popular pieces were from his fertile pen, and Sir Walter Scott warmly thanked him for the manner in which he set to music some of that author's poetry.

Born 1764; died 1844.

MAZZINI, GIUSEPPE, mat-se'-ne, a modern Italian politician, who was educated for the law; but being inspired with an enthusiastic love of liberty, he abandoned his profession, soon after he had commenced its practice. Allying himself with a small circle of ardent Genoese gentlemen, he became the soul of a movement which had for its object the regeneration of Italy. In furtherance of their ideas, these young Genoese established a literary journal, which was soon suppressed, but was again commenced at Leghorn. In 1830 he became an active member of the secret society called the Carbonari, but being denounced to the police, was arrested. After a detention of six months, he was set at liberty, on the understanding that he should quit Italy. He took refuge at Marseilles, and founded there a journal and a society, both of which were significantly named "Young Italy." The main idea of both was that the freedom of Italy, both from domestic and foreign tyranny, could only be attained by a union of all the separate states into one nation,—Romans, Piedmontese, Tuscans, Neapolitans, Lombards, Venetians, &c.—all merging their separate interests in the one common name of Italians, and under this name forming a single powerful European nation. The motto was "God and the People," and the chosen flag white, red, and green. The precise form of government was to be decided by circumstances; Mazzini himself preferred the republican. After months of secret plotting, a conspiracy was organised, which, from Genoa as a centre, spread through all Italy, from the Alps to the extremity of Sicily, and even the officers and soldiers of the Piedmontese and Neapolitan armies were concerned in it. This formidable organisation was discovered, however, and a great number of the chief agents therein either lost their lives or sought safety in flight. This took place in 1833, and from that year until 1848, Mazzini was mainly employed in a propagandism of his ideas throughout the Italian peninsula. He resided in France, in Switzerland, and was expelled from both countries in turn; upon which he went to London, always keeping up a close correspondence with his party in Italy. In 1844 Sir James Graham, then home secretary, authorised the opening of several letters in the post-office. It was thereby ascertained that the brothers Bandiera were plotting an insurrection in the Venetian states. (See BANDIERA). After the French revolution of 1848, and the insurrection at Milan, Mazzini went to Italy with the view of giving a turn to the great Italian movement in conformity with the ideas he had so long advocated. After the defeat of Charles Albert, and the consequent re-establishment of the Austrian rule in Italy, Mazzini was accused of nullifying the king's efforts by causing the republican party to keep aloof from him. He next travelled about in Garibaldi's wake, and, in 1849, went to Rome. The pope had fled before his arrival, and an assembly, elected by universal suffrage, had passed decrees for the total abolition of the temporal sovereignty of the pope, and for the creation of the Roman states into a republic. Mazzini's advent at this crisis was met with the acclamations of the Romans. With Saffi and Armellini, he was appointed triumvir, and charged to defend the republic against its enemies. The French, under General Oudinot, landed soon afterwards at Civita Vecchia. On the entrance of the French into Rome, Mazzini returned to England and resumed his pen. The expulsion of the Austrians from Lombardy, and its annexation to Piedmont, again opened up the field for the labours of Mazzini. He assisted greatly to organise Garibaldi's expedition to Sicily in 1860, and in 1864, being again expelled from Switzerland, returned to England. In the following year he was elected a deputy to the Italian parliament, for Messina, but his election was cancelled. He afterwards attempted to enter Italy, but was arrested at Gaeta, where he remained a prisoner till Rome was taken by the Italian army. He was a man of pure and ardent aspirations, and marked by a heroic simplicity of manners and mode of life. The Italian government honoured him with a public funeral.

Born at Genoa, 1808; died at Pisa, 1872.

MAZZUOLI, FRANCIS, mat'-soo-o'-le, commonly called Parmegiano, a famous Italian painter, who has also been named as the inventor of the art of etching. He had an admirable genius for painting; his invention was ready, and he had a peculiar talent for giving grace and sweetness to his figures.

Born at Parma, 1504; died 1540.

MEAD, RICHARD, mede, a celebrated English physician, who studied under Grævius, at Utrecht, after which he removed to Leyden, and contracted a close intimacy with Boerhaave. On completing his studies in that celebrated school of physic, he went to Italy, and took his doctor's degree at Padua. In 1696, he returned to his native country, and commenced the practice of physic at Stepney, where he resided seven years. In 1702 he published his treatise on Poisons, which procured him considerable reputation. In 1704 he was admitted a member of the Royal Society, of which, in 1707, he became vice-president, and, in 1727, he was appointed physician to George II.

Born in London, 1673; died 1754.

MEADE, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 10,000.

MEADVILLE, mede'-vil, capital of Crawford county, Pennsylvania, United States, on the east bank of French creek, 82 miles N.W. of Pittsburgh. There are a handsome court-house, a state arsenal, Alleghany College, and an opera house. Manf. Woollens and machinery. There is a large trade with the oil regions. Pop. 8,000.

MEAGHER, mah'-er, a county of Montana Territory, United States. Area, 7,650 square miles. Pop. 1,500. The capital is Diamond City.

MEAGHER, THOMAS FRANCIS, Irish politician. He studied law at Dublin, and became a leader of the Young Ireland party, assisting, in 1846, to organize the Irish Confederation. In 1848 he was sent to Paris to congratulate the revolutionary leaders. Soon after his return he was tried for high treason and sentenced to death, but transportation for life was substituted, and he was sent to Tasmania, from which he escaped in 1852, and reached New York, where he was admitted to the bar, and edited the "Irish News." In the War of Secession he commanded the Irish brigade on the Federal side. In 1866 he was appointed secretary, and acted as governor of Montana Territory. He was accidentally drowned in the Missouri.

Born at Waterford, 1823; died 1867.

MEANEE, me-an-e', a town of Scinde, British India, on a branch of the Indus, 6 miles N. of Hyderabad. The place is famous for the great victory obtained by Sir Charles Napier over the army of the Ameer of Scinde, Feb. 17, 1843.

MEANGIS ISLANDS, me-an'-gis, a group in the Asiatic archipelago, 90 miles from Mindanao. Its principal island is Nanusa. Lat. 5° N. Lon. 127° E.

MEARNS, meerns, the popular name of the county of Kincardine, Scotland.

MEATH, meeth, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, bounded N. by the counties of Cavan, Monaghan, and Louth; E. by the Irish Channel and the county of Dublin; S. by the county of Kildare; and W. by Westmeath. It consists, in general, of rich undulating pasture-land, having few bogs or hills, and these but of inconsiderable height. It is noted for grazing and tillage. There are a number of dairy-farms, especially in the south-eastern part. Some marshes on the Moynalty river feed an immense number of horses in the summer season; and the Kilcrew hills, in the W. angle, adjoining Cavan, are remarkable for fattening sheep. The antiquities are numerous and of great interest, especially John's Castle, at Trim, and the round tower and sculptured crosses at Kells.

Rivers.—The principal are the Boyne, the Blackwater, the tributary streams of the Nanny, the Ryewater, and Moynalty

Area.—906 square miles.

Pop.—86,301, nearly all Roman Catholics.

Chief Towns.—TRIM, the county town, KELLS, and NAVAN.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

MEAUX, mo, a town of France, department Seine-et-Marne, 25 miles N.E. of Paris. It stands on the Marne, and is divided into two parts by that river. The principal public building is the cathedral, begun in the 11th century, the choir of which passes for a masterpiece of Gothic architecture. Here is the tomb of Bossuet, bishop of Meaux. Manf. Cotton, pottery, leather, and saltpetre. Pop. 12,500.—After a siege of several months, this place was taken by the English, in 1520. It is a station on the railway to Strasburg.

MEBARREZ, or MUBARRUZ, me-bar'-rez, a town of Arabia, district of El-Ahsa. It consists of the town proper, strongly fortified, and an extensive suburb. Pop. 10,000.

MECCA, mek'-ka, (OM-AL-KARA, "mother of cities"), a city of Arabia, capital of the province of Hedjaz, and of the district Belad-el-Haram, the holy place of the Mahometan world, being the birthplace of Mahomet. It is situate in a narrow valley, 65 miles E. of Jiddah, and is divided into an Upper and Lower city. Pilgrims flock to this place from every part of the Mahometan world. It is estimated that 300,000 hadjis or pilgrims annually arrive. The principal building is the Beit Ullah, or chief mosque, in the interior of which is the Kaaba, or the house of the Prophet. This is contained in a square, which is entirely surrounded by the temple. The most sacred relic in the Kaaba is the black stone said to have been brought by the angel Gabriel, to form the foundation of the edifice. The mosque will hold about 35,000 persons, and there are 19 gates. Pop. Probably 20,000. Lat. 21° 30' N. Lon. 40° 8' E. Mecca is governed by a sherif, or direct descendant of the prophet, who is elected by other sherifs, subject to the approval of the Sultan of Turkey.

MECHAIN, PIERRE FRANÇOIS ANDRÉ, mek'-a(n), French astronomer, whose great merits were first discovered by Lalande. In 1782 he gained the prize of the Academy for his memoir on the comet of 1661, which was expected to return in 1790. He became editor of the "Connaissance des Temps," which work he improved. In 1792 he was employed in the great work of measuring the arc of meridian between Dunkirk and Barcelona. He returned from it in 1798; but wishing to extend it as far as the Balearic Isles, he set out for them in 1803; but death prevented his accomplishment of the task.

Born in France, 1774; died 1804.

MECHITAR, or MEKHITAR DA PETRO, mek'-hi-tar, (the comforter), founder of the order of Mechitarists, and reviver of Armenian literature. In 1691 he entered an Armenian convent at Sebaste, and subsequently became secretary to Archbishop Michael. Meeting with a work by an Italian priest on the reconciliation of the Armenian church with that of Rome, he secretly became a proselyte to the latter church. In 1700 he sought to reconcile the two parties of the Armenian priesthood at Constantinople; but, meeting with little success, he openly preached submission to the pope. The Armenians were so enraged at this, that, to save his life, Mechitar was compelled to fly from the city. He went first to Smyrna, and afterwards to the Morea, then under the dominion of Venice. On the conquest of the Morea by the Turks, he went to Venice, where he was permitted to found a convent, wherein he set up a printing-press, which, in his hands and in those of his followers, has produced hundreds of volumes in the form of Armenian translations of the best works in European literature. The Armenian missionaries are an increasing body at the present day, and, in addition to the Venetian establishments, have branches at Paris and Constantinople. Mechitar published an Armenian Bible in 1733, and an Armenian Grammar and Dictionary.

Born at Sebaste, Cappadocia, 1676; died at Venice, 1749.

MECHLIN, or MALINES, mek'-lin, or ma'-leen, a town of Belgium, province of Antwerp, on both sides of the Dyle, 15 miles S.E. of Antwerp. The streets are broad, and bordered in many places by good buildings. The public square and the market-place are both spacious and regular, and the cathedral of St. Romauld, built between the 12th and 13th centuries, has a tower 345 feet high, and contains "The Last Supper," by Rubens. There are other fine churches, St. John's, Notre Dame, and the Beguinage. Among the other public buildings are the Beyard, or town-hall, built in the 15th century; the ancient market-hall, now used as a guard-house; the new palace of the archbishop, and a monument to Margaret of Austria, erected in 1849. There are also an academy of painting, and several large educational institutions. Manf. Fine lace and linen, besides damask and silk and woollen stuffs, shawls, linen, leather, jewellery, and tobacco. There are several large breweries. Pop. 46,499.—This is the central station for the railways which traverse Belgium in all directions.

MECHOACAN, mek'-o-a-kan'. (See MICHOACAN.)

MECKLENBURG, mek'-len-berg, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 34,175, about 11,000 being coloured. The capital is Charlotte.

MECKLENBURG, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 24,000, two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Boydton.

MECKLENBURG-SCHWERIN, mek'-len-boorg-shver-in', a grand duchy in the north of Germany, bounded N. by the Baltic, E. and S. by Prussia, and W. by Holstein. The surface of the country is generally level, and near the sea there are large tracts of sand and morass, but there are some ranges of low and well-wooded hills. The soil is fertile, and considerable quantities of corn are grown, and large numbers of cattle reared. There are many small lakes well stocked with fish. The climate is humid.

Rivers.—The Elbe and the Warrow.
Area.—4,834 square miles.
Pop.—577,655, chiefly Lutherans, but there are more than 3,000 Jews. The number of inhabitants formerly decreased, but has since recovered.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There is no other administrative division than that springing from the ownership of the soil, in which respect the country is divided into grand-ducal domains, embracing about one-fifth of the total area of Mecklenburg-Schwerin; knight's estates—"Rittergüter"—comprising two-fifths; convent estates—"Klostergüter"—embracing one-fifth; and town estates, comprising the remaining fifth of the land. The chief towns are SCHWERIN, the capital; Güstrow, Ludwigslust, Rostock, and Weimar.

History and Constitution.—The grand-ducal house of Mecklenburg is the only reigning family in Europe of Slavonic origin, and claims to be the oldest sovereign house in the Western world. In their full title, the grand-dukes style themselves princes of the Vandals; and they trace their descent to Genseric, king of the Vandals, who conquered Spain in the 5th century. Friedrich Franz I. was the first who held the title of grand-duke, which he obtained after the peace of 1815. The political institutions of the grand-duchy are of an entirely feudal character. The whole legislative power and part of the executive is in the hands of the proprietors of Rittergüter, or knight's estates, numbering 622. Seldom more than one-fourth of these, however, exert their privileges and take their seat in the diet. To these representatives of their own property are joined forty members, nearly all burgomasters, delegated by the municipalities and corporate bodies of a like number of towns.

MECKLENBURG-STRELITZ, strel'-itz, a grand duchy of Germany, consisting of two separated portions, the larger, Stargard, lying to the east of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the smaller, Ratzeburg, between Mecklenburg-Strelitz and Lauenberg. The country is generally flat, and the climate is more settled than in the other grand duchy.

Area.—997 square miles, of which 527 belong to the grand-duke, 353 to the nobles, and 117 to the town corporations.

Pop.—About 100,000, but decreasing.

History and Constitution.—The reigning house of Mecklenburg-Strelitz was founded, in 1701, by Duke Adolf Friedrich, youngest son of Duke Adolf Friedrich II. of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The congress of Vienna permitted Duke Karl Friedrich of Mecklenburg-Strelitz to adopt the title of grand-duke. The province of Stargard has a diet composed of landowners, but Ratzeburg has no representative institutions whatever. The Stargard diet periodically joins the legislative assembly of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. Only the possession of a Rittergut, or knight's estate, gives right to a seat in the diet, to which the "privileged" towns may add, if called upon, seven deputies. The executive is entirely in the hands of the grand-duke, and is exercised by him through one minister of state, which appointment, however, has at times been vacant for several years. Accounts of public income and expenditure are never made known, and the whole state revenue forms the civil list of the grand-duke.

MECOSTA, me-kos'-ta, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 13,973. The capital is Big Rapids.

MEDE, JOSEPH, meed, a learned English divine, who, in 1602, entered at Christ's College, Cambridge. He refused several preferments, particularly the provostship of Trinity College, Dublin, which was repeatedly offered him by Archbishop Usher. His principal work is the "Commentary on the Apocalypse," in explaining which his plan has been followed by Bishops Newton and Hurd, and many other commentators.

Born at Berden, Essex, 1586; died 1638.

MEDE, mai-dai, a town of Italy, province of Novara, 26 miles S. of the town of that name. Manf. Silk, leather, and hats. There is a trade in rice, corn, fruit, wine, and silk. Pop. 4,500.

MEDEA, me-dé'-a, a Greek legend, daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis, and the niece of Circe.

When Jason came to Colchis in quest of the golden fleece, Medea became enamoured of him, and it was to her arts that the Argonauts owed their preservation. No sooner had Jason overcome all the difficulties which Æetes had placed in his way, than Medea embarked with the conquerers for Greece. To stop the pursuit of her father, she tore to pieces her brother Absyrtus, and left his mangled limbs in the path through which Æetes was to pass. Her conduct, however, to the daughters of Pelias, on whom Jason wished to be avenged for the murder of his parents and his brother, and her refusal to bring Pelias to life after they had, at her suggestion, boiled his flesh in a cauldron, hoping to renew his youth, greatly irritated the people of Iolchos, and Medea, with her husband, fled to Corinth, to avoid the resentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for ten years; but the love of Jason for Glauce, the king's daughter, soon interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jason by causing the death of Glauce and the destruction of her family. This act was followed by another more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's presence. From Corinth Medea went to Athens, where she married king Ægeus. From her connection with Ægeus, Medea had a son, who was called Medus. She fled at length from Athens, after having attempted to poison Theseus at a feast, and went to Colchis, where, according to some, she was reconciled to Jason, who had sought her in her native country, after her sudden departure from Corinth. The story of Medea's life has furnished a subject for both ancient and modern tragic writers; Euripides, Seneca, and Corneille being the principal.

MEDEAH, or MEDEYA, me-dé'-a, a fortified town of Algeria, 45 miles S.W. of Algiers. There is a large palace, with a fine interior. The town is supplied with water by a lofty aqueduct. Pop. 10,000, of whom about one-fifth are French.

MEDEBACH, med'-e-bak, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, 48 miles S.E. of Arnsberg. Manf. Woollen goods and potash. Pop. 2,400.

MEDELLIN, mai-dail-leen', a city of the United States of Colombia, South America, 50 miles S.E. of Antioquia, between the central and western Cordilleras, beautifully situated 5,000 feet above the sea level. It is an entrepôt of a vast district of country. Pop. 40,000.

MEDFORD, med'-ford, a town of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, on Mystic river, 5 miles N.W. of Boston. Manf. Tin ware, leather, woollens, cottons, buttons, cabinet work, harness, and boots and shoes. Pop. 7,573.

MEDHURST, WALTER HENRY, missionary, who was sent by the Church Missionary Society to India, Malacca, and Java. He also laboured in Borneo and on the coast of China, and in 1843 settled at Shanghai. He afterwards travelled for six years in the interior of China. He produced a Chinese version of the Bible, and Chinese and English Dictionary, a work on the state and prospects of China, and many other valuable contributions to missionary literature.

Born in London, 1796; died in London, 1857.

MEDIA, mé'-de-a, an ancient kingdom of the north-western part of Persia, comprising the present provinces of Azerbijan, Ghilan, Mazanderan, and Irak-Ajemi, and the northern part of Luristan. The old capital was ECBATANA.

MEDIASCH, MEDGYES, or MEDWISCH, med-yash', a town of the Austrian empire, in Transylvania, on the left bank of the great Kokel, 25 miles N.E. of Hermannstadt. It is walled, has four churches, a Franciscan monastery, and a very large market-place. Four annual fairs are held. Pop. 6,000.

MEDICI, COSMO, med'-e-che, called the father of his country, member of an illustrious family at Florence, was a merchant, who inherited and acquired great wealth, which he appropriated to the noble purposes of advancing learning and supporting learned men. He collected a noble library, which he enriched with inestimable manuscripts. The envy excited against him by his riches raised him many enemies, by whose intrigues he was obliged to quit his native country. He then retired to Venice, where he was received as a prince. His fellow citizens afterwards recalled him, and he bore a principal share in the government of the republic of Florence, during thirty-four years.

Born 1389; died 1464.

MEDICI, LORENZO DE, surnamed the Magnificent, was the son of Peter, grandson of Cosmo, and brother of Giuliano Medici. These two brothers, who enjoyed an almost absolute power in Florence, were viewed with a jealous eye by Ferdinand IV., king of Naples, and Pope Sixtus IV., at whose instigation the potent family of Pazzi formed a conspiracy against the Medici in 1478, and Giuliano was assassinated as he was attending mass. Lorenzo was also wounded, but escaped with his life, and was conducted to his palace by the people, with loud acclamations of joy. Having inherited the great qualities of his grandfather Cosmo, he was accounted the Mæcenas of his age. It was a singular but noble spectacle to observe the citizen engaged in commerce on the one hand, and managing public affairs on the other; now entertaining merchants, and next receiving ambassadors; giving public shows to the people, and erecting asylums for the sick and unfortunate; ornamenting his country with magnificent buildings, and sending learned men to the East in search of valuable Greek manuscripts: such a man was Lorenzo, whom the Florentines, grateful for all these benefits, declared chief of their republic. He drew to his court a number of learned men, and sent John Lascaris into Greece to purchase literary treasures to enrich his library; but Savonarola, an eloquent and ascetic friar, was for a time a formidable opponent. (See SAVONAROLA.) Lorenzo himself cultivated letters, particularly poetry, and his compositions have been several times printed. He was so universally esteemed that the princes of Europe were glad to choose him as arbitrator in their differences. This illustrious man had three sons, Pietro, who succeeded him; Giulio, and Giovanni, who became pope, by the name of Leo X. (See LEO.)

Born 1448; died 1492.

MEDICI, CATHARINE DE. (See CATHARINE DE MEDICI.)

MEDICI, MARIE DE. (See MARIE DE MEDICI.)

MEDICI, COSMO DE, named "the Great," the descendant of a collateral branch of the famous family, became Duke of Florence on the assassination of Alessandro, in 1537. He shared the intellectual and artistic tastes of his eminent predecessors, founded academies of the fine arts, published magnificent editions of standard works, and encouraged commerce. He energetically, but remorselessly, extirpated the rival house of Strozzi, and Pius V. conferred on him the title of Grand Duke of Tuscany. He left enormous wealth.

Born 1519; died 1574.

MEDICINA, med-e-chē'-na, a town of Italy, province of Bologna, 13 miles E. of Bologna. It is surrounded by walls, and has five churches. Large markets are held, and a considerable trade carried on. There are some traces of the ancient Claterna, which stood on the site. Pop. 11,983.

MEDINA DEL CAMPO, mai-dē'-na dail kam'-po, a town of Spain, province of Leon, 26 miles S.W. of Valladolid. There is a great square surrounded with piazzas and with a fountain in the centre. It was formerly a royal residence, and a place of great population and importance. Manf. Chocolate, leather, and hats. Pop. 2.800.

MEDINA DEL RIO SECO, rē'-o saï'-ko, an old town of Spain, province of Leon, 25 miles N.W. of Valladolid. It contains a large town-house, three fine churches, convents and hospitals, the ruins of a castle, and there are 11 squares. Manf. Woollens, leather, chocolate, and pottery-wares. Pop. 4,500.

MEDINA SIDONIA, se-dō'-ne-a, an ancient town of Spain, province of Cadiz, 25 miles S.E. of Cadiz. There are a fine Gothic church, and ruins of a large castle. The town is of Moorish origin. Manf. Earthenware. Pop. 12,394.

MEDINA, or MEDINAT-AL-NABI, me-dē'-na (city of the prophet), or Tabah (the good), a city of Arabia, one of the two rendered sacred by connection with the founder of the Mahometan faith, is the second capital of Hedjaz, 270 miles N of Mecca. It consists of a town, a fort and suburbs, and is walled, with massive gates and 30 towers. The tomb of Mahomet is here, and is placed between two others, containing the ashes of the first caliphs, Abu Beker and Omar. The mosque Al Haran, which incloses the tomb, is 420 feet long, and 340 broad, with a spacious central area. The body of Mahomet is supposed to be undecayed, beneath a slab of black marble; but when the mosque, having been struck by lightning, was re-built, 260 years after the prophet's death, there was no body in the grave. There are some agreeable private houses, with gardens and fountains, and the city generally has a busy appearance. There are 30 publicly endowed schools. Pop. 16,000.

MEDINA, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 425 square miles. Pop. 22,000. The capital is Medina.

MEDINET-EL-FAYOUM. (See FAYOUM.)

MEDITERRANEAN, med'-i-ter-raï'-ne-an, an inland sea, forming the S. boundary of nearly the whole of Europe, and the largest expanse of water in the world that does not come under the name of ocean. It is bounded E. by Asia, S. by Africa, and terminates W. at the Straits of Gibraltar. Its length from E. to W. is about 2,320 miles, with a varying breadth, the outline being very broken by the large peninsulas of southern Europe. This includes several other seas, as the Adriatic, Ionian, the sea of the Grecian archipelago, the Sea of Marmora, the Black Sea, and, the Sea of Asof, are considered separate seas. The Mediterranean was called by the Hebrews the "Great Sea," and has erroneously been considered tideless. The principal rivers flowing directly into the Mediterranean are the Ebro, the Rhone, and the Po, from Europe, and the Nile from Africa. There are two strong currents in opposite directions, one from the west through the Straits of Gibraltar, the other from the Black Sea in the east. In the western part the depth has been ascertained to exceed 5,000 feet, and it is 6,000 feet on each side of a ridge (over which there is not more than 40 feet of water), between the Island of Sicily and the north-eastern cape of Tunis. The most important islands are Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Crete, Cyprus, Malta, and the Balearic islands, belonging to Spain.

MEDJIBOJ, med'-ye-boi, a town of European Russia, government of Podolsk, on the right bank of the Bug, surrounded by extensive marshes, 70 miles N.E. of Karamenetsz. Pop. 4,300.

MEDJIDIEH, med-yid'-e, a town of European Turkey, 23 miles N.W. of Kustendji. Before 1860, it was only a small village, and owes its rapid growth to the immigration of Tartars after the Crimean war. It is now the Tartar metropolis of the Dobrudscha. Pop. 25,000.

MEDNOI, med-noi', an island belonging to Russia, in Behring Strait. Ext. 30 miles long, with a breadth of 5. Pop. Unascertained.

MEDUSA, me-dū'-sa, in Greek mythology one of the three Gorgons, and the only one of them subject to mortality. She was celebrated for her personal charms and for her beautiful hair. Neptune became enamoured of her in the temple of Minerva, which so provoked the goddess, that she changed the beautiful locks of Medusa into serpents. Perseus rendered himself immortal by the conquest of Medusa, whose head he cut off, the blood that dropped from the wound producing innumerable serpents in Africa. He placed the head upon the ægis of Minerva, which he had used in the expedition, and it retained its former power of changing the beholder into stone.

MEDVIEDITZA, med'-ve-ai-dit'-sa, a river of Russia, in the government of Saratov, and flowing south-west, enters the country of the Don Cossacks. After a course of 300 miles it joins the Don at Ostrovosk.

MEDWAY, med'-wai, a river of England, which, rising in Sussex, near the Surrey border, flows through Kent, and falls into the Thames, after a north-east course of 50 miles, in a large estuary at Sheerness. It is navigable to Penshurst.

MEDYNSK, or MEDYN, me-dinsk', a town of Russia, government of Kaluga, on the Medynka, 37 miles N.W. of Kaluga. Pop. 7,600.

MEEANEE. (See MEANEE.)

MEEKER, meek'-er, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 55 square miles. Pop. 11,739. The capital is Litchfield.

MEENGANA, or MOGHYANI, meen-gan'-a, a town of British India, in the Punjaub, 105 miles S. of Lahore. Manf. White cotton cloth, which is extensively made.

MEERANE, mee-rā'-ne, a manufacturing town of Saxony, 10 miles N. of Zwickau. It is rapidly growing into importance. Manf. Woollen and mixed fabrics, of the value of more than £2,000,000 annually. There is a very large export trade. Pop. 22,000.

MEERPOOR, meer'-por, a town of British India, in Scinde, near the Pinyaree, 45 miles from Hyderabad. Pop. 10,000.

MEERUT, or MIRUT, meer'-oot, a division or commissionership of British India, in the north-west provinces. This country forms a part of the Doab, and was the scene of one of the first mutinies during the Sepoy rebellion of 1857. Area, 10,947 square miles. Pop. 5,141,204.

MEERUT, capital of the province, on the Kalli Nuddi, 42 miles N.E. of Delhi. There are a fine English church and large military cantonments. Pop. 99,565; of the district, 1,313,137.

MEGALO; mai-gá'-lo, an island, one of the Petali group, belonging to Greece, on the south-western extremity of Nepofont. It is 12 miles long, and 2 miles wide, rising to 1,300 feet in the centre.

MEGARA, meg'-a-ra, a town of Greece, in the nomarch of Attica and Bœotia, on the south-eastern side of the Isthmus of Corinth, 21 miles N.W. of Athens. There are the remains of an ancient castle. Pop. 3,000.

MEGARA, in Greek legend a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, and wife of Hercules. During the descent of the latter hero into the infernal regions, Lycus, a Theban exile, attempted to carry off Megara; but Hercules, returning at that moment, killed Lycus. Juno, displeased at the death of Lycus, rendered Hercules so delirious, that he slew Megara and his three children by her in a fit of madness.

MEHADIA, me-há'-de-a, a favourite watering-place of Hungary, near the Roumanian frontier, 12 miles N. of Orsova. The springs are sulphurous, and are much resorted to by gouty patients. Pop. 2,000, permanent.

MEHEMET, or MOHAMMED ALI, me-hé'-met, pacha of Egypt. This remarkable man commenced life as the keeper of a small shop in an obscure town of Roumelia, but, abandoning the pursuits of a trader for the profession of arms, he took an active part in suppressing a rebellion of the pirates of Candia. In 1799 he headed a corps of Albanians, and went to Egypt, where he fought on the side of the British, and assisted in the expulsion of the French from that country. He soon acquired great influence in Egypt, and formed an alliance with the Mamelukes, against Khozrew Pacha, the viceroy of the sultan. The Mamelukes having regained all their former influence, chose Mehemet as their viceroy. The sultan created him Pacha of Cairo in 1806, and added to this dignity the pachalic of Alexandria, in the following year, ostensibly for his services rendered to the Ottoman empire, but gained over, in reality, by Mehemet Ali's gold. His next step was to turn against the redoubtable soldiery that had helped him to gain so much power, and, after a vain effort to reduce the turbulent Mamelukes to subjection, he ordered them to be exterminated. In 1811, 470 of the Mamelukes were invited within the citadel of Cairo, where they were ruthlessly put to the sword, 1,200 more being massacred throughout the country. By this step Mehemet Ali became the undisputed master of Upper Egypt. The Wahabees, a fanatical sect, were his next victims, and these he destroyed after a war which lasted six years. He subsequently dispatched an army into Nubia, under the command of one of his sons, Ismail Pacha, who succeeded in conquering the provinces of Dongola, Sennaar, Kordofan, &c., thus opening up a large slave trade. Upon the Greeks raising the standard of independence, he assisted the sultan to subdue them, by dispatching to the shores of the Morea a fleet of 163 vessels, under the command of his son, Ibrahim Pacha. This fleet wrought havoc upon the country during three years, but was destroyed at Navarino by the combined squadrons of England, France, and Russia, in 1827. As a reward for his co-operation against the Greeks, the sultan ceded to Mehemet Ali the island of Candia, in 1830; but this was not sufficient to gratify his ambitious desires, for he further demanded of the sultan the cession of Syria. This being refused, he invaded the country with a powerful army, and rapidly conquered the province. After a great victory at Konieh, in 1832, he was in triumphant march upon Constantinople, but was brought to a halt by European intervention; he succeeded, nevertheless, in gaining, by the treaty of Kutayeh, the possession of Syria and the province of Adanah. In 1839 the sultan, Mahmoud II., resolved to regain Syria; but suffering defeat at the hands of Mehemet Ali, he sought the assistance of England and other European powers. By this means, Mehemet, after having been defeated near Beyrout, and finding Alexandria blockaded, consented to forego his claims upon Syria, on condition that his family should be constituted hereditary pachas of Egypt. Thenceforth he ruled in peace, but in 1848 resigned the government to his son, Ibrahim Pacha, who dying soon afterwards, the pachalic was vested in Abbas Pacha, Mehemet's grandson. During the last two years of his life he was deprived of reason. Mehemet Ali was unquestionably an extraordinary man and wise ruler: he introduced European organisation and tactics into his army, encouraged agriculture, commerce, and industry, especially the cultivation of cotton, sugar, indigo, and silk, and founded military and medical schools in his kingdom. His rise was due to his native intelligence and indomitable courage and energy; for it is a remarkable fact that this former Albanian peasant was throughout his earlier career totally destitute of education. He only learnt to read at the age of 45.

Born at Kavala, Roumelia, 1769; died at Cairo, 1849.

MEHUL, STEPHEN HENRI, me(r)l, a French composer, who, in 1779, went to Paris, and there became the friend of Gluck. In 1790, he produced, at the Opéra Comique, "Euphrosyne" and "Coradin," both of which were prodigiously successful. He subsequently composed, among other operas, "Stratonice," "Joseph and Phrosine," and "Melidor." A large number of hymns, sonatas, and the celebrated republican airs, "Chant de la Victoire," "Du Départ," and "Du Retour," issued from his genius.

Born 1763; died at Paris, 1817.

MEHUN-SUR-YÈVRE, mai-hu(n)', a town of France, department Cher, on the Yèvre, 10 miles N.W. of Bourges. There are a church in the Romanesque style, and the ruins of the castle in which Charles VII. starved himself to death. Manf. Druggets and coarse sheetings. Pop. 6,000.

MEIAPONTE, maï-e-a-pon'-tai, a town of Brazil, in the province of Goyaz, on the Almas, 65 miles E. of Goyaz. Pop. 6,000.

MEIGS, maigs, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 425 square miles. Pop. 33,000. The capital is Pomeroy.

MEININGEN, mi'-ning-en, capital of the duchy of Saxe-Meinengen, Germany, on the right bank of the Werra, 33 miles from Fulda. It has a ducal palace, with art collections, and a beautiful garden. Pop. 11,227.

MEISENHEIM, mi'-sen-hime, a town of Hesse-Homburg, Germany, on the Glan, 30 miles S.W. of Mainz. It is walled and has a castle. Pop. 2,600.

MEISSEN, mi'-sen, an old town of Saxony, on the left bank of the Elbe, 15 miles below Dresden. The cathedral, which has a beautiful open work spire, is the finest Gothic church in Saxony, and contains some extremely interesting monuments and brasses. It has been twice destroyed by fire and rebuilt. Manf. Porcelain, known as Dresden china, hosiery, leather and colours. Pop. 14,500.

Born at Lyons, 1815.

MEKLONG, or MEKOM, me-kom', a river of Asia, rising in the Chinese province of Yunnan, in lat. 27° 20′ N, and flowing under various names in a south-eastern direction, to the Chinese Sea, about lat. 9° 34′ N.

MEKLONG, a town of Siam, on the river of the same name, 40 miles S.W. of Bangkok. Pop. 10,000.

MEKRAN, or MUKRAN, mek-ran', a large maritime province of Beloochistan.

MEL, mal, a town of Italy, province of Venetia, at the confluence of the Arno and Piave, 44 miles N.W. of Venice. Pop. 6,000.

MELA, POMPONIOS, me'-la, a Latin geographical writer, was a native of Spain. His valuable works, entitled "De Situ Orbis," is divided into three parts, and contains a description of the world as it was known in his time.

Flourished early in the 1st century.

MELANCTHON, PHILIP, me-lank'-thon, the famous reformer, and friend of Luther. His family name was Schwarzerde, or Black-earth, which Reuchlin, his friend, altered to the corresponding Greek word Melancthon. He made a rapid progress in his studies and obtained the Greek professorship at Wittenberg. His greatest labour was in drawing up the Augsburg Confession of Faith. He was a profound scholar, and a man of gentle disposition, who felt deeply the controversies in which he, as a leading reformer, was involved. The tricentenary of his death was solemnly celebrated in Germany in 1860.

Born at Bretten, in the Palatinate of the Rhine, 1497; died at Wittenberg, 1560.

MELAZZO. (See MILAZZO.)

MELBOURNE, mel'-burn, the metropolis of the colony of Victoria. It was so named because founded during the English premiership of Lord Melbourne, in 1835-7. Mr. J. B. Fawkner took a prominent part in its earliest history, and its streets were planned in 1837 by Sir R. Bourke, hence Bourke Street and the county of the same name. Previously called Beargrass, and including only thirteen buildings—three being weather-boarded or slated and eight mere turf huts—the city sprang into vigorous development at the date referred to, and has continued to progress since with a rapidity second to no rival. Melbourne is situated in Bourke county, on seven hills on the north bank of the river Yarra-Yarra, about two miles by land from its mouth in the bay of Port Phillip. The principal streets are a mile in length, 99 feet in width, and run at right angles to each other; they are intersected by smaller streets which bear the name of the larger streets with the prefix of "Little." These leading thoroughfares are named respectively—Flinders, Collins, Bourke, Lonsdale and Latrobe, running nearly E. and W.; and cross streets called Spencer, King, William, Queen, Elizabeth, Swanston, Russell, Stephen and Spring, running nearly N. and S. Elizabeth Street runs at the base of the two principal hills on which the city is situated, and divides it into E. and W. Local management is entrusted to a municipal corporation upon the English model, with seven wards, each having an alderman and three councillors. Prominent amongst the principal buildings is Government House, the palatial official residence of the Governor as Viceroy of the British crown. It is rendered conspicuous by a square tower, 145 feet high, from the top of which magnificent views are commanded. The Houses of Parliament are of corresponding magnificence, and are distinguished by a notable dome. The Treasury buildings, the official seat of the executive government of the colony, are also amongst the leading edifices, each department having its own ample offices, including the important detailed business relating to lands and mines, peculiar to the constitution of the colony and in striking contrast to old-country arrangements relating to such subjects. The other numerous handsome buildings include the Law Courts, the Post Office, the Custom House, the Mint, the Free Library (containing considerably over 100,000 volumes); the University, with a remarkable museum and its grand Wilson Hall; the Ormond Presbyterian College, and the Town Hall, including a room that will seat 4,000 persons, and one of the largest and finest organs in the world, there being free public rehearsals once a week. The buildings devoted to religious observances include the Church of England Cathedral, St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Cathedral, the Scotch Church, Wesleyan, Independent and Baptist churches. In connection with business there are the Exchange, insurance offices, banking houses that rival each other in handsome solidity, and commercial establishments fully worthy to stand amongst them. At Port Melbourne (formerly called Sandridge), 2½ miles from the city, there are very extensive facilities for the constantly increasing shipping business, which, in proportion to the population of the colony, surpasses anything of the kind in the world. Two wide and extremely long piers, extending far into deep water, enable vessels of almost any tonnage to berth alongside. There is accommodation, including good anchorage, for 800 vessels, and communication with the city by rail and water is complete, dangerous rocks having been removed by blasting, and the harbour perfected by artificial means. Communication to and from the city in all directions is amply provided by railways, there being three principal terminal stations, while within the limits of the city and suburbs are tramways upon which the cable system of propulsion is in use. These tramways, as well as all the railways of the colony, are public property and under public control and management. There are also numerous cars, omnibuses of the latest designs, waggonettes and other means of conveyance, the accommodation being good and cheap. The great heat and dryness of the climate has induced the extensive planting of trees in the streets, their shade being very acceptable and almost essential. The paving is generally of the highest class and the water supply is good. Drainage is a difficult subject, but is undergoing progressive improvements which bid fair to render it complete. Gas amalgamation has prevailed there as in London, three old companies being absorbed by the one which has become universal. Telegraphic communication is amply provided for and the telephone is very extensively adopted. Physical misfortune is alleviated by a public hospital and several voluntary institutions of a similar character. An excellent cemetery is rendered picturesque by its numerous handsome memorials. Crime necessitates a large gaol, which is distinguished by its exceptionally gloomy appearance. Voluntary associations for social and educational purposes are not wanting.

Amongst them is the Athenæum or Mechanics' Institute, the Athenæum Club and the Melbourne Club. Primary education is publicly provided, it being compulsory, unsectarian and free. The buildings which were devoted to the great Exhibition of 1880 are retained for industrial and technical education and other means of public advancement. The Observatory, which has been placed with exceptional care on the south side of the river, contains a telescope which for size and excellence is amongst those of the very highest rank. At the rear of the Public Library is a gallery for pictures and statuary, with many points of excellence and special attractiveness. Trading establishments are exceptionally good, and hotels are numerous and well-appointed, the temperance principle being well represented, and coffee taverns and palaces vie in attractiveness with the more comprehensive places of refreshment. Theatres are good and generally successful. Music halls are amongst the largest and best anywhere known. Public parks and gardens abound and are much resorted to, the Carlton Gardens demanding special mention. Racecourses are among the most popular attractions, being frequently thronged with enthusiastic multitudes. Cricket is played and witnessed with an avidity elsewhere unknown, accommodation being provided for as many as 12,000 spectators at one time. These and other out-door amusements by no means deter from mental recreations and thirst for knowledge, as evidenced by the fact that in Melbourne alone there are four daily papers, exhibiting all the evidences of abundant success, while weekly and monthly papers are very numerous, several being well illustrated and some so large and costly as to surpass in these respects anything of the kind published for popular reading in England. This mental activity is in a great measure attributable to the system of education which prevails throughout the colony, the capital city of Melbourne being a remarkable example of the results. This system, naturally carried to greater perfection where the concentration of large numbers affords the most scope, was brought into operation on the 1st of January, 1873. It is distinguished by being strictly secular, compulsory with reference to all children between the ages of six and fifteen, and absolutely free, there being no fees whatever chargeable in the elementary stages. The consequence of this is that, including immigrants who have landed in ignorance, only 3½ per cent of the population are entirely illiterate. The stimulus thus given to intellectual cultivation is such that teachers in the higher branches of education find ample encouragement, acting as individuals or in association with proprietary colleges and other organisations. The newspapers, in addition to news strictly so called, abound with evidences of popular interest in science and arts. Upon the whole, the city of Melbourne for rapid growth, undeniable evidences of prosperity, enterprise and mental activity, is absolutely unique.

Pop. 65,878; including suburbs, 330,000.

MELBOURNE, a town of Quebec province, dominion of Canada, on the St. Francis, 75 miles N.E. of Montreal. The river affords a large amount of water-power for numerous mills. Pop., with the suburbs, Richmond and the Gore, 2,000.

MELBOURNE, WILLIAM LAMB, Viscount, an English statesman, was the second son of the first Viscount Melbourne. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Glasgow, and entered the House of Commons in 1805, for Leominster, under the auspices of the Whigs. Canning appointed him secretary of state for Ireland, a post he filled with very distinguished success, and he afterwards held office under Lord Goderich and the Duke of Wellington. In 1828 he was called to the upper house, after the death of his father, and while a member of Earl Grey's cabinet, as home secretary, greatly contributed to the passing of the Reform Bill. In 1834, on the retirement of Earl Grey, he became first lord of the treasury, and head of the Whig party, a position he retained, with only one short interruption, until the year 1841. Lord Melbourne was the political instructor and valued adviser of the young Queen Victoria, and his engaging and conciliatory manners served to secure the allegiance not alone of the Whig, but also of several distinguished members of the Tory party. In 1805, he married Lady Caroline Lamb, a daughter of the Earl of Bessborough, known for her personal eccentricity and literary talent, and as a correspondent of Byron.

MELCHISEDECH, mel-kis'-e-dek, king of Salem, and priest of the most high God, who met Abraham after his victory over Chederlaomer, king of Sodom, and presented to him bread and wine, with his benediction. St. Paul having said, in his epistle to the Hebrews, that Melchisedech was without father and without mother, led some ancient heretics to assert that he was a celestial being, superior to angels, and even to Jesus Christ. They were called Melchisedecians.

MELCHTHAL, ARNOLD DE, melk'-tal, one of the founders of the Swiss liberties. In 1307, with Tell, Furst, and others, he roused his compatriots to arms, and drove out the Austrians. (See TELL, William.)

MELCHTHAL, a valley of Switzerland, canton of Unterwalden, enclosed by mountains, 6,000 to 8,000 feet high, and watered by the Melch. Excellent cheese is made, and there is a marble quarry. Noted as the birthplace of Nicholas von der Flue and Arnold, two of the founders of the Swiss confederation, in the early part of the 14th century.

MELCOMBE REGIS. (See WEYMOUTH.)

MELDOLA, mel-do'-la, a town of Italy, province of Forli, on the right bank of the Ronco, 7 miles S. of Forli. An important annual fair is held, lasting nearly the whole of the month of August. Pop. 3,700.

MELEAGER, me-le'-a-ger, a Greek poet. His epigrams are in the collection of Greek poetry called the "Anthologia."

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

MELEDA, or MELITA, mai-lai'-da, an island in the Adriatic Sea, belonging to Dalmatia, 19 miles N.W. of Ragusa. It is 23 miles long and 4 broad. There are several commodious harbours. The surface is mountainous, producing corn, fruit, wine, and oil. There are some remarkable grottoes of stalactite. Pop. 1,000.

MELEGNANO, or MARIGNANO, me-leg-na'-no, a town of northern Italy, 10 miles S.E. of Milan. Pop. 4,000.—A great victory was gained here, in 1515, by Francis I. of France, over the Swiss and Milanese, 20,000 men being killed. In 1859, the French, under Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers, defeated the Austrians here, with great loss.

MELENDEZ VALDEZ, DON JUAN, mai-lain'-daith val'-dez, Spanish poet, who studied at Madrid, and afterwards at Salamanca, where he occupied the chair of belles-lettres. In 1789 he became judge of the tribunal at Saragossa. When the French invaded Spain, he attached himself to Joseph Bonaparte, who created him minister of public instruction. Upon the expulsion of the French, he was proscribed as a traitor and fled to Montpellier. His poems, which are very fine, consist of elegies, odes, &c.

Born at Ribera del Fresno, 1754; died at Montpellier, 1817.

MELFI, mail'-fe, a town of Italy, province Basilicata, on a lofty volcanic height, 75 miles N.E. of Naples. It contains a fine cathedral. In 1651 it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake, by which a great many persons perished. Pop. 12,000.

MELGACO, mal-ga'-so, a town of Brazil, province of Para, on the west shore, 160 miles S.W. of Para. There is a large trade in timber. Pop. 4,000.

MELHO, PHILIP DE, mello, an eminent divine, Biblical translator, and oriental poet, was the first native of Ceylon who was admitted into the Christian ministry. His learning and labours earned him the titles of "Rabbi de Melho" and "The Great Labourer." After education in the only seminary in his native town, and an examination in Italian, Greek, and theology, he was licensed to preach before he attained the age of 21. He was ordained in the island, by an exception to the Dutch rule, which rendered an university education a sine quâ non for the ministry. He officiated in Dutch, Portuguese, and Tamul, and was eloquent in the pulpit. His principal works are Tamul versions of the New Testament from the Greek, the Dutch Liturgy, and some of the Psalms of David, the decalogue, &c., in metre; a work against Popery, entitled, "The Triumph of Truth," a catechism in Portuguese, and a version of the Pentateuch from the Hebrew, published in 1790; also additions to the Tamul Classical Lexicon, and other philological works. At his death he left translations of the books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth in MS. He also wrote many poems of great merit.

Born at Colombo, 1723; died at Jaffna, North Ceylon, 1790.

MELI, GIOVANNI, mai'-le, Sicilian poet, was a physician by profession, and for some time held the professorship of chemistry at the university of Palermo. He was most successful in bucolic verse, and has been placed by his admirers after Theocritus. He likewise produced odes, canzoni, satires, epistles, fables, and some short poems. His Don Quixote, a sort of rhymed version of Cervantes' novel, is, although good in portions, little better than farce as a whole.

Born at Palermo, about 1740; died 1815.

MELICERTA, mel-i-ser'-ta, in Greek legend, son of Athamas and Ino, was saved from the fury of his father by his mother, who threw herself and him into the sea. Neptune out of compassion changed both into sea-deities. Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palamon, and the Isthmian games were instituted in his honour.

MELILLA, mai-leel'-ya, a seaport of Morocco, belonging to Spain, on the coast of the Mediterranean, 40 miles from Beni-Botoya, on a peninsula, united to the mainland by a rocky isthmus. In 1848 it was nearly destroyed by a combined earthquake and hurricane. It has a strong citadel. Pop. 3,000.

MELINDA, me-lin'-da, a seaport on the coast of Zanzibar, East Africa. There are several mosques and ruins of churches and other buildings erected by the Portuguese, who at one time had a settlement here. A large trade is carried on by caravans with the interior, and by sea with the Red Sea, Persia, and India. Lat. 0° 3′ S. Lon. 41° 2′ E.

MELIPILLA, me-lip'-el-la, a town of Chili, South America, 40 miles S.W. of Santiago, near the north bank of the Maypu. Manf. Coarse cloth, blankets, and pottery. There is a considerable transit trade. Pop. 8,000.

MELITA. (See MELEDA.)

MELKSHAM, melk'-sham, a market-town of Wiltshire, on the Avon, 11 miles E. of Bath. It has a cruciform church, several chapels, a handsome town-house, and a fine bridge over the river. Manf. Woollen goods. In the neighbourhood are baths and a pump-room, erected over a chalybeate and saline spring. Pop. 2,450.—A station on the Great Western railway.

MELLAN, CLAUDE, mel'-la, a French engraver, whose engravings are very remarkable productions, and mostly from his own designs.

Born at Abbeville, 1601; died at Paris, 1688.

MELLEN, GUSTAF HENRIK, mel'-lin, Swedish novelist and historian, author of several historical novels, a volume of poems, and a history of Scandinavia, previous to 1248. He held a high place among modern Swedish writers.

Born in Finland, 1803; died 1876.

MELNIK, mel'-nik, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the right bank of the Elbe, 18 miles N.E. of Prague. There are an old church, built in the 12th century, a castle, and a town-house. Good wine is made in the vicinity. Pop. 3,300.

MELORIA, mai-lor'-e-a, a small island in the Mediterranean, off the W. coast of Italy, 4 miles from Leghorn. In 1284 a naval engagement here took place between the Pisans and the Genoese, in which the former were defeated.

MELPOMENE, mel-pom'-e-ne, from the Greek melpo, "a recite[r] of heroic verse," in Greek mythology, one of the nine muses, who presided over tragedy.

MELROSE, mel-rose', a village of Roxburghshire, Scotland, on the south bank of the Tweed, 11 miles S.W. of Jedburgh. Near it are the remains of the Cistercian abbey, one of the most beautiful Gothic structures in Great Britain, from the height and embellishment of its columns, the elegance of its sculpture, and the symmetry of its parts. It was founded by David I. in 1136, and having been destroyed, the rebuilding was commenced in 1326, by King Robert Bruce, and finished in the reign of James IV. The chief part of the conventual church, and some portions of the cloisters remain. Within a few miles of Melrose Abbotsford, the former residence, and Dryburgh Abbey, the burial-place of Sir Walter Scott. Pop. 11[illegible]31.—A station on the North British railway.

MELSUNGEN, mel-sun'-gen, a town Fulda, Prussia, province Hesse-Nassau, on the [illegible] miles S.E. of Cassel. It is walled and has a c[illegible] Manf. Woollen cloth, worsted, and leather. 3,600.

MELTON MOWBRAY, mo'-brai, a market-town of Leicestershire, on the river Eye, over which are here two handsome stone bridges, 15 miles N.E. of Leicester. The church is a fine cruciform structure, and the tower in the centre high and elegant. It has, besides free schools, alms-houses, a library, and stabling for 800 horses belonging to the members of the famous subscription fox-hunt. Stilton cheese and pork pies are extensively made. Six fairs are held. Pop. 5,000.—A station on the Midland railway.

MELUN, mlu(r), an ancient town of France, capital of the department of Seine-et-Marne, on an island, and on both banks of the Seine, 27 miles S.E. of Paris. Manf. Cement, bricks, and hats, and there is a trade in timber, grain, and flour. Pop. 8,400.—The town occupies the site of the Melcndunum of the Romans. It suffered greatly in the war with the Northmen in the 9th century, and was besieged and taken by the English in 1419.

MELVILLE, SIR JAMES, a Scotch writer, who, when a youth, became page to Mary, queen of Scots, whom he attended in her last moments; he afterwards entered the service of the Duke of Montmorency. On his return to Scotland, in 1561, he was appointed privy councillor and gentleman of the bedchamber. He was the author of some very curious memoirs of affairs of state.

Born about 1535; died 1607.

MELVILLE, ANDREW, Scotch reformer, who, four years after the establishment of the Reformation in Scotland, left the university of St. Andrews, where he had acquired considerable proficiency in languages and philosophy, for that of Paris. After studying in France during five years, he went to Geneva, where he was appointed to the chair of humanity in the academy. In 1574 he returned to Scotland, and was almost immediately afterwards appointed principal of the university of Glasgow. As a writer, teacher, and reformer of the church of his native country, Melville soon displayed the most uncommon ardour. The overturning of the episcopacy and establishment of presbytery was his constant effort. In 1580 he was appointed principal of St. Mary's College, in the university of St. Andrews, and there taught the Hebrew, Syriac, Rabbinical, and Chaldee languages. His boldness giving offence to the Scottish court, he was cited before the privy council but refused to appear, in consequence of which he was sentenced to imprisonment, and to be punished in his person and goods. On this he made his escape to London, where he remained for nearly two years, and then returned to Scotland, where he was several times chosen moderator of the General Assembly and rector of the university of St. Andrews. After James I. had ascended the English throne, he invited him to London to attend the Hampton Court conference; but Melville, having written a short epigram in contempt of a rite of the English church, the privy council summoned him to appear before them, when he indulged in a vigorous attack on the Archbishop of Canterbury for encouraging popery. The council convicted him of gross scandal, and, after a year's confinement in the houses of the dean of St. Paul's and the bishop of Westminster, he was sent to the Tower, where he remained nearly four years. In 1611 he was released, and went to the university of Sedan, where he became professor, and whence he never returned; the king refusing him permission to return to Scotland.

Born near Montrose, 1545; died at Sedan, about 1622.

MELVILLE, HENRY DUNDAS, Viscount, British statesman, was educated at the university of Edinburgh, admitted to the Scotch bar in 1763, and rose to be deputy-advocate and solicitor-general. He was returned to parliament for Edinburgh in 1774, and appointed lord-advocate for Scotland in 1775; and two years afterwards keeper of the king's signet for Scotland. He strongly supported the administration of Lord North, but on his resignation continued to hold office. Although he had previously opposed Pitt, he joined him in the opposition to the coalition ministry under Fox and Lord North, and when Pitt took office in 1784, Dundas became president of the board of control, and in 1791 was appointed secretary of state for the home department. He also held other offices, and displayed remarkable administrative ability, and to him was chiefly due the formation of the volunteer defensive force. In 1802 he was raised to the peerage as Viscount Melville and Baron Dunira. In 1805 he was tried on a charge of misconduct while acting as treasurer of the navy, but was acquitted. The remainder of his life was chiefly passed in retirement in Scotland.

Born 1741; died at Edinburgh, 1811.

MELVILLE, HERMAN, mel'-vil, a modern American novelist. Incited by a passion for maritime adventure, he, in his 18th year, went on board ship as a common sailor. In 1841 he joined a whaling vessel, and went on a cruise. After 18 months of that monotonous mode of life, he took advantage of the vessel putting into Noukahiva, to desert, in company with another young sailor. He gained the interior of the island, but was detained a prisoner during four months by a savage tribe. A vessel from Sydney having put into the port, he succeeded in getting on board. He afterwards visited Tahiti and the Sandwich Islands, and, in 1843, returned to Boston, after four years of travel and adventure. In 1847 he married, and went to reside upon his farm in Berkshire, United States. "Typee," the first work of this author, had an immense popularity, and in it was recounted, in a delightful manner, his adventures in the Marquesas Islands. In his next works, "Omoo," "Mardi," and "Redburn," the unknown regions of the Pacific Ocean were described with all his former vigour; but his style became by degrees eccentric and unequal. The "White Jacket," "Pierre," and "Israel Potter," and other romances, were subsequently produced, and were greeted with almost as much popularity as his first works. At a later period he went on a whaling voyage round the world.

Born at New York, 1819.

MELVILLE ISLAND, an island in the Arctic Ocean, discovered in 1819 by Captain Parry. It is 200 miles long, and 130 miles in breadth, and separated on the west by Fitzwilliam and Kellett Straits from Prince Patrick Island. Cape Dundas is the most western point. Lat. 74° 30'—77° N. Lon. 105° 40'—117° 30' W.

MELVILLE ISLAND, an island off the north coast of Australia, 15 miles from the mainland. It is 70 miles long, with a breadth of 30. Lat. 11° 28' S. Lon. 131° E.

MELVILLE PENINSULA, is connected with the continent of British North America by Ray Isthmus, and bounded on the N. by Fury and Hecla Strait. It is 250 miles long and 100 in average breadth. Lat. 66°—70° N. Lon. 81°—87° W.

MELVILLE SOUND, to the south-east of the above island, is about 250 miles long and 200 miles wide, communicating with the Arctic Ocean by Banks' Strait and Baffin's Bay by Barrow Strait and Lancaster Sound.

MEMEL, mem'-el, a town of Prussia, province of Prussia, on the small river Dange, adjacent to the Kurisches Haff, which joins the Baltic here by a narrow strait. It is strongly fortified, and consists of the town and three suburbs, one of which lies beyond the Dange. There is a large harbour, and the town is the great entrepôt of the country watered by the Niemen, and exports timber, which is brought down in floats; also hemp, flax, corn, hides, skins, tallow, bristles, wax, feathers, and Lithuanian yarn. Manf. Iron cables, cast-iron goods, soap, linseed oil, and brandy. Shipbuilding is carried on, and there is a school of navigation. There is regular communication by steam with other Baltic ports. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 55° 43′ N. Lon. 21° 6′ E. Memel was founded in 1253 by the Livonian knights, and fortified by the Teutonic knights in 1404. A large portion of the town was destroyed by fire in 1854, and rebuilt in a better manner.

MEMLING, or MEMMELINGHE, HANS VAN, mem'-ling, Flemish painter and missal illuminator of the 15th century. Of the circumstances of his life, very little that is authentic is known. He is said to have become an inmate of the hospital of St. John at Bruges, in 1477, and to have therein painted the exquisite pictures which still adorn the establishment. His most celebrated works are the "History of St. Ursula," "The Marriage of Saint Catherine," and "The Descent from the Cross." As a decorator of missals and church books, he was eminently successful; and the specimens of his art which have been preserved are accounted inestimable treasures.

Born 1425; died 1499.

MEMMINGEN, mem'-min-gen, a walled town of Bavaria, on the right bank of the Iller, 28 miles S. of Ulm. Manf. Woollen, cotton and linen fabrics, gunpowder, and earthenware. There is a trade in hops, wool, leather, and grain. Pop. 700.

MEMNON, mem'-non, according to Hesiod, a king of Æthiopia, son of Tithonus and Aurora. He came with a body of 10,000 men to assist his uncle Priam during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Nestor's son. The aged father challenged the Æthiopian monarch, but Memnon refused, on account of the venerable age of Nestor, and accepted that of Achilles, who killed him in combat, in the sight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. In Egypt there are several statues traditionally said to be Memnonian, the most celebrated being that described as vocal by Strabo and Pausanias. Modern explorers have pronounced this particular statue to be the easternmost of the two representing Amenophis III. of the 18th dynasty, situate in the Theban plain, at a place named Koum-el-Sultan, on the west bank of the Nile. It is stated to be 50 feet in height, and on its legs are graven inscriptions in Greek and Latin, commemorating the names of those who had heard the sounds. These sounds were probably caused by priestly jugglery.

MEMNON, a Greek historian, who wrote an account of the rulers of Heraclia, of which fragments have been preserved by Photius. Flourished in the 2nd century.

MEMNON, of Rhodes, an able general, who entered the service of Darius, king of Persia, whom he advised to desolate his country, in order to impede the progress of Alexander the Great, and then to attack Macedon; but this counsel was overruled by the other generals. After the battle of Granicus, Memnon defended Miletus with vigour, took the isles of Chios and Lesbos, carried terror into Greece, and was near putting a stop to the conquests of Alexander, when he was carried off in the midst of his successes. His wife was taken prisoner, with the family of Darius, and became the mistress of Alexander.

Died at Mitylene, B.C. 333.

MEMPHIS, mem'-fis, a ruined city of Lower Egypt, 10 miles S. of Cairo. It was the ancient capital of Egypt, but now its site is occupied only by a few villages.

MEMPHIS, a city and port of entry of Tennessee, United States, on an eminence near the east side of the Mississippi. It is a great cotton depôt, and has fine public buildings. Manf. Iron and machinery. Pop. 33,592.

MEMPHREMAGOG, LAKE, mem'-fre-ma'-gŏg, a lake of North America, partly in Canada, and partly in the state of Vermont. It is 30 miles long.

MENADO, me-na'-do, a Dutch settlement and residency under the government of the Moluccas, on the north side of Celebes, on the Molucca Strait. The surface is mountainous, attaining, in some parts, a considerable elevation. Coffee and rice are extensively cultivated. The chief town is Menado. Pop. 547,189, the larger portion being Christians.

MENAGE, GILES DE, me-nazh', a learned French writer, who became an eminent pleader, but quitted that profession and entered into orders, in order to cultivate letters the more undisturbedly. His principal works are,—two books on the origin and nature of the French language; miscellanies; Latin, Italian, French, and Greek poems; on the Italian language; and an edition of Diogenes Laertius.

Born at Angers, 1613; died at Paris, 1692.

MENAHEM, men'-a-hem, or me-nai'-hem, an idolatrous king of Israel, was son of Gadi. He advanced against and defeated Shallum, B.C. 772, thus securing the sovereignty; but the people did not all submit to him; and hence he "smote Tipsah, and all that were therein, and the courts thereof, from Tirzah, because they opened not to him." Soon after he ascended the throne, the Assyrians invaded Judæa; but Menahem induced them to depart, by paying them 1,000 talents of silver,—upwards of £350,000, which he raised from "all the mighty men of wealth."

Died 761 B.C.

MENAI STRAIT, men'-ai, is in North Wales, dividing the island of Anglesey from Caernarvonshire. It is 14 miles long, with a varying breadth of from 260 yards to 2 miles, and at Bangor opens out into Beaumaris Bay. A suspension bridge of 560 feet in length crosses this strait; also the Britannia tubular railway bridge.

MENAM, or MEINAM, me-nam', "mother of waters," one of the largest rivers of Southern Asia, rising in the Chinese province of Yun-nan, traversing the centre of Siam, and, after a course of 700 or 800 miles, entering the Gulf of Siam by three mouths, the largest of which forms the harbour of Bankok.

MENAMAH. (See BAHREIN.)

MENANDER, me-nan'-der, a Greek comic poet, who was called the prince of new comedy, and preferred to Aristophanes. He was the nephew of the comic poet Alexis. He was of gay, luxurious habits, and was accidentally drowned. All his plays are lost; but the six comedies of Terence were borrowed from him; by which we may form a judgment of his excellence. Some fragments have been collected by Meineke.

Born at Athens, 342 B.C.; died 290 B.C.

MENANGKABU, me-nang-ka-boo', a native state of the island of Sumatra. The soil is very fertile and well cultivated, yielding all tropical produce, and there are iron and gold mines. Manf.

Cotton, silk, and arms. The sultan is considered the chief of all the Malays.

MENARD, me-nard', a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 302 square miles. Pop. 13,000. The capital is Peterburg.

MENARD, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 870 square miles. Pop. 800. The chief place is Menardville.

MENASALBAS, men-a-sal'-bas, a town of Spain, province of Toledo, 26 miles S.W. of the city of Toledo. Pop. 3,600.

MENBRILLA, men-bril'-la, a town of Spain, province of Ciudad-Real, on the right bank of the Azwel, 29 miles E. of Ciudad-Rodrigo. There are a handsome church, a town-house, and a nunnery; but many of the houses are in a ruinous condition. Manf. Serge, earthenware, corks, and oil. Pop. 5,000.

MENCHIA, EL, or MENCHYEH, men-ke'-a, a straggling town of Tripoli, North Africa, near the town of Tripoli. The inhabitants are chiefly Bedouins.

MENDE, mend, a town of France, capital of the department Lozère, on the Lot, 70 miles N.W. of Montpellier. It has a cathedral with two towers. Manf. Serges and coarse cloths. Pop. 4,800.

MENDELSSOHN, MOSES, men'-del-sone (which signifies Moses the son of Mendel), a learned German Jew. He was brought up for the pursuit of commerce, but at an early age studied languages and philosophy at Berlin, and devoted himself to literature, in which he attained a distinguished reputation. Later in life he became partner in a large silk manufactory. He would have been admitted to the Berlin Academy, having gained a prize for an essay, but Frederick the Great, who greatly disliked Jews, struck his name off the list. In 1755 he published his first piece, entitled "Jerusalem." His next work was "Phædon; or, a Discourse on the Spirituality and Immateriality of the Soul." In this excellent treatise the principle of the immateriality of the soul was acutely maintained. On account of this book, the author gained the appellation of the Socrates of the Jews. He also wrote several philosophical works, letter to Lavater, commentary upon Ecclesiastes, and a translation of the first book of the Old Testament.

Born at Dessau, 1729; died 1786.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY, FELIX, a German musical composer, was grandson of the preceding, and son of an eminent banker of Hamburg, who had renounced Judaism and adopted the Lutheran faith. As early as his 9th year he distinguished himself as a pianist and composer; and at the age of 17 gave concerts in France and Italy. His first work was the opera entitled "The Wedding of Camelio;" this was quickly followed by the overture to Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." In 1829, having just completed his 20th year, he made his first visit to England, where his overture was played, and received with enthusiasm. Thenceforth he paid an almost annual visit to this country, where he felt he was even more appreciated than in his native land. "St. Paul," his first oratorio, was performed under his own direction at the Birmingham Festival in 1837. So, in 1846, was "Elijah," his third and best work of the same kind. His last visit to England took place in 1847, when he conducted his "Elijah" at London, Birmingham, and Manchester. In the same year his health, which had been declining for some time, became very bad, and he went to reside in Switzerland; but, although he appeared to derive considerable benefit from the mountain air, he was carried off by an affection of the brain, soon after his return to Leipsic. He left behind a large collection of musical manuscripts, portions of which were published. Mendelssohn's works embrace every department of the musician's art; and his oratorios "St. Paul" and "Elijah" are worthy to rank with the "Messiah" and the "Israel in Egypt" of Handel. He combined with extraordinary musical genius great intellectual power, and a noble and amiable disposition.

Born at Hamburg, 1809; died at Leipsic, 1847.

MENDEN, men'-den, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, on the right bank of the Hünne, 11 miles N.W. of Arnsberg. Manf. Silk, velvet, leather, and needles. There is a trade in cattle. Pop. 4,200.

MENDEZ, PINTO FERNAM, men'-dez, a Portuguese traveller, who went at an early age to India, and after many adventures was captured by the Turks, and sent as a slave to Mocha. He was ransomed by the Portuguese governor of Ormuz, and returned to India. In 1542 he accompanied a Chinese pirate to an island near Pekin, intending to rob some tombs in which, it was believed, immense treasures were hidden. They were unsuccessful, and were shipwrecked on the Chinese coast, and being taken prisoners were set to work to repair the great wall. He afterwards served with the Tartars, then with a Chinese pirate, and was the first white man who visited Japan. He returned to Ningpo (then called Liampo), and on his representations of the wealth of the country he had discovered, an expedition was fitted out, but most of the ships foundered. Pinto, after many strange adventures, made two other visits to Japan, the last in company with St. Francis Xavier, the great missionary, and he founded a seminary for the propagation of the faith. He was appointed by the Portuguese viceroy in India ambassador to Japan, and took vows as a Jesuit, from which, however, he was soon released. He returned to Lisbon in 1558, hoping for court preferment, but was disappointed. He wrote a narrative of his life, and his adventures were so extraordinary that he was generally disbelieved. Later travellers, however, have confirmed many of his most remarkable assertions.

Born near Coimbra, 1510; died near Lisbon, 1583.

MENDIP HILLS, men'-dip, a mineral range in the county of Somerset, extending from south-east to north-west for about 25 miles. A large portion is now under cultivation, and the summit, 1,100 feet in elevation, is known as Black Down. The lead and calamine mines have been worked from a very remote period.

MENDOCINO, men-do-se'-no, a county of California, United States. Area, 3,816 square miles. Pop. 12,800. The capital is Ukiah.

MENDOZA, men-do'-za, a province of the Argentine Confederation, South America. Area, 54,000 square miles. Pop. 99,000.

MENDOZA, capital of the above province, on the Pacific, 150 miles N.E. of Valparaiso. There are some fine open squares, and many churches and convents. Pop. 18,000.

MENDOZA, DIEGO HURTADO DE, Don, an eminent Spanish statesman and scholar. He studied at Salamanca, and distinguished himself as a soldier, diplomatist, geographer, historian, and poet. Charles V. intrusted him with several important missions, especially to Venice, and to the Council of Trent, and in 1547 to the Papal Court; during six years, he held the military command of Tuscany. He made a noble collection of Greek and Arabic manuscripts, and used all the resources of his wealth and power to advance learning. Under Philip II. he fell into disgrace in consequence of an affair of gallantry, and was banished from the Spanish court; but his leisure was occupied by the composition of his "War against the Moors," and in collecting upwards of 400 Arabic manuscripts. At his death he bequeathed his library to the king, and it is now in the Escurial.

Born at Granada, 1503; died 1575.

MENECRATES, me-nek'-rat-tees, a Greek physician, celebrated for his pride and vanity. He crowned himself like the master of the gods, and, in a letter which he wrote to Philip, king of Macedon, expressed himself thus: "Menecrates Jupiter to King Philip, greeting." The Macedonian monarch replied, "Philip to Menecrates, greeting and better sense." Philip once invited him to his board; but a separate table was set for the arrogant physician, served only with perfumes and frankincense, while before the other guests was placed good and substantial cheer.

Lived in 4th century B.C.

MENEHOUD, St., men'-e-hood, a town of France, department Marne, on the Aisne, at the junction with the Auve, 25 miles N.E. of Châlons. There are a handsome town-hall and a college. Manf. Glass, hosiery, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 4,300.

MENELAUS, men'-e-lai'-us, in Greek legend, king of Lacedæmon, brother of Agamemnon, with whom he was brought up in the house of Atreus. He was the husband of Helen, the abduction of whom by Paris was the cause of the Trojan war. During the war, Menelaus behaved with great courage; and, says the poet, Paris must have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interposed, and redeemed him from certain death. In the tenth year of the war, Helen obtained his forgiveness, and she returned with him to Sparta, after a voyage of eight years. He died some time after his return.

MENENIUS AGRIPPA. (See AGRIPPA.)

MENES, mé'-nes, first king of the 1st Egyptian dynasty. According to the latest chronological researches, he ascended the throne about 2717 B.C. He built Memphis, and made many foreign conquests. Egyptian legends assert that he was killed and devoured by a hippopotamus, a story not easily reconcilable with the known habits of the animal.

MENGS, ANTON RAFAEL, mengs, a German painter and writer on art, who studied under his father, and subsequently greatly improved himself at Rome. On his return, although only 16 years of age, he was appointed court painter to Augustus III., king of Poland and Saxony, but received permission to return to Rome, where he married a beautiful girl who had sat to him as a model for the Virgin, and under whose influence he became a Roman Catholic. While at Rome, he executed many fine frescoes and paintings in oil. In 1761, Charles III. of Spain invited him to his kingdom, and became his patron; but, in consequence of the state of his health and the jealousy of rivals, he returned to Rome. Mengs formed his style after Raphael, Correggio, and Titian. To his excellence as an artist, he added literary talent, and wrote several works in Italian; as, "The Life of Correggio," "Reflections on Beauty," and a treatise on "Taste in Painting," "On the Principal Pictures at Madrid," &c. They have been translated into English, with his life prefixed.

Born at Aussig, Bohemia, 1728; died at Rome, 1779.

MENIFEE, men'-e-fee, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 2,000. The capital is Frenchburg.

MENIN, menn'-a, a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, on the left bank of the Lys, at the French frontier, 7 miles S.W. of Courtrai. Manf. Table linen, lace, and silk stuffs, oil, soap, and tobacco. Pop. 11,608.—It has undergone a great number of sieges, and, in the 17th and 18th centuries, was frequently taken by the French.

MENIPPUS, me-nip'-pus, cynic philosopher. He was originally a slave, but became a pupil of Diogenes, whose poverty, however, he did not imitate, but acquired considerable property, and having lost it, his philosophy did not save him from committing suicide. He was notorious for his ill-tempered satires.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

MENNO, SIMONS, men'-no, chief of a sect which sprang up in Germany at the time of the Reformation, and was called after his name, was originally a minister of Friesland, but left his parish in 1536, and was rebaptized by Ubbo Philippi. He gathered about him a number of disciples in Germany, Holland, and Flanders, maintained the necessity of rebaptism in adults, and denied that Jesus Christ received a human body from the Virgin. The Mennonites still continue a considerable sect in Holland, and are not to be confounded with the Anabaptists.

Born at Witmarsum, Friesland, 1496; died at Oldeslohe, Holstein, 1561.

MENOUF, me-noof', a town of Lower Egypt, on the canal of Menouf, which connects the Damietta and Rosetta branches of the Nile, 34 miles N.W. of Cairo. Pop. 4,000.

MENSCHIKOFF, or MENCHIKOW, ALEXANDER DANILOVITCH, men'-chi-kof, field-marshal, statesman and prince of the Russian empire, was the son of a peasant, and the servant of a pastrycook, who employed him to cry pies about the streets. He was taken notice of, and entered the service of Peter the Great. He discovered a conspiracy among the guards, and insinuated himself into the confidence of his sovereign, whom he accompanied to Holland and England, and whose confidential adviser he became. The czar, in 1704, made him governor of Ingria, with the rank of major-general. He defeated the Swedes at Kalisch in 1706; was made a field-marshal on the field of Pultowa; took Riga in 1710; and three years afterwards took Stettin, which, against orders, he surrendered to Prussia; for which he was tried by court-martial and condemned to death, but was pardoned on payment of a heavy fine, and restored to favour. Under the Czarina Catherine he had still more power, and his daughter was married to Peter II., who made Menschikoff duke of Cozel, and grand master of the imperial hotel; but, by the intrigues of Dolgorouski, a mistress of the czar, he fell into disgrace, and was banished to his estate, where he lived in such magnificence that Peter was persuaded to send him, for his own safety, to Siberia, where he died in a poor hut.

Born at Moscow, 1674; died 1729.

MENSCHIKOFF, ALEXANDER SERJEVITCH, Prince, a Russian admiral and general, was the great-grandson of the preceding. He was at first attached to the embassy at Vienna; but, becoming aide-de-camp to Alexander, in 1812, he shared in the military service of the period, and attained the grade of general. When Nicholas ascended the throne, he dispatched Menschikoff on a mission to Abbas-Mirza, shah of Persia, who, taking advantage of a revolt of the Russian army, suddenly broke off the negotiations, and the ambassador narrowly escaped death. In 1824 he commanded a division of the Russian army which took Anapa, and was afterwards severely wounded at the siege of Varna. In 1831 he was appointed governor of Finland, and in 1834 he attained the rank of admiral. In 1853 the czar Nicholas sent him to Turkey on an embassy relative to the holy places; but his haughtiness and obstinacy were little suited to further the end he had in view. In a short time he presented his ultimatum, and his departure soon followed. The war with Russia was the result of this act, and when the allied forces landed in the Crimea, he was in the chief command of the Russian forces. Shortly after the defeat at Inkermann, and the death of the czar Nicholas, he fell ill, and was superseded in his command in the Crimea by Prince Gortschakoff. A few months later he was, however, charged with the defence of Cronstadt against the allied English and French fleets. In 1856 he was recalled to occupy a position at the court of the emperor Alexander. Prince Menschikoff was the recognized head of a very powerful and important, although retrograde, party in Russia, called the Old Russian party, and was the declared enemy of all reform.

Born 1789; died 1869.

MENSHIEH, EL, men'-she-ai (the ancient Ptolemais), a town of Upper Egypt, on the left bank of the Nile, 10 miles N. of Girgeh. It is a halting place for the boats between Cairo and the cataracts, and a place of considerable trade. Manf. Cotton and nitre.

MENTONE, men'-tone, a beautiful town in the south of France, department Alps Maritime, on the Mediterranean, near the Italian frontier. It is a favourite winter resort, the salubrious climate especially recommending it to invalids. It formerly belonged to the principality of Monaco, but was annexed to France by purchase, in 1860. Pop. 10,000.

MENTOR, men'-tor, in Greek legend, the son of Alcimus, and friend of Ulysses, who confided to him the education of his son, whilst he was absent at the siege of Troy. He was celebrated for his wisdom, and, according to the Greek tradition, Minerva took his shape, in order to bring up the son of Ulysses. This last view has been adopted by Fénélon in his "Télémaque."

MENTOR, a Greek artist of the age of Pericles. He excelled in polishing cups and engraving flowers upon them.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

MENTZ, MAINZ, or MAYENCE, mentz, mintze, mai-yence, a city and imperial fortress of Germany, on the left bank of the Rhine, immediately below the influx of the Main; is built nearly in the form of a semi-circle, of which the Rhine is the chord. It is one of the strongest fortresses of the empire, the bastions and other works extending 10 miles, and there are four strong forts. There is a pontoon bridge across the Rhine to Castel, which is also fortified. Many of the streets are crooked, narrow, and gloomy, but a new town has recently sprung up. The principal buildings are the electoral palace, used as a merchants' hall, the palace of the Teutonic Knights, now the residence of the military governor; and the arsenal. The cathedral was begun in the 10th century, six times destroyed, and restored by Napoleon I. It has a tower 400 feet high, 6 lesser towers, and 20 chapels. There are 9 other Catholic churches, among them St. Ignacius, which is a model of architecture, and ornamented in the ceiling with good paintings; and the ancient church of St. Stephen, the steeple of which commands an extensive view. There is also a Protestant church. The public library contains a collection of 120,000 volumes, a cabinet of coins and medals, a cabinet of natural history, a collection of philosophical and mechanical instruments, a museum of Roman monuments, said to be the most complete of any out of Italy, and a gallery of pictures. A club-house now occupies the site of the house of Guttenberg, the inventor of printing, of whom there is a statue by Thorwalsden. The establishments for education are a seminary for priests, a gymnasium, and various schools. There are many Roman remains, especially of a fine aqueduct, and a memorial mass of huge stones. The Neue Anlage is a beautiful public pleasure-ground. Mentz is the principal trading city of the duchy, and, after Cologne, the principal in Western Germany, and there is a very large trade in corn and wine.

Manf.—Articles in leather, soap, glue, tobacco, artificial pearls, musical and philosophical instruments, metal wares, porcelain, and carriages.

Pop.—65,314, exclusive of the garrison, which is about 6,000.

History.—The site of Mentz was occupied by the Romans as a military position, the castle of Maguntiacum having been erected here by Drusus. In the 13th and 14th centuries, it was a place of some note for literature and the arts. In the Thirty Years' War, it was taken by the Swedes, and in 1688 by the French, but restored at the subsequent peace. At the end of 1792, it surrendered to the French. Next year it was taken by the Austrians. By the peace of Luneville (1801) it was formally ceded to France, and in 1814 was ceded to Hesse-Darmstadt, to be maintained as a federal stronghold, garrisoned by Austrian, Prussian, and Hessian troops. In 1866 it became a Prussian fortress, but was declared an imperial fortress by the Treaty of Versailles in 1870.

MENTZ, mentz, a township of New York, United States, on the Erie Canal, 8 miles from Auburn. Pop. 4,000.

MENU or MANU, me-nu', (man of thought) a Hindoo legislator, and the supposed author of a code of laws and morality. This vast work, which is still extant, is written in verse, and in the Sanskrit language. Sir William Jones translated it into English, in 1796. The Hindoos consider Menu as the son of Brahma, and the first created man, if not, indeed, the creator of the universe. There is no authentic date to be assigned for his birth, but the code which is attributed to him is considered to be older than the Vedas, which latter were composed about the 11th or 12th century B.C.

MENZALEH, men-za'-le, an extensive lagoon of lower Egypt, extending along the coast to the east of the Damietta branch of the Nile. It is 37 miles in length and 16 in average breadth. It communicates with the Mediterranean, from which it is separated only by a narrow strip of land, by three openings, has extensive fisheries, and receives the Pelusiac and Tanitic branches of the Nile.

MENZALEH, a town on the above lake, partly ruined, with a trade in rice and fish, 20 miles E. of Damietta.

MENZEL, WOLFGANG, ment'-zel, German author and politician. He was the son of a physician, member of a wealthy family, and received his first education at Breslau. In 1818 he went to Jena, and afterwards to Bonn, but his free expression of advanced political opinions attracted the notice of the police, and he went to Switzerland. His various critical and poetical works, and his attack on the school of Goethe, involved him in many controversies. He was the author of histories of Germany and Europe from 1789 to 1815, works on German literature and mythology, wrote poems and collected popular lyric poetry. In his later years he was nicknamed "the Frenchman eater," from his opposition to French influence. His last works related to the Italian war of 1860, and the Prusso-Austrian war of 1866.

Born at Waldenburg, Silesia, 1798; died at Stuttgardt, 1873.

MEPPEL, mep'-pel, an old town of the Netherlands, province of Drenthe, on the Havelter Aa, near its mouth, 25 miles from Assen. Manf. Linen, sailcloth, and coarse woollen fabrics. There is a large shipping trade, chiefly in agricultural produce and peat, which is of great value. Pop. 7,000.

MEPPEN, mep'-pen, a walled town of Prussia, province of Hanover, at the confluence of the Hase with the Ems, 42 miles N.W. of Osnabruck. Manf. Soap, leather, linen, tobacco, and chicory. Pop. 3,000.

MEQUINEZ. (See MIKNAS.)

MER, or MENARS-LA-VILLE, mair, a town of France, department Loir-et-Cher, 12 miles N.E. of Blois. Manf. Leather. Pop. 4,200.

MERAN, me-ran', a town of the Austrian empire, in Tyrol, 14 miles N.W. of Bolsern, at the confluence of the Passeir and Adige. There are two churches and a Benedictine and a Capuchin monastery. Near it is the mountain fortress of Tyrol. Pop. 3,000.

MERBIDERY, mer-bid'-e-re, a town of British India, province of Madras, 17 miles E. of Mangalore. There are several pagodas, one of them a splendid building, and the town was formerly of great importance.

MERCADAL, mer-ka-dal', a town of Spain, in the island of Minorca, 12 miles N.W. of Port Mahon. There is a large and handsome church. A trade is carried on in corn, cattle, flax, and fruit. Pop. 4,000.

MERCADANTE, SAVIERO, mair-ka-dan'-te, Italian musical composer, when 12 years old entered the Royal College of Music at Naples. His first cantata was performed in 1818, and in the following year his first opera. He continued to produce operas in rapid succession, and composed ecclesiastical music. The opera best known in this country is "Il Giuramenti." In 1856 he was elected foreign member of the French Institute, and in 1868 received the civil order of merit from the king of Italy.

Born at Altamura, 1798; died at Naples, 1870.

MERCARA, mer-ka'-ra, a town of British India, province of Madras, capital of Coorg. It occupies a position 4,500 feet above the sea, and consists principally of a large fort, within which was the palace of the deposed rajah.

MERCATOR, GERARD, mer-kai'-tor, Flemish geographer, who composed a chronology, a greater and lesser atlas, and "Geographical Tables;" also "A Treatise on the Creation," &c. He was the first to represent the meridians by equidistant parallel lines, and the parallels of longitude by lines at right angles with the meridian; whence the name Mercator's projection, now employed in nautical maps.

Born at Rupelmonde, 1512; died at Duisburg, 1594.

MERCED, mer'-sed, a county of California, United States. Area, 1,975 square miles. Pop. 5,656. The capital is Snelling.

MERCEDES, mer-se'-des, a town of Uruguay, South America, on the left bank of the Rio Negro, 150 miles N.W. of Monte Video. There is an active trade in hides, wool, and dried beef. Pop. 5,000.

MISSOURI.—Area, 530 square miles. Pop. 14,673. The capital is Princeton.

NEW JERSEY.—Area, 260 square miles. Pop. 58,061. The capital is TRENTON.

OHIO.—Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 21,808. The capital is Celina.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Area, 624 square miles. Pop. 56,161. The capital is Mercer.

WEST VIRGINIA.—Area, 540 square miles. Pop. 7,200. The capital is Princeton.

MERCIA, mer'-she-a, one of the old kingdoms of the Saxon Heptarchy, comprising all the modern counties (except Middlesex) between the Thames on the south, Yorkshire and Lancashire on the north, Wales on the west, and the kingdoms of East Anglia and Essex on the east. Its capital city was Leicester. The name was derived from "mark," meaning frontier, as this was the most western of the three kingdoms of the Angles.

MERCIER, LOUIS SEBASTIEN, mair'-se-ai, French author, who wrote works in almost every department of literature. In 1781 he commenced his celebrated "Picture of Paris," wherein he dissected the social system of the French capital with so much vigour and truth, that he judged it prudent to leave Paris and carry on the publication in Switzerland. So completely did this work exhibit the corruption and frivolities of French society, that its publication has been claimed as one of the great precursors of the French revolution. He returned to France after the revolution, and edited the "Patriotic Annals," a republican journal, but moderate in tone. He was a witty and entertaining writer; but his works are defaced by paradox and inordinate vanity.

Born at Paris, 1740; died 1814.

MERCURIALIS, JEROME, mer'ku-ri-al'-lis, a celebrated Italian physician, who taught at Padua. Maximilian II. invited him to Vienna. He wrote several important works on medicine; among the rest "Practical Medicine." He likewise produced a good edition of Hippocrates, which was published at Venice, 1588.

Born at Forli, 1530; died 1606.

MERCURY, mer'-ku-re, the name in the Roman mythology of the god called Hermes by the Greeks. There were no less than five of this name, according to Cicero. Some add a sixth; but to the son of Jupiter and Maïa, the actions of all the others have been probably attributed. Mercury was the messenger of the gods, and Jupiter in particular; the patron of travellers and shepherds; he conducted the souls of the dead into the infernal regions, and not only presided over orators, merchants, and declaimers, but was also the god of thieves, pickpockets, and all dishonest persons. His name is derived from mercibus, because he was the god of merchandise among the Romans. The worship of Mercury was well established, particularly in Greece, Egypt, and Italy. He is generally represented as having small wings attached to his head and feet, and bearing a winged wand, round which a serpent is entwined. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him, by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of speaking, of which the tongue is the organ.

MERDIN. (See MARDIN.)

MEREND, or MEHREND, me-rend', a town of Persia, province of Azerbijan, 40 miles N.E. of Tabriz. Cochineal, opium, apricots, and peaches are produced. Pop. 10,000.

MERGENTHEIM, mair'-gen-time, a town of Wurtemberg, circle Taxt, 56 miles N.E. of Stuttgardt. It has an old castle, town house, and gymnasium. Pop. 3,000.

MERGUI, mer-ge', a seaport town of the Tenasserim district, Lower Burmah, on an island in the delta of the Mergui river. It is about 3 miles in circuit and surrounded by a stockade. There is a good harbour. Its exports are ivory, trepang, rice and dried fish. This place was taken by the British in 1824. Pop. of town and district, 56,559.

MERGUI ARCHIPELAGO, a group in the Bay of Bengal, lying along the coast of Tenasserim, with a strait between them and the mainland, of 15 to 30 miles broad, having good anchorage. The islands are mountainous, rising to a height of 3,000 feet. Pearls, timber, coal, and edible birds' nests are among the chief articles of export. Pop. 18,000. Lat. between 9° and 13° N. Lon. between 97° and 98° 30' E.

MERIAN, MATTHIAS, German painter, chiefly of portraits. As a student, he derived instruction from Syndrart, from Vandyck in London, from Le Sueur at Paris, and from Carlo Maratti at Rome. Although he produced some historical pieces, his fame chiefly rests upon his portraits. The emperor Leopold I. and some of the highest German princes and nobles sat to him.

Born at Basel, 1621; died at Frankfort, 1687.

MERIAN, SIBYLLA MARIA, a celebrated naturalist, who excelled in drawing insects, flowers, and fruits, was sister of the preceding. She became the wife of John Andriez Graff, a painter, in 1665; but her own name was so celebrated as an artist, that her husband's was prevented from being adopted. She painted flowers and insects after nature with scrupulous exactness, and, in 1699, undertook a voyage to Surinam in order to make drawings of the insects of that country. Although her fame mainly rests upon her artistic performances, she was an excellent writer on the natural history of insects. Sir Hans Sloane purchased many of her drawings for a considerable sum, and they are now contained in the print department of the British Museum. Several collections of her fine drawings are also preserved at St. Petersburg, in Holland, and at Frankfort.

Born at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 1647; died at Amsterdam, 1717.

MERIDA, mer'-e-da, a town of Spain, province of Estremadura, on the right bank of the Guadiana, 32 miles E. of Badajos. Across the river is a Roman bridge of 8 arches, and 2,575 feet in length, erected by Trajan. There are the remains of a temple of Diana, several aqueducts, a theatre, and a circus. Pop. 5,500.—This place was founded by Augustus, 25 B.C. Its antiquities, however, scattered in all directions, are interesting. In 713 it was taken by the Moors, and, in the 13th century, was attached to the kingdom of Castile.

MERIDA, a city of the republic of Venezuela, South America, the capital of the state of Merida, or Guzman, 85 miles S.W. of Trujillo. Pop. 10,000. In 1812 it was nearly entirely destroyed by an earthquake. Previous to that event it was the largest city in Venezuela.

MERIDA, the capital of Yucatan, Central America, about 25 miles from the Gulf of Mexico. There are a cathedral, university, and 13 churches. Pop. 24,000, mostly Indians and half-bloods. Lat. 20° 50' N., Lon. 89° 40' W.

MERIDEN, mer'-i-den, a town of Connecticut, United States, 18 miles N.E. of Newhaven. Manf. Combs, cutlery, hardware, iron castings, electro-plate and silver ware, woollens, carriages, and machinery. Pop. 15,540.

MERIMÉE, PROSPER, mer'-e-mai, French historian, novelist, and archæologist, was educated for the profession of the law; but after the revolution of 1830, he obtained high employment under the constitutional government. In 1831 he was appointed to an inspectorship of the antiquities of France. The duties of this office caused him to make several archæological tours throughout France, and the result was the publication of a number of illustrated works of considerable importance. In 1844 he was elected a member of the French Academy. In addition to his archæological labours, he wrote historical works, romances, and plays, and was a regular contributor to the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and to the newspaper press of France. He was made a senator in 1853, and afterwards grand officer of the legion of honour.

Born at Paris, 1803; died 1870.

MERIONETH, mer-i-on'-eth, a maritime county of North Wales, bounded N. by the counties of Caernarvon and Denbigh, S. by Cardigan, from which it is separated by the estuary of the Dovey, W. by Cardigan Bay, and E. by the counties of Denbigh and Montgomery. It is wild and mountainous and everywhere abounding with the most romantic and sublime scenery. Cader Idris is the most noted mountain, being 2,914 feet above the sea. Arran Mowddy is still higher, its height being 2,955 feet. The other principal mountains are Arrenig, 2,809 feet, and Cader Ferwyn, 2,563 feet. The coast generally consists of cliffs, skirted by sands and dangerous sandbanks. The soil is poor.

Rivers.—The principal are the Dee, the Maw or Mawddach, the Dovey or Dyfi, and the Glaslyn and Dwyrid. The largest lakes are Llyn-Tegid, near Bala, and Llyn-y-Myngil, at the foot of Cader Idris.

Minerals.—There are large quarries of slate and limestone; and a small quantity of lead and copper.

Manf.—Principally coarse flannels; also strong cloths druggets, kerseymeres, and stockings.

Area.—602 square miles.

MERKAH, a seaport of East Africa. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 1° 44' N. Lon. 44° 51' E.

MERLIN, mer'-lin, a British legendary personage, who was regarded in his time as a magician and prophet. His history is half mythical, and the idlest tales are told of him by some ancient writers; such as that he was engendered of an incubus, and that he conveyed by enchantment the stupendous stones on Salisbury Plain from Ireland. There also passed under his name some extravagant predictions. Near Caermarthen is a mount called Merlin's Hill, beneath which tradition relates that he was buried.

Lived, probably, in the 5th century.

MERLIN, CALEDONIUS, "the wild," a native of Strathclyde, Scotland, who is said to have killed his nephew and then fled to the woods, where he lived the life of a savage. Being pursued, he leapt into the Tweed, and was impaled on a stake. Some rhapsodical prophecies are attributed to him, and he is frequently confused in legend with the Welsh Merlin mentioned above.

MERODACH, mer'-o-dak, in Babylonian mythology, the second of the minor gods. Several of the Babylonian kings were named after him, as Merodach-baladan, and Evil-Merodach.

MÉRODE, FRANÇOIS XAVIER MARIE FREDERIC GHISLAIN DE, mai'-rode, Roman Catholic archbishop, descended from the kings of Aragon, and son of the Count de Mérode, who was proposed as king of the Belgians in the revolution of 1830. He served for a time in the Belgian army, and in the French army in Algiers. In 1848 he went to Rome, studied theology, and was ordained priest, was soon afterwards appointed chamberlain to the pope, and in 1860 organized the pontifical army, composed mostly of foreigners. In 1865 he resigned political office, and in 1866 was appointed archbishop of Meletene. He spent great sums on street improvements in Rome, in archæological investigations, and in founding charitable institutions and agricultural and industrial schools.

Born at Brussels, 1820; died at Rome, 1874.

MEROË, ISLE OF. (See NUBIA.)

MEROPE, mer'-o-pe, in Greek mythology, one of the Atlantides, who married Sisyphus, son of Æolus, and was, like her sisters, changed into a constellation after death. (See PLEIADES.)

MEROVÆUS, or MEROVING, mer-o-ve'-us, king of France, succeeded Clodius in 448, and defeated Attila in 451. He is said to have extended the bounds of his kingdom to Treves, which city he took and plundered. He began the race of French kings called Merovingian.

Born about 411; died 457.

MERRICK, a county of Nebraska, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 5,341. The chief place is Lone Tree.

MERRIMACK, mer'-ri-mak, a river of the United States, traversing New Hampshire, and, after a course of 120 miles, falling into the Atlantic at Newburyport. It has many falls and affords valuable water power. Some of the most important manufacturing towns in the States are on its banks.

MERRIMACK, a county of New Hampshire, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 46,300. The capital is Concord.

MERSE. (See BERWICKSHIRE.)

MERSEBURG, mer'-se-boorg, a district of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the Saale, 15 miles from Leipsic. The surface is undulating and fertile, except in the eastern part, where are extensive sandy tracts.

Rivers.—The Unstrut, Saale, Mulde, and the two Elsters.
Minerals.—Silver, lead, iron, copper, and coal.
Area.—2,500 square miles.
Pop.—971,098.

MERSEBURG, capital of the above district. The most remarkable buildings are the cathedral, a beautiful structure, with four fine towers, and a noble organ; interesting historical monuments; and the castle erected in the 15th century. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, paper, tobacco, and beer. Pop. 15,500.

MERSENNE, MARIN, mair-sen', an eminent French mathematician. In 1615 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Nevres. After resigning this office, as well as that of superior of the convent in which he lived, he travelled in Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands. He subsequently took up his final residence at Paris. His chief work was "Harmonie Universelle," which contains a variety of information connected with the science of music.

Born in France, 1588; died at Paris, 1648.

MERSEY, mer'-se, a river of England, rising on the borders of Cheshire, Derbyshire, and Yorkshire, and in its lower course forming the boundary between Lancashire and Cheshire, after a course of 60 miles, falling into the Western Sea in a large estuary at Liverpool. The chief affluents are the Irwell, from Lancashire, and the Bollin and Weaver from Cheshire.

MERTHYR TYDVIL, tid'-vil, a market town and parliamentary borough of South Wales, in Glamorganshire, in the valley of the Taf, 24 miles N. of Cardiff. Merthyr Tydvil derives importance from its ironworks, of which it is the great seat in South Wales, and there are also large collieries. The parliamentary borough includes Aberdare and other outlying districts. There are 17 churches, and more than 100 chapels for dissenters in the borough. Pop. of the borough, 48,857. —A station on the Great Western, London and North Western, and allied railways.

MERVILLE, mair'-veel, a town of France, department Nord, on the left bank of the Lys, 19 miles W. of Lille. Manf. Damasks, table-linen, and cotton velvet. Pop. 7,000.

MERZEG, mair'-zag, a town of Prussia, on the right bank of the Saar, 22 miles S.E. of Treves. Pop. 4,000.

MESAGNA, mai-sag'-na, a walled town of Italy, province of Lecce, beautifully situated 27 miles N.W. of Lecce. There is a large trade in oil made in the district. Pop. 8,000.

MESCHED, or MESHID, mesh-ed', a city of Persia, capital of the province of Khorassan, standing in a fertile plain on the Tejend, inclosed by strong walls. It is distinguished by a very splendid mausoleum, in which repose the ashes of Imaum Riza, one of the most splendid mosques in the country, and other sacred buildings; but its houses are meanly built, and mostly composed of sun-dried bricks. The town is the chief seat of the great Mahometan sect of the Shiites, and is visited by large numbers of pilgrims. The ruins of Thus, the old capital of Khorassan, are in the neighbourhood. Manf. Woollen goods, gold work, jewellery, and sword-blades. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 36° 17′ N. Lon. 59° 40′ E.

MESERITSCH (GROSS), mai'-ser-itch, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, 58 miles S.W. of Olmütz. There are an old castle and two churches. Manf. Linen. There is a large corn market. Pop. 5,000.

MESERITSCH (WALACHISCH), a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, 35 miles S.E. of Olmütz, on the Betschwa. Manf. Linen. There is a trade in cheese. Pop. 2,800.

MESERITZ, or MEDZYRZEZ, mait'-zer-itch, a walled town of Prussia, province of Posen, at the confluence of the Pachlitz with the Olga, 56 miles N.W. of Posen. Manf. Linen, leather, and hosiery. Pop. 5,000.

MESILLA, me-sil'-la, a town of New Mexico territory, United States, on the Rio Grande. Pop. 2,000.

MESMER, FRIEDRICH-ANTON, mes'-mer, a German physician, who first propagated the doctrines of animal magnetism, long called Mesmerism, after his name. In 1766 he took the degree M.D. at the university of Vienna, and wrote a treatise on the "Influence of the Planets upon the Human Body." In conjunction with Father Hell, a Jesuit and professor of astronomy at Vienna, Mesmer, in 1772, engaged in a series of investigations relative to the influence of the loadstone in curing disease. They achieved what they termed an "extraordinary success;" but Hell having published a work in which he declared Mesmer to be only a physician who had been employed by him to practically test the new discovery, the latter engaged in a violent controversy with his rival. All the scientific men of Vienna, however, sided with Hell, and Mesmer, who was pronounced to be an impostor, was obliged to quit the city. He visited several parts of Germany and Switzerland, everywhere working astonishing cures, and, in 1778, reached Paris, where he speedily became the most popular professor of the healing art in the French capital. Thousands of people, from peer to peasant, flocked to his apartments for the purpose of being "mesmerized." He soon afterwards settled at Spa, whither a crowd of wealthy patients followed him. A subscription was subsequently entered into for his benefit, and the sum of £14,000 was raised. With this money Mesmer returned to Paris, and again commenced his public treatment; but those persons who had conducted the subscription having set up a society for gratuitously practising animal magnetism, Mesmer left France and repaired to England, where he lived under an assumed name. Mesmer's principal works were "Memoirs on the Discovery of Animal Magnetism," and "Collection of Facts and Documents relative to Animal Magnetism."

Born at Morsburg, Baden, 1734; died 1815.

MESOLA, mai-so-la, a town of Italy, 31 miles N.E. of Ferrari. Pop. 5,000.

MESOPOTAMIA, mes'-op-o-tai'-me-a, an ancient name of the country between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, in Asiatic Turkey. It is now comprised in the pashalics of Bagdad and Diarbekir.

MESSALINA, VALERIA, mes-sa-li'-na, wife of the Roman emperor Claudius. She was of a most libidinous character, and committed adultery with all the officers of her court. Having been repudiated by Claudius, she espoused her favourite, Silius, who was put to death with her, by order of the emperor. She was as cruel as she was debauched, and caused many distinguished Romans to be put to death.

MESSINA, mes'-se-na, a province of the Italian kingdom, in the island of Sicily. Area, 1,768 quare miles. Pop. 477,191.

MESSINA, a city and capital of the above province, situate on a strait, called from it the Strait of Messina, which separates Italy from Calabria, 8 miles from Reggio. The town runs parallel with the strait, and has, for its finest part, the Marina, a long line of buildings facing the harbour, and running parallel with it for more than a mile. A broad quay separates it from the water. The town sweeps along the swelling eminences, and gradually rises so as to present almost every public edifice in a striking point of view. The whiteness of the buildings forms a beautiful contrast to the dark green of the forests behind. It is enclosed by old walls, and has several fine streets paved with lava. The public buildings include the senate-house, archiepiscopal palace, numerous convents, college, several seminaries, asylums for the poor, and banks; two theatres, a large hospital, town-hall, exchange, custom-house, lyceum, public library, and prison. There are a cathedral, and more than 50 churches, some of them beautiful buildings, containing a number of paintings. The cathedral has a fine Gothic front and granite pillars, which support the roof. The harbour of Messina is the finest in the Mediterranean, about four miles in circumference, and is defended by a citadel and six forts. The exports consist of wine, silk, oil, fruits, and corn. Manf. Damasks and satins. Pop. 124,283. Lat. 38° 11' 10" N. Lon. 15° 34' 7" E.—Messina is a place of great antiquity, having been known not only to the Romans, but to the Greeks.

MESSINA, STRAIT OF, separates Sicily from South Italy, and has a length of 22 miles and a breadth of from 3 to 10. Opposite Messina is the whirlpool of Charybdis.

MESTCHOWSK, mestch'-owsk, a town of Russia, government of Kaluga, on the Tureja. There is an important yearly market, and a trade in hemp, oil, tallow, corn, and cattle. Pop. 5,000.

MESTRE, mais'-trai, a town of Italy, province of Venetia, 6 miles N.W. of Venice. It is surrounded by beautiful villas, and has an old castle. Pop. 8,500.

META, mai'-ta, a river of South America, forming a portion of the boundary between Colombia and Venezuela, rising about 40 miles S. of Bogota, and, after a course of 500 miles, joining the Orinoco. It is navigable for the greater part of its course.

METASTASIO, or TRAPASSI, PIETRO, mai-tas-ta'-se-o, Italian poet. He displayed an early genius for poetry, and wrote verses at the age of 6 years; and he was only 14 when he composed his tragedy, "Il Giustino." A celebrated lawyer and critic, named Gravina, was his instructor, and made him his heir when he died, giving him the name by which he is generally known, from a Greek word, "metastasis," signifying a transfer. In 1724, Metastasio produced his play of "Dido," acted at Naples, with the music of Sarro. The success of this piece stimulated him to follow up the same career; and, in 1729, the emperor Charles VI. invited him to Vienna, where he gave him a large pension, and appointed him court poet. The empress Maria Theresa bestowed upon him magnificent presents, as also did Ferdinand VI., king of Spain. The emperor offered him the title of nobility, and the empress the order of St. Stephen; but he declined both. He wrote a great number of operas and other dramatic pieces, which are highly admired in his native country.

Born at Rome, 1698; died at Vienna, 1782.

METCALFE, CHARLES THEOPHILUS, Baron, met'-kalf, Indian statesman and colonial governor, was the son of a director of the East India Company, and at the age of 15 went out to India as a writer. He rapidly rose in the service, and at the age of 23 was appointed British resident at Lahore, and succeeded in fixing the boundary between the dominions of Runjeet Singh and of the Sikhs. In 1819 he was appointed secretary of the secret and political department of Calcutta, and in the following year was made British resident at the court of the Nizam. In 1820 he succeeded his father in the baronetcy, and having filled other offices of importance went, in 1834, to Agra as president of the North-West Provinces; and in the following year acted for some time as governor-general until the arrival of Lord Auckland. His allowance of increased liberty to the press offended the directors, and in consequence Sir Charles Metcalfe quitted the service. In 1839 he was appointed governor of Jamaica, and in 1842 governor-general of Canada. On his return to England in 1845 he received a peerage.

Born in Berkshire, 1785; died 1846.

METCALFE, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 9,423. The capital is Edmonton.

METIUS, JACOB, mé'-te-us, a native of North Holland, who is said by Descartes to have been the inventor of the refracting telescope. While one day amusing himself with a few burning-glasses, after looking through them singly he began to look through them by pairs, placing one at each extremity of a short tube. In this way a convex and concave lens happening to be employed together, the first refracting telescope is said to have been constructed. Barlow, in his "History of Optics," however, declares that the refracting telescope must have been known in England at a much earlier date.

Born 1609.

METON, mé'-ton, an Athenian mathematician, who invented what is called in chronology the golden number.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

METRODORUS, met-ro-dor'-us, a disciple of Democritus, and the master of Anaxarchus and Hippocrates. He was a physician of Chios, and maintained that the matter of the universe is eternal.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

METRODORUS, a famous painter and philosopher, who was sent by the Athenians to the Roman general Paulus Æmilius, who, after the defeat of Perseus, had demanded a painter and philosopher; the former to paint his temples, and the latter to instruct his children. Metrodorus gave him satisfaction in both capacities.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

METTERNICH, CLEMENS WENZEL NEPOMUK LOTHAR, Prince von, and duke of Pontella, met'-ter-nik, a celebrated German diplomatist. His ancestors had been distinguished in the wars of the empire against the Turks, and his father, Count von Metternich, had obtained some distinction as a diplomatist, and as the associate of Kaunitz. At the age of 15 he entered the university of Strasburg, and, two years afterwards, removed to Mayence, to complete his studies. In 1790 he made his first appearance as master of the ceremonies at the coronation of the emperor Leopold II.; and, in 1794, after a short visit to England, was attached to the Austrian embassy at the Hague, in the following year marrying the granddaughter and heiress of his father's friend Kaunitz. All this time he was serving his apprenticeship in diplomacy. He first came into notice at the congress of Rastadt, where he represented the Westphalian nobility; after which he accompanied Count Stadion to St. Petersburg; was, in 1801, appointed minister at the court of Dresden; then, in 1804, proceeded as ambassador to Berlin, where he took a leading part in the well-known coalition which was dissolved by the battle of Austerlitz. After the peace of Presburg, he became Austrian minister at the court of Napoleon. When the war broke out, in 1809, he returned to the Austrian court, then about to seek refuge in the fortress of Comorn, and was appointed minister of foreign affairs. It was during his tenure of office that he struck out the idea of a marriage between Napoleon and an Austrian archduchess. Napoleon was divorced from Josephine, and Maria Louisa was escorted by Metternich to Paris. But Austria had only adopted this course as an expedient, and, after the French defeat in Russia, Austria again declared war against France. The grand alliance was signed at Toplitz in the same year, and Metternich was, upon the spot, created a prince of the empire. He took a very prominent part in the subsequent conferences and treaties, and he signed the treaty of Paris on behalf of Austria. He afterwards paid a visit to England, and received the honour of a doctor's degree from the university of Oxford. Upon the opening of the congress of Vienna, he was chosen as its president. After the revolutionary outbreak of 1848 he went to England, where he remained some time. In 1851 he again appeared at the Austrian court.

Born at Coblentz, 1773; died at Vienna, 1859.

METZ, metz, a fortified town of Germany, in the imperial territory of Alsace-Lorraine. It is situate at the confluence of the Seille and Moselle, and on both sides of the latter river. On the left bank the town is flat, on the right rises steeply, and is surrounded by ramparts, and defended by a great number of bastions and five forts. The breadth of Metz is nearly equal to its length; so that its form is compact, though by no means a regular square. Some of the streets are tolerably straight and wide, but laid out, as in other old towns, on no uniform plan. The finest parts are the quays, communicating by handsome bridges, and the esplanade, a very beautiful promenade. The public buildings are, the governor's residence, to the east of the citadel, a fine edifice; the cathedral, a Gothic structure, begun early in the 11th century, with a spire 373 feet high; the church of Notre Dame, with a choir built in the 12th century; a number of churches and religious houses, a college, military hospital, arsenal, and cannon foundry.

Manf.—Different kinds of woollens, hosiery, muslin, and paper: there is an active trade.

Pop.—54,716, exclusive of a garrison of about 11,000.

History.—The town occupies the site of the Roman Divodurum, afterwards known as Mettis (from Mediomatrici, the name of the people inhabiting the district). After the death of Charlemagne, Metz became a free city of the German empire. In 1552 the French obtained possession, and it was formally ceded to them in 1648. As the capital of the department of the Moselle, it was considered the strongest defence of France against the Germans, and in the war of 1870 was held by Marshal Bazaine, with a force of 180,000 men and immense military stores, which were surrendered to the Germans, and the town was afterwards annexed to the German empire.

METZENSEIFEN, OBER and UNTER, met'-zen-si'-fen, two neighbouring towns of Hungary, 16 miles W. of Kaschau. In the neighbourhood are iron-mines and works. Pop. 5,000.

METZINGEN, metz'-in-gen, a town of Wurtemburg, on the Erms, 17 miles S.E. of Stuttgart. Manf. Woollen and linen goods. Pop. 4,600.

MEUDON, meu'-daun(g), a town of France, department Seine-et-Oise, 6 miles N.E. of Versailles. It has a palace, and a park known as the Forest of Meudon, which is a favourite holiday resort. Manf. Glass and whitening. Pop. 5,600.

MEULEBEKE, me(r)l'-bek, a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, 10 miles N. of Courtrai. Pop. 8,500.

MEULEN, ANTHONY FRANCIS VAN DER, me(r)'-len, a celebrated painter, who always accompanied Louis XIV. on his campaigns, the incidents of which he perpetuated with his brush. In drawing the horse, he was without an equal in his time.

Born at Brussels, 1634; died 1690.

MEUNG, me(r)n(g), a town of France, department of the Loiret, on the right bank of the Loire, 12 miles S.W. of Orleans. Manf. Felt hats, and leather. Pop. 3,600.

MEURIM, moir'-im, a river of Brazil, South America, rising in the province of Maranhao, and falling into the Bay of Sao Marcos, on the western side of the island of Maranhao. The total course is about 350 miles.

MEURS, moirs, a town of Prussia, province of Dusseldorf, 18 miles N.W. of Dusseldorf. It has a Lutheran and a Roman Catholic church. Manf. Silk, cotton, and woollen fabrics. Pop. 3,200.

MEURSIUS, JOHN, moir'-se-us, an eminent Dutch scholar, who, in 1610, was appointed professor of history at Leyden. After the execution of Barneveldt, in 1619, he retired to Denmark. His principal works were "Glossarium Græco-barbarum," and various treatises on different branches of Greek and Roman antiquities.

Born near the Hague, 1579; died 1639.

MEURTHE, a river of France, rising on the west side of the Vosges, and, after a course of 100 miles, joining the Moselle on the right bank, 6 miles below Nancy.

MEURTHE-ET-MOSELLE, murt-ai-mo-selle', a department of the north-east of France, comprising portions of the former department of Meurthe and Moselle, the remainder of which was ceded to Germany, by the treaty of Frankfort, after the Franco-German war of 1870-1. The surface is undulating and picturesque, the soil fertile, and the scenery very attractive.

Rivers.—The Moselle, Meurthe, and Seille.
Area.—2,015 square miles.
Pop.—419,317.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 596 communes. The chief towns are NANCY, the capital; BRIEY, LUNEVILLE, and TOUL.

MEUSE, mu(r)ze, a frontier department in the north-east of France. It is traversed from south-east to north-west by the valley of the Meuse, bordered by two parallel ranges of hills. In this and the other river valley the soil is fertile; but in other parts poor. Very large quantities of red and white wine and cheese are made; and cattle and sheep are reared.

Rivers.—The Meuse, Ornain, Aire, Aisne, and Saulix.
Area.—2,403 square miles.
Pop.—289,861.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 587 communes. The chief towns are BAR-LE-DUC, the capital; COMMERCY, Montmédy, and Verdun.

MEUSE, a river of France. (See MAESE.)

MEXICO, mex'-i-ko, a federative republic of North America, occupying the south-western extremity of that portion of the American continent, and a part of the isthmus which connects it with South America. About three-fifths of the country is spread out in extensive table-lands of from 5,000 to 9,000 feet in height. Towards the W. the descent from the table-land is much more steep than towards the E. The E. declivity of the Cordillera is so regular and uniform, that when once the traveller begins to descend from the great central plain, he continues the descent until he arrives at the E. coast. The W. coast is furrowed by four very remarkable oblong valleys, of which the respective heights above the level of the sea are 3,217, 1,685, 557, and 518 feet. Much of the country is fertile, but much of it is arid, from the excessive dryness of the atmosphere. The whole country may be regarded as an enormous ridge, raised by volcanic force, between two oceans, and branching off into several chains as the land grows wider. The principal chain is the Sierra Madre, which divides into three main branches, the central being the watershed between the Pacific Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. Among the loftiest peaks are Istarcihuatl (White Lady), 15,700 feet; the Pico del Frayle, 15,250 feet; and the Coffre de Perote, 13,400 feet. There are five burning mountains; namely, Orizava, or Citlaltepetl (Star-mountain), of the height of 17,374 feet; Popocatepetl (Smoking-mountain), of the height of 17,880 feet; and the mountains of Tuxta (5,118 feet) Jorullo, and Colima. Earthquakes are by no means rare on the coasts of the Pacific and in the environs of the capital. The W. coast possesses some excellent harbours; namely, San Francisco, in New California, San Blias, in Guadalaxara, near the mouth of the river of Santiago, and especially Acapulco, which are magnificent ports. The last is one of the finest basins in the world, but it is now little frequented. There are several others of less importance. The eastern coast does not, however, possess the same advantages as the western. Vera Cruz is merely a bad anchorage between the shallows of La Calleta, La Gallega, and La Lavandera. The whole coast of Mexico is also beset with sand-banks, which are raised by the continual and uniform action of the trade-winds on the ocean. Another very serious inconvenience is common to both coasts,—that of being rendered inaccessible for several months by violent tempests, which effectually prevent all navigation, and which are caused by the N.W. winds blowing in the Gulf of Mexico, from the autumnal to the spring equinox. From the singular construction of the country, the coasts alone possess a warm climate. These are distinguished by the appellation of the Tierras Calientes, or the warm regions. In this region the climate, more especially in populous cities, is exceedingly fatal to Europeans. On the declivity of the Andes, at an elevation of from 3,936 to 4,920 feet, there reigns perpetually a soft spring temperature, which never varies more than seven or nine degrees. The natives give to this region the appellation of Tierras Templadas, or temperate. The third region is distinguished by the name of the Tierras Frias, or cold lands, and comprehends the plains which are elevated more than 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. Here the temperature is mild and agreeable. Above this the climate is rude and disagreeable, even to an inhabitant of the north.

Rivers.—Mexico suffers in general from the want of water and of navigable rivers. The great river of the S., Rio Bravo del Norte, and the Rio Colorado, are the only ones worthy of fixing the attention. The former forms all the N.E. frontier. The others are the Rio Guasacualco and the Rio Alvarado, both to the S.E. of Vera Cruz; the Rio de Moctezuma, which carries the waters of the lakes and valley of Tenochtitlan to the Rio de Panuco; the Rio de Zacatula, the great river of Santiago, which falls into the Pacific Ocean.

Lakes.—The most remarkable is that of Chapala, covering an area of 1,500 square miles.

Pro.—As a result of the deficient supply of water, there are large tracts of barren land, and in the northern and eastern parts are large tracts at one time the beds of salt lakes. In the western part of the great plateaux are fertile agricultural districts. In the plains are depressed tracts, known as "barrancas," water d by small streams, and of great fertility. The chief productions are sugar, cacao, cotton, coffee, wheat, tobacco, hemp, flax, silk, oils, and wine. Among the forest trees are cedar, brazil-wood, mahogany, ebony, rosewood, and every sort of timber, either for use or ornament. The fruits are, pine-apples, oranges, plums, dates, water-melons, apples, peaches, quinces, apricots, pears, pomegranates, figs, black cherries, walnuts, almonds, olives, chestnuts, and grapes. In the markets of Mexico there are sold, exclusive of European fruits, about sixty different sorts of native productions. The country also produces a great variety of valuable drugs; such as copal, anime, tacamahac-caramia, liquid amber, balsam of Tolu, guaiacum, mechoacan-root, sarsaparilla, &c. Other productions are cochineal, dyeing-woods, and indigo. The agricultural products are, in the warmer regions, the plantain or banana-tree, the cassava-root, the farina of which, called manioc, is made into bread; maize, of which the cultivation is extensive and important. In the temperate region are cultivated European grains, such as wheat, barley, oats, and rye. The absolute want of rain during the summer months is very injurious to the agriculture of Mexico; and the inhabitants are, in consequence, compelled to have recourse to artificial irrigation. In places which are not artificially watered, the Mexican soil yields only pasturage in the months of March and April.

Minerals.—Very important. The mountains, especially the Sierra Madre, contain ores of every kind of metal; comprising not only the precious metals, but mercury, iron, copper, lead, tin, alum, crystal, vitriol, and different kinds of precious stones. In the province of Zacatecas, about 200 miles N.W. of Mexico, and San Luis de Potosi, there are silver-mines, formerly deemed the richest in the world; but the richest mines now worked are those of Real del Monte. Veins of silver intersect every part of the western declivities of the mountain ranges. There are, besides, numerous other mining-stations scattered throughout the country. The metallic produce of Mexico also forms one of the most important objects of its industry. The Mexican gold is, for the most part, extracted from alluvial grounds, by means of washing. Another part of the Mexican gold is extracted from the veins which intersect the mountains of primitive rock. More than three-fourths of the silver obtained is extracted from the ore by means of quicksilver. The mines are surrounded by cultivated fields, towns, and villages; the neighbouring summits are crowned with forests; and a combination of circumstances facilitates the acquisition of the subterraneous wealth of this country.

Zoology.—Innumerable herds of cattle graze in the savannahs and woods, the skins and fat of which form an important article of commerce. There are also deer, elk, bison, grisly black bear, wild horses, the tapir, the jaguar, the puma, and the tiger-cat. The woods swarm with gluttons, sloths, porcupines, ant-eaters, weasels, polecats, armadilloes, cavies, and monkeys. Sheep are numerous, but their wool is of little value. All the domestic animals imported from the Old World thrive well. Among the birds may be reckoned those of the domestic kind, goldfinches, nightingales, and upwards of twenty species of singing birds; pigeons, parrots, parroquets, eagles, vultures, pelicans, ravens, macaws, and humming birds. Serpents are numerous, as, likewise, scorpions, spiders, ants, and mosquitoes and locusts, which are sometimes exceedingly destructive. The cochineal insect and the silkworm are extensively reared. In the rivers, in the lakes, and on the coasts, are found a variety of fish and a great number of alligators, the Mexican crocodile, and the cayman.

Area.—744,000 square miles.

Pop.—10,460,703. About 5,000,000 are pure "Indians" (speaking, it is said, 35 distinct languages), the rest comprising a mixture of various races, the white, or European-descended inhabitants, numbering about 500,000.

Lat. 18°—32° N. Lon. 95°—115° W.

Administrative Divisions.—The republic is composed of 27 states, the territory of Lower California, and the federal district of Mexico, seat of the central government. The following are the names of the states and their respective capitals:—

Federal District of Mexico	Mexico.

Political Constitution.—The present constitution of Mexico bears date February 5, 1857. By the terms of it Mexico is declared a federative republic, each state of which is permitted to manage its own local affairs, while the whole are cemented together in one body politic by fundamental and constituent laws. The powers of the supreme government are divided into three branches, the legislative, executive, and judiciary. The legislative power is vested in a congress consisting of a house of representatives and a senate, and the executive in a president. Representatives, elected by each state, at the rate of one member for 80,000 inhabitants, hold their places for two years. The qualifications requisite are, twenty-five years' age, and eight years' residence in the state. The senate consists of two members for each state, of at least thirty years of age, who are elected by a plurality of votes in the state congress. The members of both houses receive salaries of 2,000 dollars a year. The president and vice-president are elected by the congress of the states, and hold office for four years. A council of government, consisting of the vice-president and half the senate, sits during the recesses. The City of Mexico is the seat of government. The legislatures of each of the states are similar to that of the republic. The administration is carried on, under the direction of the president, by a council of six ministers, heads of the department of justice, finance, the interior, army and navy, foreign affairs, and public works.

Religion.—The Roman Catholic is the dominant church, and has one archbishop and 11 bishops.

Commerce.—The imports of Mexico average about £5,700,000 in annual value, and the exports about £5,100,000. The chief article of export is silver, of the estimated value of £3,000,000, the remainder comprising copper ores, cochineal, indigo, hides, and mahogany and other woods. The staple imports are cotton and linen manufactures, wrought iron, and machinery. More than two-thirds of the total trade of Mexico is carried on with the United States. The shipping belonging to the republic consists of about 360 vessels engaged in the foreign trade, and 670 coasters.

Railways and Telegraphs.—About 640 miles of railway are open for traffic, and there are about 3,750 miles of telegraph.

History.—The earliest inhabitants of whom any authentic accounts are preserved were the Toltecs, who occupied the country between the 7th and 13th centuries. They appear to have been a peaceful and industrial people, but were superseded by a more warlike and ambitious race, the Aztecs, who were, in 1519, conquered by the Spaniards, led by Cortez; and, after having been long engaged in a struggle with the mother country, and having been subjected to her authority, dissolved the connection in 1820. In 1822 it was acknowledged independent, and was governed by an emperor. In 1824 the form of government was changed into that of a federal republic, with the legislative power vested in a general congress, consisting of a senate and chamber of deputies. In 1835, Santa Anna, a successful general, changed the foderal into a central republic. In 1847 its armies were beaten by those of the United States, to which it was forced to yield upwards of 530,000 square miles of territory. In 1853 further concessions were made to the United States. In the same year Santa Anna, who had been deposed by the course of various revolutionary movements, was recalled, but was driven out in 1855. The internal dissensions induced England, France, and Spain to interfere, and a French expedition placed the Archduke Maximilian of Austria on the throne as emperor, but he was defeated and shot by Juarez, who was proclaimed president. MEXICO, the capital of the Republic, is the oldest city in America of which we have any account, and stands in a plain 7,470 feet above the level of the sea. The original city, or, as it was called, Tenochtitlan, was founded by the Mexicans in the year 1325, and was situated in the valley, on a group of islands in Lake Tezcuco, and connected with the mainland by three principal dykes, or causeways, formed of stone and earth. The ancient city was taken by Cortez, in the year 1521, and was completely destroyed, and the present city has risen out of its ruins. The situation is exactly the same; but owing to the diminution of the waters in Lake Tezcuco, the modern city stands on dry land, about three miles distant from the lake in which it was formerly built. It is inclosed by walls, and the ground on which it stands is quite level. The streets, which converge towards the Plaza Mayor, a very fine public square, are wide and well-paved. The lake communicates with the city by means of various small canals, which flow through some beautiful streets, and are covered with craft and canoes, which appear every day, loaded with supplies of fruit, flowers, and other produce, and make their way as far as the walls of the palace, situate in the great square. The city is entered by seven stone causeways, three of which were built by the Indians; the others are the work of the Spaniards. They are planted with trees, and form fine promenades. The public buildings are magnificent, and some of them of the most beautiful architecture. Those which chiefly attract attention are, the cathedral (erected on the site of the great Aztec temple of the god Mixitle), in the Plaza Mayor; 14 churches, about 50 monasteries and convents, among which is particularly distinguished the great convent of St. Francis, founded in the year 1531; the national palace, an immense building forming one side of the great square, and occupying the site of the palace in which Cortez was received by Montezuma. In the same square is the town-house (Casa Municipal) also used as an exchange; the Accordada prison, of which the apartments for the prisoners are generally spacious and well-aired; the School of Mines, and the old provisory establishment, with its fine collections in physics, mechanics, and mineralogy; the botanical garden, extremely rich in vegetable productions, either rare, or interesting with a view to commerce; the university and public library (in the courtyard of which is an equestrian statue of Charles V.); the Academy of Fine Arts, with a collection of ancient casts; a sepulchral monument, consecrated to Cortez, in a chapel of the Hospitale de los Naturales, and the mint. A large Plaza de Toros, for bull fights, will hold 3,000 spectators. There are two fine promenades, the Paseo Neievo and the Paseo de la Viga, and the Alameda is a beautifully planted park of about 12 acres, the resort of the fashionable and wealthy classes. Mexico being situate at the extremities of the lakes Tezcuco and Xochimilco, is abundantly supplied, by means of boats, with all the productions of the surrounding country. The houses are not loaded with useless ornaments. Two sorts of hewn stone, one a porphyry, give to the Mexican buildings an air of solidity, and sometimes of magnificence. Its general appearance is much heightened by the beautiful character of the scenery by which it is surrounded. Manf. Cloth, woollens, gold and silver lace, hard soap, cigars, carriages, and saddlery. The working of gold and silver in all its branches is carried to great perfection. Pop. 300,000. Lat. 19° 20′ 7″ N. Lon. 99° 5′ W.

MEXICO, a state of the Mexican Republic, bounded on the S. by the Pacific, and on the other sides by Michoacan, Queretaro, Vera Cruz, and La Puebla. It is very mountainous, but well watered, and rich in minerals. Area, 9,598 square miles. Pop. 710,579.

MEXICO, GULF OF, a large bay or gulf of the Atlantic, extending N. to S. from the coast of Florida to the coast of Tabasco and Yucatan, about 600 miles, and E. and W. from Cuba to the coast of Mexico, about 700. The coast is generally low and sandy or marshy, and lined with many lagoons. The largest bay is the Bay of Campeachy. The Mississippi, Rio Grande, Mobile, Appalachicola, Colorado, Pascagaula, and many other rivers, discharge into the Gulf. Area, 800,000 square miles. The gulf-stream sets into it at its S.E. part, and leaves it at its N.E. side through the strait of Florida.

MEXICO, a township of New York, United States, 145 miles from Albany. Pop. 4,500.

MEXICO, NEW. (See NEW MEXICO.)

MEYER, JAMES, mī-air, a Flemish historian, sometimes called Baliolianus, after his birthplace. He was rector of Blakenberg. His work relates to the history of his native country.

Born near Bailleul, in Flanders, 1491; died 1552.

MEYERBEER, GIACOMO, or JAKOB, mī-er-bair, a musical composer, son of a Jewish banker of Berlin, of a wealthy family. He was the schoolfellow of Carl Maria von Weber. His first dramatic piece, "Jephtha's Daughter," was produced at Munich when he was only 18 years of age. He afterwards studied at Vienna and in Italy, and subsequently his style was formed upon the Italian models. His best operas were "Sémiramide," "Robert le Diable" (produced in Paris in 1831, and one of the greatest of operatic successes), "Le Prophète," "L'Etoile du Nord," to conduct which last in person, at the Royal Italian Opera, he visited England in 1855; and "Dinorah."

Born at Berlin, 1794; died 1864.

MEYER, mī-er, a newly-formed county of Dakota Territory, United States. Area, 2,850 square miles. Pop. 115.

MEYMAC, mā-ma, a town of France, department Corrèze, 26 miles N.E. of Tulle. There are an ancient church and an hospital. A trade is carried on in horses, mules, and cattle. Pop. 3,700.

MEYRICK, SIR SAMUEL, mer-rik, an eminent antiquarian, whose chief works were "Arms and Armour," "Costume of the Original Inhabitants of the British Islands," and "A Critical Inquiry into Ancient Armour, as it existed in Europe, but more particularly in England, from the Norman Conquest to the Reign of Charles II."

Born 1783; died 1848.

MEZE, maiz, a town of France, department Hérault, on the lagoon of Thau, 18 miles S.E. of Montpellier. There are an old abbey, and a small but good harbour protected by forts. Manf. Liqueurs and salt. Pop. 6,500.

MEZEN, or MEZENE, me-zen', a river in the north of Russia, in Europe, rising in the government of Vologda, and after a course of 450 miles flowing into the White Sea.

MEZEN, a town of Russia, government of Archangel. 50 miles from the mouth of the river of the same name. Pop. 1,800.

MEZERAI, FRANÇOIS EUDES DE, mez'-e-rai, French historian, who was educated at the university of Caen; on leaving which, he obtained a military employment, and served two or three campaigns in Flanders. Having abandoned the army, he projected the "History of France," while writing which he was liberally encouraged by Cardinal Richelieu; and on its completion, in 1651, he obtained a pension from the king. He was also admitted a member of the Academy, and had a principal share in the compilation of the great dictionary. Besides his History of France, and an abridgment, he wrote a treatise on the Origin of the French, a continuation of the History of the Turks, several satires against the ministry, "History of a Mother and Son," &c.

Born at Ry, near Argentan, 1610; died 1683.

MEZIÈRES, mez'-e-air, an ancient built town of France, capital of the department Ardennes, on a peninsula formed by the Meuse, 45 miles N.E. of Rheims. It has a Gothic church, and is commanded by a citadel. A suspension bridge connects it with Charleville, on the opposite side of the Meuse. Manf. Ironmongery, cutlery, and leather. Pop. 5,800.—In 1520, the Chevalier Bayard successfully held this place against 40,000 Spaniards, and, in 1815, it held out for two months against the Russians.

MEZÖ-TUR, mai'-ze(r)-toor, a town of Hungary, on the Berettyo, an affluent of the Köros, 60 miles S.W. of Debreczen. Manf. Pottery. An important market is held. Pop. 21,000.

MEZZOFANTI, GIUSEPPE, Cardinal, met-so-fan'-te, a celebrated linguist, was the son of a carpenter, and was intended for the same trade; but being taken under the patronage of Father Respighi, was sent to the university of Bologna, where he so distinguished himself, that at the age of 22 he was appointed professor of Arabic. At that period he was master of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Spanish, French, German, and Swedish languages. During the war for which northern Italy was so long the field, Mezzofanti came into contact with soldiers of the Austrian, Russian, and French armies, and always turned the opportunity such meetings afforded him and other meetings with foreigners of studying the modern languages to the best account. In 1812, he became assistant, and in 1815, chief librarian of his university; and every traveller through Bologna made a point of seeing the great linguist. Lord Byron, when he visited the place, called him "a walking polyglot, a monster of languages, and a Briareus of parts of speech." Although he had received many flattering offers to take up his residence in Paris, Vienna, and Rome, it was not until 1831 that he was induced to settle in the last city. Mezzofanti, although incomparably the greatest linguist that ever lived, left no works, philological or otherwise, to perpetuate his fame; and notwithstanding his ability to express himself in fifty-eight different languages, and his acquaintance with sixty-four others, he wrote nothing of importance relative to any one of them.

Born at Bologna, 1774; died at Rome, 1849.

MEZZOJUSO, mat'-zo-zhoo'-so, a town of Sicily, province of Palermo, 21 miles S. of Palermo. Pop. 5,700, mostly Arnauts.

MEZZOLOMBARDO, mat'-zo-lom-bar'-do, a market-town of the Austrian empire, in Tyrol, 16 miles from Trent. There are a church, Franciscan monastery, and castle. Pop. 3,300.

MEZZOVO, or METZOVO, met-zo'-vo, a town of European Turkey, province of Albania, on the left bank of the Arta, in a pass of the Grammos Mountains, 23 miles N.E. of Janina. It is situated 3,000 feet above the sea-level. Manf. Woollens. There is a trade in wine. Pop. 5,000.

MGLIN, meg-lin', a town of Russia, government of Czernigov, 130 miles E. of the town of that name. There is a large trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 6,000.

MHENDIGUNJ, men-de-goonj', a town of British India, in Oude, near the right bank of the river Saee, 90 miles S.E. of Lucknow. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 20,000.

MHYE, mi, a river of India, rising in the Vindhaya Mountains, about 60 miles S.W. of Indore, and falling into the Arabian Sea, near the head of the Gulf of Cambay, 21 miles W. of Baroda.

MIAGAO, mc-a-ga'-o, a town of Panay, one of the Philippine Islands. The inhabitants are said to be intelligent, fairly educated, and industrious. Pop. 31,000.

MIAJADIS, me-a-hai'-dis, a town of Spain, province of Caceres, 32 miles S. of the town of that name. There is a very fine church, partly in ruins. Manf. Leather and oil. Agriculture and cattle rearing are principal occupations. Pop. 3,300.

MIAKO, KIOLO, or SAI-KIYO, me-a'-ko, formerly the capital of Japan, in the south-western part of the island of Nipon. It is well built, and the streets are wide, but, in consequence of the removal of the Mikado's court to Yedo in 1868, is much reduced in importance, except for its literary and educational institutions. Manf. Silk, noted for its fine quality and colour, and carved ornaments and Japan ware, of great beauty. Pop. 300,000.

MIAMI, GREAT, mi-am'-i, a river of the United States, rising by several branches in the western part of Ohio, and, after a course of 150 miles, entering the Ohio river 20 miles W. of Cincinnati.

MIAMI, the name of three counties of the United States.

INDIANA.—Area, 384 square miles. Pop. 24,683. The capital is Peru.

KANSAS.—Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 17,802. The capital is Paola.

OHIO.—Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 36,158. The capital is Troy.

MIAVA, me-a'-va, a town of Hungary, on an affluent of the Morava, 48 miles N.E. of Presburg. Manf. Woollens and linen. Pop. 9,200.

MICAH, mi'-ka, the sixth of the twelve minor prophets, lived in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. He prophesied the captivity of the tribes, and their deliverance by Cyrus; also of the coming of the Messiah.

Lived in the 8th century B.C.

MICHAEL I. (RHAGABE), mi'-kel, emperor of the East, succeeded to the throne on the death of Nicephorus I., in 811. He was a great prince, and the father of his people; but was deposed by Leo the Armenian, his general, in 813. He then retired to a monastery, where he spent the remainder of his days in devotion.

Died 846.

MICHAEL II. (BALBUS) was born in Upper Phrygia, of an obscure family; but was ennobled by Leo the Armenian. That monarch afterwards sent him to prison, and condemned him to death; but, the night previous to his intended execution, Leo was assassinated, and Michael placed on the throne, A.D. 820. He endeavoured to force his subjects to celebrate the Jewish sabbath and passover, and was guilty of great cruelties; on which his general, Euphemius, revolted, and proclaimed himself emperor; but was slain near Syracuse, in Sicily.
Died 829.

MICHAEL III. succeeded his father Theophilus, in 842, under the regency of his mother Theodora, whom he compelled to enter a monastery with her daughters. He at first associated Bardas, his uncle, with himself in the empire, and, at his instigation, sent St. Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople, into exile. Michael afterwards put Bardas to death, and elevated Basil the Macedonian to the title of Cæsar, by whom he was assassinated while drunk.
Died 867.

MICHAEL IV., usually styled the Paphlagonian, from the country where he was born, of obscure parentage. He obtained the imperial throne in 1034, through the influence of the empress Zoe, who, being enamoured of his person, murdered her husband, Romanus Argyropulus, and married him. Michael made war, with success, against the Saracens and Bulgarians; and afterwards retired to a monastery, where he died.
Died 1041

MICHAEL V. (CALAPHATES) succeeded his uncle, the preceding emperor, in 1041, after having been adopted by the empress Zoe, whom he exiled a few months afterwards, which so irritated the people, that they deprived him of his eyes and sent him to a monastery. Zoe and her sister Theodora then reigned in conjunction.
Died 1042.

MICHAEL VI. (Stratioticus, or the Warrior), reigned after the empress Theodora, in 1056; but, the year following, he was compelled to relinquish the sceptre to Isaac Comnenus; on which Michael retired to a monastery, in 1057.
Died 1057.

MICHAEL VII. (DUCAS PARAPINACES) was the eldest son of Constantine XI., and of Eudoxia. That princess, a few months after the death of her husband, married Diogenes, a Roman, whom she caused to be proclaimed emperor; but, in 1071, the usurper was taken prisoner by the Turks, and Michael regained the throne. In 1078, Nicephorus took Constantinople by the aid of the Turks, and Michael was obliged to retire to a monastery. He afterwards took orders, and became archbishop of Ephesus.
Died 1078.

MICHAEL VIII. (PALÆOLOGUS), regent of the empire during the minority of John Lascaris, whom he deprived of his throne and his eyes, in 1261. In the same year, he retook Constantinople. He signed an act for effecting a union between the Greek and Latin churches, which, however, did not succeed. Pope Martin IV. excommunicated him, as the supporter of heresy and schism.
Died 1282.

MICHAEL IX. (PALÆOLOGUS), associated in the empire with his father, Andronicus II.
Died 1326.

MICHAEL-ANGELO BUONAROTTI, an'-jai-lo bo-na-rot'-te, an Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, was descended from the Canossa, an ancient Tuscan family. Having evinced, from his earliest youth, the greatest talent for art, he was placed under the tuition of Bertoldo, a pupil of Domenico Ghirlandaio, and afterwards studied in the academy established by Lorenzo de' Medici. Lorenzo soon afterwards assigned him apartments in his palace, and treated him as if he were his own son. At the death of his magnificent patron, his fame was established. Julius II. invited him to settle at Rome, where Michael-Angelo carved the mausoleum of that pontiff: he also painted in fresco the ceiling of the Sistine chapel, and was, in succession, the favourite artist with three popes,—Leo X., Paul III., and Julius III. He planned the fortifications of Florence, and by his skill as a military engineer greatly assisted to defend that city. At the age of 40, he turned his talents to architecture, and constructed one of the grandest examples of that art,—the cupola of St. Peter's. Michael-Angelo's commanding genius has never been contested: all place him in the first rank as painter, sculptor, and architect. At Mantua there is a "Sleeping Cupid," and at Rome a "Bacchus," which Raffaelle said was worthy of Phidias or Praxitelcs. His "Last Judgment," in the Sistine chapel, Rome, remains a marvellous proof of his great genius as a painter. He completed St. Peter's, at Rome, refusing any remuneration for his work, which he regarded as a service to God. He was a man of a remarkable noble character and versatile genius, and was the author of poems and sonnets. He died at Rome, but his remains were removed to the church of Santa Croce, Florence.
Born at Chiusi, 1474; died 1564.

MICHAEL, or MIGUEL, ST., the largest island of the Azores, in the Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Portugal. It is of volcanic formation, and mountainous, but with very fertile valleys, producing maize, wheat, fruit, and wine. The export of oranges is very large. Manf. Druggets and coarse pottery. Pop. 81,000. Lat. 37° 48' N. Lon. 25° 8' W.

MICHAEL'S, ST., MOUNT, a granite rock on the north-west side of Mount's Bay, Cornwall, opposite Marazion. It rises in the form of a cone, 250 feet high, and has, on its summit, a castle, or fortified monastery, founded in the 5th century. It is the Ocrium of Ptolemy, whence tin was shipped in ancient times from Cornwall.

MICHAELIS, JOHANN DAVID, mi-ka-el'-is, German Biblical scholar, studied at Halle, where his father was a learned oriental scholar and professor. He travelled in England and Holland, and in 1745, was appointed professor of philosophy at Göttingen, and was for some years librarian to the university. He greatly assisted in the preparation of the expedition of discovery in Arabia, afterwards undertaken by Niebuhr. He was one of the earliest of the critical school of German theologians, and some of his more important works have been translated into English.
Born at Halle, 1717; died 1791.

MICHAILIENI, mik-ile'-e-a-ne, a town of Moldavia, the capital of a circle. Pop. 3,000.

MICHAILOVSKAIA, mik-ile-ov'-ski-a, a town of Russia, government of Don Cossacks, on the left bank of the Choper, 125 miles S.E. of Vovonej. Three important fairs are held annually. Pop. 13,500.

MICHAUD, JOSEPH, mē'-sho, French historian and poet, who was a member of the Institute under the Empire, and celebrated, in verse, the marriage of Napoleon and the birth of the king of Rome. Under the Restoration he acted as newspaper censor. His principal works were,—"History of the Crusades," and "History of the Hundred Days."

Born in Savoy, 1767; died 1839.

MICHELE, SAN, mik-ai'-lai, a town of Italy, province of Verona, on the Adige, 6 miles S.E. of Verona. There is a circular church, resorted to by pilgrims. Manf. Cordage. Pop. 3,500.

MICHELET, JULES, mē'-she-lai, modern French historian, who, in 1821, was appointed teacher of history and languages at the College Rollin. He commenced his literary career with the composition of several elementary works on the study of history, which, obtaining considerable popularity, attracted the attention of the government towards him as a writer of research. He received the appointment of chief officer in the historical department of the French Archives, and was soon afterwards selected by Guizot to continue the latter's lectures on history to the Faculty of Literature. In 1838 he was appointed professor of history in the College of France. In 1845-46 considerable attention was directed towards two works of this author, translations of which appeared in England, under the titles, "The People," "Priests, Women, and Families." In consequence of the attacks made in these works upon the ecclesiastical party, Guizot, the prime minister, interdicted his lectures. In 1847 he commenced his "History of the French Revolution;" upon which, and the "History of France," he was afterwards engaged. Translations of both these works, as far as they have been published, have appeared in England. Michelet's style is marked by great vehemence and pictorial power. He is strongly given to generalize, and has a great deal of the poet in his nature. His latest works are "The Bird," "The Insect," "Love," "The Bible of Humanity," and "Our Sons," a work advocating a compulsory system of education.

Born at Paris, 1798; died 1874.

MICHELSTADT, mi'-kel-stat, a town of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the right bank of the Minding, 20 miles S.E. of Darmstadt. Manf. Woollens, cottons, leather, and iron. Pop. 3,000.

MICHIGAN, mich'-i-gan, one of the United States. It consists of two peninsulas of irregular shape, bounded N. by Lake Superior and St. Mary's river, N.E. by Lake Huron, E. by St. Clair's river and lake, by Detroit river, and Lake Erie, S. by Ohio and Indiana, and W. by Lake Michigan. The northern peninsula is covered with woods, lakes, and rivers, and is mountainous and rocky, the Porcupine Mountains attaining an elevation of 2,000 feet; the soil is barren, and the climate cold. The southern peninsula is level and fertile, and comprises a large extent of prairie-land. Wheat, oats, maple-sugar, wool, and live stock are produced.

Rivers.—The most important are the Kalimazoo, the Muskegon, the Grand, and the Saginaw, in the southern peninsula.

Minerals.—Copper, lead, coal, gypsum, limestone, and marl.

Manf.—Woollens, cottons, iron forges and furnaces, tanneries, breweries, and distilleries.

Area.—56,243 square miles.

Pop.—1,636,937. Though far north, there are several thousand coloured inhabitants, probably descended from refugees in the slave-hunting period.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 80 counties. The chief towns are LANSING, the capital; ANN ARBOR, DETROIT, Grand Haven, Kalimazoo, MARSHALL, and MONROE.

History.—The French made a settlement at Detroit in 1610. The state of Michigan was constituted and admitted to the Union in 1837.

MICHIGAN, LAKE, one of the five great lakes of North America, and the second in size, included in the territories of the United States, having Michigan on the north and west, and Wisconsin on the west. It is 320 miles long, and 70 in average breadth. The mean depth is 900 feet, and it is 595 feet above the sea level. The shores are bold, and sometimes dangerous. Chicago, Milwaukee, Michigan City, and Grand Haven are the principal ports. Area, 25,000 square miles.

MICHIGAN CITY, a town of Indiana, United States, on the southern shore of Lake Michigan, 42 miles S.E. of Chicago. It is an important lake port, and a large trade is carried on. Pop. 7,366.

MICHOACAN, mik-o'-a-kan, a maritime state of the republic of Mexico, bounded S.W. by the Pacific. The coast line is 100 miles long. The state is very mountainous, being traversed by the Sierra Madre. The chief rivers are the Lerma and Mescala, and there are many lakes. The soil is very fertile. Area, 21, 609 square miles. Pop. 784,108. The chief towns are MORELIA (the capital), Ario, Puruandiro, Zacambaro, and Zamora.

MICKIEWICZ, ADAM, mik'-e-vitch, Polish poet, who was exiled from Poland in 1824, and in 1839 was appointed professor of Slavonic literature at Paris, but was suspended in 1844.

Born 1798; died 1855.

MICKLE, WILLIAM JULIUS, mik'-el, Scotch poet, who became corrector of the press at the Clarendon printing office, Oxford, and is better known by his translation of the "Lusiad" of Camoens, and his ballad "Cumnor Hall," which suggested Scott's "Kenilworth."

Born 1734; died 1788.

MIDAS, mī'-das, in Greek legend, son of Gordius and Cybele, was a king of Phrygia. Having shown hospitality to Silenus, the preceptor of Bacchus, he was permitted by the god to choose whatever recompense he pleased. He had the avarice to demand that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted; but, when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away so fatal a present. He was then ordered to wash himself in the river Pactolus, whose sands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Midas subsequently declared that Pan was superior to Apollo in singing and playing upon the flute; for which opinion the offended god changed his ears into those of an ass, to show his ignorance and stupidity. The name Midas is given to other mythical kings of Phrygia.

MIDDLEBURG, mid'-del-boorg, a town of the Netherlands, capital of the province of Zealand, situate in the small island of Walcheren, 45 miles from Rotterdam, and connected with the sea by a ship canal 5 miles long. It is nearly circular in form, and surrounded by a wide canal. Some of its streets are wide and handsome, and shaded with trees, and it is on the whole one of the finest cities in the northern provinces. The market-place forms a spacious square, and part of the town is traversed by canals, across several of which are drawbridges. The town-house, which has a beautiful tower, was founded in 1648, and is decorated with many statues. The provincial states meet in a building, part of an abbey founded in the 12th century. Manf. Starch, glass, paper, leather, snuff, chocolate, powder, and sugar; and there are saw-mills. Pop. 12,655.—This was formerly one of the leading commercial cities. In 1573-4 the Spaniards endured a siege of 22 months, and were compelled by famine to surrender.

MIDDLEBURY, the capital of Addison county, Vermont, United States, beautifully situated on the Otter Creek, 35 miles S. of Burlington. The town is the seat of Middlebury College. There are quarries of fine marble in the vicinity. Pop. 3,500.

MIDDLEHAM, mid'-del-ham, a market-town of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, on the Ure, 10 miles from Richmond. Here are the ruins of a once magnificent castle, built in 1190. In it Edward IV. was detained a prisoner by the earl of Warwick.—Middleham Moor, in the neighbourhood, is a noted place for the training of race-horses.

MIDDLESBOROUGH, mid'-dels-bru(r), a market-town, port, and parliamentary borough of the North Riding of Yorkshire, at the mouth of the Tees, 48 miles N.E. of York. There are five churches, and numerous other places of worship; a large and handsome royal exchange, in which the weekly iron-market is held, built in 1867, and there are many fine commercial buildings in the town. A dock, where large quantities of coal from the South Durham fields and iron are shipped, was constructed in 1842, and has been since considerably enlarged, and will now accommodate the largest ships. There is a well laid out public park of 72 acres, given, in 1866, by Mr. Bolckow. The rapid growth of this town has been remarkable. Previous to 1840, when ironstone was discovered in the Cleveland hills, it was a small hamlet with a few hundred inhabitants, the first house having been erected in 1830. In 1841 iron works were established, and three years afterwards other works were opened, most of which are now very large establishments. Manf. Locomotive engines, boilers, rails, machinery, chemicals, and pottery. Shipbuilding is extensively carried on. Pop. 55,288.—A station on the North-Eastern railway.

MIDDLESEX, mid'-del-sex, an inland county of England, comprising the city of London, and bounded S. by Surrey and part of Kent, N. by Hertfordshire, W. by Buckinghamshire, and E. by Essex. The Thames divides it from Surrey and Kent, the Colne from Buckinghamshire, and the Lea from Essex. Between it and Hertfordshire there is no natural boundary. Excepting Rutlandshire, it is the smallest county in England. In general the surface is undulating, with considerable inequalities in some parts, and extensive levels in others. The ground rises from the banks of the Thames towards the north; and within a few miles of London there is a range of eminences,—namely, Harrow, Hampstead, Highgate, Muswell-hill, and others; and a yet higher and more extensive ridge runs north-eastward in Edgeware and Barnet, to the forest scenery of Enfield Chase. The Brent, a small stream, is the most important river within the county. The New River supplies great part of the metropolis with water. There are, besides, the Grand Junction, the Paddington, and the Regent canals, which greatly assist the internal communication of the county. In the western part of the county is an extensive level tract, very thinly inhabited, being mostly occupied as pasture and farm land. The soil is not naturally very fertile, except on the banks of the Thames, but London furnishes immense quantities of valuable manure. About one-fifth of the whole surface is occupied with nurseries, gardens, and pleasure-grounds, and not more than one-fifth is in tillage. The corn crops raised are chiefly wheat and barley, the green crops various; such as beans, peas, turnips, cabbages, white and red clovers, rye-grass, &c. The raising of willows for the basket-makers is pursued to a considerable extent, and forms a very lucrative branch of cultivation. The extensive tracts of waste land, uncultivated heath, and commons, such as Hounslow Heath, Finchley Common, Enfield Chase, &c., which formerly existed in this county, are now mostly inclosed, and in the way of improvement.

Area.—281 square miles.

Pop.—As the metropolitan county, the proportion of population to area is larger than that of any other county of England. The census of 1881 gave 2,918,874 as the number of inhabitants; but excluding the metropolitan boroughs, the population of the county may be taken as 370,000.

Chief Towns.—Exeluding the metropolis, the most important towns, none of large size, are Brentford, the county town; Harrow, Hounslow, Staines, and Uxbridge.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county.

MIDDLESEX, a county of Ontario province, Canada. Area, 1,228 square miles. Pop. 73,000. The capital is London.

MIDDLESEX, the name of four counties of the United States.

Connecticut.—Area, 430 square miles. Pop. 36,000. The capitals are Middletown and Haddam.

Massachusetts.—Area, 883 square miles. Pop. 317,830. The capitals are Cambridge and Lowell.

New Jersey.—Area, 399 square miles. Pop. 52,286. The capital is New Brunswick.

Virginia.—Area, 170 square miles. Pop. 5,000, more than half being coloured. The capital is Saluda.

MIDDLETON, mid'-del-ton, a market-town of Lancashire, 6 miles N.E. of Manchester. It has a church, several chapels, and a free grammar-school. Manf. Cotton and silk goods. Pop. 18,952.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

MIDDLETON, a market-town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, on a navigable stream of the same name flowing into Cork harbour, 14 miles E. of the city of Cork. There is a good college. Pop. 3,600.

MIDDLETON, Conyers, English divine and critic, received his education at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow in 1706. In 1717 he was created D.D., on which occasion he resisted the claim of Dr. Bentley, regius professor, to exorbitant fees. This occasioned a lawsuit, in which Middleton triumphed. A personal enmity was the consequence of this affair; and when Bentley printed his proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, Middleton attacked them with such force that the design was abandoned. In 1724 he spent some time in Italy, and on his return published his famous "Letter from Rome," showing that the religious rites of the Roman Church were drawn from the heathens. An attack on Dr. Waterland's "Vindication of the Scripture," in 1730, drew upon Middleton the charge of infidelity, and he narrowly escaped academical censure. In 1741 appeared his "Life of Cicero," a very curious and valuable work, and highly necessary towards forming a just idea of the character and writings of that great man, as well as exhibiting an exact picture of the Roman republic in his time. In 1743 he published the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus, and those of Brutus to Cicero, in Latin and English, with a vindication of their authenticity. In 1747 appeared his "Discourse on the Miraculous Powers supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church, from the earliest ages." This work gave great alarm to the clergy, and numerous answers were written to it. He was continually involved in theological controversies. Middleton's style is admirable, and his learning was profound and multifarious.

Born at Richmond, Yorkshire, 1683; died 1750.

MIDDLETON, SIR HUGH, a wealthy citizen and goldsmith of London, and practical engineer, who, in 1606, offered, at his own cost, to supply London with pure water. His proposal being accepted, he commenced what he termed the "New River," selecting the Chadwell and Amwell springs at Ware, in Hertfordshire, as the sources thereof. The river had a course of about 37 miles, and its projector had stipulated to complete it in four years; but the mechanical appliances of that day not proving equal to such a speedy completion of the work, and Middleton's fortune being, moreover, exhausted, he applied to his fellow-citizens for assistance. Meeting with no response, he petitioned James I., who entered into an agreement with him to pay half the present or prospective expenses, on condition of being entitled to half the property. In little more than a year the great work was completed, and on the 29th September, 1613, the water of the New River entered a reservoir prepared for its reception at Sadler's Wells, near Pentonville. The work had occupied five years and five months in its execution, and had cost £500,000. There was no dividend, however, for nineteen years, and then only one under £12. Meanwhile Middleton had been knighted, but had been compelled to sell his shares, and made a profession of what is now termed civil engineering. In token of his services, he was created a baronet in 1622. These services were set forth as follows:—"For bringing to the city of London, with excessive charge and greater difficulty, a new cut, or river of fresh water, to the great benefit and inestimable preservation thereof. 2. For gaining a very great and spacious quantity of land, in Brading Haven, in the Isle of Wight, out of the bowelles of the sea; and, with banks and pyles, and most strange defensible and chargeable mountains, fortifying the same against the violence and fury of the waves," &c. In 1636, Charles I. made over to Sir Hugh the whole of his father's shares for a yearly rent of £500. A commemorative statue of Sir Hugh, at Islington, was inaugurated by Mr. Gladstone.

Born 1565; died 1631.

MIDDLETON, THOMAS, an English dramatic writer, who wrote in conjunction with Jonson, Fletcher, and Massinger. In 1620 he was appointed city poet of London. Three of his plays, —"A Mad World, my Masters," "The Mayor of Queenborough," and "The Roving Girl,"—are included in Dodsley's collection of old plays. These were his best works; but there are many others by him. In 1624 he was censured by the Privy Council for allusions in his "Game of Chess" to the king and ambassador of Spain. His play "The Witch," is supposed to have suggested the witch scenes in Shakspeare's "Macbeth."

Died 1627.

MIDDLETOWN, mid'-del-toun, a township of New York, United States, 55 miles N. of New York. Manf. Agricultural implements, blankets, and chemicals. Pop. 6,500.

MIDLOTHIAN. (See EDINBURGH.)

MIDNAPORE, mid-na-por' a district of Bengal, in the province of Orissa, British India. Is hilly in the west, but level in other parts, traversed by affluents of the Hooghly. Pro. Rice, indigo, sugar, silk, salt, wax, honey, and lac. Manf. Cotton cloths and gauzes, metal and shell ornaments. Area, 5,029 square miles. Pop. 2,517,802. Lat. 21° 41'—22° 57' N. Lon. 86° 36'—87° 59' E.

MIDNAPORE, capital of the above district, on the left bank of the Cassai, 72 miles S.W. of Calcutta. It has a gaol, hospital, barracks, and is the station of the British judge, &c. Pop. 33,560.

MIERES (DEL CAMINO), me-air'-es, a town of Spain, province of Oviedo, on the right bank of the Lena. There are a fine old palace and a church. In the vicinity are mines of iron, sulphur, coal, and cinnabar. Pop. 4,000.

MIERIS, FRANCIS, meer'-is, called the Elder, a celebrated Dutch painter, who was the disciple of Gerard Douw, whose manner he imitated. His pictures are very valuable.

Born at Leyden, 1635; died 1681.

MIFFLIN, mif'-flin, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 375 square miles. Pop. 19,577. The capital is Lewistown.

MIGNARD, PETER, meen'-yard, called the Roman, from his long residence at Rome, was the favourite artist of Louis XIV., whose portrait he painted ten times. He also adorned the palaces of St. Cloud and Versailles, and was ennobled by Louis.

Born 1610; died 1695.

MIGNET, FRANÇOIS AUGUSTE ALEXIS, meen'-yai, an eminent modern French historian, who was educated for the legal profession at Aix, but removed to Paris in 1821, and in 1824 produced, when only 28 years of age, his "History of the French Revolution, from 1789 to 1814." He was afterwards extensively employed as a journalist, and was associated with Armand Carrel and Thiers in conducting the "National." After the revolution of 1830 he was made a councillor of state, and appointed director of the archives in the foreign ministerial department, which office he vacated in 1848. His principal works are, "History of Mary Stuart," "Charles V.," "Negotiations relative to the Spanish Succession under Louis XIV.," several treatises on moral and political science, and for many years he has been engaged on a History of the Reformation, the League and the reign of Henry IV.

Born at Aix, 1796.

MIGUEL, DOM MARIA EVARIST, mig'-oo-ail, third son of John VI. of Portugal. He spent his early years in Brazil, and was so uneducated that when, at the age of 19, he returned to Portugal he could neither read nor write. He conspired with his mother to depose his father, and, by the assassination of the old Marquis of Loulé, and the arrest of the ministers in 1824, endeavoured to carry out his design, but failed; and he and his mother were banished. For two years he led a wild and dissolute life, and at the death of his father, in 1826, he claimed the throne, which had been resigned by his elder brother, Dom Pedro (who had become emperor of Brazil), to his daughter. It was proposed that Miguel should marry the young princess and carry on the government as regent. To this he agreed, but his mother objected, and, urged by her, he proclaimed himself king, and a disastrous war succeeded and lasted eight years, till Miguel was completely defeated, and resigned his claim to the throne. But he was no sooner safe out of the country than he repudiated the promise he had made, and endeavoured to excite a renewed agitation, in which he was encouraged by the pope, who recognised him as king of Portugal. In return for this treachery, the Portuguese government confiscated his estates and pension. He afterwards took up his residence in Baden.

Born at Lisbon, 1802; died 1866.

MIGUELTURRA, mig'-ooail-toor'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Ciudad-Real. There is a superb church, Santo Cristo de Misericordia. Manf. Leather, brandy, coarse woollens, oil, bricks, and tiles. Pop. 5,500.

MIGULINSKAIA, mi-gool-ins'-ki-a, a town of Russia, government Don Cossacks, on the right bank of the Don, 160 miles N.E. of Novo-Tcherkask. An annual fair is held. Pop. 13,000.

MIKLOSICH, FRANZ, mik-los-itch', learned Slav philologist, studied law at Grätz, and afterwards practised as an advocate at Vienna, where he was appointed to a post in the imperial library, and in 1850 professor of Slavic. His works on the Slav language place him in the highest rank of philologists.

Born at Luttenberg, Styria, 1813.

MIKNAS, MEQUINEZ, or MEKNAZA, mik'-nas, a town of Morocco, province of Fez, 38 miles S.W. of Fez. It is surrounded by triple walls, and contains the finest palace in the kingdom, built of marble, and surrounded by beautiful gardens. This is the summer residence of the sultan. Manf. Earthenware and leather. There is a large trade in native produce, and olives are extensively cultivated in the vicinity. Pop. probably 30,000.

MIKULLINCE, mik'-ul-lin'-ce, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, on the Seret, 12 miles S. of Tarnopol. There is an old castle, now used as a linen factory. A large trade is carried on in cattle, wax, honey, hemp, and linen and woollen fabrics. In the vicinity are mineral springs, which are much frequented. Pop. 3,400.

MILAH, mi-la', a town of Algeria, North Africa, 21 miles N.W. of Constantine. It is surrounded by fruit and flower gardens. Pop. 4,000.

MILAM, mi'-lam, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,048 square miles. Pop. 18,659, one-third being coloured. The capital is Cameron.

MILAN mi-lan' (MILANO, me-la'-no), a city of Italy, province of Milano, in the centre of the great plain of Lombardy, on the river Olona, between the Ticino and the Adda, 75 miles N.E. of Turin. Its form is compact and nearly circular, enclosed on three sides by walls, entered by 10 gates, and about 8 miles in circumference. It is built with little regard to regularity, but the streets are wide and well kept, and the houses are generally commodious and handsome. The public edifices display all the richness and magnificence of Italian architecture. Of these the cathedral, or Duomo, is the grandest and most imposing specimen of Gothic architecture extant. It is built of white marble, and is remarkable for the extreme lightness of its construction. It is 485 feet long, 252 broad, and the dome is 355 feet high. It was commenced in 1386 by Visconti, and many famous artists have since contributed to its embellishment. For the delicacy of its carvings it is unrivalled, and it is adorned by 106 pinnacles and upwards of 4,500 statues. Several of the other churches are worth attention, both for their architecture and the statues and paintings of celebrated masters which decorate their interior. The church of St. Ambrogia, founded in the 4th century, is that in which the emperors of Germany were formerly crowned kings of Italy, and it contains many interesting historical monuments. The Dominican church, Santa Marie delle Grazie, and the new church of San Carlo Borromeo, each of which contains some fine paintings, and St. Sebastiano, on the site of a Roman temple, are fine churches.

The chief official edifices are the Palazzo Reale, or La Corte; the Palazzo di Governo, the Palazzo del Marino (the custom-house), the Broletto, or Palazzo Municipali, and the Palazzo de' Tribunalis. Hospitals and charitable institutions are numerous, and some of them large, especially the great hospital, founded by the Sforzas, in 1456, and the Trivulzi hospital for aged pensioners. Of theatres there are no less than nine, most of them small; but the opera-house, La Scala, rivals in size and magnificence the famous theatre of Naples. The residences of the great families, though less grand than those of Rome and Genoa, display a similar architectural luxury, and several of them possess valuable collections of paintings. A triumphal arch on the road leading from Milan to the Simplon, called the Arco della Pace, is the finest in the city. In the esplanade, or Piazza di Castello, is an arena, in imitation of the amphitheatre of the Romans: it was made in 1806, by order of Bonaparte. Adjoining it is a large square, the Piazza d' Armi. Of the literary and scientific institutions the first is the Ambrosian college, with its valuable library of 60,000 volumes and about 15,000 manuscripts, together with a fine gallery of paintings, statues, antiques, medals, and curiosities. The Brera palace, formerly a Jesuit college, is now known as the Palace of Arts and Sciences, and contains an academy of arts, a fine gallery of pictures, and a very large public library; and attached to it are an observatory and botanic garden. The university of Milan was instituted by the empress Maria Theresa, in 1766. The Collegio Helvetico, or Swiss College, is also an interesting institution on a smaller scale. Milan contains, likewise, academies of sculpture, architecture, and agriculture, a conservatory of music, a museum, a cabinet of natural history, and, at the Mint, a collection of coins and medals. The most fashionable promenade is the Corso, the principal street; and another favourite place of resort is the Christopher-arcade, where are many brilliant shops. Manf. Silks, ribbons, lace, velvets, cotton, carpets, jewellery, cutlery, glass, porcelain, and paper. There are various other manufactures on a small scale, and it is the largest book-mart in Italy. A considerable trade in silk, grain, rice, and cheese is carried on. Pop. 309,614, besides military. Lat. 45° 28′ 1″ N. Lon. 9° 11′ 20″ E.—Milan was founded 400 B.C., and is one of the few cities of Italy which survived the devastation of ages, and has brought down its celebrity to modern times. It suffered much during the wars of the middle ages; but it always rose with new lustre from its misfortunes. In 1796 the French, under Bonaparte, made themselves masters of it; but, in 1799, they were driven from it by the Austrians and Russians. After the battle of Marengo it again was possessed by the French, was made the capital of the Cisalpine Republic, and continued the seat of their viceroy until the fall of Bonaparte, in 1814. In 1815 it was restored to Austria, and, in 1859, Napoleon III. and Victor Emmanuel, king of Sardinia, entered it in triumph, after the battle of Magenta; and Milan was ceded to the kingdom of Italy by the treaty of Villafranca.

MILANO, or MILAN, one of the provinces of Italy, bounded on the N. by Como, on the W. by the Ticino, on the S. by Lodi and Pavia, and on the E. by the Adda. Area, 760 square miles. Pop. 1,153,871.

MILAZZO, me-lat'-so, a fortified seaport-town of Sicily, 20 miles W. of Messina. It consists of an upper and lower town, both irregularly built, and strongly defended. There is a good harbour. It has an export trade in wine, fruit, silk, corn, oil, tunny, and liqueurs. Pop. 13,000.—In 1860 Garibaldi, with a small force of volunteers, compelled the Neapolitans to evacuate the fortress.

MILAZZO, GULF OF, extends to the E. about 16 miles, and has been the scene of many engagements in both ancient and modern times.

MILETO, me-lai'-to, a town of Italy, province of Calabria Ulteriore, 4 miles S.W. of Monteleone. It has a bishop's palace and a cathedral. Pop. 2,200.

MILETUS, mi-lē'-tus, anciently the greatest city of Ionia, Asia Minor, at the mouth of the Mæander. It was famous for woollen manufactures. The Persians destroyed it 494 B.C. It was rebuilt, but never regained its importance. There are ruins of a Greek temple, afterwards a Christian church, a large theatre, and an aqueduct.

MILFORD, mil'-ford, a parliamentary borough (with Pembroke) and seaport of South Wales, on the northern shore of Milford Haven, 6 miles N.W. of Pembroke. The town was established about the beginning of the present century, as a mail-packet station, and a dockyard was built, but removed in 1814. There are a fine church, several chapels, a custom-house, and good market buildings. New docks and quays have recently been constructed, and the town is now progressing. There is a trade in timber, limestone, and anthracite, and the oysters are of fine quality. Pop. 2,836.—A station on the Great Western railway.

MILFORD, a town of Massachusetts, United States, 34 miles S.W. of Boston. Manf. Machinery and boots and shoes. Pop. 10,000.

MILFORD HAVEN, a deep inlet of the sea in Wales, county of Pembroke. It is completely land-locked, and has a length of 17 miles and an average breadth of 2. It is easy of access, of depth sufficient for the largest vessels, and is reputed one of the finest natural harbours in the world.

MILHAU, or MILLAU, me-lo', a town of France, in department Aveyron, on the right bank of the Tarn, 30 miles from Rodez. In the 16th and 17th centuries it was one of the strongholds of the Calvinists. Manf. Silk twist, chamois leather, and leather gloves. Pop. 13,800.

MILIANAH, mil-e-a'-na, a town of Algeria, 68 miles S.W. of Algiers, on a mountain slope, 3,000 feet above the sea level. There are twenty-five mosques. There is a French garrison. Pop. 8,000.

MILITARY FRONTIER, a border crown land of the Austrian empire, known as the Croato-Slavonic Military Frontier, bounded N. by Croatia and Slavonia; E. by Hungary; S. by Dalmatia and Turkey, and W. by the Adriatic Sea. The surface is elevated in the western part, and the coast-line generally rocky. The Unna and the Save, the chief rivers, flow in an eastern direction. Area, 7,840 square miles. Pop. 700,000. This district was established in the 15th century as a defensive frontier against the Turks, and all the able-bodied men are trained to bear arms, but only a small portion are employed on active service.

MILITELLO, me-le-tel'-lo, a city of Sicily, province of Catania, 21 miles S.W. of the town of that name. There are salt lagoons in the vicinity. Pop. 8,000.

MILITSCH, mi-litch', a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the Bartsch, 31 miles N.E. of Breslau. There are a castle, three churches, and a synagogue. Manf. Woollens, linen, and leather. Pop. 3,500.

MILL, JAMES, mil, an eminent historian, who, after receiving some education at the grammar-school of Montrose, and continuing in the house of Sir John Stuart, M.P. for Kincardineshire, was sent to the university of Edinburgh to study for the Church. After distinguishing himself as a Greek scholar, and in moral philosophy, he obtained a licence to preach in 1798; but, changing his views, he, two years afterwards, went to London with Sir John Stuart. For some time he supported himself by means of the "Literary Journal;" but, on the discontinuance of that print, he was engaged to write for others, and occasionally contributed to the "Edinburgh Review." He commenced his great "History of British India" in 1806, and completed it in the year 1818. The knowledge and ability displayed in the course of this history led, in 1819, to his being employed in the Correspondence department of the East-India Company, of which he afterwards became the head. Besides his great work on India, Mr. Mill contributed articles on Education, Government, Jurisprudence, Law of Nations, Liberty of the Press, &c., to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." In 1822 he published "The Elements of Political Economy," and, seven years subsequently, "The Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind." His latest efforts were the "Fragment on Mackintosh," and the articles on "The Formation of Opinions," and "The Ballot," in the Westminster Review. He took an active part in the establishment of University College, London. He was a man of determined and somewhat austere mind, a thinker of remarkable clearness, and possessed of vast scholarship. Early in life he rejected all theological dogmas, and devoted himself to hard reasoning and historical researches.

Born at Montrose, 1773; died at Kensington, 1836.

MILL, JOHN STUART, an eminent writer on political economy, was son of the preceding, who himself educated him so efficiently that the child was one of the greatest prodigies of intellectual acquirement of whom we have any record. He was well acquainted with history, philosophy, the chief classic authors, Latin and Greek languages, the principles of political economy, and the rudiments of many other sciences, at an age when children are generally in a very elementary stage of education. He never was permitted to play, and even when taking exercise was accompanied by his father, who questioned him as to his knowledge of the laws of the Greek republics, or of the Benthamite philosophy. When 14 years of age he went to France, and made himself acquainted with the French language and literature. On his return, at the age of 17, he was appointed to a clerkship in the East-India House, and, after many years of service, rose to the grade of examiner of Indian correspondence, the post formerly held by his father. His first literary efforts appeared in the form of contributions to the Westminster and Edinburgh Reviews, and his next work was the "Essays on some Unsettled Questions of Political Economy." The more extensive "Principles of Political Economy" succeeded, and, in 1835, he undertook the management of the "London and Westminster Review," and carried it on until 1840. He was a frequent contributor to magazines and newspapers on questions of the day, in all of which he showed himself a brilliant advocate of the principles of advanced liberalism. In 1843 he wrote a system of logic, followed by several treatises on subjects connected with political economy; in 1859, his famous essay on Liberty; and among his latest productions were works on Positivism, the philosophy of Sir William Hamilton, and the subjection of women. In 1867 he was elected rector of St. Andrew's University. Two years previously he had been returned to the House of Commons for Westminster, but lost his seat at the general election of 1868. His "Autobiography," which contains very interesting records of his studies and recollections of eminent persons, with whom he associated, and "Three Essays on Religion," were posthumous publications. In this famous work he refers with great feeling to the influence on his intellectual life of his wife, who had been Mrs. Taylor, a lady with whom, during the life of her first husband, he had been on terms of close friendship. After retiring from parliament, he chiefly passed his time in literary retirement at Avignon, where Mrs. Mill died and was buried, and where he died.

Born in London, 1806; died at Avignon, 1873.

MILLAIS, JOHN EVERETT, mil'-lais, an English painter, one of the founders of that body of innovators in modern art termed the "Pre-Raphaelite" school. A student of drawing from a very early period, he entered the Royal Academy school, and, by the time he had reached his 19th year, he had carried off all the honours to be gained in that probationary period. He became A.R.A. in 1853, and R.A. in 1856.

Born at Southampton, 1828.

MILLARD, mil'-lard, a county of Utah Territory, United States. Area, 6,000 square miles. Pop. 3,000. The capital is Fillmore City.

MILLEDGEVILLE, mil'-lej-vil, a town, and formerly the capital of Georgia, United States, on the right bank of the Oconee, 150 miles N.W. of Savannah. Cotton is extensively cultivated in the vicinity. Pop. 2,800, more than half being coloured.

MILLE LACS, mil'-lak', a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 684 square miles. Pop. 1,500. The capital is Princeton.

MILLER, HUGH, mil'-ler, geologist and author, whose father was lost at sea on board a small vessel of which he was the owner, while Hugh was still a child. He was sent to the parish school, and in course of time was apprenticed to the trade of a stonemason. From the time he had mastered the art of reading, he had been assiduous in his search after knowledge, and a love of natural history had been fostered in him by his uncle. While hewing stones in the quarry, he was engaged in observing their geological facts. Of poetry, also, he was very fond; and, after seeking in vain to get a certain effusion in rhyme inserted in a newspaper, he published, in 1829, a volume of verse, which brought him into notice, and obtained for him the clerkship of a bank in his native place. The leisure afforded by this occupation he turned to good account. After contributing for a short period to the "Inverness Courier," he published "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland." He was next selected by the "Free Church" party to edit their organ, the "Witness" newspaper, a post which he continued to fill until his death. His first geological paper appeared in this print, and when the British Association met at Glasgow, in 1840, Sir Charles Lyell, Dr. Buckland, and Sir Roderick Murchison, all expressed themselves astonished and delighted at the labours of the new scientific writer. One of the fishes described by him in this course, was named, by Professor Agassiz, after Mr. Miller. A republication of the papers afterwards took place, under the title of the "Old Red Sandstone; or, New Walks in an Old Field." His ready, picturesque, and vigorous pen was henceforth constantly employed; and he produced, after a visit to the south, "First Impressions of England and its People;" "Footprints of the Creator,"—an answer to some of the statements of the "Vestiges of Creation;" the "Geology of the Bass," and the "Testimony of the Rocks," in which he endeavoured to reconcile the results of geological science with the account of Creation in the book of Genesis. He also lectured upon his favourite science in Edinburgh and London, and, in 1855, read a paper on the "Fossil Flora of Scotland," before the British Association at Glasgow. In addition to the above-mentioned works, he gave to the world a most interesting account of his early life, in a work called "My Schools and Schoolmasters." In 1856, while labouring under a paroxysm of disease of the brain, he shot himself through the body.

Born at Cromarty, 1802; died at Portobello, 1856.

MILLER, JOSEPH, an English comedian, best known as the reputed collector of the famous Joe Miller's jest-book, with which, however, he had nothing to do.

Born 1684; died 1738.

MILLER, PATRICK, one of the inventors of steam navigation. He was a Scotch gentleman of independent means, and in 1785 commenced experiments on a loch, near his estate at Dalswinton, Dumfriesshire, on various modes of propulsion. Three years later, with the help of a tutor named Taylor, and Symington, the engineer, he constructed a small steamboat, and in the following year a larger vessel, which was tried on the Forth and Clyde Canal. Having spent about £30,000 on experiments, he passed the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits.

Born at Dalswinton, 1730; died 1815.

MILLER, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 3,200, about one-third being coloured. The capital is Colquit.

MILLER, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 570 square miles. Pop. 10,000. The capital is Tuscumbia.

MILLETIÈRE, THEOPHILUS BRACHET, Sieur de la, meel-lat'-te-air, a Protestant advocate, who instigated the Protestants at Rochelle to take up arms in defence of their religion. In 1628 he was arrested at Toulouse, and kept in prison four years. On regaining his liberty, he turned Catholic, and wrote against the Calvinists.

Died 1665.

MILLIN, AUBIN-LOUIS, mee'-ya, a celebrated French antiquary, who acted as keeper of the medals and antiquities in the Royal Library at Paris. His chief works were, "Dictionary of the Fine Arts," "Dictionary of Mythology," "Monuments of Antiquity," and "Gallery of Mythology." He edited the "Magasin Encyclopédique" during 20 years, and also produced a number of works relative to the antiquities of his native land, Savoy, &c.

Born 1758; died 1818.

MILLINGEN, JAMES, mil'-lin-jen, an English archæologist, who, about the time of the French revolution, went to Paris with his father, but was arrested at the instance of the National Convention. After his liberation, he became partner in a bank at Paris, and henceforth devoted his leisure to archæological pursuits. Being afflicted with disease of the chest, he was compelled to repair to Italy, where he resided until his death, making, however, occasional visits to the French capital. His most important works were, "A Medallic History of Napoleon," "Ancient Coins of Greek Cities and Kings," "Ancient Unedited Monuments of Grecian Art," and "Remarks on the State of Learning and Fine Arts in Great Britain:" besides which he was the author of many papers in the "Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature of London."

Born in London, 1774; died 1845.

MILLOT, CLAUDE FRANCIS XAVIER, mee'-yo, a French historian, who was for some time a member of the Society of Jesuits, which order he was permitted to quit, after officiating as a preacher at Versailles and Luneville. He was professor of history at Parma many years, and on his return to France became tutor to the Duc d'Enghien. His works are, "Elements of the History of France," "Elements of the History of England," "Elements of Universal History," "History of the Troubadours," "Memoirs for a History of Louis XIV. and XV.," "Translations of Orations from the Latin Historians."

Born at Besançon, 1726; died 1785.

MILLS, a newly formed county of Dakota Territory, United States. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. unascertained.

MILLS, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 14,137. The capital is Glenwood.

MILLVILLE, mil'-vil, a city of Cumberland county, New Jersey, United States, on the Maurice river. Manf. Cotton, glass, iron, and gas-pipes. Pop. 7,660.

MILMAN, REV. HENRY HART, mil'-man, an eminent English historian and poet, son of Sir Francis Milman, physician to George III. He was educated at Eton and Brasenose College, at Oxford, where he gained the Newdegate prize in 1812, and was elected fellow. In 1815 he published a tragedy, entitled "Fazio," which was played at Covent-Garden theatre without his consent, in consequence of the defective state of the law at that period. In 1817 he entered upon holy orders, and obtained a living at Reading. In 1820 he produced "The Fall of Jerusalem" a sacred poem, founded upon Josephus' narrative. The university of Oxford appointed him its professor of poetry in the following year. In 1829 he published anonymously, "The History of the Jews." The "History of Christianity from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire," was his next important publication. In 1849 he produced a beautiful edition of Horace, adding to it a most interesting life of the poet. In the same year he was appointed dean of St. Paul's, and shortly afterwards gave to the world a continuation of his "History of Christianity," under the form of a "History of Latin Christianity." He likewise produced a new and copiously-annotated edition of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." In addition to the poem already mentioned, he was the author of "The Martyr of Antioch," "Belshazzar," "Anne Boleyn," and many other poems.

Born in London, 1791; died 1868.

MILNA, mil-na', a seaport of the Austrian empire, in Dalmatia, 13 miles S. of Spalatro, on the west coast of the island of Brazza, on a large bay which forms an excellent harbour. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 3,200.

MILNE, EDWARD HENRI, zoologist, was the son of an Englishman, resident at Bruges. He studied medicine at Paris, and took a degree in 1823, but preferred the study of zoology to medical practice. He became professor of natural history, in 1838 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1854 a member of the Academy of Medicine. He was afterwards chosen president of the Faculty of Sciences, appointed a commander of the legion of honour, and elected a member of many learned societies. In 1856 he received the Copley medal of the Royal Society of London. His works on the invertebrate animals, his lectures on physiology, and his "Comparative Anatomy of Men and Animals," are highly valued.

Born at Bruges, 1800.

MILNES, RICHARD MONCKTON, milns, Lord Houghton, a modern English politician, poet, and prose writer, is a member of an old Yorkshire family. A few years after concluding his university career at Trinity College, Cambridge, he was elected member of parliament for Pontefract, and distinguished himself therein as a zealous supporter of all questions relative to popular education and complete religious equality. His literary efforts were various in kind and of an excellent character. As a poet, he produced "Poems of Many Years," "Memorials of Many Scenes," "Poems, Legendary and Historical," and "Palm Leaves." His "Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of John Keats" was an appreciative and delightful commemoration of departed genius. He is understood to have been the writer of several interesting articles in the "Westminster Review." He published several of his speeches, delivered from his seat in the House of Commons, and wrote a number of political pamphlets, the most important of which were "Thoughts on Party Politics," "Real Union of England and Ireland," and "The Events of 1848." In 1863 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Houghton.

Born 1809.

MILO, mi'-lo, the ancient Melos, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, in the Mediterranean, S.E. of the Gulf of Ægina. It is about 14 miles long, and from 1 to 4 wide, mountainous (rising in Mount St. Elias to 2,538 feet), volcanic and generally barren. There is a good natural harbour, on the north coast. The chief town, Milo, in a ruinous condition, is on the south side of the island. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 36° 40′ N. Lon. 24° 23′ E.

MILO, an athlete of Crotona, in Italy, who is said to have carried a bullock on his shoulders above forty yards, and then killed it with one blow of his fist, after which he made a meal of it in one day. He received the prize seven times at the Pythian games, and six at Olympia. Many other marvellous things are related of his enormous strength. According to Ovid, attempting to split a tree, it closed upon his hands, and held him fixed while wolves devoured him.

Lived in the 6th century B.C.

MILO, TITUS ANNIUS, a Roman, who made several parties for the purpose of obtaining the consulate. He was opposed by Claudius, and supported by some of the first members of the senate. In a quarrel between Clodius and Milo, on the Appian Way, the former was slain by some of the domestics of the latter.

Died 48 B.C.

MILTENBERG, mil'-ten-bairg, a town of Bavaria, circle of Suabia, at the junction of the Mudan with the Main. There are two churches, a convent, hospital, and building docks. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 3,100.

MILTIADES, mil-ti'-a-dees, Athenian general, who succeeded his uncle in the government of the Athenian colony in the Chersonese, B.C. 513. He proposed to destroy the raft over which Darius had passed in his Scythian expedition, and so cut off the Persian king's retreat; his comrades, however, overruled the proposal, and Miltiades became so unpopular as to be compelled to return to Athens. Twenty years afterwards, the Persians having declared war against Greece, their army landed in overwhelming numbers at Marathon. The Athenians, under Miltiades, were very few; yet, by his superior skill, the Persians were defeated with great slaughter, and part of their fleet destroyed, 490 B.C. After this, he had the command of a naval squadron, with which he took several islands; but being obliged to raise the siege of Paros, and also dangerously wounded, he returned to Athens, where he was condemned to death, which sentence was altered to imprisonment. He died shortly afterwards of his wounds.

Died 490 B.C.

MILTON, JOHN, English poet. He was the son of a scrivener, who became wealthy, and was a man of considerable accomplishments, especially in music. His son was educated first at St. Paul's School, and afterwards at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, being designed for the bar or the church; but, not having an inclination for either calling, he returned to his father, who had retired from business with a good fortune, and settled at Horton, in Buckinghamshire. Here the poet wrote his "Comus," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Lycidas;" poems of such merit as would alone have immortalized his name. In 1637 he travelled into France and Italy, where he became acquainted with Galileo. On his return to England he settled in London, and undertook the tuition of his nephews, for which profession he appears, by his "Tractate on Education," to have been well calculated. On the outbreak of the differences between the king and parliament, Milton engaged as a political writer on the popular side; and having a great animosity to the hierarchy, he published some pamphlets against the bishops. In 1643 he married Mary Powell, the daughter of a justice of peace and royalist, in Oxfordshire; but for some reason, of which various explanations have been given, she left him a month after marriage, and returned to her friends. He repudiated his wife, and published some tracts on divorce, to vindicate this act, which he was about to carry into effect, when his wife's friends brought about a reconciliation. In 1652 he lost his wife, who left him three daughters, and soon afterwards he married a second time a Miss Woodcock, but his wife died in childbed two years afterwards, her fate giving rise to one of his most exquisite sonnets. He was a determined republican, and wrote with energy against monarchical government, "the very trappings of which," he said, "would support a commonwealth," while, as Latin secretary to the council of State, he rendered good service to the cause of national liberty. He wrote with great asperity a reply to the famous "Eikon Basilike," which was believed to have been the production of Charles I., and attacked a royalist writer, Claude de Saumaise, better known as "Salmasius," with such intensity and vigour, as to cause the death of his opponent. Milton endeavoured to prevent the Restoration; which event he had undoubted cause to dread, considering the active part taken by him in the rebellion. And when the Restoration took place, he was excepted from the act of indemnity; on which he kept himself concealed some time. By the interest, however, of Sir William Davenant and others, he obtained a pardon from the king, Charles II., and soon afterwards was married for the third time, to Elizabeth Mershull. In the time of the plague he removed, with his family, to Buckinghamshire, where he completed his "Paradise Lost," which was first printed in 1667. This immortal work he sold to a bookseller for £5. For the idea of it he is said to have been indebted to an Italian drama on the Fall of Man; and it is certain that he had himself an intention at first of writing only a tragedy on the same subject. As the work grew under his hand, his soaring genius gave it the form and consistence, the variety and elegance, of an epic poem. He subsequently composed "Paradise Regained," which, though abounding in beauties, is in all respects inferior to "Paradise Lost," though Milton, remarkably enough, is said to have considered it the better poem. Besides this, and the other poems mentioned above, Milton wrote a drama on the Greek model, entitled "Samson Agonistes," which possesses uncommon beauties, though not adapted to theatrical representation. Among the prose works of Milton, are his "History of England," which comes down only to the Conquest, and his "Areopagitica," in which he pleaded the cause of a free press with great force. When at Cambridge, he was so handsome as to be called the lady of Christ's College, and he retained his comeliness to the last. Two of the three daughters he had by his first wife used to read to him in eight languages, though they understood only their own, it being a usual saying with him that "one tongue was enough for a woman." Although unquestionably a man of strong religious convictions, Milton attended no church, and belonged to no religious communion. He was an excellent musician, and almost the only recreation from study was playing on the organ or bass-viol. His remains were interred at the parish church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, where a monument has been erected to his memory; and there is another in Westminster Abbey.

Born in Bread Street, London, 1608; died 1674.

MILYUTIN, NIKOLAI ALEXIVITCH, mil-yu'-tin, Russian statesman, educated at the Moscow lyceum and university of St. Petersburg. In 1842 he was appointed vice-president of the imperial chamber of court accounts, and two years afterwards chief of the press bureau. He was afterwards entrusted with the revision of the municipal laws, appointed a member of the committee on the emancipation of Russian serfs, and secretary of the interior. After the accession of Alexander II. in 1855, he was the confidential adviser of the Emperor, carried out the great work of emancipation, and, as member of the interior, reformed the criminal code and the press laws, and introduced the jury system.

Born 1818; died at Moscow, 1872.

MILWAUKEE, mil-waw'-ke, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 240 square miles. Pop. 138,537. The capital is MILWAUKEE.

MILWAUKEE, capital of Milwaukee county, Wisconsin, United States, on the western shore of lake Michigan, at the mouth of Milwaukee Creek, which forms a good harbour. It is beautifully situated on an eminence, and contains 43 churches, college for women, schools, a large court-house, and other good public buildings. Manf. Iron, lager beer, machinery, agricultural implements, woollens, soap, and joinery. There are several large pork-packing establishments. An extensive marine commerce is carried on, and it is a good grain depôt. Pop. 115,712, more than one-third being Germans.

MIMNERMUS, mim-ner'-mus, a Greek poet and musician, was a native of Colophon, and contemporary with Solon. He excelled in elegiac poetry, the invention of which has been ascribed to him. Some fragments of his are included in the "Analecta" of Brunck.

Lived in the 7th century B.C.

MIN, or MIN-KIANG, min, a river of China, draining the province of Fo-Kien. It falls, after a winding course of 110 miles, into Hoesien, in the Pacific, in lat. 26° N., lon. 119° 28′ E.

MINA, DON FRANCISCO ESPOZY, mé'-na, a Spanish general, who first distinguished himself in guerilla warfare, by the incessant activity and admirable presence of mind he displayed. Having co-operated in the blockade of Pampeluna, and recovered several other places, he was mortified to find that, at the general peace in 1814, he had been labouring only to re-establish the despotic policy of Ferdinand VII., and made an ineffectual effort in the cause of freedom to gain over the garrison of Pampeluna. He then sought an asylum in France; but whilst resident in the French capital, was arrested by a commissary of police, employed by the Spanish ambassador, but Louis XVIII. dismissed the commissary, insisted upon the ambassador being recalled, and not only released Mina, but granted him a pension of 1,000 francs. When the army of Cadiz, in 1822, unfurled the standard of freedom, by proclaiming the constitution of 1812, Mina hastened to Navarre, and was advancing against Pampeluna, at the head of a few hundred followers, when he was informed that the king had accepted the constitution. He was subsequently appointed captain-general of the three armies of Navarre, Catalonia, and Arragon; but when by the intervention of France, Ferdinand was again enabled to discard his professed adherence to the constitution, Mina left Spain for England. After the accession of Isabella II., under the regency of her mother, Christina, Mina took an active part against Don Carlos; and to him and his wife the charge of educating the young queen was committed.

Born in Navarre, 1782; died 1836.

MINAHASA, min-a-ha'-sa, a district occupying the extremity of the northern peninsula of CELEBES, in the Indian Archipelago. It is volcanic and mountainous, the loftiest peak, Klobert being 6,100 feet above the sea level. There are table-lands from 2,500 to 3,000 feet in elevation, containing many lakes, apparently the craters of extinct volcanoes. Cocoa, coffee, rice, sago, maize, and tobacco are cultivated. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 97,000, of Malay extraction, but speaking a distinct language.

MINERVA, mi-ner'-va, in Roman mythology the goddess of wisdom, war, and all the liberal arts, was supposed to be produced from Jupiter's brain, whence she issued all armed and grown up, and was immediately admitted into the assembly of the gods. She was known among the ancients by many names. In Greek mythology she was called Athena, Pallas, and Parthenia from her remaining in perpetual celibacy. In the Iliad she appears as assisting the Greeks. The worship was universally established; she had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. The festivals celebrated in her honour were solemn and magnificent. She was invoked by every artist, and particularly such as worked in wool, embroidery, painting, and sculpture. Minerva was represented in different ways, according to the different characters in which she appeared. She was usually depicted with a helmet on her head, with a large plume nodding in the air. In one hand she held a spear, and in the other a shield, with the dying head of Medusa upon it. Sometimes this Gorgon's head was on her breastplate, with living serpents writhing round it, as well as her shield and helmet. When she appeared as the goddess of the liberal arts, she was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplum. She was the especial patron of the olive-tree; the owl and the cock were her favourite birds, and the dragon, among reptiles, was sacred to her.

MINERVINO, min-er-ve'-no, a town of Italy, province of Terra di Bara, beautifully situated on a hill commanding extensive prospects. Pop. 15,113.

MINGHETTI, min-gat'-te, Italian writer and statesman, is a member of a wealthy family, engaged in commerce. Early in life he travelled in the principal countries of Europe, examining political, social, and economical institutions, and on his return published an essay advocating the principles of free trade. In 1846 he issued a journal of Liberal tendencies, and in 1847 was elected member of the Roman council of finance, and in the following year was appointed minister of public works. He soon afterwards resigned his appointments, and attached himself to king Charles Albert of Sardinia, in whose army he distinguished himself, and received the cross of the knight of St. Maurizio. He was afterwards appointed by the king secretary for foreign affairs, and subsequently minister of the interior, and, in 1863, premier. He was for a short time ambassador to London, and on his return, minister of agriculture. He is the author of a valuable work on public economy.

The soil is not remarkably fertile, but corn, wine, flax, hemp, saffron are produced, and there is a trade in wool, honey, wax, capers, and cheese. The coast is broken, and there are many little islands. Minerals. Iron, copper, lead, and fine marble. The chief towns are PORT MAHON, the capital, and CIUDADELA. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 37,300. Lat. 39° 52′ 5″ N. Lon. 4° 21′ E.—The British took possession of Minorca in 1708, and held it until 1758, when it was retaken by a French fleet and army. At the peace of 1763 it was restored to Britain, but in 1782, was retaken by the Spaniards. It was once more taken by the British in 1798, but restored at the peace of Amiens, in 1802.

MINOS I., mi'-nos, takes his place in mythological history as the king of Crete, where he is said to have reigned B.C. 1432. He founded several cities, and established some excellent laws and customs. The laws of Minos were in force even in the time of Plato, more than a thousand years after the death of the legislator.

MINOS II. grandson of the preceding, exercised justice with so much strictness as to be made by the fabulists one of the judges of the infernal regions.

MINOS III., of the same family as the preceding, reigned B.C. 1300. He imitated the severity of his ancestors in the administration of justice, and made several new laws, which he pretended to have received from Jupiter. He defeated the Athenians and Megarians, against whom he declared war, to avenge the death of his son Androsus. He took Megara, and reduced Athens to such extremity that the people were obliged to make peace, on condition of delivering to him yearly seven youths of each sex; whence arose the fable of the Minotaur. These personages belong to a period when history and mythology interlace.

MINOTAUR, min'-o-taur, in Greek mythology a celebrated monster of Crete, who was half a man and half a bull. Minos confined the monster in a labyrinth constructed by Dædalus. The Minotaur was at length slain by Theseus, one of the tributary Athenian youths to be devoured by it. Theseus received, it is said, a clue from Ariadne, which served to extricate him from the mazes of the labyrinth, and to effect his escape after he slew the Minotaur.

MINOW ISLANDS, mi'-no, a group of 27 small islands in the Mozambique Channel, East Africa, off the north-west coast of Madagascar. They are mostly basaltic, and the ranges of columns are very beautiful. Lat. 12° 49′ S. Lon. 48° 39′ E.

MINSK, minsk, a province of European Russia, extending from the Dwina on the north to the province of Volhynia on the south. It is little more than a marsh in the spring, and covered with extensive forests, and the climate is very severe in winter; but rye, hemp, and flax are cultivated. Manf. Woollen cloth, glass, Russian leather, potash, and tar. Pop. 1,569,342, many of whom are Jews and descendants of Tartars. Lat. between 51° 12′ and 55° 50′ N. Lon. between 25° 10′ and 30° 45′ E.

MINSK, capital of the above province, on the Svislocz, an affluent of the Beresina. There are a Greek and a Roman cathedral, a church, several educational and charitable institutions, a public library, and a theatre. The houses are generally built of wood. Manf. Woollen cloth and leather. Pop. 54,307, including many Jews.

MINTO, GILBERT ELLIOTT, min'-to, second Earl of, English diplomatist, was the eldest son of the first earl. Brought up for the diplomatic service, he entered parliament in 1806, as member for Ashburton. In 1814 he succeeded to his father's peerage. He obtained no public employment until the year 1832, when, at the mature age of 50, he entered upon his diplomatic career. He was then sent as ambassador to Berlin, where he remained till, in 1835, he was recalled, to assist Lord Melbourne in the responsibilities of a cabinet, and was at once appointed first lord of the admiralty. He held this important office until the overthrow of Lord Melbourne's administration, in 1841. When Lord John Russell, who had married his daughter, obtained power, in 1846, his father-in-law was made lord privy seal, and retained that post until the ministry was overthrown, in 1852. Towards the close of 1847, he was sent on a mission to Italy, and that was his last public employment.
Born at Lyons, 1782; died 1859.

MINUCIUS FELIX, mi-nu'-she-us, a famous Roman Christian orator, who wrote a dialogue, under the title of "Octavius," in which he introduces a pagan and a Christian disputing as to the merits of their respective religions. It is a production of considerable merit, and written with eloquence in favour of Christianity.
Lived in the 3rd century.

MIOSEN, me-o'-zen, a large lake of Norway, to the north of Christiana. It is 55 miles long, with a breadth of 12.

MIQUELON, GREAT AND LITTLE, mé'-ke-lon, two little islands belonging to France, 8 miles S.W. of Cape May, in Newfoundland, North America. Pop. 3,800, chiefly engaged in fishing.

MIRABAUD, JEAN BAPTISTE DE, mir'-a-bo, a French writer, who was at first a member of the Congregation of the Oratory, and afterwards in the army. His works are translations of Tasso's "Jerusalem" and Ariosto's "Orlando" into French.

Born at Paris, 1675; died at Paris, 1760.

MIRABEAU, VICTOR RIQUETTI, Marquis de, mé'-ra-bo, was born of an ancient family in Provence. He was one of the principal institutors of a political sect called Economists. For his "Théorie de l'Impôt," a tract in which he made some free remarks on the finances and government, he was incarcerated in the Bastile for some time. His principal work was entitled "L'Ami des Hommes" (the Friend of Mankind). In this work the author displayed a considerable knowledge of rural and political economy, and also furnished some judicious hints for the good of society; but while displaying so much philanthropy in public, he was, it is said, a cruel tyrant in his own house, and obtained, at various times, more than 50 lettres de cachet against his wife and children.

Born 1715; died 1789.

MIRABEAU, GABRIEL HONORÉ RIQUETTI, Count de, eldest son of the preceding, was one of the leaders, and the greatest orator, during the French revolution. After staying some time in the army, he espoused a rich heiress of Aix; but he soon squandered away the fortune he received with her, and plunged himself into debt. He was confined in different prisons, and, on obtaining his liberty, eloped to Holland with the daughter of the president of the parliament of Besançon. For this he was afterwards imprisoned in the castle of Vincennes, and remained there a considerable time. In 1780 he regained his liberty, and published his work on "Lettres de Cachet." He subsequently visited London, and, on his return to Paris, employed himself with literature, chiefly political pamphlets. The agitation preliminary to the French revolution offered Mirabeau an ample element for his activity. He sought to be returned to the States-General as a representative of the nobles of Provence, but was rejected on account of his poverty. Smarting with disappointment, he opened a shop, over the door of which was inscribed "Mirabeau, dealer in drapery." He was elected deputy of the third estate both for Aix and Marseilles, electing to represent the latter. In the National Assembly he displayed the very highest powers of an orator, supporting a constitutional monarchy, while strongly opposing despotism. By his influence he instituted the National Guard, in 1790 was elected president of the Jacobin Club, and in 1791 of the National Assembly; but he died in the midst of his political career, his death being hastened by his great exertions in connection with his profligate life. He was buried in the church of St. Genevieve, the "Pantheon," and his obsequies were celebrated with great pomp. Mirabeau wrote "A Comparison between the Great Condé and Scipio Africanus," "History of Prussia under Frederick the Great," collection of his labours in the National Assembly, "Secret History of the Court of Berlin:" this book was burnt by the common executioner. He was a remarkable man, whose political character has been much misrepresented. When he became president of the National Assembly, in 1791, he rendered immense services to his country, in introducing clearness and order where all had before been entanglement and confusion. Had his life been prolonged, it is more than a question whether the French revolution would have been other than a bloodless one,—a simple change from despotism to constitutional monarchy. His death was a public calamity. His ambition was not to set up or destroy absolute monarchy, but to raise himself to the position of prime minister of a constitutional régime.

Born at Bignon, near Nemours, 1749; died at Paris, 1791.

MIRAMICHI, or MIRACHI, mir'-a-me-shé', a bay and river on the N.E. coast of New Brunswick, British North America. The bay forms the estuary of the river, which, after a course of 100 miles, falls into it, and so into the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

MIRAMON, MIGUEL, me-ra-mon', Mexican general of French descent. At the age of 14 he entered the military academy of Chapultepec, and was wounded and taken prisoner while defending that place against the Americans, but released after the treaty of peace. In 1852 he entered the army, distinguished himself and rapidly rose. In 1856 he defended Puebla with great vigour and success, and afterwards was an active guerilla and revolutionary leader. At the age of 25 he was looked upon as one of the most conspicuous leaders of the revolutionary party, and in 1859 was offered and declined the presidency, in favour of Zuloaga, who retired after a few days, and Miramon became acting president. The success of his opponents compelled him to quit the country in 1860. He attempted to return two years afterwards, but was not permitted to land. He lived in Europe until 1866, when he was appointed one of the leaders of the army of the Emperor Maximilian, and was captured at the battle of Querétaro, and shot at the same time as Maximilian.

Born at Mexico, 1832; died 1867.

MIRANDA, me-ran'-da, a town of Portugal, on the Dueça, 15 miles S.E. of Coimbra. Pop. 5,300.

MIRANDA, FRANCISCO, the founder of the independence of Spanish America. He rose to be colonel in the Spanish army, and was for some time intrusted with important matters by the governor of Guatemala; but, taking part in a conspiracy against the Spanish viceroy, he was compelled to fly from his native country. He went to Paris in 1791, and allied himself with the republican party, who appointed him to a command under General Dumouriez. He was tried on a charge of causing the defeat at Neerwinden, but acquitted. He was, however, banished four years afterwards. In 1806 he resolved to achieve the independence of his country; and, after a long struggle, succeeded in establishing a republic at Caracas, in 1811. He sustained a defeat by the Spanish army subsequently, and was treacherously betrayed to the Spanish general, who sent him in chains to Spain, where he died in the prison of the Inquisition.

Born at Caracas, 1750; died 1816.

MIRANDE, me-rand', a town of France, department Gers, on the left bank of the Baise, 10 miles S.W. of Auch. Manf. Leather. There is a trade in corn, wool, and brandy. Pop. 4,000.

MIRANDOLA, me-ran-do'-la, a town of northern Italy, province of Modena, in the centre of a plain, 20 miles N.E. of Modena. There are a citadel, cathedral, and numerous churches. Rice is cultivated in the vicinity, and silk-worms are extensively reared. Pop. 12,612.

MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI PICO DELLA, count and prince of Concordia, Italian scholar, who displayed remarkable powers of memory in his childhood, and studied law at Bologna, and philosophy, theology, and languages at Ferrara. He went to Rome in 1486, and after the fashion of the scholars of the time, propounded 900 theses as subjects of controversy. Some of these were denounced by the pope as heretical, and he suffered much persecution in consequence; but he was absolved from the charge of heresy a year before his death.

Born at Mirandola, 1463; died at Florence, 1494.

MIRECOURT, meer'-koor, a town of France, department Vosges, 20 miles S. of Nancy. It is the seat of a tribunal of commerce, and has a college. Manf. Violins, guitars, organs, other musical instruments, and lace. Pop. 5,000.

MIREPOIX, meré'-pwo-e, a town of France, department Ariége, on the Lers, 16 miles N.E. of Foix. There are a church, with a fine choir, and seven chapels, a college, and well-laid-out cemetery. Manf. Linen, flannel, coarse woollens, worsted, and soap. Iron, jet, and coal are wrought in the vicinity. Pop. 4,000.

MIRFIELD, mir'-feeld, a manufacturing village in the North Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles E. of Dewsbury. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 12,900.—A station on the London and North-Western and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways.

MIRGOROD, mir-go-rod', a town of Russia in Europe, government of Poltawa, on the left bank of the Khoral, 50 miles N.W. of Poltawa. There is a large trade, and four yearly markets are held. Pop. 9,500.

MIRIAM, mi-re-am', elder sister of Moses and Aaron. It was she who watched Moses in the bulrushes, and who sang the famous song of rejoicing after the passage of the Red Sea. The name is the Hebrew form of Mary.

MIRIBEL, me-re-bal', a town of France, department Ain, near the right bank of the Rhone, 31 miles S.W. of Bourg. There are an old castle and Roman remains. Pop. 3,300.

MIROPOLIE, mi-ro-po'-le, a town of Russia in Europe, government of Koursk, on the Psiol, 60 miles S.W. of Koursk. It is surrounded by an earthen rampart and a fosse, and has 7 churches. Pop. 9,500.

MIRPUR, or MIRPOOR, mir-poor', a town of British India, in Scinde, on the left bank of the Piniari, 45 miles S. of Hyderabad. There is a large fort. Pop. 32,000.

MIRTA, mir'-ta, a town of India, 75 miles from Joudpoor. Pop. 26,000.

MIRZAPUR, or MIRZAPORE, mir-za-poor', a town on the right bank of the Ganges, 30 miles S.W. of Benares, in British India. It is a flourishing trading place, being the chief mart for cotton. Manf. Carpets, cotton, silk and iron. Pop. 56,400; of the district, 1,136,796.

MISENO, me-sai'-no, a promontory of S. Italy, 9 miles S.W. of Naples. Near it are the ruins of the ancient Roman port of Misenum. There are a remarkable grotto, and a number of subterranean chambers, which are much visited.

MISILMERI, me-sel-mai'-re, a town of Sicily, province of Palermo, 7 miles S.E. of Palermo. It is a poor straggling place, and formerly notorious as a haunt of banditti. Pop. 10,400.

MISIVRIA, mi-siv'-re-a, a town of Turkey in Europe, in Bulgaria, on a bay of the Black Sea. There is a harbour, but it is difficult of access. A trade in wine and wood for fuel is carried on. Pop. 3,000.

MISKOLCZ, mis'-koltz, a large and well-built town of Hungary, in the county of Borsod, 25 miles N.E. of Erlau. It has numerous churches. The iron obtained in the neighbouring mines is manufactured into the best steel in Hungary, and there is a considerable trade in wine and melons. Pop. 22,000. The town was nearly destroyed by floods in 1878.

MISSAUKEE, mis-sau'-ke, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 1,553. The chief place is Falmouth.

MISSISQUOI, mis'-sis-koi, a county of Quebec province, Canada. Area, 358 square miles. Pop. 17,000, about 7,500 being of French descent. The capital is Frelighsburg.

MISSISSIPPI, mis-sis-sip'-pi, one of the United States of America, bounded N. by Tennessee, E. by Alabama territory, S. by the Gulf of Mexico and Louisiana, and W. by Pearl and Mississippi rivers, which separate it from the state of Louisiana. The surface is undulating, the seacoast sandy, but well timbered, and the soil generally very fertile. There is a coast-line of 88 miles, but no good harbour. The climate is semi-tropical, but very healthy. Cotton is the staple production, but sugar, maize, and wheat are cultivated. Peaches and figs are the fruits most easily produced, and apples, plums, lemons, and oranges are common.

Rivers.—The Mississippi, which for 500 miles marks the boundary of the state, and its tributaries, the Yazoo, Black, and Sunflower: The Pearl, and Pascatoula.

Area.—47,156 square miles.

Pop.—1,131,597. Having formerly been a state where slavery largely prevailed, the proportion of coloured people is unusually large.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 66 counties. The chief towns are JACKSON, the capital; NATCHEZ, VICKSBURG, and COLUMBUS.

History.—In 1682, this region was claimed for France by La Salle, who descended the Mississippi; and in 1698 French settlements were formed. In 1817 the district was admitted as a state to the Union. It seceded to the Southern Confederacy in 1861, but was readmitted in 1869.

MISSISSIPPI, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 1,080 square miles. Pop. 7,332. The capital is Osceola.

MISSISSIPPI, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 380 square miles. Pop. 9,270. The capital is Charleston.

MISSISSIPPI (from the Indian, miche-sepe, ("father of waters"), the principal river of North America, and the common channel by which all the waters that fall on the immense valley between the Rocky Mountains on the west, and the Alleghany Mountains on the east, are carried to the ocean. It has its source in a small pool, until it subsides in Lake Fraser, lat. 47° 42′ N., lon. 93° 8′ W.; and it falls into the Gulf of Mexico by several outlets, forming a delta 150 miles wide. Its length is generally estimated at 3,160 miles; but from the source of the Missouri, its longest and real head-stream, it is about 4,300 miles. (See AMERICA, NORTH.) The general course is southerly, with many windings. In breadth it varies greatly, from 300 to 900 yards in the upper part of the stream, and from 2,000 to 2,500, yards opposite the Missouri. At New Orleans it is rather less than 1,500 yards, though the general width of it along the delta is somewhat less. At New Orleans, and below it in dry seasons, the depth is about 120 feet: it is said to be more than 200 feet at the distance of 100 miles above that city; thence to the Arkansas it may average nearly 50 feet; and between that and the Missouri from 25 to 35 feet in the lowest state of the water. The Mississippi has two annual floods: the first, in ordinary seasons, about the new year; the second, or great spring inundation, commences with the first flood of the Missouri, which is usually in March, on the breaking up of the ice. This is followed by the Mississippi above its junction with that river; afterwards by the Ohio, the Illinois, and all the other tributaries. The great flood of the Missouri begins in June; on the 15th of the same month the Mississippi attains its greatest height at Natchez, which is about 400 miles from its mouth; and on the first week of July the highest flood takes place at New Orleans. At this time the waters of the Mississippi are spread at New Orleans to an extent of from 80 to 100 miles. The breadth of the inundation gradually diminishes the higher the river is ascended; but even at the mouth of the Ohio, which is 1,000 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi, it still extends over a space of 30 miles. There are about 1,500 navigable affluents, the principal of which, on the W. side, are the Red River, the Washita, the Arkansaw, the St. Francis, the White River, the Missouri, the Rivière des Moines, and the St. Peter's. On the E. side there are the Yazoo, the Ohio, the Tennessee, the Wabash, a tributary of the Ohio, and the Illinois, which enters 18 miles above the Missouri. About 250 miles above the mouth of the Missouri the navigation is difficult, and obstructed by rapids. About 60 miles higher up, occur the falls of St. Anthony, above which the water is 627 yards wide; and it falls perpendicularly 16½ feet. Below the falls it is only 209 feet in breadth. Above the Arkansas, the current at low water runs at the rate of about two miles an hour, and at high water, at the rate of four miles an hour. As the river approaches the sea, the velocity of the current diminishes to one-third, and afterwards to one-half.

MISSOLONGHI, or MESOLONGHI, mis-so-lon'-ge, a town of Greece, monarchy of Ætolia, on the northern shore of the Gulf of Patras, 24 miles W. of Lepanto. It is fortified, and is memorable in modern Greek history, for the sieges it endured from the Turks in 1822 and 1826. On the last occasion, after ten months' resistance, the garrison cut their way through the enemy, who then entered and destroyed the town. It was here that Lord Byron died. Pop. 4,000.

MISSOULA, mis-soo'-la, a county of Montana Territory, United States. Area, 20,400 square miles. Pop. 3,000. The capital is Missoula.

MISSOURI, mis-soor'-i, one of the United States, which is bounded on the E. by the Missouri River, W. by Nebraska and Kansas, N. by Iowa, and S. by Arkansas. There is undulating country in the southern part of the State rising in the mountains near the Arkansas boundary, and in the northern part are fertile valleys and extensive prairie lands. There is very little timber. Maize, wheat, rye, oats, cotton, hemp, fruits, and tobacco are cultivated, and large herds of cattle, hogs, and horses are reared.

Rivers.—The Mississippi, which forms the western boundary for 470 miles; the Missouri, which forms a part of the western boundary, and traverses the state from east to west, and the Osage, Gasconade, and other affluents of the Missouri.

Minerals.—Coal and iron are abundant, and there are lead and limestone.

Area.—65,350 square miles.

Pop.—2,168,380. Though there are many thousands of coloured people, the proportion of them is not so large as in several other states of the Union.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 117 counties. The chief towns are JEFFERSON CITY, the capital; BOONEVILLE, HANNIBAL, INDEPENDENCE, LEXINGTON, and ST. LOUIS.

History.—This state was formerly a portion of Louisiana, but was admitted into the Union as a separate state in 1821, the result of what is known as the Missouri Compromise, by which slavery was permitted in it. It was one of the seceding states in the war of 1861.

MISSOURI, "Mud River," one of the greatest rivers of North America, rising by two principal sources, the Jefferson and Gallatin, in the Rocky Mountains in Dakota territory, about lat. 45° N., lon. about 112° W. After a northern and then south-eastern and eastern course of 3,100 miles, it falls into the Mississippi in lat. 38° 55′ 19″ N., and lon. 89° 57′ 45″ W., 18 miles below the mouth of the Illinois. The navigation of the Missouri to the Great Falls, which is a distance of 2,540 miles from the Mississippi, may be generally deemed good. Above these it meets with various interruptions and falls. The Great Falls, 555 miles from its source, consist of a series of rapids, in the course of which the river falls 357 feet in 16 miles. The upper part of the river is remarkable for its scenery, and for several miles it flows through a gorge only 450 feet wide, and with perpendicular walls 1,200 high. Its waters are turbid, and its stream rapid, whilst along its banks are rich lands and extensive prairies. The principal tributaries are the Cheyenne, Kansas, Osage, Platte, and Yellowstone.

MISTEK, mis-tek', a town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, 10 miles S.W. of Teschen. Manf. Woollen and linen cloth. Pop. 3,300.

MISTELBACK, mis'-tel-bak, a market-town of the Austrian empire, province of Lower Austria, on the Zaraback, 30 miles N.E. of Vienna. It is well-built, and a large corn market is held. Pop. 2,500.

MISTERBIANCA, mis'-ter-be-an'-ka, a town of Sicily, province of Catania, a short distance N.W. of the town of that name. There are thermal baths. Pop. 5,800.

MISTRA, mis'-tra, a town of Greece, in the Morea, 27 miles S.W. of Tripolitza. It is surrounded by walls in a ruinous condition, and there is a Venetian octagonal fort on an adjacent eminence. Pop. 1,500.

MISTRETTA, mis-trat'-ta, a town of Sicily, 67 miles S.W. of Messina, near the river Netroden. Pop. 12,443.

MITCHELL, SIR THOMAS, mit'chel, a distinguished geographer and military surveyor, who served with distinction during the peninsular war, as an officer of the staff. In 1827 he produced "Outlines of a System of Surveying for Geographical and Military Purposes," and was about the same time nominated deputy surveyor-general of New South Wales, which post he retained until his death. He proved himself one of the most distinguished explorers of the Australian continent, and, under circumstances of great difficulty and danger, traced the course of the river Darling to its junction with the river Murray. An account of these labours was published in 1838. On coming to England he received the honour of knighthood from her majesty, was elected fellow of the Royal and of the Geographical societies, and became D.C.L. of the university of Oxford. He subsequently discovered the Victoria river, and invented a new propeller for steam-vessels, on the principle of the boomerang, a weapon used by the aborigines of Australia. He published several works descriptive of his explorations. He attained the grade of colonel in 1854, and at his death his remains were honoured by a public funeral at Sydney.

Born at Craigend, Stirlingshire, 1792; died at Sydney, 1855.

MITCHELL, the name of four counties of the United States:—

GEORGIA.—Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 9,392, nearly one half being coloured. The capital is Camilla.

IOWA.—Area, 431 square miles. Pop. 14,363. The capital is Mitchell.

KANSAS.—Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 1491 1. The chief place is Beloit.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Area, 530 square miles. Pop. 9,435. The capital is Bakersville.

MITCHELSTOWN, a market town of Ireland, county of Cork, 27 miles E. of the city of that name. There are a fine Gothic church, and a cruciform Roman Catholic chapel. Manf. Blankets and flax; and there is a large trade in pigs, butter and corn. Mitchelstown castle is in the vicinity. Pop. 3,000.

MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL, mit'-ford, a modern authoress. She was the daughter of a clever physician, whose unthrifty habits involved him in constant pecuniary embarrassments. When the future authoress had attained her 10th year, her father made her a present of a ticket in the Dublin lottery, which eventually turned up a prize of £20,000. This large sum was, however, dissipated by the extravagant parent, who was, nevertheless, a most kindly man and affectionate father. Before she reached her 20th year, she put forth a volume of verse, which was demolished by the "Quarterly Review." Nowise disheartened, she brought out another, and, in reality, adopted literature as a profession. For some time, her pen was engaged upon short tales and sketches for the magazines, the success of which emboldened her to turn her attention to the composition of a series of rural tales and descriptions of rustic life and scenery. She had long been residing at a pleasant village on the borders of Berkshire and Hampshire, and was familiar with every house, cottage, green lane, and dweller therein. She accordingly set to work to give faithful delineations of the place and its inhabitants. Her first essays were sent to the "New Monthly Magazine," but the then editor, Thomas Campbell, at once rejected them. After many disappointments, they appeared in the "Lady's Magazine." These were afterwards put forth in a collected form, and were entitled "Our Village," a book which justly merits its great popularity, being truly unrivalled of its kind. Five series of "Our Village" were published. "Belford Regis; or, Sketches of a Country Town," subsequently appeared, the materials for which were drawn from the town of Reading. Her later, though less celebrated works, were, "Stories of Country Life," and "Atherton," a novel. She also wrote several dramas, four of which require a short mention. "Julian" was performed in 1823, Macready enacting the leading part. The "Foscari" and "Rienzi" were also very successful; but "Charles the First" was interdicted by Colman, who at the time was licenser of plays. It was subsequently played at a minor theatre, but soon disappeared from the stage. One of her latest efforts was "Recollections of my Literary Life: or, Books, Places, and People," published in 1852. In the last 27 years of her life she received a pension from government.

Born at Alresford, Hampshire, 1786; died at Swallowfield Cottage, near Reading, 1855.

MITFORD, WILLIAM, English historian, who studied at Queen's College, Oxford, and subsequently entered himself of the Middle Temple; but, succeeding to the family estates upon the death of his father in 1761, he retired into the country, and devoted his life to the study of the Greek language and literature. In 1769 he was appointed captain in the South Hampshire militia, of which Gibbon was the major. Some conversations between the historian of the Decline and Fall and himself led, it is said, to his undertaking a history of Greece. That history was produced in successive volumes, the first of which appeared in 1784. It is a work of great ability, but marked by an intense dislike of democracy. Mr. Mitford also published a treatise on the Religions of Ancient Greece and Rome. He was returned to parliament in 1785, and sat there during many years; but his speeches were principally made upon the militia laws. A treatise by him upon "The Military Force, and particularly the Militia, of England," created some excitement in its day, but is now forgotten.

Born in London, 1744; died in Hampshire, 1827.

MITHRAS, in Persian mythology, the genius of the sun, and ruler of the universe. The worship was adopted in Rome, and the mysterious observances connected with it were famous.

MITHRIDATES, or MITHRADATES (from Mithras), mith'-ri-dat'-tees, the name of several kings of Pontus, of whom the most remarkable was Mithridates VI., one of the most determined enemies that the Romans encountered. He was educated at Sinopa, and succeeded his father, of the same name, B.C. 123, at which time he was only 12 years of age. The Romans, anxious to weaken his power, declared war against him, and he, in revenge, ordered all the Romans in his dominions (numbering, it is said, more than 100,000) to be massacred. He then marched with a powerful army against Aquilius, whom he defeated; but Sulla, after some victories, forced Mithridates to make peace, B.C. 84. He renewed the war in alliance with Tigranes, king of Armenia. The second Mithridatic war broke out in the following year, and lasted until Pompey obtained a great victory over him near the Euphrates, B.C. 65, upon which Mithridates fled to Tigranes, who refused him an asylum. He next sent ambassadors to Pompey to sue for peace, but the Romans insisted upon his surrendering in person. Meantime his people revolted, and proclaimed his son Pharnaces king. Rather than fall into the hands of the Romans, Mithridates put an end to his life. He was a man of remarkable ability, had a great love for the arts, collected pictures, sculpture, and gems, and could speak 25 languages. As a general he was the most formidable opponent the Romans ever met.

Born about 135 B.C.; died 63 B.C.

MITROVICZ, or MITROWITZ, mit'-ro-vitz, a town of the Austrian empire, in Slavonia, near the left bank of the Save, 22 miles S.W. of Peterwardein. There are a Roman Catholic and three Greek churches and a castle. A large trade is carried on in cattle and hides. Pop. 5,200.

MITSCHERLICH, EILHARD, mitch'-er-lik, Prussian chemist, who studied at Heidelberg, Paris, and Göttingen. Early in life he devoted his studies especially to physical philosophy, and was, on the strong recommendation of Berzelius, in 1821, appointed professor of chemistry in the university of Berlin. He was the discoverer of the fact, that two bodies having the same composition could assume different forms; to which Berzelius gave the name "Isomerism." His greatest literary work is "Manual of Chemistry," which details the principles of the science from a mathematical and physical point of view. He was an honorary member of most of the great scientific societies, and received the gold medal of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Neuende, near Jena, 1794; died at Berlin, 1863.

MODENA, mod'-e-na, a northern province of Italy, formerly a portion of the duchy of Modena. In 1796, the duke of Modena was expelled from his dominions by the French. In 1814 the congress of Vienna restored to his son, the archduke Francis of Este, the territory of Modena. In August, 1859, the National Assembly, by a unanimous vote, declared the forfeiture of Francis V., and any other prince of the house of Hapsburg-Lorraine, to the ducal throne. After which, the Assembly decreed the annexation of the Modenese state to the kingdom of the dynasty of Savoy, under the sceptre of King Victor Emmanuel II., and on the constitution of the kingdom of Italy, the province of Modena was formed. The capital is MODENA. Area, 1,090 square miles. Pop. 286,643.

MODENA, the capital of the above province, is situate in a delightful plain, between the rivers Panaro and Secchia, 24 miles N.W. of Bologna. It has a citadel, and is surrounded with ramparts. There are, besides, an old and new town, the latter containing some elegant residences. The houses are well built, the streets clean and regular, and the Strada Maestra, on the Æmilian Way, is the finest in the town; but almost all are bordered with arcades, under which the passengers walk. The finest public building is the royal palace, erected in the 17th century, a picturesque building, with courts and marble arches, in a large square, with a picture-gallery, extensive library, museum, observatory, and gardens. The cathedral, dedicated to St. Geminianus, patron of the city, is in the Gothic style. The campanile, or belfry, is a square tower, 315 feet in height, with a marble façade. There are schools of theology, law, medicine, and mathematics, replacing the university suppressed in 1821 museums, theatres, botanic gardens, and baths. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, silk, paper, leather, glass, and pottery. Pop. 56,576. It has an old Franciscan convent, which is preserved as a national monument, a fine town-house, and a handsome church. Pop. 6,600.—Near this is the port of Palas, whence Columbus sailed, in 1492.

MOGUL EMPIRE, THE, mo-gul', comprised principally the provinces of Delhi and Agra, in India, till overthrown by the British power. (See INDIA.) The first Great Mogul, or Emperor of Delhi, was BABER. The last of the dynasty was transported for complicity in the Indian mutiny of 1857.

MOHACS, mo-hats', a market-town of Hungary, on the western arm of the Danube, 110 miles S.W. of Pesth. It has several churches, a college, and is a station for steamers plying on the Danube. There is an important cattle-market, and a large trade is carried on in wine, coal, timber, and agricultural produce. Pop. 13,000.—In 1526, the Hungarians were here defeated by the Turks, their king, Louis II., slain on the field, with upwards of 20,000 soldiers. In 1687, the Turks were also here defeated by the imperialists under the duke of Lorraine.

MOHAMMED. (See MAHOMET.)

MOHAMMED-IBN-ABDALLAH, founder of the Mahometan sect, the Almohades. He was the son of a lamplighter in a Moorish mosque in Spain, and studied at Cordova, and afterwards at Cairo and Bagdad. About 1116, he appeared as a reformer of the religion of Islam, affected an unusual degree of piety, wore ragged garments, and denounced every kind of amusement or gratification of the senses. Assisted by an earnest and talented young Mussulman, Abd-el-Mumen, he propagated his doctrines and attracted a large number of followers, including about 20,000 warlike Arabs and Berbers, by whose aid he endeavoured to dethrone the reigning sultan of Morocco, whom he defeated, but was unable to reduce the city of Morocco. After his death, Abd-el-Mumen became the head of the new sect, and obtained possession of the throne, founding the dynasty of the Almohades. (See MOROCCO.)
Died 1130.

MOHAMRAH, mo-ham'-ra, a strongly fortified town of Persia, in Khuzistan, on the island of Abadan, formed by two branches of the Euphrates, near the head of the Persian Gulf. It is a place of considerable strategetical importance.

MÖHLER, JOHANN ADAM, me(r)'-ler, German theologian, received his university education at Tübingen, and was ordained priest in 1819. In 1828 he took the degree of doctor, and was appointed professor of theology. He published several works on theological subjects, and in 1832 revised his work on the doctrinal differences between Catholics and Protestants, which excited a vigorous controversy, and was followed by another work on the same subject. So much bitterness was the result, that Möhler quitted Tübingen, and declining invitations to Breslau and Bonn, accepted the chair of biblical exegesis in the university of Munich, in 1835. Three years afterwards he died of consumption.

Born in Wurtemberg, 1796; died 1838.

MOHRUNGEN, mo-roon'-gen, a town of E. Prussia, 60 miles from Königsberg. Pop. 3,100.—Here the Russians were defeated by the French in 1807.

MOIR, DAVID MACBETH, moir, a modern poet and prose writer, who was educated for and practised the medical profession. He made his first appearance as an author in 1812, by publishing a small volume of poems, and afterwards became widely known as a contributor to Blackwood's Magazine, his contributions being signed Δ (Delta). As a poet, he was tender and pathetic, rather than forcible and original. He was a graceful essayist and a competent man of science, and was, moreover, a kind and excellent man.

Born at Musselburgh, 1798; died 1851.

MOISIE, or MIS-TE-SHIPU (great river), mo-i-sé', a river of British America. It rises on the high land of Quebec province, and after a course of 250 miles, with many rapids, discharges on the northern shore of the estuary of the St. Lawrence.

MOLA, mo'-la, a city and seaport of Italy, province of Terra di Bari, on the Adriatic, 13 miles from Bari. There are several fine churches. Pop. 12,500.

MOLAY, JACQUES DE, mo'-lai, the last grand-master of the order of Templars, elected to that high position in 1298. The prodigious wealth of the knights having excited the envy and hatred of Philip the Fair, king of France, he resolved to suppress the order. Accordingly, a violent persecution broke out against the knights, on charges the most absurd and abominable. Molay was tried, condemned, and burnt alive near Paris. He endured his sufferings with the greatest fortitude, and vindicated the innocence of his order to the last.

Born 1244; died 1314.

MOLD, molde, a market-town and parliamentary borough of Wales, in Flintshire, on the Alun, 12 miles S.W. of Chester. MOLE, LOUIS MATHIEU, Count, mo'-lai, French statesman, whose father was president of the parliament of Paris, and died by guillotine, and his mother a daughter of Malesherbes. He exhibited precocious talents, and at the age of 24 published a pamphlet defending the government of Napoleon. His rise was rapid through several offices of state to a place in the cabinet and the title of count. After the return of Napoleon from Elba, he withdrew his support and refused to sit in the chamber of peers, and after the abdication of Napoleon, he voted for the death of Ney. In 1817 he held the office of Minister of Marine for a short time, was minister of foreign affairs under Louis Philippe in 1830, and in 1836 succeeded Thiers as Prime Minister, but resigned in 1839. In 1840 he was chosen a member of the Academy. He was a constitutional liberal, alike detesting anarchy and despotism. After the coup d'état he withdrew entirely from political life.

Born at Paris, 1781; died at Champlâtreux, 1855.

MOLESWORTH, LORD ROBERT, moles'-werth, a nobleman who contributed so effectually to the revolution of 1688, that William III. admitted him of the privy council, and despatched him upon an embassy to the court of Denmark. Having given some offence at Copenhagen, he was recalled, and, after his return to England, published an account of the kingdom of Denmark, which enjoyed great popularity. Under George I. he acted as commissioner of trade and plantations. The same monarch also advanced him to the Irish peerage in 1716.

Born at Dublin, 1656; died 1725.

MOLESWORTH, SIR WILLIAM, English statesman and man of letters, who was the eighth baronet in his family, an old Cornish one, originally of Irish extraction. After spending some time at Cambridge university (from which he was expelled for sending a challenge to his tutor) and Edinburgh, where an Italian refugee was his tutor in classics, metaphysics, and mathematics, he repaired to Germany. Philology and history were his chief studies in the latter country; and, after completing his collegiate course, he made the tour of Europe, and returned to his native land in 1831. In the year following he was returned to parliament as member for East Cornwall; was re-elected in 1834; but, in 1837, declining to contest this seat, he sought and obtained the suffrages of Leeds. He represented this latter place until 1841, after which time he remained out of parliament several years. The constituency of Southwark chose him as their representative in 1845, and in that capacity he sat in the House of Commons until his death. In the Aberdeen administration of 1853, he was appointed first commissioner of public works, and in 1855 he commenced his short but brilliant career as secretary for the colonies. As a speaker, he was too philosophical to be generally popular. These were the orations on the colonies, the state of the nation and condition of the people, and on transportation. He was a leader of the "philosophical radicals," and a close friend of Bentham and James Mill; for some time the proprietor and conductor, in conjunction with his friend John Stuart Mill, of the "Westminster Review." Many valuable articles from his pen likewise appeared in the newspapers and periodicals. A noble edition of the works of Thomas Hobbes (see HOBBES), was produced by him at his own expense.

Born in Cornwall, 1810; died 1854.

MOLFETTA, mol-fet'-ta, a city of Southern Italy, province of Terra di Bara, on the Adriatic, 18 miles N.W. of Bari. It is partly enclosed by walls, and has a splendid cathedral, and a number of churches. Almonds, oranges, and olives are cultivated in the neighbourhood, and many interesting relics of antiquity have been found. Pop. 29,697.

MOLIÈRE, JEAN BAPTISTE, mol'-e-air, the greatest comic dramatist of France. His real name was Poquelin, and his father, who was a tapestry-maker, intended him for the same business; but young Poquelin being in the habit of visiting the theatre, conceived a violent inclination for the stage. At the age of 14 he commenced his studies under the Jesuits in the college of Clermont, Paris, made rapid progress in belles lettres, studied law, and passed as an advocate. His father becoming reduced in circumstances, the youth associated himself with some persons of his own age, who had a like attachment to dramatic representation, and who formed a company of strolling players; performing in the faubourgs of Paris and the provinces, but not neglecting classical and other studies. It was in consequence of this connection that he took the name of Molière. This event took place in the year 1645. He subsequently went with his players to Lyons, where, in 1653, he brought out his first comedy, entitled "L'Étourdi," or, the Blunderer, which piece was received with great applause, and greatly pleased the prince de Conti, who had known the author at college. That prince offered to make him his secretary, which honourable station Molière declined, saying that, "though he was a passable author, he should make but a bad secretary." After performing at various places, Molière's company visited Paris, where, in 1658, by the interest of the prince, they performed several of his plays before Louis XIV., who took the troupe into his own service, and gave their leader a pension. During the subsequent fifteen years, Molière worked hard as a dramatic author and actor, and received many substantial marks of the royal favour. His best pieces, "Les Précieuses Ridicules," "Sganarelle," "L'Earle des Maris," "Le Tartuffe," "Le Medecin Malgré Lui," "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," "Les Femmes Savantes," and others followed in rapid succession. His last piece, "L'Hypocondriaque; ou, le Malade Imaginaire," occasioned his death; for, by his exertions in performing Argan, the principal character, he was seized with a convulsion, of which he died. The archbishop of Paris refused to allow his remains to be interred in consecrated ground, on account of his profession, till he was compelled to do so by the king, and the body was deposited in the cemetery of St. Joseph, from which it was removed in 1792 to the Museum of French Monuments, and in 1817 to Père Lachaise. Molière left a widow, with whom he had lived a very unhappy life, and who married a comedian named Guerin, and died in 1728, aged 92. The works of Molière have been translated into English; and several of his comedies have been adapted to our stage with success. As a comic dramatist Molière has no equal, Shakspeare excepted.

Born at Paris, 1622; died 1673.

MOLINA, LUIS, mo-le'-na, Spanish Jesuit, who entered the Society of Jesus, when 18 years old, and completed his studies at Coimbra, after which he was professor of divinity at Evora during twenty years. He wrote many learned theological works, among them a treatise on grace and free will, which occasioned great disputes afterwards between the Jesuits and Dominicans, the latter order accusing Molina of reviving Pelagianism.

Born at Cuença, 1535; died at Madrid, 1600.

MOLINE, mo-leen', a city of Rock Island county, Illinois, United States, on the east bank of the Mississippi, 179 miles S.W. of Chicago. The river is divided by an island three miles long, and there are rapids which afford a great amount of water power. Manf. Agricultural implements, woollens, iron, and machinery. There are extensive coal fields in the vicinity. Pop. 7,800.

MOLINOS, MIGUEL DE, mo-le'-nose, a Spanish divine, descended from a noble family. He was educated at Pampeluna and Coimbra, taking his theological degree at the latter university. He went to Rome, where he acquired a high reputation as a confessor and spiritual director, refusing ecclesiastical preferment. He published a book called the "Spiritual Guide," in which he maintained that man must annihilate himself, or reduce his mind to an absolute quiescence, in order to enjoy God, and, by implication, that the soul may attain such an entire independence of the body, that the greatest bodily excesses will not impair the spiritual condition. For this he was sent to the prison of the Inquisition, where he died. The religious opinions of Molinos occasioned great disputes in France, where they were known by the name of "quietism," on account of the passive disposition of mind which they inculcate.

Born at Patacina, 1627; died 1696.

MOLIQUE, WILHELM BERNARD, mo-leek', German violinist and composer. At the age of 18 he was appointed first violinist to the Bavarian court. From 1826 to 1849 he was concert director at Stuttgart. He wrote "Abraham," an oratorio, and several orchestral works, but his fame chiefly rests upon his compositions for the violin. In 1861 he was appointed professor of composition, at the Royal Academy of Music in London.

Born at Nuremberg, 1802; died at Cannstadt, 1869.

MÖLK, or MELK, me(r)lk, a town of the Austrian empire, province of Lower Austria, on the right bank of the Danube, 43 miles W. of Vienna. On a lofty rock near the town is a splendid Benedictine Abbey, and a magnificently adorned church, a large and valuable library, and a fine collection of paintings. The town is one of the Danubian steamboat stations. Pop. 3,000.

MOLL, mol, a town of Belgium, province of Antwerp, on the right bank of the Moll-Neohe, 32 miles E. of Antwerp. There are a fine church, four chapels, and an hospital. Manf. Woollens, tobacco, leather, and bricks. Pop. 5,400.

MOLLOY, CHARLES, mol'-loi, a dramatic writer, who became a student of the Middle Temple, and was the editor of a periodical paper, called "Common Sense." His plays are, "The Perplexed Couple," "The Coquette," and "The Half-pay Officers."

Born in Dublin, 1706; died 1766.

MOLO, mo'-lo, a city of the Philippine Islands, on an island of the same name. Pop. 7,544.

MOLOCH, or MOLECH, the fire-god, the supreme national idol of the Ammonites, identical with the Chemosh of the Moabites.

MOLOGA, mo-lo'-ga, an ancient town of European Russia, government of Jaroslav, near the confluence of the Mologa and Volga, 68 miles N.W. of Jaroslov. There is a considerable transit trade by river, especially in timber. Pop. 3,800.

MOLOKAI, or MOROTOI, mo-lo-ki', one of the Sandwich Islands, Pacific Ocean. It is 40 miles long, about 9 broad, and traversed by a chain of lofty volcanic mountains. About two-thirds of the island is barren, and the inhabitants are very poor. Pop. 5,000.

MOLORCHUS, mo-lor'-kus, in Greek legend, an old shepherd near Cleonæ, who received Hercules with great hospitality. The hero, to repay the kindness he received, destroyed the Nemæan lion, which laid waste the neighbouring country; and therefore the Nemæan games instituted on this occasion are to be understood by the words "Ludus Molorchi."

MOLSHEIM, molz'-hime, a town of Germany, in Alsace, on the Bruche, 11 miles S.W. of Strasburg. The church is a mixture of Gothic and modern architecture, with very elegant bell-tower. Manf. Hardware goods, cutlery, paper, and tapes. Pop. 3,300.

MOLTKE, HELMUTH KARL BERNARD, Count de, molt'-ke, Prussian general, descended from an old Mecklenburg family, studied at the military academy at Copenhagen, and in 1822 passed into that of Prussia. In 1835 he proceeded to the East, and was presented to Mahmoud, the Sultan, at the Ottoman porte, where he remained for several years, at the desire of the Sultan, initiating the Turkish troops in the new theories of strategy, and directing the military reforms of the empire. After assisting in the Syrian campaign of 1839, he returned to Prussia, and was nominated in 1846 aide-de-camp to prince Henry, who died the following year. In 1856 he became aide-de-camp to prince Frederick William, and two years later he was appointed chief of the army staff. In 1859 he planned an expedition which the prompt conclusion of the peace of Villafranca, between France and Austria, prevented from being carried into execution. In 1864 he took a prominent part in planning the strategic operations of the war against Denmark, and was attached as chief of the military staff to prince Frederick Charles, who was called to the command of the allied troops. The following year, in anticipation of a rupture with Austria, von Moltke was actively employed in preparing the plan of a campaign, and when, in 1866, war was declared, every detail as previously arranged was faithfully carried out. Promoted to the rank of general of infantry, he accompanied the king, who took the command-in-chief of the expedition, and was at his side at the battle of Sadowa. Under his direction the victorious troops marched upon Vienna. On the 22nd July general von Moltke granted a truce of five days, during which time an armistice was concluded, accompanied with the preliminaries of a peace, humiliating to the Austrian empire and promoting the ambitious projects of Prussia. On this occasion the king of Prussia conferred upon von Moltke the order of the Black Eagle. When war between France and Germany was declared, on the 15th July, 1870, this great strategist had prepared the most elaborate plan of a campaign that was ever entered upon. Appointed second in command of the Prussian forces headed by king William, who accompanied the expedition in person as commander-in-chief, general von Moltke was the presiding genius of all those masterly operations which led up to the capture of Sedan and the surrender of the French emperor, and which ultimately culminated in the capitulation of Paris, on January 28, 1871. General von Moltke was created account of the German empire on his seventieth birthday, October 28, 1870.

Born at Griewitz, in Mecklenburg, October 28, 1800.

MOLTON, SOUTH, mole'-ton, a market town and municipal borough of Devonshire, on the Mole, 12 miles E. of Barnstaple. There are a fine old church, several other places of worship, a handsome town hall, and a large market place. Manf. Woollens and lace. Pop. 4,000.—A station on the Great Western railway.

MOLUCCAS, or SPICE ISLANDS, moluk'-kas, the name given to islands of the Asiatic archipelago, lying to the east of Celebes, comprising AMBOYNA, BANDA, CERAM, TERNATE, TIDORES, the Ulliaser group, and some smaller islands. They are chiefly famous for the production of spices, particularly nutmegs and cloves. Pop. 346,055.—They were taken by the British from the Dutch, but were restored in 1814.

MOLYNEUX, WILLIAM, mathematician, who received his education at Trinity College, Dublin, after which he entered as a student of the Middle Temple, London. The Philosophical Society, established at Dublin in 1683, owed its origin to his endeavours, and he became the first secretary. Soon after, he was appointed surveyor-general of the works and chief engineer. In 1685 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and in 1689 settled with his family at Chester, where he employed himself in finishing his "Treatise on Dioptrics," which was published in 1692. In this year he returned to Dublin, and was chosen one of the representatives for that city. Besides the above, he wrote: "Sciothericum Telescopium;" or, a description of a Telescopic Dial invented by him; also, "The Case of Ireland stated, in relation to its being bound by Acts of Parliament in England;" some papers in the "Philosophical Transactions;" and several letters between him and Mr. Locke.

Born at Dublin, 1656; died 1698.

MOMBARUZZO, mom'-ba-rut-zo, a town of northern Italy, province of Alessandria, on the Cervino. There are three churches, an old convent, and the remains of a feudal castle. There is a trade in corn, wine, and wood. Pop. 2,500.

MOMBAS, or MOMBASAH, mom-bas', a small island on the east coast of Africa, formed by two streams, the Yombo on the north, and the Penha on the south. The island is only about 3 miles long and 2 wide, has rocky shores, and a good harbour at Mombas, the town; a place of some importance as a Portuguese settlement in the 16th and 17th centuries, but now in a ruinous condition. The possession of the island has been warmly contested, and it now belongs to the Sultan of Muscat. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 4° 6′ S. Lon. 39° 49′ E.

MOMBERCELLI, mom-ber-chel'-le, a town of northern Italy, province of Alessandria, on the right bank of the Tiglione. Pop. 3,000.

MOMMSEN, CHRISTIAN MATTHIAS THEODOR, mom'-sen, German historian, best known in this country by his "Earliest Inhabitants of Italy," and his "History of Rome;" but he is also the author of several other learned works, of great value, on numismatics, philology, and other subjects connected with antiquarian research. He edited a magnificent work on Latin inscriptions, which was published by the Prussian Academy of Science, and another work on Roman coins. He studied at the universities of Altona and Kiel, was professor of jurisprudence at Leipsic, but deprived in 1849 on account of his political opinions, and afterwards professor at Zurich and Breslau, and in 1858 was appointed professor of Roman archæology at Berlin. In 1874 he was restored to his professorship at Leipsic.

Born at Garding, in Schleswig, 1817.

MOMPOX, mom'-pox (Sp. mom'-poj), a city of Colombia, South America, on the Magdalena, 110 miles S. of Cartagena. It stands in a marshy uncultivated country, but is said to be well built. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 9° 14′ 20″ N. Lon. 74° 27′ 30″ W.

MOMUS, mo'-mus, in Greek mythology, the god of pleasantry among the ancients, son of Nox, according to Hesiod. He was continually employed in satirising the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned into ridicule. Vulcan, Minerva, Venus, &c., all alike experienced the shafts of his censure and satire. Such illiberal reflections, however, upon the gods, were the cause of his being driven from Olympus. He is generally represented raising a mask from his face, and holding a fool's bauble in his hand.

MONACO, mon'-a-ko, a small principality of Italy. It consists now only of the town of Monaco, prettily situated on a rocky promontory, 8 miles E. of Nice. Before 1861, it formed, with Mentone and Roccabruna, and a fertile territory about 52 square miles in extent, an independent principality; but Mentone and Roccabruna having been sold to France, the town is now the sole possession of the prince. It is much resorted to as a pleasure resort, and the greater part of the revenue is derived from the gambling tables in the casino. Pop. 2,000.

MONAGHAN, mon'-a-han, an inland county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded N. by Tyrone, E. by Armagh and Louth, W. by Fermanagh, and S. by Meath and Cavan. It is generally undulating, but in the north-west and east are hills reaching an altitude of 1,250 feet, and in many parts interspersed with bogs and small lakes.

Rivers.—The Lagan, the Fane, the Glyde, the Finn, and the Blackwater. There are numerous lakes, some of them considerable sheets of water.

Area.—500 square miles.

Pop.—102,590.

MONBODDO, JAMES BURNET, Lord, mon-bod'-do, a learned Scotch writer, and one of the lords of the Court of Session. He received his education at Marischal College, Aberdeen, and at the university of Gröningen. In 1737 he returned to Scotland, commenced the practice of the legal profession, greatly distinguished himself as an advocate in the famous Douglas case, and was, in 1767, elevated to the bench. His most important works were, a "Dissertation on the Origin and Progress of Language," and "Ancient Metaphysics." He held the singular notion, that men were only a civilised species of monkeys, and that the savage state was that in which virtue and happiness could be best attained. This extravagant love of the ancients led him to make, like them, supper his principal meal, and at these entertainments, he had Dr. Nash, Dr. Hutton, and many of the learned of Edinburgh, as his guests. Shortly before his death he published a work on "Ancient Metaphysics."

Born at Monboddo, Kincardineshire, 1714; died at Edinburgh, 1799.

MONBUTTOO, mon-but-too', a country of Central Africa, between lat. 3° and 4° N., and lon. 28° and 29° E. The German traveller Schweinfurth describes it as a table land, 2,500 feet above the sea. Very fertile. Area. About 4,000 square miles. Pop. About 1,000,000, of lighter complexion than other people of Central Africa.

MONCADA, FRANCESCO DE, mon-kai'-da, Conde de Osona, Spanish historian, was the son of the viceroy of Valencia, and descended from a noble family. He was appointed ambassador to Vienna, and afterwards governor of the Netherlands. He was killed while besieging Goch, a fortress of the duchy of Cleves. He wrote a history of the expedition of the Catalonians and Aragonese against the Turks which is considered one of the masterpieces of Spanish historical literature.

Born at Valencia, 1586; died 1635.

MONGAULT, NICHOLAS HUBERT DE, mawn-golte', a learned French ecclesiastic, who was educated in the congregation of the Oratory, and became a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and tutor to the duke de Chartres. His works are a French translation of Herodian, and another of

Cicero's Letters to Atticus; and dissertations in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions.

Born at Paris, 1674; died 1746.

MONGE, GASPARD, mawnzh, French geometrician, the son of an hotel-keeper, studied natural philosophy at the Oratorian college at Lyons, and afterwards at the artillery school at Menzières, where, in 1772, he became tutor and professor. In 1780 he became member of the Academy of Sciences, and, three years afterwards, was appointed examiner of naval aspirants. In 1780 he was chosen a member of the French Academy, and in the same year appointed professor of hydrodynamics at the Louvre. Energetically espousing the principles of the Revolution, he became, in 1792, minister of marine, which post proving to be little in accordance with his genius, he renounced the employment soon afterwards, and turned his attention to providing his country with the most efficient methods of defence. He was one of the founders of the Polytechnic school, accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and became president of the Institute of Cairo. The emperor subsequently nominated him senator, Count de Peluse, and loaded him with honours. After the Restoration, however, he fell into disgrace. His various works on geometry are among the clearest and best in the French language.

Born at Beaune, 1746; died 1818.

MONGHIER, or MONGHYR, mon-geer', a city of British India, on the right bank of the Ganges, 80 miles from Patna. MONGOLIA, mon-go'-le-a, an extensive region in the north-eastern part of Asia, a dependency of the Chinese empire, to the N. and N.W. of China, and filling most of the space between that empire and Asiatic Russia. A considerable portion is occupied by the great sandy desert of GOBI, and there are lofty chains of mountains, the summits of which are well wooded with pine, elm, birch, and white poplar. The principal range is the Altai, which under various names extends as far to the N.E. as the Amoor. The climate is intensely cold on the plains in winter, but in summer the heat is intense. There are many fertile but little-cultivated spots, the inhabitants chiefly depending on the supplies they receive from China in exchange for cattle and sheep. Wild horses, wolves, goats, and fur-bearing animals, are numerous.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Hoang-ho, or Yellow River, in the south-east; the Siramuren and its branches in the south; the Selenga, Orkhon, and Tola, which unite their streams and flow into Lake Baikal; the Kerlon, Onon, and other tributaries of the Amoor. There are several lakes, the largest being Upsa-nor, Attai-nor, Alak-nor, and Iki-aval, in the north-west, and Koko-nor (or Azure Sea) in the south, and Oling and Dzaring near the sources of the Yellow River.

Area.—1,288,035 square miles.

Pop.—2,500,000, wandering hordes of that nomadic race which, under the name of Mongols, or Moguls, has been so celebrated. They are Buddhists, living under various chiefs, and paying tribute to the Chinese emperor, who returns them presents to a greater amount.

Divisions.—There are four principal regions:—Inner Mongolia, between the great wall and the desert of Gobi; Outer Mongolia, between the desert and the Altai mountains; the country west of the Ala-shan ranges; and Uliassutai and its dependencies.

MONMOUTH, JAMES, Duke of, natural son of Charles II. and Lucy Walters, who, coming to England in 1656, during the Commonwealth, was at first committed to the Tower, but allowed to retire to France, where she died. Her son was taken care of by Lord Crofts, and was known as James Crofts, but, at his father's restoration, was created earl of Orkney, and, at a subsequent period, became duke of Monmouth and knight of the Garter. He had previously, at the age of 16, married Anne, daughter of the duke of Buccleuch, with whom he lived unhappily. He was for some time in the service of France, with an English regiment, and signalized himself against the Dutch; for which he was created lieutenant-general. The party opposed to the succession of the duke of York asserted that Monmouth was the legitimate heir to the crown, but the king formally announced that he had not married Lucy Walters. On his return to England he was sent, in 1679, to quell an insurrection in Scotland, which he succeeded in doing, gaining the famous victory over the Covenanters at Bothwell Bridge; but he was severely censured for his want of severity, which, however, gained him the warm support of the English Nonconformists. He was exiled to Holland, but was permitted to return to England in the following year, and was received with joyful popular demonstrations. The excitement attending his visits to the west of England and some of the northern counties alarmed the duke of York, who influenced the king to order Monmouth to be arrested at Stafford. He then confessed that he had been concerned in the Rye House plot, but on his promise of allegiance to the duke of York should he succeed to the throne, the king pardoned his son, who fled to Holland, and remained there until the death of Charles. Monmouth then, at the head of a large body of friends, set out an expedition to England, proclaimed James a murderer and usurper, and landed at Lyme Regis, in Dorsetshire. At Taunton he was proclaimed king; but three weeks after he landed his small army was completely routed at Sedgemoor, by the earl of Faversham, who commanded the king's forces. Monmouth fled from the field, and was captured in a ditch, in a wretched and starving condition. He was taken to London, and made abject appeals for mercy, but James was inflexible, and he was beheaded on Tower Hill. The infamous Jeffreys was sent to punish the adherents of the unhappy man, and the terrible "Bloody Assize" showed how efficiently he did his sanguinary work. An attempted rising in Scotland, under Argyll, intended to assist Monmouth, also disastrously failed. His wife, who survived him 47 years, married Charles, Lord Cornwallis. She is the "Duchess" of the introduction to Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel." Monmouth himself is the "Absalom" of Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel."

Born at Rotterdam, 1649; died 1685.

MONMOUTHSHIRE, mon'-mouth-sheer, a maritime county of England, on the borders of Wales, bounded S. by the estuary of the Severn, N. by the counties of Hereford and Brecknock, W. by Glamorgan, and E. by Gloucester. The coast-line is 22 miles long, and the surface of the county generally is extremely diversified, rising to the N. and N.W. to an elevation of 1860 feet. The soil is on the whole fertile, especially in the valleys of the Wye and Usk. In the south are large tracts of moor or marsh lands, of a deep rich loamy soil in some places, and a black peaty earth in others. The marsh lands along the coast are many of them subject to inundations of the sea; and great dykes have been raised for their protection, chiefly in the extensive levels of Caldecot and Wentloog. In the western and hilly part of the county the soil is barren, and of a thin, peaty nature. The scenery of the county is very beautiful, and there are many interesting ancient edifices, especially Raglan, Caldecot, and Chepstow castles, and Llantheny and Tintern abbeys. There are many Roman antiquities.

Rivers.—The principal are the Monnow, the Wye, the Usk, the Ebbw, flowing into the Severn, besides a number of smaller streams.

Minerals.—Iron-stone, lead, coal, limestone of the finest kind, brescia for millstones, and valuable building-stone.

Manf.—Principally iron.

Area.—575 square miles.

Pop.—211,374.

Chief Towns.—MONMOUTH, the capital; NEWPORT and USK.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned for the county, and one for Monmouth.

History.—This county, formerly belonging to Wales, was made an English county in the reign of Henry VIII.

MONNOYER, JEAN BAPTIST, mon-nwoi'-yai, a celebrated fruit and flower-painter, who was employed by Le Brun to decorate the palace at Versailles with examples of his art, and became member of the French Academy of Painters. His fame reaching England, he was invited to London about 1680, by the duke of Montague, to embellish his house (the late British Museum). He also decorated the mansions of several of the English nobility, and some flower-pieces by him are at Hampton-Court Palace. He etched a collection of his own designs, which was published in a folio volume.

Born at Lille, 1635; died in London, 1699.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, mun-ro', a celebrated Scotch physician and anatomist, who studied at London and Leyden under Boerhaave. In 1719 he returned to Edinburgh, and was appointed professor of anatomy in the university. He was one of the promoters of the Edinburgh Royal Infirmary, received the M.D. degree in 1756, and in the same year was elected a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. He was also a fellow of the Royal Society of London, and a member of the Royal Academy of Surgery at Paris. His most important and valuable works are, "Osteology;" "Anatomy of the Nerves;" several papers in the "Medical Essays of Edinburgh;" and on the "Success of Inoculation in Edinburgh." He also published some literary essays.

Born in London, 1697; died 1767.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, youngest son of the preceding, and also an eminent physician and anatomist. He studied at Edinburgh, and at the age of 22 was appointed joint professor with his father, whom he afterwards succeeded. He was secretary of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. He wrote treatises on the veins, the nervous system, and other physiological subjects. His son, also an eminent anatomist, was joined with him in the professorship, so that Alexander Monro primus, secundus, and tertius, appear in the annals of the university.

Born at Edinburgh, 1733; died 1817.

MONROE, JAMES, fifth president of the United States, was descended from a Scotch cava-

ier, who, in the Commonwealth time, emigrated to Virginia. He entered the American Army of Independence, as volunteer, in his 16th year, and, at the close of the war, became colonel, on the recommendation of General Washington. He next studied the law at the William and Mary College, in Virginia, and was sent as representative of Westmoreland county in the legislature. After forming a member of the senatorial body of the United States for three years, General Washington appointed him minister to France. In 1796 he was recalled, on account of his extreme sympathy with the Revolutionary government; but was, two years afterwards, chosen as governor by his native state of Virginia. He held that office for three years, at the end of which he again went to France as United States minister. While in Paris, he negotiated the purchases of New Orleans and Louisiana. He next represented his native country at the courts of Spain and Great Britain, and, in 1808, returned home. After serving as secretary of state under President Madison, he was chosen president, in 1816, and re-elected in 1821. The most important measures of his presidency were the Missouri compromise on the slavery question, and the recognition of the independence of Mexico and the republics of South America. The line of policy known as the "Monroe Doctrine" was first declared by Monroe. It announces the policy of the United States to be not to interfere with the affairs of Europe, nor permit the Old World to interfere with the system of the New. Upon the termination of his presidentship, he retired to Virginia, where he acted as a justice of the peace. During the last years of his life, he lived at New York. It is noticeable that his death, like that of Adams and Jefferson, his predecessors, occurred on the 4th of July, the anniversary of the independence of the States.

Born in Westmoreland, Virginia, 1758; died at New York, 1831.

MONS, mons (Flemish, BERGHEN, ber'-gen), a town of Belgium, capital of the province of Hainault, divided into two parts by the Trouille, 35 miles S.W. of Brussels, and communicates with the Scheldt by the Condé canal. It is a well-built town, with several squares, and tolerably regular streets. The principal buildings are the market-place, the government-house, the house of the provincial council, the town-hall, with a fine steeple erected in 1716, the noble Gothic cathedral of St. Waudru, built in the 15th and 16th centuries, and various churches and charitable institutions. Manf. Woollens, cotton, linen, lace, cutlery, and sugar. There are large coal-fields in the vicinity, and there is a large trade in coal, flax, hemp, horses, and cattle. Pop. 24,827.—It has been frequently besieged and taken: in 1709, by the allies under Marlborough and Eugene; in 1746, by Marshal Saxe; and in the war of the French revolution (in 1792, 1793, 1794), by the French and allies.

MONSELICE, mon-sai-le'-chai, a town of Italy, province of Padova, on a rocky eminence, 12 miles S.W. of Padua. There are an old castle and four churches, and near the town is a monastery, on the site of a temple of Jupiter. Manf. Woollen and linen goods, silk, and hats. Pop. 8,200.

MONSEY, MESSENGER, mon'-se, an English physician, was a man of great originality of manners, and of considerable talents, and was for many years physician of Chelsea hospital. By his will he ordered that his body should be anatomised, and the skeleton preserved in Chelsea Hospital, having a great aversion to interment in churches and churchyards.

Born 1692; died 1788.

MONSTER, mon'-ster, a town of Holland, province of South Holland, near the North Sea, 15 miles N.W. of Rotterdam. Pop. 3,700.

MONSTRELET, ENGUERRANDE DE, mon'-stre-lai, a celebrated French chronicler. Relative to his early life, nothing authentic is known. He was appointed provost of the city of Cambrai, and bailiff of Wallaincourt, which offices he retained until his death. His chronicles commence about the time that Froissart's terminate, and like his predecessor, he gives a clear and picturesque narrative of the wars of France, and of the principal persons engaged in them, from the year 1400 to 1453.

Born 1390; died 1453.

MONTAGNAC, mon-tan'-yak, a town of France, department Herault, on the right bank of the Herault, 22 miles S.W. of Montpellier. There is a trade in woollen goods. Pop. 3,900.

MONTAGNANA, mon-tan-ya'-na, a town of northern Italy, province of Padova, 32 miles S. of Padua. There are a fine cathedral and palace, and the town is walled. Manf. Spun silk, wool, hemp, and coarse cotton goods. Pop. 7,600.

MONTAGU, LADY MARY WORTLEY, was the eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepoint, earl, and afterwards duke of Kingston. She received a liberal education, and taught herself the elements of the Latin language. In 1712 she eloped with and married Edward Wortley Montagu, cousin of Charles Montagu, earl of Halifax. This gentleman distinguished himself in parliament, and was the intimate friend of Addison. In 1716 he was appointed ambassador to the court of Constantinople, whither he was accompanied by his lady. During this embassy, she wrote an elegant and interesting description of Constantinople, in letters to her friends. While at Constantinople, she obtained information of a practice among the villagers, of inoculating for the small-pox. This operation she performed on her son, and by this means was instrumental in introducing inoculation into the east of Europe. At the end of 1718, Lady Mary returned to England, and settled at Twickenham, where she formed an intimacy with Pope; but the friendship was afterwards broken, and the poet did not scruple to write satires against her talents and reputation, which satires, when charged with, he was mean enough to deny. In 1737, for some reason not precisely known, she left her husband, and went to Italy, taking up her residence in Venice, where she remained till 1761, when she returned to England.

Born at Thoresby, Nottinghamshire, 1690; died 1762.

MONTAGU, EDWARD WORTLEY, son of the preceding, whom his niece, in her biography of his mother, describes as "betraying from the beginning that surest symptom of moral (or mental) disease, an habitual disregard of truth, accompanied by a fertile and ready invention, never at fault." He received his education at Westminster school, whence he ran away, and entered into the service of a chimney-sweeper. His family had given him up as lost, when a gentleman recognised him in the street, and took him home to his father. He escaped a second time, and engaged with the master of a fishing-smack; after which he shipped himself on board a vessel bound to Spain, where he served as muleteer. In this situation he was discovered and conveyed home to his friends, who placed him under a tutor, with whom he travelled abroad. His father being rather scanty in his remittances, owing probably to the son's extravagance, the tutor is said to have committed a curious fraud to obtain a supply. This was the printing a book entitled "Observations on the Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire, by Edward Wortley Montagu, Esq." This work, whether the production of the son or not, gave great pleasure to the old gentleman, who acknowledged it in a handsome manner. Edward was for some time in parliament, and conducted himself in a manner becoming his rank. He afterwards went to the Levant, where he adopted the dress and manners of the Turks. Out of pique against his family, he caused an advertisement to be inserted in the English papers, for a wife without fortune, that by having an heir, he might disappoint his relations, which expedient, however, failed. He wrote "Observations on Earthquakes," and some curious papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

Born at Wharncliffe, Yorkshire, 1713; died at Padua, 1776.

MONTAGU, EDWARD. (See SANDWICH, Earl of.)

MONTAGU, ELIZABETH, an English authoress, the care of whose education was undertaken by the celebrated Dr. Conyers Middleton. (See MIDDLETON, Dr.) In 1769 Mrs. Montagu published "An Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakspeare," which obtained a great and deserved reputation. She formed a literary society, known by the name of the Blue-Stocking Club, from the circumstance that a gentleman belonging to it wore stockings of that colour. Mrs. Montagu was noticed for another peculiarity,—that of giving an annual dinner on May-day to the chimney-sweepers of the metropolis, to celebrate the fact of her kinsman (see MONTAGU, Edward Wortley) having been for some time a chimney-sweep. George Lord Lyttleton was a warm admirer of Mrs. Montagu, and was assisted by her in the composition of his "Dialogues of the Dead."

Born 1720; died 1800.

MONTAGUE, GEORGE, a distinguished English naturalist, and one of the original members of the Linnæan Society of London. His "Ornithological Dictionary, or Alphabetical Synopsis of British Birds," was first published in 1802, and may be advantageously consulted by the student of natural history, even at the present time. In the following year, he put forth a "Natural History of British Shells, Marine, Land, and Freshwater," to which a supplement was added in 1809. His most important contributions to the Transactions of the Linnæan Society were, a "Description of three Rare Species of British Birds," "On some Species of British Quadrupeds, Birds, and Fishes;" "Of several New or Rare Animals, principally Marine, found on the South Coast of Devonshire," and "Some New and Rare British Marine Shells and Animals." Mr. Montague was a gentleman of ancient family, who resided upon his estate in Wiltshire, and afterwards at Knightsbridge, in Devonshire, and his works were the result of a polished and lettered ease.

Died in Devonshire, 1815.

MONTAGUE, RICHARD, a learned English prelate, who, in 1616, became dean of Hereford, and in 1621 published a learned answer to Selden's "History of Tithes." He afterwards engaged in a controversy with the Roman Catholics, on which occasion he wrote his "Appello Cæsarem," for which he was ordered to appear at the bar of the House of Commons in the first parliament of Charles I., on the charge of maintaining Arminian and popish errors. He was made bishop of Chichester in 1628, whence he was translated to Norwich in 1638. His principal work is an "Ecclesiastical History," in Latin.

Born in Buckinghamshire, about 1577; died 1641.

MONTAGUE, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 11,257.

MONTAGUE ISLAND, an island in the Pacific Ocean. Ext. 50 miles long, with a breadth of 8. Lat. between 59° 50′ and 60° 30′ N. Lon. between 147° and 148° W.

MONTAIGNE, MICHEL EYQUEM DE, French essayist. While yet a child he attained a remarkable proficiency in Latin, and at 10 years of age entered the college of Bordeaux. He was intended for the bar, and when 21 years of age was appointed councillor in the parliament of Bordeaux, but the death of his father giving him possession of the paternal estate of Montaigne, in Perigord, he renounced the profession, and travelled into Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, making his observations rather on human nature than on places and curiosities. At Rome he was honoured with the citizenship. In 1581 he was chosen mayor of Bordeaux, in which post he gave such satisfaction as to be elected for four years successively. He appeared with applause at the meeting of the states of Blois in 1588, and was honoured by Charles IX. with the order of St. Michael. After an active life he retired to his country seat, where he devoted himself for the remainder of his life to philosophical studies. The celebrated "Essays" were written at a time when Montaigne was suffering from deep melancholy, which had been induced by the horror with which the massacre of St. Bartholomew (1572) had inspired him. He kept a journal of his tour, which he did not intend to publish, but which was discovered two centuries afterwards, in his family château, and given to the world under the title, "Journal of the Travels of Michael de Montaigne." The essays, which were truly called, by Cardinal du Perron, "the breviary of honest men," treated of the most diverse subjects, were evidently composed without plan, and were the simple and truthful expression of Montaigne's mind upon certain occasions. They are written in a facile and quaint style; on which account, as well as for their deep sincerity, they present a great charm to the reader. The most remarkable essays are those on friendship, the education of children, and on the administration of justice. Although his writings exhibit a very sceptical habit of thought, he died professing implicit belief in the doctrines of the church of Rome. The best English translation of the Essays is that of Cotton.

Born at Montaigne, 1533; died 1592.

MONTALCINO, mon-tal-che'-no, a town of Central Italy, 22 miles S.E. of Siena, beautifully situated on a hill, in the midst of valleys. The wine made in the vicinity is of fine quality. Pop. 7,600.

MONTALEMBERT, CHARLES FORBES, Count de, mon-tal-em'-bair, French author and politician, who was son of a peer of France, ambassador at Stockholm from the court of Charles X. His mother was a Scotch lady. He received his education at the university of Paris. At the outset of his career he was an advocate of the union of Catholicism and democracy, of which Lamennais was the apostle (see LAMENNAIS), and was one of the editors of a journal founded to advocate that union, called "L'Avenir." He subsequently commenced a kind of crusade against the university, and opened, in 1831, with Lacordaire, a school called the "Ecole Libre." (See LACORDAIRE.) His opposition to the existing government at length brought him before the tribunals of justice; but, during the process of trial, his father died, and, as he thus became a peer of France, he claimed the right of being tried by the upper chamber, by which he was condemned to a fine of a hundred francs. His defence, pronounced before the chamber, may be considered as the beginning of his political career; but he was prevented, not having attained the legal age of 30, from taking his seat until 1840. The condemnation of Lamennais by the pope greatly increased the severity of Montalembert's orthodoxy, and, both by writing and speaking, he thenceforward made himself known as the great champion of Catholicism. In 1836 he published his famous "Life of Elizabeth of Hungary." In 1842 he strongly opposed the educational measure of M. Villemain, and in the following year published his Catholic manifesto. In 1843 he delivered, in the Chamber of Peers, his three remarkable speeches on the liberty of the church, the liberty of education, and the liberty of the monastic orders. He also made himself notorious for the part he took on behalf of oppressed nationalities; and in 1848 he had a solemn funeral service celebrated in Notre Dame to the memory of Daniel O'Connell. After the establishment of the republic, M. de Montalembert was elected a member of the Constituent Assembly, and then acted with the opposition party. He was opposed to the measure for again requiring journals to furnish security, to the continuance of the state of siege, and to the admission of Louis Bonaparte. At the end of the session, however, he supported a bill for the restriction of the press, and loudly approved of the French expedition to Rome. He was re-elected to the Legislative Assembly, and distinguished himself by his frequent encounters with M. Victor Hugo, his only rival in oratory, and by his defence of the president. When the coup d'état came, he protested strongly against the imprisonment of the deputies, but was nevertheless named a member of the Consultative Commission, a distinction he declined, and was, in 1852, elected into the Corps Législatif. At the election in 1857 he lost his seat, and retired into private life, but came before the public again as the writer of the article in the "Correspondant" which led to his being summoned before the bar of the correctional police, and to his trial which attracted the attention of every capital of Europe. For that effusion he was fined 3,000 francs, and ordered to be imprisoned for six months. M. de Montalembert is likewise known in England as the author of two eloquent works, entitled, respectively, "Catholic Interests in the 19th Century," and the "Political Future of England." He was elected a member of the French Academy in 1852.

Born in London, 1810; died 1870.

MONTALEMBERT, MARC-RENÉ, Marquis de, a celebrated French engineer general, and member of the Paris Academy of Sciences. He displayed great military talent in the French, Russian, and Swedish services; but is best known by his works, which were, "Perpendicular Fortification; or, the Art Defensive superior to the Art Offensive, by a New Manner of employing Artillery;" "Correspondence with Ministers and Generals," and some comedies and poems.

Born at Angoulême, 1714; died 1800.

MONTANA, mon-ta'-na, a territory of the United States, to the east of the Rocky Mountains, bounded N. by British America, W. by the territory of Washington and Idaho, and S. and E. by the territories of Wyoming and Dakota. The district is well watered, and there are large tracts fit for pastoral purposes.

Rivers.—The Missouri and Yellowstone, with their affluents, and the Columbia.

Minerals.—Silver, gold, copper, coal, galena, and precious stones.

Area.—145,776 square miles.

Pop.—39,159, chiefly engaged in mining operations, and 22,000 Indians of various tribes.

MONTANARO, mon-ta-na'-ro, a town of Italy, province of Torino, 14 miles N.E. of Turin. It has churches, several schools, and a castle. Pop. 4,200.

MONTANCHES, mon-tan'-ches, a town of Spain, province of Caceres, 30 miles S.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Oil and flour. There is a trade in ham and beef. Pop. 3,500.

MONTANUS, mon-tai'-nus, a Phrygian, founder of the sect of Christian heretics called Montanists, or Cataphrygians. He pretended that the Holy Spirit descended into him, together with two of his followers, Priscilla and Maximilla, two ladies of considerable property. He denied the doctrine of the Trinity, and condemned second marriages as adulterous. His followers, who were numerous, affected extraordinary agitations of the body, as the effects of the Spirit, and pretended to make prophecies. Among others who were gained over to this strange sect was the learned Tertullian: but, in the end, he separated himself from them.

Lived in the 2nd century.

MONTARGIS, mon-tar'-zhe, a town of France, department Loiret, 40 miles N.E. of Orleans. It stands at the junction of the canals Loing and Briare, and has several churches, a small theatre, and an old castle. In the vicinity is a large forest of the same name. Manf. Cloth and leather. There is a considerable trade in corn and cattle. Pop. 8,200.

MONTAUBAN, mon-to'-ba, a town of France, the capital of the department of the Tarn-et-Garonne, between the Tarn and the Tescon, 32 miles N. of Toulouse. It consists of three parts, two on different sides of the Tarn from the third, with which they communicate by a bridge. In the centre of the town is a square, surrounded with good buildings, and presenting a double range of arcades adorned with pilasters of the Doric order. This square forms the point of junction of eight streets. The most remarkable object is the elevated public walk called the Falaise, which has an extensive view. The principal buildings are the cathedral (a fine building in the Italian style), the bishop's palace, and the college; here are also an astronomical observatory, a society of arts and sciences, and a public library. Its celebrated Protestant university, suppressed in 1629, was re-established by Bonaparte in 1810. Manf. Silk stuffs and stockings, linen, serge, and woollens. There is a large trade in wines, grain, and leather. Pop. 28,335. the great majority being Protestants. This place, which was the stronghold of the Huguenots in the 17th century, has several times been besieged.

MONTBARD, mawnt-bar', a town of France, department Côte d'Or, on the Brenne and the Burgundy canal, 40 miles N.W. of Dijon. There are an old church and the château in which Buffon was born. Manf. Woollen goods, laces, and leather. Pop. 2,800.

MONTBELIARD, mawnt-bal'-le-ar, an old walled town of France, department Doubs, 40 miles N.E. of Besançon. There are a communal college, town-hall, several churches, and a castle. Manf. Clocks and watches, hosiery, cotton, muslins, leather, and agricultural implements. There is a good general trade, especially in timber. Pop. 6,500.

MONT BLANC. (See BLANC, MONT.)

MONTBLANCH, monte-blanch', a town of Spain, province of Tarragona, 19 miles N.W. of the town of that name. Manf. Leather and cotton. Pop. 4,100.

MONTBRISON, mawnt-bre'-sawng, a town of France, capital of the department Loire, on the Vizezy, 37 miles S.W. of Lyons. There are a Gothic cathedral, two colleges, and fine promenades on the site of the old fortifications. In the vicinity are mineral springs. Pop. 6,400.

MONTBRON, mawnt-bron', a town of France, department Charente, on the Tardoire, 16 miles E. of Angoulême. Manf. Iron and paper. There are lead mines near the town. Pop. 3,300.

MONTCALM, LOUIS JOSEPH, Marquis de, mont'-kam, a French general, who entered the army at an early age, and signalised himself on many occasions, particularly that of Placenza, in 1746. In 1756 he became field-marshal, and was appointed to command the French army in Canada, where he opposed Lord Loudon with considerable skill and success. He afterwards defeated Abercromby, his lordship's successor; but in the battle fought under the walls of Quebec, Montcalm received a mortal wound, as did also his brave opponent, the English general Wolfe.

Born at Candiac, near Nimes, 1712; died 1759.

MONTCALM, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 33,148. The capital is Stanton.

MONTCALM, a county of Quebec province, Canada. Area, 4,027 square miles. Pop. 13,000, about 11,000 being of French descent. The capital is Sainte Julienne.

MONT DE MARSAN, mawnt de(r) mar'-sa, a town of France, department Landes, on the Midouze, 62 miles S. of Bordeaux. It stands in a sandy plain, and has a college and mineral warm baths. Manf. Woollen goods, leather, and sailcloth. It is an entrepôt for wine, brandy, wool, and the agricultural produce of the surrounding country. Pop. 8,400.

MONTDIDIER, mawnt-did'-e-air, a town of France, department Somme, on the Don, 21 miles S.E. of Amiens. Manf. Hosiery, serge, cotton, and leather. Pop. 4,300.

MONTEBELLO, mon'-tai-bel'-lo, a town of Italy, 20 miles from Verona. It has several churches and two castles. Pop. 3,200.

MONTEBELLO CASTEGGIO, kas-tedj'-e-o, a village of Northern Italy, 23 miles N.E. of Alessandria, on the banks of the torrent Schizzola. —Here the Austrians were defeated by the French in 1800 and in 1859. In the former battle the French were commanded by Marshal Lannes, who received the title of the Duke of Montebello. (See LANNES.)

MONTE CARLO, kar'-lo, a town of Northern Italy, province of Firenze, 32 miles N.W. of Florence. There are four churches, one very large and handsome. A trade is carried on in wine, olives, hemp, flax, and dairy produce. Pop. 3,300.

MONTE CHRISTO, kris'-to, a small Italian island, 26 miles S. of Elba. It is uninhabited, consisting of an almost inaccessible granite mountain, rising to a height of nearly 2,000 feet. It is best known as giving a name to the famous novel by Alexandre Dumas.

MONTECUCULI, SEBASTIAN, Count, mon'-tai-koo'-koo-le, an Italian gentleman, who went to France in the suite of Catherine de' Medici, and became cupbearer to the dauphin Francis, son of Francis I. He was accused of having poisoned the young prince at Valence, in 1536, and, being put to the torture, confessed that he was hired to do it by the partisans of Charles V. He suffered death, but the friends of the emperor fully refuted the abominable charge, and threw it back upon his patron, Catherine de' Medici, wife of Henry II., brother to the dauphin.

MONTECUCULI, RAIMONDO, Count de, general in the service of Austria. He entered early into the army, under his uncle, who commanded the artillery of the emperor. The first action in which he distinguished himself was in 1638, when, at the head of 2,000 men, he surprised 10,000 Swedes, who were engaged in besieging Numslau, in Silesia, and whom he compelled to abandon their baggage and artillery, but was subsequently taken prisoner by General Bannier. He did not regain his liberty till two years after; but he employed that time to great advantage in study. On returning to his profession, he defeated the Swedes in Bohemia. After the peace of Westphalia, he travelled in different countries. In 1657 he was appointed field-marshal, and sent to the relief of John Casimir, king of Poland, who was attacked by Sweden and the prince of Transylvania. After defeating the latter, he took Cracow from the Swedes, and gained several splendid actions, which produced a peace. In 1660 he served against the Turks, and drove them out of Transylvania, for which he was made president of the imperial council. In 1673 he was sent against the French, and had to oppose the great Turenne, who fell in the contest, and Montecuculi, in his despatch to the emperor, regretted the loss of a man who was an honour to humanity. He afterwards acted with great courage and skill against the Prince de Condé. The emperor Leopold made him a prince of the empire, and the king of Naples gave him the duchy of Melfi. His death was caused by the accidental fall of a beam as he was entering Linz with the imperial court. He was the author of works on military subjects, and several sonnets.

Born at Modena, 1608; died 1681.

MONTEFIORE, MOSES, the eldest son of a merchant whose ancestors came from Ancona and Leghorn, but his grandfather, Moses Haim Montefiore, settled in England, and was a near neighbour and associate of Benjamin Disraeli, the grandfather of Lord Beaconsfield. Moses Montefiore was educated privately and articled to a wholesale tea merchant in Eastcheap, but he afterwards entered the Stock Exchange and was one of twelve Jewish brokers. He eventually joined a volunteer regiment and became a captain. Meanwhile, in consequence of suffering from a default, he very nearly got posted as a defaulter himself, but he obtained the indulgence of his creditors and was spared that misfortune. Subsequently he and Nathan Mayer Rothschild married sisters, and from that time he became recognised as amongst the wealthiest of his race, retiring from business in 1824. He engaged in various joint-stock undertakings, amongst others the South Eastern Railway, of which he was a director. In 1827 he visited Palestine in the interest of his race, and henceforth became famous as the advocate of justice to his people. In 1836 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1837 he became a Sheriff of London under the relief bill of 1835. In his official capacity as sheriff he attended the coronation in 1838, and hence was knighted. Soon afterwards he and Lady Montefiore went on a second pilgrimage to Palestine, and he became greatly distinguished by his benevolence from that time to his death. His final residence was on East Cliff, Ramsgate, where he continued to live in universal esteem, until he attained to the remarkable distinction of living more than a century. His celebrity and benevolence having made for him a universally esteemed name, the completion of his hundredth year was a subject of world-wide remark, especially in England, where, from the throne to the humblest recipient of his charity, much sympathy was very cordially expressed, at which he evinced much gratifying appreciation.

Born Oct. 24, 1784; died July 28, 1885.

MONTENEGRO, or KARA DAGH ("black mountain"), mon-te-né-gro, an independent principality of Europe, formerly tributary to Turkey. It is on the western frontier of European Turkey, having Albania to the south and the large province of Herzegovina to the north. Mountainous; consisting of a series of lofty ridges, rising, in the north to Mount Dormitor, to 8,500 feet, and in the east to Kutsh Kom, 9,300 feet. On the mountain sides are forests of beech, oak, ash, fir, willow and poplar. The principal industry is agriculture and fishing. The country has about 300 villages, and every village has its church. There are no large towns. The seat of government is CETTIGNE.

Area.—3,550 square miles.

Pop.—250,000, mostly Slavs of the Servian race, calling themselves Tzernagorzes. They are extremely ignorant, quarrelsome, divided into forty tribes, and perpetuating family quarrels, considering revenge a duty, warlike, and intensely patriotic. They speak a dialect of the Slavic, and profess to belong to the non-united Greek church.

Political Constitution and Administrative Divisions.—The government is vested in a prince, or hospodar, assisted by a chancellor, a secretary of state, and a senate of 12 members, elected from the chief families, and occasionally there is an assembly of all the adult males; but it exercises very little power. Ecclesiastical affairs are administered by a vladika, who previous to 1851 was the supreme authority in secular and religious matters. There are two administrative divisions, Montenegro proper, and Zjeta.

History.—Montenegro was, previous to the end of the 14th century, a portion of the great Servian kingdom, and after its destruction by the Turks at the battle of Kossovo, in 1389, the prince of Montenegro retained his independence, notwithstanding that the Porte claimed the territory as part of the pashalik of Scutari. In 1710 Russia granted a subsidy, and the modern history of the district is a continual record of hostilities between the Turks and Montenegrins. In 1862, the sovereignty of the Port was admitted by treaty, but virtually disputed by the Montenegrins. By the treaty of Berlin, the town and district of Antivari were annexed to Montenegro, and in 1880 the port of Dulcigno was surrendered to it by Turkey.

MONTEPELOSO, mon-te-pai'-lo-so, a walled town of Italy, 22 miles N.W. of Matera. Pop. 5,500.

MONTEPULCIANO, mon'-tai-pul'-che-a-no, a city of Italy, province of Arezzo, 56 miles S.E. of Florence, on a hill. It has a fine church and several palaces, and is famous for its wine. Pop. 2,000.

MONTEREALE, mon-te-rai-ai'-le, a town of southern Italy, 14 miles N.W. of Aquila. There are several fine churches, and in the vicinity are extensive groves of chestnut. Pop. 5,100.

MONTEREAU, mon'-te-ro, a town of France, department Seine-et-Marne, at the confluence of the Seine and Yonne, 46 miles S.E. of Paris. Manf. Earthenware and leather. Pop. 6,500.—The duke of Burgundy was assassinated here in 1419, by order of the Dauphin, afterwards Charles VII., and near the town Napoleon defeated the allies in February, 1814.

MONTEREY, mon-te-rai', a city of Mexico, capital of the state of Nuevo Leon, on the San Juan, a tributary of the Rio Grande, 175 miles W. of Matamoras, more than 1,600 feet above the sea level, beautifully situated amid gardens and orchards. It is a thriving town, and a great centre of trade. Pop. 15,000.

MONTEREY, a county of California, United States. Area, 4,536 square miles. Pop. 11,302. The capital is MONTEREY.

MONTE SANT' ANGELO, mon'-tai sant-an'-jai-lo, a city of southern Italy, province of Capitanata, situated nearly 2,800 feet above the sea level, 28 miles N.E. of Foggia. There are several fine churches. Honey of very choice quality is a great product of the vicinity. Pop. 19,019.

MONTE SAN GIULIANO, ju-le-a'-no, a town of Sicily, province of Trapani, on a mountain, 4 miles N.E. of the town of Trapani. Near it are the remains of a temple of Venus. Pop. 21,500.

MONTE SARCHIO, sar'-ke-o, a town of southern Italy, province of Benevento, on the Correo, 13 miles N.W. of Avellino. Pop. 5,700.

MONTES, Lola (Maria Dolores Porris y Montes), a dancer and actress, who became the mistress of Louis I. of Bavaria, but was driven from Munich by a popular outbreak, which caused the king's abdication in 1848. After various adventures, she went to America.

Died in New York, 1861.

MONTESPAN, Françoise Athenais, Marquise de, mon'-tes-pa, a French lady, wife of a nobleman of that title, and mistress of Louis XIV., over whom she gained a complete ascendancy, which she maintained till that monarch became attached to Madame de Maintenon. Madame de Montespan had children by the king, one of whom became duke of Maine and another count of Toulouse.

Born 1641; died 1707.

MONTESQUIEU, Charles de Secondat, Baron de, mon'-tes-kyu, French author and political philosopher, descended from a noble family of Guienne. He was educated for the legal profession. At an early age he exhibited literary tastes, and when 25 he was appointed a councillor of the parliament of Bordeaux, and two years afterwards the president. His first performance that became famous was entitled "Persian Letters," published in 1721, which gave proofs of a fine genius and a remarkable vein of pungent satire. The year following he pleaded with so much eloquence against the imposition of a new duty, that it was suppressed. In 1728 he was admitted a member of the French Academy, though not without opposition from Cardinal Fleury, who conceived there was some things dangerous to religion in the "Persian Letters." Montesquieu having formed the design of his great work, the "Spirit of Laws," he resigned his office in 1726, and travelled into Germany and Holland, and lastly to England, where he resided two years, calling this the country for thinking and France for living. On his return home he published his treatise "On the Causes of the Greatness and Declension of the Romans." In 1748 appeared his "Spirit of Laws." In it the author distinguished three sorts of government, the republican, the monarchical, and the despotic; all of which he examined with much clearness, the whole work being an admirable exposition of political science as it was understood in the author's time. Montesquieu was an upright man and a conscientious judge.

Born near Bordeaux, 1689; died at Paris, 1755.

MONTEUX, or MONTEAUX, mawn-te(r)', a walled town of France, department Vaucluse, 3 miles W. of Carpentras. Pop. 4,500.

MONTEVERDE, or MONGONORE ISLANDS, mon'-te-verd', a group of about 30 low islands of coral formation in the North Pacific Ocean. They are arranged in the form of a circle, enclosing a lagoon 20 miles long and 15 broad. The islands are densely wooded, and abound in bread-fruit and palm trees. The inhabitants are well made and active. Lat. 3° 27' N. Lon. 155° 48' E.

MONTE VIDEO (San Felipe de), mon'-tai-ve'-dai-o, a fortified town of South America, capital of the republic of Uruguay, 132 miles S.E. of Buenos Ayres, on the north side of the estuary of the river Plata, which is here 60 miles wide. The harbour, although shallow, and open to the south-western winds, is the best in the Rio de la Plata. The town occupies the whole of a peninsular promontory forming the eastern point of the harbour, and there are two small suburbs, Cordon and Aguada. It makes a handsome appearance from the harbour, as it is built upon an ascent, and the houses, mostly of one storey, are interspersed with gardens and trees. The great square contains the cathedral, which is a handsome edifice, the town-house, and the public prison. The trade is considerable, hides, wool, tallow, dried meat, and bones being exported. There is constant steam communication with the United States, and the chief South American and European ports. Pop. 106,000. Lat. 34° 53' S. Lon. 56° 15' W.

MONTEVORCHI, mon'-tai-vor'-ke, a walled town of northern Italy, 24 miles S.E. of Florence. There is a collegiate church. A trade is carried on in wine, oil, and silk. Pop. 3,300.

MONTEZUMA I., mon-te-zu'-ma, emperor of Mexico, conquered and annexed the neighbouring kingdom of Mexico, and otherwise greatly extended his dominions.

Died 1464.

MONTEZUMA II., the last emperor of Mexico, came to the throne in 1502. He was a prince of noble qualities, and opposed the invaders of his country with firmness, but was at last, in 1519, seized by Cortes, who forced him to acknowledge himself a vassal of Spain. The Mexicans having assembled in great numbers against the Spaniards, Cortes, being apprehensive that he was not sufficiently strong to resist them, obliged his royal captive to appear in his robes, in order to appease his subjects. The insurgents, however, hurled stones while he was speaking, and mortally wounded him. He left two sons and three daughters, who embraced the Christian religion.

Born 1466; died 1520.

MONTEZUMA, Don Marsilio de Terrel, Count of, the last descendant of the Mexican emperors, was banished from Spain by Ferdinand VII., and afterwards from Mexico, for his liberal opinions.

Died at New Orleans, 1836.

MONTFAUCON, Bernard de, a learned French antiquary. In his youth he served as a cadet in the army; but the death of his parents made so great an impression upon his mind, that he entered the congregation of the Benedictines of St. Maur, in 1675. He applied himself to study with prodigious application, and acquired a great knowledge of languages, theology, history, and general literature. In 1698 he went to Italy, to consult the public libraries there, and was received with much distinction at Rome, by the college of cardinals and Pope Innocent XII. On his return to Paris, in 1702, he published a curious relation of his journey, under the title "Diarium Italicum." His principal works were "Analecta Græca," an edition of the works of St. Athanasius, Greek and Latin, with notes; a collection of ancient Greek writers, a French translation of Philo's "Contemplative Life," with notes: "Palæographia Græca," "Antiquities Explained," in French and Latin, and a supplement to the same (this is a work of immense erudition, and of the greatest value to students of art); "Monuments of the French Monarchy," an edition of the works of Chrysostom, "Dissertation on the History of Judith."

Born at Soulage, Languedoc, 1655; died at Paris, 1741.

MONTFORT, Simon Count de, mawnt'-fort, grandson of Robert de Beaumont, earl of Leicester, which title he also bore, together with that of count de Toulouse. He went twice to the Crusades, and in 1209 conducted the persecution of the Albigenses, on which occasion he tarnished his reputation by his cruelties. In 1213 he gained a complete victory over Peter, king of Aragon. He was killed at the siege of Toulouse.

Born 1150; died 1218.

MONTFORT, SIMON DE, earl of Leicester, was fourth son of the preceding, by an English lady. He went to England in 1236, to assume the English title in right of his grandmother, and was well received by Henry III. He married Elinor, the king's sister, and widow of the earl of Pembroke, but the marriage was disapproved of by the king, who, however, gave him the government of Gascony. De Montfort became a staunch advocate of popular liberty, and when the rapacity of the king and some of his foreign relations became unbearable, he excited the English barons into a revolt, placed himself at their head, in 1258, and forced the king to convoke a parliament, called, by the old chroniclers, "the mad parliament," at Oxford, and extorted from him many important concessions. During many years, he exercised almost absolute power in England, and took the king and his son Edward prisoners at the battle of Lewes, in Sussex, in 1264. In the following year, however, Prince Edward made his escape from Dover Castle, where he had been confined, and, in the same year, the royal and baronial forces met at Evesham, the latter being defeated with immense slaughter, both De Montfort and his son being among the slain. His body was mutilated, his head being sent to Wigmore castle, and his limbs to various towns; but his death was generally mourned by the people, who looked upon him as their champion. He was certainly a brave and able man, and, although probably more ambitious than he openly professed to be, was undoubtedly greatly instrumental in founding English national liberty.

Born 1206; died 1265.

MONTFORT L'AMAURY, la'-mor-e, a town of France, in the department of the Seine-and-Oise, 14 miles from Versailles. Pop. 1,800.—Here Simon Count de Montfort, who led the first crusade against the Albigenses, was born in 1165.

MONTFRIN, mawnt'-fra, a town and parish of France, in the department of Gard, 10 miles from Nimes. Pop. 2,700.

MONTGOLFIER, JACQUES ETIENNE, mawnt-gol'-fe-ai, a Frenchman, a paper manufacturer at Annonay, who in 1783, with his brother Joseph Michel, invented the kind of balloon which bears his name, for which he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, created chevalier of the order of St. Michael, and rewarded with a pension of two thousand livres.

Died 1799.

MONTGOMERY, mont-gom'-e-re, a parliamentary borough and market town, and capital of Montgomeryshire, near the Severn, 20 miles S.W. of Shrewsbury. It is well built, and stands in the vale of Montgomery, at the foot of a high hill. It has a fine old cruciform church, in the Early English style, restored in 1868, several other places of worship. Pop. 1,300. In this neighbourhood was fought the last battle between the Welsh and English in 1204. The ruins of Montgomery castle stand on an eminence north of the town.

MONTGOMERY, the capital of Alabama, United States, on the left bank of the Alabama river, 415 miles above Mobile, at the highest point to which the river is navigated by steam-vessels. There is a handsome state house, and the appearance of the city, situated on several hills, is very picturesque and attractive. It is one of the largest cotton depôts in the state, and is a considerable railroad centre. Pop. 16,713, about half being coloured.

MONTGOMERY, the name of 18 counties in the United States:—

ALABAMA.—Area, 800 square miles. Pop. 52,356, three-fourths being coloured. The capital is MONTGOMERY.

ARKANSAS.—Area, 1,050 square miles. Pop. 5,729. The capital is Mount Ida.

GEORGIA.—Area, 624 square miles. Pop. 5,381, about one-third being coloured. The capital is Mount Vernon.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 96,494. The capital is NORRISTOWN.

TENNESSEE.—Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 28,481, half being coloured. The capital is Clarksville.

TEXAS.—Area, 852 square miles. Pop. 10,154, about half being coloured. The capital is Montgomery.

VIRGINIA.—Area, 490 square miles. Pop. 16,693, nearly 3,000 being coloured. The capital is Christiansburg.

MONTGOMERY, GABRIEL, Count de, a French nobleman, of Scottish descent, and an officer in the Scottish life guard of the king of France, who, in 1559, had the misfortune to kill Henry II. of France, by accidentally wounding him in the eye, as they were tilting at a tournament given by that monarch, on the occasion of the marriage between his daughter Elizabeth and the king of Spain. After this unfortunate disaster Montgomery went to Italy, and lived there and in other countries, till the civil wars recalled him to France, where he attached himself to the Protestants, and became one of their principal chiefs. He defended Rouen in 1562 against the royal army; and, when the city was taken by assault, he escaped to Havre. In 1569 he raised the siege of Bearne in Navarre, then closely pressed by the Catholics, after which he followed the besiegers to Orthez, which he took by assault. Montgomery was at Paris at the time of the massacre of the Protestants in 1572, but escaped, though closely pursued. With his family, he retired first to Jersey, and afterwards to England. In 1573 he returned to Normandy, where he was joined by some of the Protestant nobility at St. Lo, at which place he was besieged by Matignon, lieutenant-general in Lower Normandy; but Montgomery escaped, and went to Domfront, whither he was followed by Matignon, who, after a prolonged contest, made him prisoner. This gallant nobleman was subsequently condemned to death by Catherine de' Medici, who was then regent of the kingdom, and beheaded.

Born 1530; died 1574.

MONTGOMERY, JAMES, English poet, was the son of a Moravian preacher, and was sent to be educated at the settlement of that sect at Fulneck, near Leeds. There he was principally distinguished for his indolence and melancholy. Inattention to his studies caused him to be placed by the school authorities with a shopkeeper, from whom, in 1789, he ran away. A few months afterwards he sent a volume of poems to a London bookseller, and followed it himself to the great metropolis. The poems were declined, but the young poet obtained a situation in the publisher's office. He at length entered the service of Mr. Gales, a printer and bookseller at Sheffield, who permitted him to write political articles for the "Sheffield Register," a paper conducted on what were then termed revolutionary principles. A warrant being issued for the apprehension of Gales, he fled to America, and Montgomery started a paper on "peace and reform" principles, called the "Sheffield Iris," and was soon afterwards indicted for producing some doggrel verses, which had been brought to his printing-office to be printed. For this he was fined £20, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. On another occasion, for publishing an account of a riot at Sheffield, he was fined £30, and was imprisoned for six months. His subsequent career was comparatively uneventful. In 1806 he produced "The Wanderer in Switzerland," which quickly ran through three editions, and was subsequently followed by other and better works of the same nature, the chief of which were, "The West Indies," "The World before the Flood," and "Greenland," a poem descriptive of that desolate establishment of Moravians, which sect he had again joined. In 1823 he produced "Original Hymns for Public, Private, and Social Devotion." In 1825 he resigned the editorship of the "Sheffield Iris;" whereupon he was entertained at a public dinner by his fellow townsmen. His interesting "History of Missionary Enterprise in the South Seas" was produced in 1830. Five years later he was offered the chair of rhetoric in the university of Edinburgh, which he declined. Sir Robert Peel, about the same time, bestowed upon him a pension of £150. In 1836 he left the house of his old employer Gales, where he had lived during forty years, for a more convenient abode. He delivered several courses of lectures upon "The British Poets," at Newcastle-on-Tyne and other places, during some years; but, in 1841, he visited his native country on a missionary tour. His last effort was a lecture "On some passages of English Poetry but little known."

Born at Irvine, Ayrshire, 1771; died at Sheffield, 1854.

MONTGOMERY, Rev. Robert, a popular preacher and poet, of whose boyish years nothing is known, till he conducted, at an early age, a periodical publication in Bath. In 1828 he produced his "Omnipresence of the Deity," which attained an astonishing degree of popularity, twelve editions having been sold in as many months, but which elicited a most slashing review by Macaulay in the Edinburgh Review. Another volume of religious poems soon followed, containing "A Universal Prayer," "Death," "A Vision of Heaven," and "A Vision of Hell." A third production, entitled "Satan," was next put forth, and obtained almost as much success as its predecessors. In 1830, Montgomery resolved to devote himself to the Church, entered of Lincoln College, Oxford, and graduated B.A. in 1833, and M.A. in 1838. Two years afterwards he was ordained, and became a curate at Whittington, in Shropshire. In 1836 he went to London, where he officiated as minister of Percy-street Chapel, which he quitted for the Episcopal chapel of St. Jude's, at Glasgow; but although his preaching drew large congregations in the latter place, so large an amount of controversy was engendered, that he resigned the incumbency. In 1843 he again commenced his ministerial labours at Percy-street Chapel, which he continued to fulfil until his death. In addition to the works already quoted, he published many others, nearly all of which shared the success of his early efforts. The principal of these were, "The Messiah, a Poem in Six Books;" "Luther, or the Spirit of the Reformation;" and "Sacred Meditations and Moral Themes."

Born at Bath, 1807; died 1855.

MONTGOMERYSHIRE, mont-gom'-e-re-sheer, a county of North Wales, bounded on the E. by Shropshire, W. by part of Merioneth and Cardigan shires, S. by Radnorshire, and N. by Denbigh and part of Merioneth. It is considerably diversified; but, on the whole, mountainous, with extensive moors. The valleys among the mountains are friendly to vegetation, and highly productive of both corn and grass; but the finest arable land lies on the eastern side, bordering on Shropshire. The arable lands are chiefly confined to the vales, the uplands are devoted to the pasturage of sheep and cattle. A breed of small horses, peculiar to this county and that of Merioneth, is much used here, and called "Merlins," and the ordinary crops are oats, barley, wheat, and rye; green crops to alternate with these, have been long introduced. This is the best wooded county in North Wales.

Minerals.—Copper, lead, zinc, limestone, and slate.
Manf.—Chiefly Welsh flannel.
Area.—755 square miles.
Pop.—65,798.
Chief Towns.—Montgomery, the capital; but the county business is carried on alternately at Newtown and Welshpool; Llanidloes.
Parliamentary Representation.—One member is returned for the county, and one for Montgomery.
History.—This county formed, in the Saxon era, part of the Welsh principality of Powis, and took the name of Montgomery from one of its Norman conquerors.

MONTHERME, maun-ter-mai, a town of France, department Ardennes, on the left bank of the Meuse, here crossed by a suspension bridge, 10 miles N. of Mezières. Manf. Glass and earthenware. Pop. 2,500.

MONTHOLON, Charles Tristan, Count de, mon'-to-lawng, one of the most faithful adherents of Napoleon I., who, after serving for a short time in the navy, quitted it in 1798, and obtained a commission in a cavalry regiment, with which he went through the campaigns in Italy, Germany, and Poland; rose to the grade of colonel, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Wagram, where he received five wounds. Appointed chamberlain to the emperor in 1809, he served him in that capacity until Napoleon's first abdication, when he requested to be allowed to accompany him, but could not obtain permission. During the Hundred Days he acted as one of Napoleon's aides-de-camp. Upon the deportation of the emperor to St. Helena, the count accompanied him, and remained near his person until his death. He was one of the ex-emperor's executors, and to him was confided all the MSS. which had been composed at St. Helena. These he afterwards published, under the title of "Memoirs towards the History of France under Napoleon, written at Saint Helena." In 1840 he took part in Louis Napoleon's descent at Boulogne, and was sentenced to imprisonment with his leader, but afterwards pardoned.

Born at Paris, 1782; died 1853.

MONTI Vincenzo, Italian poet, studied at the university of Ferrara, was, in his youth, secretary to Don Luighi Braschi, nephew of Pope Pius VI.; but afterwards entirely devoted himself to poetry. Desirous of rivalling Alfieri, with whom he had a personal quarrel, he wrote the tragedies of "Caius Gracchus" and "Aristodemo," and then composed several poems in imitation of Dante. He, in the first instance, ridiculed the French; but, after the successes of the republic in Italy, he became one of the greatest eulogists of Napoleon. He next became professor of eloquence at Pavia, of belles-lettres at Milan, and finally, historiographer of the new kingdom of Italy, but, after the fall of Napoleon, he sang the praises of the Austrian empire, a versatility of opinion which caused him to lose the esteem of his countrymen. Besides the works we have quoted, he translated the works of Voltaire, and Homer's "Iliad," and published some polemical writings.

Born at Fusignano, Ferrara, 1753; died at Milan, 1828.

A famous wine is grown in the vicinity. Pop. 13,000.—In 1508 the fortifications of this place were destroyed by Frederick the Catholic.

MONTIVILLIERS, mawnt-vil'-le-ai, a town of France, department Seine-Inférieure, 6 miles N.E. of Havre. Manf. Linen goods, cotton, lace, tulle, paper, leather, and sugar. Pop. 4,500.

MONTJEAN, mawnt-zhane', a town of France, department Maine-et-Loire, on the right bank of the Loire, 20 miles N. of Beaupreau. There is an important coal-field in the vicinity. Pop. 3,500.

MONTJOIE, mawnt-jo-ai, a town of Prussia, 13 miles S.E. of Aix-la-Chapelle, at the confluence of the Langbach with the Roer. There are the ruins of an old castle, supposed to have been a hunting-seat of Charlemagne, two churches, and an Ursuline convent. Manf. Linen, cassimere, and worsted. Pop. 3,000.

MONTLUC, Blaise de, mawnt-look', a celebrated French general, member of an ancient family of Guienne, who rose through the different ranks in the army to that of marshal of France. His first services were in Italy; and at the battle of Pavia, in 1525, he was taken prisoner. In the wars of Piedmont he served with great reputation, and, in 1546, he recovered Boulogne from the English. The city of Sienna, in Tuscany, having driven out the imperial garrison, and solicited the protection of France, Montluc was appointed to command the forces sent thither in 1554. He sustained a siege of eight months against the imperial army, commanded by the Marquis de Marignan, who was obliged, after several attacks, to convert the siege into a blockade. It was not till the garrison and inhabitants had endured the utmost extremity of famine that the place capitulated, when Montluc and his troops marched out with the honours of war. He commanded in Guienne during the wars which ravaged France on account of religion, and defeated the Huguenots in several actions, but was guilty of great cruelties to the vanquished. At the siege of Rabastens, in 1570, he was so severely wounded in the face as to be obliged always to wear a mask to hide his deformity. At the age of 75 he wrote the memoirs of his military life, under the title of "Commentaries;" and therein recounted, with horrible frankness, the story of his numberless acts of cruelty.

Born 1502; died 1577.

MONTLUÇON, mawnt-loo'-sawng, a town of France, department Allier, on the right bank of the Cher, 40 miles S.W. of Moulins. Manf. Coarse woollens, iron, and plate-glass. There is a trade in corn, wine, and fruits. Pop. 26,000.

MONTMARTRE, mawnt-martr'. (See PARIS.)

MONTMEDY, mawnt'-me-de, a fortified town of France, department Meuse, near the Cher, 25 miles W. of Luxemburg. Manf. Hosiery and leather, and there are gypsum quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 2,200.

MONTMIRAIL, mawnt'-me-rail, a town of France, department Marne, on the right bank of the Petit-Morin, 22 miles from Epernay. There is a fine château. Manf. Leather. Pop. 2,300.

MONTMORENCI, mont'-mo-ren'-se, a short river of Canada, which runs into the St. Lawrence, about 7 miles below Quebec. It is noted for its beautiful falls, which are 242 feet high.

MONTMORENCY, or ENGHIEN, a town of France, department Seine-and-Oise, 9 miles N. of Paris. There are an old château and church, and the adjoining forest is a favourite resort of Parisians. There is a large trade in fruit. Pop. 3,200.

MONTMORENCY, Matthieu de, a distinguished French general, who signalized himself by his valour at the battle of Pont-à-Bouvines, in 1214, and, the year following, was employed against the Albigenses in Languedoc; for which services he received the sword of constable of France, and was made general of the army. He afterwards took several places from the English. Louis VIII. committed his son to the care of the constable, who, by his prudence, dissolved a league which had been formed against the queen-mother during the minority of Louis IX.

MONTMORENCY, Anne, Duke de, a descendant of the preceding, who received his feminine Christian name from his godmother, Anne of Brittany. He displayed great military talents at an early age, and was at the battle of Marignano in 1515. In 1521 he defended the city of Meziers, and compelled the count of Nassau to raise the siege. He accompanied Francis I. to Italy, as marshal of France, and was taken prisoner, with the king, at the battle of Pavia. The important services he had rendered to the state were rewarded with the sword of constable in 1538; but, in 1541, he fell under the displeasure of Francis, and was banished from France. In the reign of Henry II. he regained favour at court, and was employed in military service, but was defeated and taken prisoner at the battle of St. Quentin. He was again disgraced by the intrigues of Catherine de' Medici. Charles IX.

recalled him, and he served against the Huguenots, but was taken prisoner by them at the battle of Dreux, in 1562. Having obtained his liberty the year following, he took Havre from the English. In 1567 he received a fatal wound at St. Denis.

Born at Chantilly, 1493; died 1567.

MONTMORENCY, HENRI, Duke de, was grandson of the preceding. At the age of 17 he was made admiral, and defeated the Huguenots in Languedoc. In 1630 he commanded the French troops in Piedmont, where he defeated the Spaniards, for which he received a marshal's baton. He was beloved by the people of France for his bravery, generosity, and other great qualities. But having joined Gaston of Orleans against Cardinal Richelieu, Montmorency took up arms in the province of Languedoc, of which he was governor. The king sent against him the marshals De la Force and Schomberg, and a battle ensued at Castelnaudary, where the duke was made prisoner, and, notwithstanding the earnest and general solicitations for his pardon by the Pope, King Charles I. of England, the Venetian Republic, and the Duke of Savoy, he was beheaded at Toulouse.

Born at Chantilly, 1595; died 1632.

MONTMORILLON, mawnt-mo-reel'-yon, a town of France, department Vienne, on both sides of the Gartempe, 27 miles S.E. of Poitiers. There are remains of a famous hospital founded in the 11th century, and the town was once strongly fortified. Manf. Biscuits and paper. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 5,200.

MONTOIR, mon-twawr, a town of France, department Loir-et-Cher, on the right bank of the Loir, 25 miles N.W. of Blois. The old castle of St. Outrille is immediately above the town. Manf. Woollens, linen, hosiery, and leather. Pop. 3,200.

MONTOIR, a town of France, department Loire-Inférieure, 11 miles W. of Savenay. Manf. Chemicals. Great quantities of peat are cut, and cattle are reared in the vicinity. Pop. 4,500.

MONTONA, mon-to'-na, a town of the Austrian empire, in the peninsula of Istria, 21 miles S. of Trieste. A large trade is carried on in shiptimber. Pop. 5,400.

MONTONE, mon-to'-nai, a town of Sicily, province of Syracuse, 8 miles S.W. of Modica. Pop. 4,000.

MONTOPOLI, mon-to-po'-le, a walled town of Northern Italy, 24 miles S.W. of Florence. There is a trade in corn and silk. Pop. 2,600.

MONTORO, mon-to'-ro, a town of Southern Italy, province of Avellino, 12 miles N of Salerno. Manf. Linen and cloth. There are large markets. Pop. 4,800.

MONTORO, mon'-to-ro, a town of Spain, in Cordova, on the Guadalquiver, 26 miles N.E. of Cordova. There are a very fine Gothic church, a good hospital, five squares, and several bridges. Manf. Woollen and pottery. There are extensive olive plantations, and oil is largely exported. Pop. 13,316.

MONTPELIER, mont-pe'-lier, the capital of Vermont, United States, on the Winooski river, 215 miles N.W. of Boston. There are a state-house and five churches. Manf. Carriages and hats. There is a trade in lumber. Pop. 3,000.

MONTPELLIER, mawnt-pel'-le-ai, an ancient city in the south of France, capital of the department Herault, between the rivers Masson and Lez, 75 miles from Marseilles, and 8 miles from the sea. It stands on a declivity, which renders the streets, in many places, steep and irregular, and they are in general winding, narrow, and dark. It has, still, some fortifications: viz., an old stone wall, and a citadel built by Louis XIV. Of the gates, the finest is that which leads to the Place du Peyrou, which is outside of the town, and is said to be the finest public walk, not only in France, but in Europe. It commands splendid views of the Mediterranean, the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the Cevennes. The principal structures are the cathedral, the hall of justice, the prefecture, the exchange, the hôtel des monnoies, and the university, founded in the 12th century, a museum, picture gallery, and public library; but the object of greatest interest is a magnificent Roman aqueduct, composed of three rows of arches. The town communicates with the sea through the medium of the canal de Grave: the commodious little harbour of Cette serving as its port. Manf. Cottons, woollens, leather goods, corks, sugar, perfumes, soap, chemicals, and surgical instruments. Pop. 56,000.—Montpellier was built in the 10th century, and many strangers resort to it on account of its literary advantages, and on account of the climate, which once had a great repute as beneficial to consumptive patients; but the prevalence of cold winds, and the sudden alternation of extreme heat, are now considered objections.

MONTPENSIER, mawnt-pa'-se-ai, ANNE-MARIE-LOUISA, Duchess de, the daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIII. She was generally known by the name of Mademoiselle, and embraced the cause of Condé in the civil wars. She caused the cannon of the Bastille to be fired on the French troops, and showed, on many occasions, a most impetuous spirit. After trying in vain to espouse several sovereign princes, among the rest Charles II. of England, she is said to have secretly married the Count de Lauzun. (See LAUZUN.) Mademoiselle passed her last years in devotion, and wrote her memoirs, which are very curious, and full of anecdotes relative to the court of Louis XIV. and the Fronde leaders.

Born at Paris, 1627; died 1693.

MONTPENSIER, ANTOINE LOUIS, Duke of, fifth son of Louis Philippe, king of the French. In 1842 he entered the artillery with the grade of lieutenant, and took part in all the subsequent campaigns in Algeria. On his return he was decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honour, and was promoted to the rank of general of brigade. In 1846 he was married to Marie-Louise-Ferdinande, sister of Isabella II., queen of Spain, an alliance which almost led to a rupture between France and England. The duke was exiled from France, with the other members of his family, after the revolution of 1848. He repaired, in the first instance, to England, but subsequently took up his residence at Seville.

Born at Neuilly, 1824.

MONTRADOK, mont-ra-dok', a town of the island of Borneo, near the west coast, 25 miles from the sea. Pop. about 50,000, a large number being Chinese diggers.

MONTREAL, mawnt-rai'-al, three towns of France, in the departments of the Aude, Dordogne, and Gers. Pop. 3,200, 1,900, and 1,800.

MONTREAL, mon'-tre-awl', an island of Canada, at the confluence of the Grand or Ottawa river with the St. Lawrence. It is 30 miles long and 10 wide, forms the county of Montreal, and is of a triangular shape and gently undulating. Area 197 square miles.

MONTREAL, a city of Canada, and the largest in British North America, on the south side of the island of Montreal, 180 miles E. of Quebec. It is divided into the Upper and Lower towns, and there is an eastern suburb, Hochelaga. The streets are airy, and the new ones, particularly, of a commodious width; some of them running the whole length of the town, parallel to the river, intersected by others at right angles. The public edifices are the hôtel Dieu, established in 1644, for the purpose of administering relief to the destitute sick; the convent of Notre Dame, a seminary of education; the general hospital, or convent of the Grey Sisters, a refuge for invalids. The Roman Catholic cathedral is a large substantial building in the Gothic style, with six towers, and capable of containing 7,000 persons. The large seminary of St. Sulpice, for the education of youth, adjoins the cathedral. There are several other Roman Catholic churches, a newly erected and very handsome cathedral of the Church of England, a Gothic Scotch church, and a Methodist church, also Gothic in style. There are colleges of the Roman Catholics, Jesuits, Baptists, and a university; fine market-hall; and at the upper end of the market-place is a handsome monument, erected in honour of lord Nelson. The city is supplied with water from the St. Lawrence, by works constructed at a great expense. In the vicinity are many noble residences. Manf. Candles, soap, hardwares, floor-cloth, and tobacco. There are, besides, iron-foundries, shipbuilding-docks, and distilling and brewing establishments. It is the channel through which is carried on the commerce between Canada and the United States. Ships of large size can reach the town. The harbour, with more than a mile of wharves, is always secure for shipping during the time the navigation of the river is open, between April and December. There is a large daily traffic, by steamers and sailing vessels, with Lake Ontario; a weekly line to Liverpool; and fine canals evade the obstructions caused by rapids in the upper part of the river; railway communication with the most important parts of Canada, and the states of New York and Maine. The St. Lawrence is crossed near the town by the great Victoria tubular bridge, more than a mile and a half long. Pop. 140,747. Lat. 45° 31′ N. Lon. 73° 35′ W.—In 1640 a few log-houses, closely built together, and called Hochelaga, was the commencement of Montreal. It was taken by the English, under the command of General Amherst, in the year 1760. In 1775 it was taken by the Americans, under General Montgomery, but soon after evacuated.

MONTREJEAU, maunt-rai'-zho, a town of France, department Haute-Garonne, at the confluence of the Garonne and Neste. Over the former river there is an elegant marble bridge of six arches. Manf. Knitted stockings and worsted articles. There is a large trade in corn, cattle, mules, hides, and timber. Pop. 4,000.

MONTREUIL (SUR MER), maunt'-re(r)-e, a fortified town of France, department Pas-de-Calais, near the right bank of the Canche, 20 miles S.E. of Boulogne. There are a highly decorated church, a communal college, and a citadel, in which queen Bertha, wife of Philip the Fair, was imprisoned, in the 11th century. Pop. 3,700.

MONTREUIL (LES PÊCHES), a town of France, department Seine, near Vincennes, 7 miles E. of Paris. It is a handsome town, surrounded by nursery gardens and orchards. There is a large and handsome old church. Manf. Porcelain and tiles. Pop. 19,000.

MONTRICHARD, mawnt'-ree-shard, a town of France, department Loir-et-Cher, on the Cher, 17 miles N. of Blois. It is surrounded by old walls, with towers, and there are picturesque ruins of an old castle. Manf. Serge and leather. Pop. 2,800.

MONTROSE, mon-troze', a royal and parliamentary burgh and seaport of Forfarshire, Scotland, at the mouth of the south Esk, 40 miles S. of Aberdeen. It stands on a flat sandy peninsula, formed by the German Ocean, the river, and a basin into which the flowing tide is spread. A suspension bridge over the Esk connects it with its suburb, Roine Island. There are a handsome town-hall and a large lunatic asylum, opened in 1868. The harbour, formed by the river South Esk and an arm of the sea, is very commodious, and has excellent quays, and two light-houses. Manf. Flax, linen, sheeting, and sailcloth. There are also tanneries, machine factories, breweries, and soap and starch works. Exp. Manufactured goods, salmon, stone, and agricultural produce. It is reckoned a fashionable resort, as well as a place of commerce and industry. The downs, or "Links," situate between the town and the German Ocean, are extensive, and are very favourable for the well-known Scots game of golf, which is much practised here. Pop. 16,303. Lat. 56° 42′ 5″ N. Lon. 2° 28′ W.

MONTROSE, JAMES GRAHAM, Marquis of, "the great marquis," was descended from one of the oldest families in Scotland. He was educated at the university of St. Andrews, married when only 17 years of age, and went abroad, but returned to Scotland about 1633, and was generally considered one of the most accomplished gentlemen of his time. He was at first one of the most violent of the popular leaders, and took a principal part in the preparation of the National Covenant. He twice captured Aberdeen from the Royalists, and obtained a complete victory near Stonehaven. In 1641, being accused of plotting against Argyle, he was imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, and three years afterwards openly supported the king, and was raised to the rank of marquis. In 1644 he was nominated by Charles II. captain-general of the forces to be raised in Scotland, and immediately commenced his attacks upon the Covenanters with varied success. At the battle of Tippermuir, however, he defeated the Covenanters with immense slaughter; achieved many other successes, and was appointed lieutenant-governor of Scotland and commander-in-chief of the royal forces; but, being surprised at Philiphaugh, in 1645, by General Leslie, his forces were routed, and he and a few followers only succeeded in gaining the Highlands after considerable difficulty. In 1646 he was allowed to take his departure for Norway. He went to France, and served with great distinction in the service of that power, and was offered the grade of lieutenant-general of the Scots in France, and other high appointments, all of which he refused. After the death of Charles I., Montrose was deputed by Charles, the king's son, to invade Scotland, and accordingly dispatched some troops to the Orkneys in 1650, joining them himself shortly afterwards; but, in the very first encounter with the Covenanters on the mainland, he was utterly routed. He escaped in the disguise of a Highland rustic; but was soon delivered up to General Leslie, and taken to Edinburgh, where he was subjected to many barbarous indignities, and sentenced to death as a traitor to the Covenant. His demeanour throughout this crisis was dignified and self-possessed, and caused many to sympathise with him who had before regarded him as the cruel agent of a tyrant. He was hanged on a gibbet, after which his limbs were severed from his body, and affixed to the gates of the chief towns in Scotland. Charles II., at the Restoration, reversed the sentence, and ordered the scattered remains of the unfortunate noble to be collected; which was accordingly done, and they were buried with great solemnity in Edinburgh.

Born in Montrose, 1612; died 1650.

MONTSERRAT, mont'-ser-rat, a British island of the West Indies, belonging to the Leeward group, 43 miles S.W. of Antigua. It is mountainous, and there are large barren tracts, but the cultivated districts produce some of the best sugar in the West Indies, cotton, arrow-root, and tamarinds. The chief town is Plymouth, on the south coast. Area, 47 square miles. Pop. 8,700. Lat. 16° 45′ N. Lon. 62° 20′ W.—It was discovered by Columbus in 1493.

MONT ST. JEAN, zha, a village of Belgium, 11 miles S.E. of Brussels. It is near the scene of the battle of Waterloo, called by the French the battle of Mont St. Jean.

MONTUCLA, JOSEPH DE, mawn-took'-la, a French mathematician and scientific writer, was an associate of the National Institute, and a member of the Academy of Berlin. He accompanied Turgot to Cayenne, as secretary of the government and royal astronomer. On his return to France, he was appointed first commissioner of public buildings. His principal works were, "Researches on the Quadrature of the Circle," "Collection of Tracts upon Inoculation," and "History of Mathematics." This last is valuable, and has been translated into English.

Born at Lyons, 1725; died 1799.

MONZA, mond'-za, a town of Italy, province of Milano, on the Lambro, 10 miles N.E. of Milan. The cathedral was founded in the 6th century by queen Theodolinda. Manf. Cotton stuffs, hats, leather, and preserved meats. Pop. 26,807.—The town, which stands on the site of the ancient Modœtia, was capital of the Lombard kingdom, where the kings received the famous iron crown, and was famous in the middle ages for wealth and the extent of the manufacture of cloth.

MOOLTAN, or MOULTAN, mool-tan', a city of the Punjab, British India, 164 miles S.W. of Lahore. It has a citadel, situate on a rising ground, and contains large bazaars, several handsome tombs and Hindoo temples. Manf. Silks, cottons, shawls, brocades, tissue and carpets. Pop. 68,674. Capital of division of same name. Pop. 1,712,394.

MOONTA, moon'-ta, a mining town of South Australia, on the shore of Spencer's Gulf, 99 miles N.W. of Adelaide. The copper mines are very rich, and give employment to about 1,300 hands. There are 27 shafts in the Moonta mines, and nearly 300,000 tons of ore have been already raised. Pop. 5,000.

MOOR, moor, a town of Hungary, Thither Danube, 17 miles N.W. of Stuhl-Weissemberg. There are two castles, two churches, and a Capuchin monastery. A large trade is carried on in corn, horses, and cattle. Pop. 7,000.

MOORE, EDWARD, moor, an English poet, who wrote "Fables for the Female Sex:" "The Gamester," a tragedy, still occasionally performed; "Gil Blas," a comedy, and other pieces. He was likewise editor of "The World," a weekly paper, for which lords Lyttleton and Chesterfield and Horace Walpole wrote.

Born 1712; died 1757.

MOORE, DR. JOHN, Scotch physician and miscellaneous writer, who received his education at Glasgow, Holland, London, and Paris. In 1747 he became assistant surgeon in the army in Flanders, where he remained till the general peace. After spending five years abroad, Dr. Moore settled in London, and, in 1779, published the fruits of his travels, in "A View of Society and Manners in France, Switzerland, and Germany." This work was so well received, that, in 1781, he added to it two volumes, entitled "A View of Society and Manners in Italy." In 1785 he published "Medical Sketches." His next performance was a novel, entitled "Zeluco," which abounds with incident, though the principal character is so atrocious as to excite the reader's horror. In 1792 he accompanied lord Lauderdale to Paris, and witnessed some of the principal scenes in the Revolution, of which he published an interesting account in 1795. The year following appeared his novel entitled "Edward," intended as a contrast to "Zeluco," but inferior to it. In 1800 he gave to the world "Mordaunt;" being sketches of life, characters, and manners in various countries.

Born at Stirling, 1730; died at Richmond, Surrey, 1802.

MOORE, SIR JOHN, British general, was son of the preceding, and entered the army in his 15th year. His father possessing great influence in the aristocratic circles, caused the young soldier to rise rapidly, and to gain the rank of lieutenant-colonel before he had seen any service. In 1794, however, he showed that he was possessed of great military qualities, by the part he took in Paoli's descent upon Corsica. His next services were in the West Indies in 1796, in Ireland during the rebellion of '98, and in Holland shortly afterwards. In 1801 he commanded the reserve of the army dispatched to Egypt, and greatly signalized himself, receiving a wound at the head of his men. Upon the renewal of the war in 1802, he applied to be placed in command of a camp of instruction upon the Kentish coast. His request was granted, and he successfully trained a number of light infantry regiments, which afterwards formed the celebrated light division of the duke of Wellington's army in the Peninsular war. In 1808 he went, with an army of 10,000 men, to Sweden, to assist Gustavus Adolphus IV. in defending his kingdom against the designs of Napoleon; but, becoming involved in a dispute with that monarch, he returned to England with his troops. In August of the same year he was sent to Portugal, and was placed in command of an army of 30,000 infantry and 5,000 cavalry, which was ordered to co-operate with the Spanish troops against the French in the north of the peninsula. Two months afterwards, he commenced his march from Lisbon; but, on entering Spain, discovered that the whole of the Spanish forces with which he was to act had been thoroughly routed. He remained for a time inactive at Salamanca, urged to advance by the British ambassador in Spain, but himself inclined to retreat into Portugal. Suddenly discovering that the French intended to surround him, he commenced a rapid, if not too hasty, march to Corunna. In that memorable retreat through the mountains of Galicia, in the depth of a severe winter, Sir John Moore displayed the highest qualities of a military commander. Before the battle of Corunna the British troops were, to all appearance, completely disorganized and exhausted; yet, animated by the example of their heroic leader, they turned upon their advancing foes, and inflicted upon them a decisive repulse. The victory was dearly bought, for Sir John Moore was killed by a cannon ball, and was buried on the field of battle. There is a monument to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Born at Glasgow, 1761; died 1809.

MOORE, THOMAS, poet, was the son of a small tradesman at Dublin, and after receiving some education at a school in the same city, was entered of Trinity College, Dublin, in 1793. He had already commenced rhyme-making, and had inserted two poems in a Dublin magazine. His collegiate career was somewhat distinguished; but being of the Roman Catholic faith, he was not permitted to take honours. In 1798 he went to London, and entered himself of the Middle Temple, with the view of adopting the law as his profession. In 1801 he produced the "Odes of Anacreon," which he had composed while at college, and in the following year, "The Poetical Works of the late Thomas Little," a collection of lyrics in imitation of Catullus. He now began to be introduced to that fashionable circle in which, throughout his after-life, he sought to move. Through the influence of Lord Moira he was, in 1803, appointed to a post at Bermuda; but finding, on his arrival, that the situation was distasteful to him, he returned almost immediately. He pursued his homeward journey through the United States, and visited New York, Virginia, Boston, Niagara, and Quebec. One of the results of the journey was his famous "Canadian Boat Song." Soon after his arrival in England, he put forth his "Odes and Epistles," which being severely criticised by Jeffrey, led to the "bloodless duel" between himself and that gentleman, satirized by Byron in his "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." (See JEFFREY.) At this period he was much courted by the noble and the fashionable, and was a constant guest at Holland and Lansdowne Houses. He had a sweet voice, and being a good musician, was in the habit of singing the melodies of his native land with much success at aristocratic re-unions. This fact led to his engaging himself to write a series of Irish melodies, the accompaniments to which were to be adapted from Irish airs, by Sir John Stevenson. This task was not completed until 1834. Of a similar character were his "National Airs" and "Sacred Songs." In 1812, his friend Mr. Perry, editor of the "Morning Chronicle," negotiated on his behalf with the Messrs. Longman the sale of a volume of poems, for which Moore was to receive 3,000 guineas. Five years afterwards, this poem appeared under the title of "Lalla Rookh," and was immediately highly successful. This brilliant composition was something quite new to the public, who were captivated with its rich colouring, its melody, and its oriental spirit. The "Fudge Family in Paris" was his next work, and was the result of a visit to the French capital, made in company with Mr. Rogers. He soon afterwards learned that his deputy at Bermuda, "after keeping back from him the proper receipts of his office, had made free with the proceeds of a ship and cargo deposited in his hands." For this, Doctors' Commons made a claim upon him to the amount of £6,000. The poet's friends proffered assistance; but he honourably resolved to pay off the claim out of the proceeds from his pen. The remaining years of his life may be described as an untiring pursuit of poetry, prose, and fashionable society. He laboured incessantly, and gave to the world, among others, "The Loves of the Angels," a poem; "The Epicurean," a prose-poetical romance; "Fables of the Holy Alliance," "Memoirs of Captain Rock," "The Summer Fête," "The Life of Lord Edward Fitzgerald," the "History of Ireland," and "The Life of Sheridan." Some time previously to the year 1821, Lord Byron intrusted Moore with his manuscript autobiography, which was to be published for Moore's benefit, but not until after Byron's death. In 1821 Moore sold the MS. to Murray, and engaged to edit it for the sum of 2,000 guineas. In 1824 Byron died, but Lady Byron deeming that the publication of the autobiography was calculated to injure the character of her husband and his family, offered to repay to Mr. Murray the sum he had advanced to Moore. This the poet would not accede to, but, after some altercation, Moore himself repaid the sum he had obtained from the publisher, and the MS. was burnt. He, however, wrote a Life of Byron for the Messrs. Longman for a like sum. His literary merits obtained for him, in 1835, a pension of £300 per annum. The "Irish Melodies" and "Lalla Rookh" have passed through many editions, and are still exceedingly popular. His last important work was a "History of Ireland."

Born at Dublin, 1779; died 1852.

MOORGHAUB, moor-gawb', a river of Afghanistan, rising in the territory of the Hazareh, and after a course of 270 miles, is lost in the sands beyond Merv, in Khiva.

MOORSHEDABAD, moor-she-da-bad', a city of Bengal, British India, on the Bagarthy, an affluent of the Ganges, 115 miles from Calcutta. From the year 1704 till 1757, the city was the capital of Bengal. There is a British college, founded in 1826. There is a very large trade in silk and indigo. Lat. 24° 11′ N. Lon. 88° 15′ E. The city is the capital of a district of the same name. Pop. of the district, 1,226,790; of the city, 39,231.

MORAT, mo'-ra, a town of Switzerland, canton of Freiburg, on the lake of the same name, 12 miles W. of Bern. Pop. 2,300. The place is famous for the defeat of Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, by the Swiss and their allies, in 1476.

MORATA, OLYMPIA FULVIA, mo-ra'-ta, a learned Italian lady, daughter of a poet, who educated her in the classics, and when quite young (some writers say in her 16th year) she gave lectures at Ferrara. She married a German physician, and became a convert to Protestantism, residing at Schweinfurt. In 1553, on the capture of that city by the Margrave of Brandenburg, her library was plundered, and she was compelled to fly, and settled at Heidelberg, where her husband was appointed professor. She wrote Greek and Latin poems.

Born in Ferrara, 1526; died at Heidelberg, 1555.

MORATALLA, mo-ra-tal'-la, a town of Spain, province of Mercia, 47 miles N.W. of the town of that name. There is a large church. Manf. Coarse cloths, soap, and oil. Pop. 11,216.

MORATIN, LEANDRO FERNANDEZ DE, mor'-at-in, Spanish comic poet, son of a poet of some eminence, who brought up his son as a jeweller. In 1790 he produced a comedy, which was successful, and that was rapidly followed by other pieces. Joseph Bonaparte made him chief royal librarian, but on the return of king Ferdinand, he was deprived of his office, and went to Paris. His later years were devoted to the production of a history of the Spanish drama.

Born at Madrid, 1760; died at Paris, 1828.

MORATIN, NICOLAS FERNANDEZ, Spanish poet, father of the above. He was a lawyer by profession, and exerted himself to reform the Spanish stage. He was the author of a narrative poem on the adventures of Cortes, several tragedies, and a comedy.

Born at Madrid, 1737; died 1780.

MORAVA, or the MARCH, mo-ra'-va, the chief river of Moravia. It rises near the borders of Prussian Silesia, nearly 4,000 feet above the sea level, and falls into the Danube 8 miles above Presburg, after a course of 184 miles. In its lower course it forms the boundary between Lower Austria and Hungary.

MORAVIA, or MÄHREN, mo-rai'-ve-a, a crown land of the Austrian empire, bounded E. by Hungary, S. by Austria Proper, and N. and W. by Bohemia. It forms a large quadrangle, enclosed and intersected by several ranges of mountains. The Sudetes are on the side of Silesia; the Moravian chain separates it from Bohemia, and the Carpathians from Hungary. The valleys and plains are of great fertility, particularly in the south. Flax is cultivated; grain, hops, potatoes, mustard, and beetroot are exported; and certain situations are so well adapted to the grape, that, in 1803, the government had to prohibit the appropriation of more land for the cultivation of the vine. The pastures are extensive, and stock of all kinds, poultry and bees, are raised in large numbers.

Rivers.—The Morava, with various small tributaries; the Oder, Elsa, and Oppa.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, iron, lead, coal, graphite, sulphur, marble, and precious stones.

Manf.—Woollen, linen, and cotton goods, thread, leather, paper, potash, and glass.

Area.—8,585 square miles.

Pop.—2,153,407, more than one-half being Czechs and Poles, and 500,000 Germans. The majority are Catholics, but there are about 50,000 Protestants and 40,000 Jews.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are two circles, Brünn and Olmütz, divided respectively into 12 and 13 governmental districts. The chief towns are BRÜNN, the capital and manufacturing emporium, and OLMÜTZ, a great cattle mart.

History.—Moravia was made tributary to the German empire in the 9th century, incorporated with Bohemia in 1029, and about 160 years afterwards erected into a margraveate. In 1526, it was added to the possessions of the house of Austria, and has, ever since, been subject to the monarch of that empire. In 1849 it was separated from Bohemia and declared a distinct province and crown land.

MORAY FIRTH is a large inlet of the German Ocean on the north-east of the Scottish coast. Thirty-one miles in length from its entrance to Inverness, and 16 miles wide at the entrance. At its western extremity it forms Loch Beauly.

MORAYSHIRE. (See ELGINSHIRE.)

MORAZAN, FRANCISCO, mo-raz'-an, president of the republic of Central America. He was secretary-general of Honduras in 1824, and soon afterwards elected chief of the state. He displayed great ability, suppressed the reactionary party, expelled the monks, and appropriated the ecclesiastical property to educational and charitable purposes. In 1832 he accepted the presidency, but in 1836 was driven out by a popular outbreak, fomented by the clerical party, who persuaded the ignorant population, especially the Indians, that an outbreak of cholera was caused by poisoning of the waters by the governing party. In 1842 Morazan was chosen governor of Porto Rico, but a revolution broke out, and he was taken prisoner and shot.

Born in Honduras, 1799; died 1842.

MORBEYA, mor'-bai'-a, a river of Morocco formed by the junction of several small streams rising in Mount Atlas, and falling into the Atlantic, after a course of 190 miles, 30 miles N.E. of Cape Blanco.

MORBIHAN, mor'-be-an', a maritime department of France, bounded on the S. by the Atlantic, and N. by the department Côtes du Nord. The coast is much indented, and there are numerous bays, harbours, and islands. The largest island is Belle Isle. There are fertile plains, and large tracts of heath and marsh, but the country rises into hills farther inland. Corn, hemp, lint, butter, cider, honey, and inferior wine are produced. There are tracts of excellent pasturage, and large numbers of horses, cattle, and sheep, are bred. Bees are reared, and the fisheries, especially of sardines, are very productive.

Rivers.—The Vilaine, Blavet, Claye, Oust, and Auray.
Area.—2,640 square miles.
Pop.—521,614.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 248 communes. The chief towns are VANNES, the capital, and L'ORIENT.

MORCHENSTERN, or MORGENSTERN, mor'-ken-stern, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, near the Prussian frontier, 53 miles N.E. of Prague. There are a church, courthouse, and castle. Manf. Glass. Pop. 3,700.

MORCONE, mor-ko'-nai, a walled town of Italy, 15 miles S.W. of Campobasso. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 4,600.

MORDAUNT, CHARLES, earl of Peterborough. (See PETERBOROUGH, earl of.)

MORE, HENRY, mor, an English divine, who received his education at the university of Cambridge, where he applied himself to the study of the Platonists. Most of his writings were devoted to the exposition of a Christiano-Platonical philosophy. His chief works were "Conjectura Cabalistica," "A Key to the Revelations," "An Apology for Descartes," "The Immortality of the Soul," and a collection of philosophical poems. He was one of the original members of the Royal Society, and, although offered high preferments in the Church, he chose rather to live a life of retirement, wherein he might devote himself to the pursuit of philosophical studies.

Born at Grantham, Lincolnshire, 1614; died at Cambridge, 1687.

MORE, SIR THOMAS, lord chancellor, statesman and writer, was the son of Sir John More, one of the judges of the King's Bench. At the age of 15 he was placed in the house of Cardinal Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, from which he was sent a year afterwards to Oxford, and afterwards became a student of Lincoln's Inn. His remarkable talents early attracted attention, and as soon as he came of age he obtained a seat in parliament, where he opposed a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. for the marriage of his eldest daughter, with such eloquence that it was refused by the house. At the accession of Henry VIII. he was called to the bar, and, in in 1508, appointed judge of the sheriff's court, in London, which was then a considerable post. By the interest of Wolsey, he obtained the honour of knighthood, was sent on several foreign missions, and called to the privy council. The king exhibited remarkable personal attachment to him, visiting him at his house at Chelsea. In 1520 he was made treasurer of the Exchequer, and, in 1523, chosen speaker of the House of Commons, where he resisted a motion for an oppressive subsidy, which gave great offence to Cardinal Wolsey. Sir Thomas was made chancellor in 1529, and, by his indefatigable application in that office, there was, in a short time, not a cause left undetermined. To the high qualities of learning, wit, and liberality, he joined a staunch adherence to the Roman Catholic religion and the papal authority. This led him to oppose the king's divorce from Catherine of Aragon and resign the great seal; and he refused to take an oath recognising the marriage with Anne Boleyn as legal, for which he was sent to the Tower, brought to trial, and condemned to lose his head, which sentence he courageously endured. Thomas More wrote several works against the Reformation, and some epistles to Erasmus and other learned men. One of the best known of his works is a kind of political romance, composed in Latin, entitled "Utopia," wherein the author delineates what he conceives to be a perfect commonwealth, situate in an imaginary island. This work has been translated into English by Bishop Burnet, Cayley, and others. Sir Thomas had four children. His eldest daughter, Margaret, married a gentleman named Roper, who wrote the life of his father-in-law. She was an accomplished woman, and well read in the Greek and Latin languages.

Born in Milk-street, London, 1480; died 1535.

MORE, HANNAH, English authoress, daughter of a village schoolmaster. Early in life she opened a school for the education of girls, at Bristol. In this occupation she was assisted by her sisters, and, in course of time, the establishment became one of the most flourishing schools in that part of England. In 1773 she produced a pastoral drama, entitled "The Search after Happiness," which meeting with a successful reception, she was encouraged to write a regular tragedy, "Regulus." Obtaining an introduction to Dr. Johnson and Garrick, she wrote works for the stage; but being of a deeply religious order of mind, she determined to forsake writing for the theatre, and retire into the country. During the remaining years of her life she resided in Somersetshire; the profits resulting from her many productions enabling her to enjoy a literary ease, and to assist in ameliorating the condition of the rustic population in her neighbourhood. It was at one time intended to commit the education of the Princess Charlotte of Wales to her charge; but, although the project fell to the ground, it was the cause of her publication entitled "Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess." Her next effort was the popular novel "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife." Her chief works of a religious order were "Practical Piety," "Christian Morals," "Essay on the Character and Writings of St. Paul," and "The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain."

Born near Bristol, 1745; died at Clifton, 1833.

MOREA, mo-re'-a, the southern portion of the kingdom of Greece, the ancient Peloponnesus, situate to the southward of the continent of Greece, with which it is connected by a narrow neck of land, called the Isthmus of Corinth. In all other directions it is surrounded by the sea. Its form approaches to the oblong, but is irregular and much indented. The gulfs and bays are numerous, the principal being those of Patras, Arcadia, Coron, Kolokythia, and Napoli di Romania. It has also several large and secure harbours. Corn, olive-oil, wine, currants (or raisins of Corinth), silk, cotton, wool, honey, beeswax, and fruit are produced. Some of the wines, particularly those made in the south-east, in the neighbourhood of Napoli di Malvasia (and thence called Malmsey), are delicious; but in general the country is neglected.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Alpheus, the Eurotas, and the Pamisus. The lakes are the Stymphalus and Pheneus, both situate towards the north; the former is remarkable for giving rise to the small river Styx, which flows out of it.
Area.—About 8,000 square miles.
Pop.—743,494.
Divisions.—The Morea is divided into the nomarchies of Achaia, Arcadia, Argolis, Corinth, Elis, Laconia, and Messenia.

MOREAU, NICOLAS, mo'-ro, French author, who was counsellor of the Cour des Aides, historiographer of France, librarian to the queen, and censor royal. He wrote several works, the chief of which were, "Lessons in Morals, Politics, and Law;" "Principles of Political Morality;" and "The Duties of a Prince: or, a Discourse on Justice."

Born at Saint Florentin, 1717; died 1803.

MOREAU, JEAN MICHEL, French designer and engraver, who studied under Lebas, and became, in 1770, designer to the king, and, in 1797, professor of drawing to the Ecoles Centrales of Paris. His designs, nearly all of which were engraved by himself, amounted to more than 2,000, and he was one of the most popular illustrators of the works of Voltaire, Rousseau, Molière, &c.

Born at Paris, 1741; died 1814.

MOREAU, JEAN VICTOR, general of the French republic. The son of an advocate, he was himself educated at Rennes for the legal profession; but he enlisted as a private soldier when he had attained his 18th year. His discharge was purchased, however, and for several years he studied and practised the law, gaining some popularity by his eloquent defence of the parliament of Rennes against the government. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he resolved to devote himself to a career of arms, for which he had always a passionate attachment. He placed himself at the head of a battalion of Breton volunteers, and, in 1792, joined the army of Dumouriez. In two years he reached the grade of general of division, and assisted Pichegru in the conquest of Holland. Although his father was guillotined, he would not withdraw from the service of the republic. In 1796 he was nominated commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine and Moselle, and in 1796 defeated the Austrians under General Wurmser, and drove them across the Rhine. While in pursuit of the Austrians in Germany, he was met by the Archduke Charles, who was at first beaten by Moreau. The Austrians, however, were soon so strongly reinforced, that Moreau was compelled to retire before overwhelming numbers. With a powerful enemy in his rear, and assailed on every side by a hostile peasantry, he fought his way through the defiles of the Black Forest, and, by his masterly retreat, gained more honour than by his previous advance. Shortly afterwards he incurred the displeasure of the Directory, by being suspected of complicity with his old friend Pichegru, in corresponding with the Bourbon princes. Upon this he requested to be allowed to retire from the army. But his services were again sought in 1799, when he was appointed to the command of the army in Italy, where the French were in a disastrous condition by a retreat, in the course of which he gained victories. He was offered the dictatorship of France, but declined the honour, and supported Bonaparte on the famous 18th of Brumaire. At Novi, after the death of Joubert, he saved the army. Again nominated to the command-in-chief of the army of the Rhine, he crossed that river in 1800, defeated the Austrians in several engagements, drove General Kray before him as far as the Danube, gained the decisive victory of Hochstadt, and signed the armistice of Parsdorff. At the recommencement of hostilities, he gained the celebrated victory of Hohenlinden, and advanced upon Vienna, which was only saved by the armistice of Steyer. The peace of Luneville put an end to this glorious career in 1801. Upon his return to Paris, the first consul pretended to receive him with great cordiality; but Moreau and Bonaparte were too eagerly pursuing the same ambitious path to escape coming into collision. Bonaparte spoke of Moreau as "the retreating general;" while the victor of Hohenlinden retaliated by defining his rival as a "general at ten thousand men a day." In 1804, Moreau was accused of being implicated in the royalist conspiracy of Pichegru and Georges Cadoudal; and, although there was no evidence against him, was condemned to an imprisonment of two years. Moreau requested that this sentence might be converted into banishment, which, being acceded to, he set out for the United States, and lived during several years in the state of New Jersey. His hatred of Napoleon caused him to accept, in 1813, a proposal made to him by the emperor Alexander to assist the allies against France. Scarcely had he joined the allied army before Dresden, when both his legs were crushed by a cannon-shot. He underwent the amputation of both limbs without a groan, but died after a few days of suffering.

Born at Morlaix, 1763; died 1813.

MOREAU, HÉGÉSIPPE, a French author. He was a printer, and went to Paris at an early age, with the intention of attaining a brilliant position by the exercise of his poetical talents. Meeting with little encouragement, he, after several years of misery, died of consumption in one of the hospitals of the French capital. Moreau wrote a volume of poems, which was published three months before his death, entitled "Myosotis," and which evinced a style full of grace and freshness.

Born 1810; died 1838.

MORECOMBE BAY. (See LANCASHIRE.)

MOREHOUSE, a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 950 square miles. Pop. 14,208 two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Bastrop.

MORELIA, or VALLADOLID, a town of Mexico, capital of Michoacan, in the valley of Olid, 6,438 feet above sea level. There are a cathedral, several elegant churches, a very fine college, handsome houses, and a good public promenade or alameda. Manf. Woollens, cotton, and preserved fruit. Pop. 30,000.

MORELL, THOMAS, mo-rel', English divine and lexicographer, who became fellow and D.D. of King's College, Cambridge, and published valuable editions of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary and Hederich's Greek Lexicon. He was also author of "Annotations on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding;" assisted Hogarth in writing his "Analysis of Beauty;" and selected the passages of Scripture for Handel's Oratorios.

Born at Eton, 1703; died 1784.

MORELLA, mo-rail'-ya, a town of Spain, province of Castelon de la Plana, 45 miles N. of Tortosa. There are some fine houses, but many of the streets are steep, and in a neglected state. Manf. Blankets and sashes. A considerable quantity of wheat is exported. Pop. 6,300.

MORELLI, JAMES, mo-rail'-le, Italian librarian, who, in 1778, became keeper of the great library of St. Mark, at Venice, and retained that post until his death. He discovered a large fragment of the works of Dion Cassius, and was the editor of many classical authors, besides producing numerous treatises on questions connected with the history of literature.

Born at Venice, 1745; died at the same city, 1819.

MORELOS, mo'-re-lose, an inland state of Mexico, formerly a portion of the state of Mexico. It is very mountainous, has a mean elevation of 4,500 feet above the sea level, and is almost entirely of volcanic formation, but between the lofty peaks are fertile plains. The great cave of Cacahuamilpa is one of the most remarkable in the world.

The climate is mild in the north, but very hot and unhealthy in the south. Sugar-cane and fruits of exquisite quality are cultivated.

Rivers.—The principal are the Cuernavaca and the Cuantla, tributaries of the Amacusaque.

Minerals.—Silver, of which 22 mines are worked; gold, quicksilver, lead, and cinnabar.

Area.—1,887 square miles.

Pop.—141,565.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are five districts. The capital is Cuernavaca, and Cuautla de Morelos, Jonacatepe, Tete-Cola, and Yautepec are other towns of some importance.

MORELOS, or MONTEMORELOS, formerly San Mateo del Pilon, a town of Mexico, in the state of Nuevo Leon, 70 miles S.E. of Monterey. The older part is ruinous, but the modern part is handsomely laid out. Manf. Sugar, rum, hardware, and agricultural implements. Pop. 9,000.

MORELOS, JOSÉ MARIA, Mexican revolutionist, a priest, who, in 1810, joined the insurgents against the Spaniards, receiving a commission to act as captain-general on the south-west coast. With a small force of negroes he captured Acapulco in 1811, and his army having increased, defeated the Spaniards. Other successes followed, but in 1815 he suffered reverses, was taken prisoner, and shot at Mexico.

Born in Mexico, 1780; died 1815.

MORELY, Lord, mor'-le, an English nobleman, who wrote several curious Latin poems, and was a great favourite with Henry VIII., who raised him to the peerage. He secured that monarch's favour by concurring in his divorce from Catherine and his marriage with Anne Boleyn.

Died 1547.

MORENA, SIERRA, or MONTES MARIANA, mo-rai'-na, a mountain-chain extending along great part of the south of Spain and Portugal, and separating the two great valleys which contain the rivers Guadiana and Guadalquiver. Its culminating point is Aracena, 5,500 feet above the sea. This chain is the scene of many incidents in "Don Quixote."

MORET, ANTOINE DE BOURBON, Count de, mo'-rai, a natural son of Henry IV. of France and Jacqueline de Beuil, countess de Moret. He espoused the cause of Gaston, duke of Orleans, and raised an army in Languedoc; but perished in the engagement at Castelnaudary, when the duke of Montmorency was made prisoner.

Born 1607; killed 1632.

MORETO Y CABANA, AUGUSTIN, mo-rai'-to, Spanish comic poet of the 17th century. He was the author of a considerable number of dramas and short poems, which were very successful. Several of his plays were imitated by Molière. About 1676 he abandoned poetry to embrace an ecclesiastical life, and became a favourite with Philip IV. His best known comedy is "Desden con el Desden" (Disdain met with Disdain), which has been adapted to the French, Italian, and German stages.

Born 1600; died at Toledo, 1669.

MORETON, more'-ton, a district of Queensland, Australia, bounded S. by New South Wales, and stretching inland to the Dividing Range. The chief towns are BRISBANE and IPSWICH. Area, 7,700 square miles.

MORETON BAY, an inlet of the Pacific Ocean, on the east coast of Queensland, Australia, between the mainland and the islands of Moreton and Shadbroke. It is 65 miles long and 23 miles wide, and receives the Arrowsmith, Caboolture Pine, Brisbane, and Logan rivers. There are numerous fertile islands, and the scenery is very picturesque. In 1849 it was made a convict settlement. Lat. 27°—27° 55′ S. Lon. 153° E.

MORETTO, IL, eel-mo-rat'-to, the name assumed by ALESSANDRO BONVICINO, an Italian painter, who studied under and imitated Titian, and afterwards adopted the manner of Raffaelle. He painted both in fresco and oil, and his pictures are marked by refinement of style, feeling, and noble expression. There are many of his pictures in the churches of Brescia and its vicinity.

Born at Brescia, 1490; died 1560.

MOREZ, mo'-rai, a town of France, department Jura, on the Bienne, 27 miles S.E. of Lons-le-Saulnier. Manf. Clock-work, telescopes, wine, nails, and leather. Pop. 5,500.

MORGAGNI, GIOVANNI BAPTIST, morgan'-ye, a celebrated Italian anatomist. He became professor of medicine at Bologna, whence he removed to Padua on being elected to the chair of anatomy. His fame chiefly rests upon a work entitled "De Sedibus et Causis Morborum per Anatomen indagatis," which contained a vast number of observations upon morbid anatomy, and is referred to at the present day with advantage.

Born at Forli, 1682; died 1771.

MORGAN, mor'-gan, the son of Cadwgan, prince of Powys, a fierce chieftain, who subsequently repented, and went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but died at Cyprus, on his return.

Died 1126.

MORGAN, WILLIAM, an eminent Welsh divine, who became, in 1595, bishop of Llandaff, whence he was translated to St. Asaph in 1601. He had a principal share in the translation of the Bible into Welsh, first printed in 1588.

Died 1604.

MORGAN, SIR HENRY, a celebrated buccaneer of Welsh birth, who at first served under Mansfield, and after whose death he collected a fleet of twelve ships, and attacked and extorted ransom from a town in the island of Cuba. He subsequently carried Portobello by assault, and destroyed the fort of Macaraibo. In 1669 he retired to Jamaica, intending to enjoy peaceably the fortune he had acquired; but in the following year he again put himself at the head of a fleet of 37 sail, with which he ravaged the coast of Nicaragua. In 1671 he marched upon Panama with 1,300 men, and took and burnt the city. His career was checked by the signature of a peace between England and Spain. After a visit to England, he returned to the West Indies, having been knighted by Charles II., and created governor of Jamaica.

Born 1637; died in Jamaica, 1688.

MORGAN, SIR THOMAS CHARLES, an English physician of some eminence, who received the order of knighthood in Ireland, in 1811, and in the following year meeting with Miss Owenson, the popular Irish authoress, at the residence of the marquis of Abercorn, in the county of Tyrone, he married her. He shortly afterwards relinquished his medical practice, and became a writer of light and sparkling sketches for magazines. His best efforts were, "Sketches of the Philosophy of Life," "The Philosophy of Morals," and "The Book without a Name," which last was written in conjunction with Lady Morgan. When the Whigs came into office in 1831, Sir Charles was appointed a commissioner of Irish fisheries. He was also fellow of the College of Physicians.

Born in London, about 1783; died 1843.

MORGAN, SYDNEY OWENSON, Lady, a popular Irish authoress, wife of the preceding, was the daughter of a musician. Her first girlish efforts were directed to poetry, and at 14 she produced a volume of miscellaneous verses, and afterwards a series of songs, set to Irish airs. When only 16 she had published two novels, which, although favourably spoken of at the time, produced no very important effects; but the "Wild Irish Girl," published in 1801, at once raised her to a conspicuous position in the literary world. This novel passed through seven editions, and formed an introduction for its gifted authoress into the best society. Her next work of importance was entitled "France," and was the result of three observant years spent in that country. It was a critical review of the social state of the country rather than a book of travels, and was published in 1818. It achieved immense success, and led to a decision, on the part of the French government of the time, to refuse the gifted authoress readmission to the country. "Florence Macarthy," her second novel, was published in England during her stay in France, and contributed, in no small degree, to add to the writer's fame. "The Life and Times of Salvator Rosa" was first given to the world in 1823. In the historical and philosophical disquisition, entitled "Woman and Her Master," Lady Morgan contended that her sex had been condemned to obscurity and passive obedience by man. Among many other works, she produced "The Book of the Boudoir," "The Princess," and "Dramatic Scenes from Real Life." Lady Morgan, although receiving large sums for her works, was not wealthy, and a well-bestowed pension of £300 a year was conferred on her during the ministry of Earl Grey.

Born at Dublin, 1783; died 1859.

MORGAN MWYNVAWR, or Morgan the Courteous, a Welsh prince, who was a lover of peace, though great in the field of battle. He was the friend of Ethelred, king of England.

Born 872; died 1001.

MORGARTEN, mor-gar'-ten, a mountain slope of Switzerland, on the east margin of Lake Egori, canton of Zug, 5 miles from Schwyz, where, in November, 1315, the first battle was fought for Swiss independence. On this occasion, 15,000 of the Austrian forces were defeated by 1,400 Swiss. In 1798 the French were also here defeated by the Swiss.

MORGHEN, RAFFAELLE SANZIO, CAVALIERE, mor'-gen, Italian engraver, who studied at Rome under Volpato, whose daughter he married. In 1793 he took up his residence at Florence, at the invitation of the grand-duke Ferdinand II. His masterpiece was an engraving of the "Last Supper," by Leonardo da Vinci; but he is stated to have engraved upwards of 200 plates, some of the best being reproductions of the great works of the painter Raffaele.

Born at Florence, 1758; died 1833.

MORHOFF, DANIEL GEORGE, mor'-hof, a learned German writer, who, in 1660, was chosen professor of poetry at Rostock, whence he removed to Kiel, where he discharged the same office, but afterwards became professor of history and librarian. His principal works were "Polyhistor," in which he gave a survey of universal literature down to the middle of the 18th century, treated of choice works, and of rare works upon grammar, rhetoric, poetry, mathematics, history, &c.; and the "Princeps Medicus," in which he defended, in a curious manner, the pretensions of the kings of France and England to the power of curing the scrofula, or king's evil.

Born at Wismar, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 1639; died 1691.

MORI, mo'-re, a market town of the Austrian empire, in Tyrol, on the Adige, at the confluence of the Conreraso, 2 miles from Roveredo. There is a trade in oil, silk, tobacco, wine, and chestnuts, and a marble quarry is in the vicinity. Pop. 4,000.

MORIANA, SAN GIOVANNI DI, or MAURIENNE, ST. JEAN DE, a town of France, department Savoie, on the left bank of the Arc, near the confluence of the Arvan, 33 miles S.E. of Chambery. Some towers remain of the old fortifications. There are a cathedral, an episcopal palace, convent, hospital, and fine triumphal arch. Pop. 3,100.

MORICE, SIR WILLIAM, mor'-is, an English gentleman, memorable for the share which he had in bringing about the restoration of Charles II. He was the kinsman of General Monk, who procured him the place of secretary of state, which he resigned in 1668. He wrote a book called "The Common Right of the Lord's Supper asserted."

Died 1676.

MORIER, JAMES, mo'-re-er, English author and diplomatist. From 1810 to 1816 he was secretary of legation and minister plenipotentiary in Persia. He published narratives of his travels in Persia, Armenia, and Asia Minor, and several novels, illustrative of eastern life. The best known is "The Adventures of Hajji Baba."

Born 1780; died at Brighton, 1849.

MÖRIKE, me(r)-re'-ke, German poet, for some time a village pastor, and afterwards a teacher at Stuttgart. He was considered to be one of the best of the Suabian poets, wrote novels, fairy tales, and ballads, and produced excellent translations of Anacreon and Theocritus.

Born at Ludwigslust, Wurtemburg, 1804.

MORIN, PIERRE, mor'-a, a learned French critic, who spent several years in the printing-office of Paul Manutius, at Venice, and afterwards taught Greek and geography at Vicenza, whence he was invited to Ferrara. Cardinal Borromeo, being apprised of his merit, called him to Rome, where he was employed on the edition of the Septuagint, on that of the Vulgate, and lastly on the great edition of the Bible, translated from the Greek version. He published a collection of General Councils, and other works.

Born at Paris, 1531; died 1608.

MORIN, JEAN BAPTIST, a French astrologer, who studied physic at Avignon, and took his doctor's degree in that faculty. His pretended skill in astrology, and the fame acquired by the casual fulfilment of some of his predictions, recommended him to the cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin, the latter of whom procured him the place of mathematical professor in the Royal College, with a handsome pension. He wrote "Astrologia Gallica," and a curious little book against the Pre-Adamites.

Born in France, 1583; died 1656.

MORIN, SIMON, a French fanatic, who, in 1647, published a strange book, in which he called himself Jesus Christ and the Second Messiah. Notwithstanding his extreme ignorance, he obtained numerous followers; but was burnt alive at Paris.

Born 1623; died 1663.

MORISON, ROBERT, mor'-i-son, a physician and professor of botany at Oxford. He studied in the university of Aberdeen, till interrupted by the civil wars, in which he displayed great zeal and courage on the royalist side. After the execution of Charles I., he went to France, where he took his doctor's degree, and was appointed director of the royal garden at Blois. In 1660 he returned to England, and was nominated physician to Charles II., and regius professor of botany at Oxford. He read botanical lectures in the garden at Oxford, and wrote some interesting works on "Elementary Botany," and on "The History of Botany."

Born at Aberdeen, 1620; died 1683.

MORISOT, CLAUDE BARTHOLOMEW, mor'-i-so, a French author, who wrote "Peruviana," a secret history, with fictitious names, of Cardinal Richelieu, Mary of Medicis, and the duke of Orleans, first published in 1645. He was also the author of some other works.

Born at Dijon, 1592; died 1661.

MORLACCHI, FRANCESCO, mor-lak'-ke, Italian musical composer, who produced an oratorio at the age of 18, and three years afterwards a cantata for Napoleon's coronation as king of Italy. In 1807 he produced his first opera, followed by eight others in four years; and in 1816 he became director of the Italian theatre at Dresden. In 1816 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Fine Arts at Florence. He produced altogether 27 operas, three oratorios, and a large number of concertos, pieces of church music, and instrumental compositions.

Born at Perugia, 1784; died at Dresden, 1841.

MORLAIX, mor'-lai, a seaport of France, department Finisterre, on the small river Morlaix, 34 miles E. of Brest. On the bank of the river there is a fine quay, forming an agreeable covered walk. There are some fine mansions in the principal square, and the more important public buildings are the municipal offices and law courts, the linen and cloth halls, and two fine churches. Manf. Linen, oil, candles, and tobacco. A large trade is carried on in horses, cattle, sheep, and agricultural produce. Pop. 11,500.

MORLAND, SIR SAMUEL, mor'-land, an English statesman, who accompanied Whitelock in his famous embassy to the queen of Sweden, and afterwards became assistant to Thurloe, Cromwell's secretary. Becoming privy to a plot for destroying Charles II., he is stated to have divulged it to that monarch, while still abroad. For this service he was created a baronet at the Restoration. He wrote a book, entitled, "Urim of Conscience." His son was master of mechanics to Charles II., and invented the speaking-trumpet, a fire-engine, and a capstan for heaving up anchors.

Born near Reading, about 1625; died in London, 1695.

MORLAND, GEORGE, English painter, was the son of an artist in London, who employed him constantly in making drawings for sale. By this means young Morland acquired a wonderful facility of invention and a rapidity of execution; but owing to the narrow and illiberal manner in which his talents were used by his father, he contracted low habits, and formed bad connections. His pictures, however, soon became objects of estimation and inquiry; and the persons who administered to his intemperance profited by his weakness to get into their possession pieces of very great value. Hence he was always at work, and always poor. Many of his best pictures were painted in sponging-houses, to clear him from arrest, or in ale-houses, to discharge his reckoning. The pictures of this skilful artist are faithful representations of rural nature and animal life. His drawings of farmyards, cattle, fishermen, and smugglers on the seacoast, are generally very good.

Born 1763; died 1806.

MORLEY, mor'-le, a town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 4 miles S.W. of Leeds. Manf. Cloth. Pop. 15,016.—A station on the Great Northern and London and North-Western railways.

MORLEY, JOHN, a journalist and politician of more than ordinarily advanced Liberal proclivities, son of Dr. Morley, of Blackburn. Educated at Cheltenham and Lincoln College, Oxford, he early evinced much interest in public affairs. Called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1873, and obtaining the honorary LL.D. of Glasgow, he became author of various works, including those on Richard Cobden, Edmund Burke and Voltaire. He was for some time editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, and unsuccessfully contested Blackburn and Westminster for a seat in Parliament, being eventually elected for Newcastle-on-Tyne in February, 1883; he was re-elected in 1885, and joined the Gladstone administration of 1886 as Chief Secretary for Ireland, in which capacity he took a very prominent part in promoting the Home Rule Bill of that year, upon the defeat of which in Parliament, and on appeal to a general election, he, in common with the whole ministry, resigned office, and forthwith took a leading part in the parliamentary opposition.

Born at Blackburn, 1838.

MORMANNO, mor-man'-no, a town of Italy, 13 miles N.W. of Castrovillari. Pop. 5,300.

MORMON CITY. (See SALT LAKE, GREAT.)

MORNAY, PHILIPPE DE, lord of Plessis, mor'-nai, Baron de la Forêt-sur-Sèvre, a celebrated French nobleman and Protestant statesman, author, and soldier, and nicknamed the "Pape des Huguenots." He was secretly educated in the Protestant faith by his mother; but upon the death of his father, in 1559, he openly avowed his religious opinions. He travelled in Switzerland, Germany, Italy, and Austria, occupying himself in religious and scientific studies, and went to England, where he had an interview with queen Elizabeth. In 1572 he returned to France, but after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, took refuge in England. In 1574, on the exhortation of the Protestant leaders, he again went to France, but finding the cause hopeless withdrew to Sedan, where he married a Huguenot widow lady, who had escaped the massacre. He was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Dormans, in 1575, but admitted to ransom. In 1576 he went to the court of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., who made him a member of his council, confided to him the charge of the finances of his kingdom, and sent him to England to request assistance from queen Elizabeth. During the wars of the League, he acted as superintendent-general of Navarre, and was, throughout his life, the chief of the Protestant party in France, his great learning and zeal in religious matters causing him to be regarded with deep veneration by the adherents of the Reformed faith. The Edict of Nantes was procured chiefly by his exertions. He was the author of a great number of works, chiefly polemical. In 1578 he published a treatise on the Church, and, in the year following, began his work on the Truth of the Christian Religion. In 1598 he published his book on the Eucharist, which occasioned a conference between him and Cardinal Du Perron, the result of which was that Mornay obtained the appellation of the Protestant Pope. In 1607 he printed a famous book, entitled "The Mystery of Iniquity; or, the History of the Papacy."

Born in Normandy, 1549; died 1623.

MORNINGTON, GARRET WELLESLEY, Earl of, mor'-ning-ton, an accomplished Irish nobleman, an eminent composer, and father of the greatest English general,—the duke of Wellington. At the age of 10, he played Corelli's sonatas upon the violin, which instrument gave place to the harpsichord when he had attained his 14th year. Throughout his life, the pursuit of musical composition was his unrelaxing effort; and so highly did the University of Dublin esteem his talents, that it conferred upon him the degree of doctor of music, and afterwards elected him professor of that faculty. His compositions were principally vocal: in glee music he was particularly happy. The four-voiced glees, "Here in cool grot,"—"Gently hear me, charming maid,"—"Come, fairest nymph," are generally acknowledged to be masterpieces of the art. By his wife Anne, daughter of Arthur, first earl of Dungannon, he had a large family. His sons were the marquis of Wellesley, lord Maryborough, the duke of Wellington, lord Cowley, and the rev. Gerard Wellesley.

Born in Meath, Ireland, about 1720; died 1781.

MORNINGTON ISLE, an island in the Gulf of Carpentaria, North Australia. It is about 30 miles long and 10 broad, and rocky. Lat. 16° 24' S. Lon. 139° 37' E.

MORNY, CHARLES AUGUSTE LOUIS JOSEPH, Count de, mor'-ne, a modern French statesman, and one of the most devoted adherents to the second empire, supposed to have been a son of queen Hortense and the count de Flahault, and consequently half brother of the emperor Napoleon III. He was adopted as son by the count de Morny, who received £32,000 for his complaisance. After pursuing his studies with considerable success, he was appointed sub-lieutenant of the 1st regiment of lancers, and served under the duke of Orleans in several campaigns in Algiers with much distinction. At the death of queen Hortense she left him an annuity of £1,600. About the year 1838 he quitted the army, turned his attention to commercial speculations, and published a pamphlet on the "Sugar question." He soon placed himself at the head of many important industrial enterprises, and attracted much notice as a projector of railway, canal, and mining speculations, and financial undertakings. At the commencement of the revolution of 1848, he kept aloof from politics; but, on being elected to the legislative assembly, he rapidly proved himself to be one of the most energetic supporters of the president, Louis Napoleon. The count de Morny was one of the few individuals of whom the president requested assistance in preparing the coup d'état of December, and, on that occasion, he displayed equal coolness and audacity. As minister of the interior, he signed or countersigned most of the proclamations and decrees by which the opponents of that act were either arrested or banished. In January, 1852, he retired from office, in consequence of the decree promulgated for the confiscation of the property of the Orleans family. He subsequently placed himself in nomination as government candidate for election to the corps législatif. Being returned, he took his seat, and, in 1854, succeeded M. Billault as president of that body. In the years 1856-57, he represented the imperial dynasty of France at the court of Russia, and, while acting in that capacity, he married the princess Trubetskoi, daughter of one of the most distinguished noblemen in that country. He was a liberal patron of the arts; and his gallery of paintings was admitted to be one of the most choice in France.

Born at Paris, 1811; died 1865.

MOROCCO, MAROCCO, or MAGHRIB ("the West"), mo-rok'-o, a country situate at the north-western extremity of Africa, bounded on the N. by the Mediterranean, on the W. by the Atlantic, while Algeria forms a small part of its E. frontier, and on other sides it is lost in the expanse of the Sahara, or Desert. It is mountainous, but containing many fertile valleys. It is separated into two parts by the great chain of the Atlas, which entirely traverses it, first from east to west, and then from north to south, leaving between itself and the sea a plain of from 50 to 100 miles in breadth. This plain, the length of which may form an oblique line of 400 or 500 miles, comprises all the fertile and populous part of Morocco. The other division consists of the territory south of the Atlas, which, at first fertile in dates and wool, passes gradually into the Sahara. The climate in the northern part near the sea is temperate and agreeable; but in the south-east, scorching winds and extremes of heat and cold prevail, rain being unknown. Wheat, maize, millet, barley, dates, grapes, olives, sugar-cane, tobacco, and cotton are produced. Much more grain is produced than is sufficient for its own consumption. Fruits abound, especially almonds. Wool is very plentiful. Goats afford another very valuable commodity, their skins supplying that leather which, under the name of Morocco, is so distinguished for its softness, pliancy, and beauty. The grass lands feed a fine race of horses, the exportation of which is prohibited; and large numbers of sheep, oxen, and mules are reared. Camels and asses are the principal beasts of burden. There are many wild animals, among them lions, panthers, hyenas, wild boars, deer, and antelopes; and ostriches are numerous on the borders of the southern desert, being hunted for their feathers.

Rivers.—The Muluya, with its tributary, the Sharef, falling into the Mediterranean; the Kos, Sebu, Oom-a-beg, Bu-Regreb, Tensift, Suse, and Assaker, into the Atlantic, and other smaller streams.

Minerals.—The Atlas mountains contain iron, tin, copper, and antimony. This last is carefully worked, being a substance extensively used in Oriental cosmetics. Mineral salt occurs throughout the empire in the greatest abundance; and, besides home consumption, makes a copious article of export to Soudan.

Manf.—Yellow, red, and green leather, of exquisite quality, silks, and the fez, or red cap, worn by Mahometans.

Commerce.—Wool, hides, leather, cattle, and sheep, are exported, the annual value of all the exports being about £1,600,000. There are coasting vessels between Tangier and Egypt. About two-thirds of the trade is carried on by British merchants.

Area.—219,000 square miles.

Pop.—5,000,000, two-thirds being Moors, the remain der Bedouin Arabs, Jews (about 340,000, much oppressed), and negroes.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—Morocco now includes the former kingdoms of Maghrib, Fez, and Tafilet. There are 28 provinces, some of considerable size, others confined to a single town. The most important towns are MOROCCO, the capital; FEZ, and TANGIER. There are altogether 24 fortified towns.

Constitution and Government.—The form of government is that of an absolute despotism, unrestricted by any laws civil or religious. The Sultan, or Emir-al-Mumenin, is of the dynasty of the Alides, or Hoseini, founded by Muley-Achmet, a descendant of the prophet, in the 17th century He is chief of the state as well as head of the religion, and master of the lives and of the property of all his subjects. As spiritual ruler, the sultan stands quite alone, his authority not being limited, as in Turkey and other countries following the religion of Mahomet, by the expounders of the Koran. He has no regular ministers, but receives advice from and carries on the executive usually through special favourites near his person, the principal of whom is generally invested with the title of "Mula-el-tesserâd," or steward of the imperial household. Each province is ruled by a Kaïd, or governor, absolute within his district, and commander of all the military forces within, but liable to instant dismissal or death at the sultan's will.

Religion and Education.—The sultan of Morocco and his subjects differ as a sectarian body from the followers of Mahomet in Turkey, Persia, and other countries by adopting as their text-book of faith the commentary upon the Koran by Sidi Beccari, the original of which is kept at the imperial palace, and deposited in time of war in a tent within the centre of the army, around which the soldiers rally as a religious and national standard. The bulk of the population is still in a state of the deepest ignorance, and even printing is almost unknown among them, the Koran and its sacred commentary existing only in written copies, the production of which occupies the lower class of teachers of religion all over the country.

History.—This is the ancient Mauritania, and was, in antiquity, a country of great importance. It has belonged successively to the Romans, Vandals, Greeks, and Arabs. In the 11th century it fell under the sway of the Fatimite caliphs, who also held power over Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli, and pushed their victorious arms into Spain. The Cherifs, who pretended to have been the lineal descendants of Mahomet, obtained power over the country in the 16th century. The sovereign of Morocco takes the title of sultan. Since the conquest of Algeria by the French, the Moroccans have frequently come into collision with the former, at whose hands they suffered a severe defeat at Isly, in 1844. In 1859, war was declared by Spain against Morocco, on account of depredations by pirates. In 1860 a treaty was signed by which the sultan ceded some portions of his dominions, granted commercial privileges, and paid a heavy indemnity.

MOROCCO, called by the natives MARAKASH, the capital of the above empire, stands in a fertile plain in the south-west of the country, near the river Tensift. It is surrounded by strong walls, with 11 gates, and, though now much depopulated and covered with the accumulated ruins of houses and gardens, still retains vestiges, however, of its former grandeur. There are 20 mosques, some particularly lofty and splendid: there are also three gardens, with splendid pavilions. The palace on the south, outside the walls, is of hewn stone, ornamented with marble, and with its gardens, enclosed by walls, occupies a space of three miles in circumference. In the city are market-places and bazaars, where a large trade is carried on. The Jews' quarter, El Maleh, is enclosed. There are remains of extensive aqueducts and large cemeteries are beyond the walls. Manf. Leather and embroidery. Pop. about 60,000. Lat. 30° 57′ N. Lon. 7° W.—This town was founded in 1072, and in the 13th century the inhabitants numbered nearly three quarters of a million.

MOROMANNO, mo-ro-man'-no, a town of Naples, in the province of Calabria, 12 miles from Castrovillari. Pop. 6,000.

MORON DE LA FRONTERA, mo'-ron-dai la fron-tai'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 37 miles S.E. of Seville. There are the remains of a very strong castle. Manf. Olive-oil. Pop. 14,879.

MOROSINI, FRANCESCO, mo-ro-se-ne, doge of Venice, and one of the bravest commanders of that republic. In 1651 he was victorious over the Turks in the Morea, for which he gained the name "Il Peloponesiaca;" and in 1667 he defended Candia against the Turks with uncommon valour during a siege of twenty-eight months, amid the admiration of the whole of Europe. The besiegers lost 120,000 men, and the Venetians about a fourth of the number. The grand vizier endeavoured to bribe him, and offered to make him prince of Wallachia and Moldavia; but Morosini was not to be corrupted. When the place surrendered, in 1669, he was treated with great honour by the victors; but, on his return to Venice, he was arrested by order of the senate; he, however, soon recovered his liberty, and was made procurator of St. Mark. The war being renewed, he resumed the command, took several places from the Turks, and gained a great naval victory near the Dardanelles. In 1688 he was elected doge.

Born at Venice, 1618; died 1694.

MOROTTU, mo-rot-tu', a town on the west coast of Ceylon, 10 miles S.E. of Colombo. It is the southern region of the limit of cinnamon cultivation in the island. Pop. 12,000.

MORPETH, mor'-peth, a market-town, municipal and parliamentary borough of Northumberland, on the Wansbeck, 15 miles N. of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Its public buildings are the town-hall, erected by Sir John Vanbrugh; the parish church, a plain Gothic building, dating from the 14th century; the county gaol; a free grammar-school, founded by Edward VI.; and a handsome county lunatic asylum. There is a large market for cattle. Manf. Flannel, leather, and iron. Malting and brewing are carried on. Pop. of municipal borough, 4,600; of parliamentary borough, 30,240. —This town was, in 1215, burnt down by its inhabitants, in order that it might not furnish quarters to King John.

MORPETH, a town of New South Wales, Australia, at the head of the navigation of the Hunter, 95 miles N. of Sydney, in the centre of a busy coal and mining district. There is a very elegant church, and good chapels. The town is the residence of the bishop of Newcastle. There are a court-house, a school of arts, and other good buildings; and wharves at which steamers load and discharge. Pop. 1,400.

MORPHEUS, mor'-fe-us, in Greek mythology, a minister of the god Somnus. He is sometimes called the god of sleep.

MORRA, mor'-ra, a town of Northern Italy, on the right bank of the Tanaro, 6 miles S.W. of Alba. There are a fine church, two monasteries, and a town-house. A trade is carried on in wine, cattle, and chestnuts. Pop. 3,600.

MORRIS, mor'-ris, a county of New Jersey, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 50,861. The capital is Morristown.

MORRIS, a county of Kansas, United States. Area, 655 square miles. Pop. 9,265. The capital is Council Grove.

MORRIS, JOHN, geologist, began life as a chemist's assistant, but devoted all his spare time to the study of geology; and he made many excursions in England, France, and Belgium. He prepared a table of organic remains, and, in 1843, published a catalogue of British fossils. Ten years later he accompanied Sir Roderick Murchison on his excursions to the Continent, and, in 1854, was elected professor of geology at University College, London. His geological treatises are of great value, and as a teacher he has a high reputation.

Born at Homerton, near London, 1810.

MORRIS, Louis, a Welsh antiquary and poet, who surveyed the coast of Wales in 1737 by order of the Admiralty board, and his work was published in 1748. Some of his poetical pieces in the Welsh language have been printed, and he left above 80 volumes of MSS. relative to Welsh antiquities.

Born in the isle of Anglesey, 1702; died in Cardiganshire, 1765.

MORRIS, Richard, brother of the above, was also a poet and critic in his native language, and superintended the printing of two valuable editions of the Welsh Bible. He was a clerk in the Navy Pay Office.

Died 1779.

MORRISANIA, a village of Westchester county, New York, United States, 10 miles N. of New York, with which it is connected by railway. There are many elegant residences, occupied by the wealthy commercial classes of New York. Pop. 20,000.

MORRISON, Rev. Robert, mor'-ri-son, a distinguished missionary to China, who was the first to preach the Protestant doctrines in that country. He was the son of humble parents, but received a fair elementary education at a school kept by his uncle at Newcastle. Between the years 1799 and 1801 he studied Hebrew, Latin, and theology, with the assistance of a Presbyterian minister of the town. The same gentleman, in 1803, furnished him with an introduction to the committee of the Independent Theological Academy in London, and he was accordingly received into their institution. In the following year he offered his services to the London Missionary Society, which being accepted, he removed to the college of that body at Gosport. In 1805, after having studied Chinese, he set sail for China, and for some time acted as translator to the East India Company's factory at Canton. During twenty-five years he remained in China, engaged in translating and disseminating the Holy Scriptures. He translated the whole of the Bible, after eight years of unremitting labour. In this task he was assisted by Dr. Milne. In 1824 he visited England, and presented to George IV. a copy of the Scriptures in Chinese. Two years afterwards he returned to the field of his labours, and continued his noble exertions until his death. Dr. Morrison and his coadjutors printed and circulated, between the years 1810—1836, upwards of 750,000 copies of works in the Chinese character. In this number were included 2,075 complete Bibles, 9,970 New Testaments, and 31,000 shorter portions of the Scriptures.

Born at Morpeth, Northumberland, 1782; died at Canton, 1834.

MORRISON, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 1,175 square miles. Pop. 5,875. The capital is Little Falls.

MORRISTOWN, a village of New Jersey, United States, on an elevated site, 27 miles W. of New York. Manf. Iron, waggons, paper, and oil. Pop. 6,000.

MORS, mors, the largest island of the Lymfiord gulf, in Denmark, province of Jutland. It is 24 miles long, by 12 broad, and rises in the centre to nearly 300 feet; fertile where it is cultivated, but about a third of it is covered by marshes. Pop. 13,500. Lat. 56° 40' N. Lon. 9° E.

MORSE, Samuel Finley Breese, morse, an artistic and scientific American, celebrated as the inventor of the United States system of telegraphs. He was the son of the Rev. Dr. Morse, a well-known writer on geography, residing in Massachusetts. Having graduated at Yale College, in 1811 he went to England to study painting, and entered of the Royal Academy of Arts, where he, two years afterwards, gained a prize for a sculpture model. He returned to America in 1815, and pursued his profession with considerable success, becoming the first president of the National Academy of Design, and professor of the arts of design in the university of New York. It was while on board ship, in 1832, returning to America after a second visit to England, that the idea of his great invention first occurred to his mind. Almost immediately after his landing in America, he commenced a series of experiments; but, having little time to give to the subject, it was not until four years afterwards that he succeeded in demonstrating his theory upon a wire half a mile in length. He exhibited his telegraph to Congress, which, in 1843, voted him 30,000 dollars to enable him to carry out his views; and, in 1844, he saw the realization of his hopes, in the perfect working of a wire 40 miles long, which had been constructed between Washington and Baltimore. More than three-fourths of the telegraphic wires in the United States are worked according to this great invention, the proceeds of which have given Mr. Morse a well-earned affluence. The New York and Newfoundland Telegraphic Company nominated him their electrician, and he was also appointed professor of natural history at Yale College. In 1856 he visited England, and was entertained at a public dinner by the directors of several telegraphic companies. A purse containing £16,000, subscribed by several European states, was presented to him.

Born 1791; died 1872.

MORSHANSK, mor-shansk', a town of European Russia, government of Tambof, on the left bank of the Tzna, a feeder of the Oka. It is an important port for the shipment of corn, and there is a large market for cattle, sheep, and melted grease. Manf. Soap and sail-cloth. Pop. 20,000.

MORTAGNE (sur-Haine), mor-tain', a town of France, department Orne, 22 miles N.E. of Alençon. It is situated on the slope and summit of a hill, the principal square being on the highest part, and approached by zigzag streets. The chief edifices are the church, the palais de justice, and large prisons: there are several fountains. Manf. Linen, thread, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 5,000.

MORTARA, mor-ta'-ra, a town of Northern Italy, province of Novara, on a height above the right bank of the Arbogna, 14 miles S.E. of Novara. The town is walled. A trade is carried on in rice, corn, and silk. Pop. 4,700.

MORTIER, Marshal. (See Treviso, Duke of.)

MORTIMER, ROGER, Earl of March, a powerful English baron, who, during fourteen years, was one of the most zealous adherents of Edward II., who nominated him his lieutenant in Ireland; but he united himself, in 1320, with the insurgent barons, who raised the standard of revolt against the king on account of his favourites the Spencers. (See EDWARD II.) Mortimer was taken, and imprisoned in the Tower of London, but contrived to escape to France. Subsequently he, with Queen Isabella, wife of Edward II., made a descent upon England with a small force, which was increased by large numbers of the English people who joined his standard. The king was taken prisoner, and afterwards assassinated in prison; his son, Edward III., being placed upon the throne, in his 14th year. During some time, Mortimer exercised absolute power in the name of the young monarch, and put to death Kent and Lancaster, the king's uncles. Edward III. at length resolved to get rid of the cruel baron, who was arrested, and hanged near Smithfield.

Born about 1287; died 1330.

MORTIMER, EDMUND, Earl, espoused Philippane, daughter of Lionel, second son of Edward III.

Born 1352; died 1381.

MORTIMER, EDMUND ROGER, son of the preceding, claimed to be heir to the crown in 1385, and left an only daughter, who married Richard of York, giving to that family a claim to the throne of England. Hence arose the wars of the Red and White Roses, between the houses of York and Lancaster.

Died 1398.

MORTON, JAMES DOUGLAS, fourth earl of, regent of Scotland, was the second son of Sir George Douglas of Pittendriech, and received his education under the famous Buchanan at Paris. He married the daughter of the Earl of Morton, and, in her right, succeeded to the title in 1553. He returned to Scotland in 1554, and greatly promoted the Reformation. In 1563 he became lord high chancellor: in a few years, however, he was compelled to relinquish the office and fly to England, for the part he took in Rizzio's murder. After a few months, Bothwell succeeded in obtaining his pardon from Queen Mary; whereupon he returned to Scotland. He soon began to take a prominent part in affairs after the imprisonment of Mary in Lochleven Castle, was restored to his office of lord chancellor, was made lord high admiral of Scotland, and, in 1572, succeeded the earl of Mar as regent, which office he resigned in 1578, his rule having made him odious to the nation. The government was then confided to James VI., who had attained his 12th year. Morton, however, was too ambitious to remain in retirement, and contrived to get possession of Stirling Castle, and also to obtain the charge of the young king. His former power had thus been secured by him; but it was only of short duration, for, being charged as accessory to the murder of Darnley, he was sent to the castle of Edinburgh, and afterwards to Dumbarton, then under the command of Lennox, father of Darnley. In 1581 he was taken to Edinburgh for trial, at which he vehemently protested his innocence of the crime with which he was charged, but was condemned to death, and beheaded by a machine much resembling the guillotine, and called the "maiden."

Born at Dalkeith, 1530; died 1581.

MORTON, JAMES DOUGLAS, Earl of, a distinguished Scotch nobleman, who, at the age of 26, established a philosophical society at Edinburgh,—a society which has since made a considerable figure in almost every branch of knowledge. The Royal Society of London elected him their president in 1733, and, on the death of the earl of Macclesfield, he was chosen an associate in the Academy of Sciences at Paris. He evinced an ardent zeal for the sciences, and was an eminent patron of merit. He was well acquainted with natural and experimental philosophy, but more particularly devoted to astronomical observations.

Born at Edinburgh, 1707; died 1768.

MORTON, JOHN, an English prelate and statesman, who was educated at Oxford, after which he became so eminent for his skill in jurisprudence as to be appointed privy councillor to Henry VI. In 1478 he was made bishop of Ely and chancellor of England by Edward IV. During the reign of Richard III. he remained out of England, but upon the accession of Henry VII. to the throne, he was nominated one of the privy council, and, in 1486, obtained the archbishopric of Canterbury. Pope Alexander VI. created him cardinal in 1493. Sir Thomas More, who was in his youth a page in Morton's household, is stated to have derived the facts of his "History of Richard III." from the cardinal archbishop. Morton was a man of the greatest ability and probity.

Born at Beer Regis, Dorsetshire, 1410; died 1500.

MORTON, THOMAS, an English dramatic writer, a native of the county of Durham, who was educated for the legal profession, but whose natural bent was for the drama. Abandoning his studies before he had been called to the bar, he gave himself entirely to play-writing, and became the most popular dramatist of his day. For his comedy of "Town and Country" he received the sum of £1,000 before the piece was placed in rehearsal. A few of his works are still occasionally performed, such as "Speed the Plough," "A Roland for an Oliver," "The Invincibles," "A Cure for the Heartache," "The School of Reform," &c.

Born 1764; died in London, 1838.

MORTON, WILLIAM THOMAS GREEN, American dentist, discoverer of ether as an anæsthetic. He began to use it in operations in 1846. Several attempts were made to obtain a national testimonial and reward, but they failed, and he died a disappointed man.

Born at Charlton, Massachusetts, 1819; died at New York, 1868.

MORTON, a new county of Dakota Territory, United States. Area, 1,100 square miles. Pop. 200.

MORTY, mor'-te, an island of the Indian archipelago, off the north-eastern end of Gillolo, from which it is separated by Morty Strait, 30 miles wide. It is 65 miles long, and from 10 to 25 broad. The island is very thinly inhabited.

MORUMBIDGEE, or MURRUMBIDGEE, mo'-rum-bid-je', a river of Australia, rising by many heads, in the county of Murray, New South Wales, and, after a course of 1,350 miles, joining the river Murray in lat. 34° 48' S., and lon., 143° E.

MOSCHELES, IGNAZ, mosh'-les, German composer, of Jewish descent, who, at 11 years of age, was a skilful pianist, and attracted the attention of Haydn and Beethoven. He rapidly attained a great reputation, and in 1820 settled in England, and was for 19 years professor in the London Royal Academy of Music, and director of the Philharmonic concerts. In 1846 he went to Leipsic as professor in the Conservatory. His compositions for the piano, violin, and other instruments are of the highest value. He translated into English Schindler's biography of Beethoven.

Born at Prague, 1794; died 1870.

MOSCHOPULUS, MANUEL, mos'-ko-pu'-lus, a Greek grammarian of the 13th century. He was a native of Crete, and wrote several treatises on grammar. His nephew Manuel was a good mathematician and antiquary. He composed a Greek lexicon, 1545.

MOSCHUS, mos'-kus, a Greek pastoral poet of antiquity, contemporary with BION. Their works are usually printed together in the Poetæ Minores.

Lived in the 3rd century, B.C.

MOSCOW, mos'-ko (Russ. MOSKWA, mosk-wa'), a government or province of European Russia, surrounded by the governments of Tver, Vladimir, Riazan, Tula, Kaluga, and Smolensk. It is for the most part a plain, but there is an elevated tract in the south-west, and the soil is not fertile, but large numbers of cattle and horses are reared.

Rivers.—The Moskva, Kliasma, and Oka, which forms part of the southern boundary.

Manf.—Woollen, cotton, and silken fabrics, brocades, chintzes, carpets, paper, gold and silver wares, porcelain, pins, and glass beads. There are quarries of yellow marble.

Area.—12,552 square miles.

Pop.—2,137,179.

MOSCOW, a city of European Russia, long the seat of the Russian government, and still the capital of the interior of that empire, on the river Moskwa, 400 miles S.E. of St. Petersburg. It covers a large area, the streets, courts, squares, and gardens being spacious. The river flows from W. to E., and traverses the city with a very serpentine course, receiving towards the middle of the town a rivulet, called the Neglina, and, soon after, the Jausa, a stream of more consequence. The centre of the city is the hill of the Kremlin, rising from the north bank of the river, nearly triangular in shape, and surrounded by a wall 60 feet high, with 18 towers and 5 gates. Around this, and extending on each side to the river is a line of boulevards planted with trees. To the east of the Kremlin is the Kitai-Gorod, or commercial city, and beyond the boulevards, extending in a semi-circle, the Beloi-Gorod, or "white city," enclosed by another fine boulevard, and still farther the Zmelnoi-Gorod. Beyond all is the outer rampart, continued on the southern side of the river, and having a total circumference of 26 miles. There are suburbs beyond the outer enclosure, especially on the north side. The streets are generally narrow and crooked, and the houses are very irregular in appearance, fine mansions and public offices alternating with huts and mean houses, but some wide and straight streets have recently been constructed, especially the Tverskaia, leading from the Kremlin in a north-western direction to the St. Petersburg road. It is three miles long, lined with good houses, some detached, with gardens, and terminating with a lofty arched gateway in the Italian style, known as the St. Petersburg gate, beyond which are extensive drives and promenades on the review ground. There are many open spaces within the city, some planted, the finest being the Romanzoff Place, laid out as an ornamental garden, with an obelisk and fountains. On the south side of the river, and stretching along the bank, are the princess Galatzin's gardens, partly occupied by the empress's villa, and farther west an eminence known as the "Sparrow hills," from which a fine view of the city is obtained. The river is crossed by a bridge, the Moskva Rekoi, leading to the Kremlin, and by three smaller bridges. The most remarkable public buildings are within the Kremlin enclosure, the chief entrance to which is by the Spass Vorata gate, over which is a picture of the Saviour, to which all who pass beneath must uncover. On the summit of the hill is the Sabernoi-Ploschad, or cathedral square, enclosed within a magnificent iron railing. The cathedral of the Assumption (Upenski Sabor) is very ornate, and has fine gilt cupolas, and the walls and pillars are covered with ugly frescoes of sacred subjects on a golden ground. In this cathedral, founded in 1325, and rebuilt in 1472, the emperors are crowned. Immediately behind the cathedral is the house of the Holy Synod, possessing a library, very rich in rare manuscripts. The church of St. Michael (Archangelski Sabor) is near the cathedral, is a heavy building, with small windows, the burial place of most of the Russian sovereigns, previous to the time of Peter the Great, who changed the royal burying-place to St. Petersburg. Over each royal tomb is a fresco portrait of the occupant. A very old church, constantly thronged with devotees, is immediately adjoining, and near at hand is the church of the Annunciation, which has a beautiful pavement inlaid with jaspers, agates, and carnelians. Within the enclosure of the Kremlin is the Terema, or old palace of the czars, consisting of four stories, which diminish in ascending, the uppermost consisting of only a single room. The main body of the palace was much injured by the French, and has now been repaired. The tower of Ivan Veliki, 270 feet high, is surmounted by a gilded dome, from which rises the cross. In each story of the tower is a great bell. Near this tower is the great bell, "Tzar Kolokal," weighing 196 tons. It is more than 19 feet high, 20 feet in diameter, was broken by a fall (the tower being burned), in 1706. It has been several times re-cast, and is now used as a chapel. Various public offices, the treasury (containing a collection of articles of great historical interest), and the arsenal, (surrounded by a trophy of 850 cannon taken from the French), are also in the Kremlin, to the east of which and between it and the Kitai-Gorod, in the Krasnoi-Ploschad, or "red place," is the cathedral of St. Basil, or Vassali, an extraordinary specimen of architecture, which has 20 towers and domes, all of different shapes and sizes, and of various hues, green, red, striped, and gilded. It is stated that Ivan the Terrible employed an Italian architect to erect the cathedral, which was to contain as many separate chapels as it would be possible to assemble under one roof, and when the building was completed the cruel czar put out the eyes of the architect, so that he might never be able to build another like it. The bazaar (an immense building of three stories) and the exchange are in the commercial city. There are two imperial palaces, the Bolshoi Dvoretz, a large palace built by the emperor Alexander, in the Kremlin, a spacious structure in the modern style, with magnificent suites of rooms, and the Maloi Dvoretz, or little palace, built by the emperor Nicholas, containing some good pictures, and a library. There are a very large number of churches in Moscow, and there are many monasteries and convents, the most noticeable of which are the Donskoi, to the south of the wall, the Seminovskoi, having the appearance of a fortification; the Devetchie at the south-west, inclosed in the windings of the river, and having walls with 16 towers, and several chapels in which empresses and princesses are interred, and near to which is the Devitchei-Foll, or "Maidens' Field," where the emperors, on their coronation, give a feast to the people, as many as 50,000 having dined there on some occasions. The Temple of the Saviour on the bank of the river, near the south-western angle of the Kremlin, begun in 1812, to commemorate the repulse of the French, but not even now completed, is planned to be a magnificent structure. The university, established in 1753 by the empress Catherine, is attended by about 1,500 students, nearly half belonging to the medical faculty, and has a large library, observatory, and botanical garden. The public museum and library, removed from St. Petersburg in 1861, is located in a palace, formerly the residence of the Pashkof family. It contains about 175,000 volumes, and some very valuable Slavonic MSS., and attached to it are galleries for pictures and sculptures. The first stone of a great historical exhibition was laid by the czar and the duke of Edinburgh in September, 1865. There are several large hospitals, among them a foundling hospital, on the bank of the river, near the commercial city, where infants are received and no questions asked, and several thousand children are supported by it; two theatres, and a riding school, which is the largest building in the world having a roof unsupported by pillars. There is also a large post-office. Moscow is divided into 28 districts for administrative purposes, and is under the charge of a general and military governor. The city is now lighted with gas, and there is railway communication with St. Petersburg, Nijni-Novgorod, and Koslov. Visitors have their attention attracted by the immense number of pigeons seen. One writer remarks that "near the grain and flour markets there are thousands of them, and toward evening the roofs are black with them. The gilded domes and roof of the Kremlin seem to be also particularly dear to these birds, and if you go down to the river about an hour before sunset, and lean over the parapet of the bridge, you will see countless numbers darting and wheeling about the palace spire. They are looked on as the incarnate symbol of the Holy Ghost, and a Russian would almost as soon think of becoming a cannibal as of eating a pigeon.

Manf. and Commerce.—The most important manufactures are woollen, cotton, and silk fabrics, leather, metal work, and chemicals. A very extensive trade is carried on,—the central position of the city making it an entrepôt for the commerce of the empire, and there being good water communication with the Baltic, Black Sea, and the Caspian; by railway with the capital and other important towns, and in winter by sledges, of which many thousands are employed for the Asiatic trade.

Lat. 55° 4′ N. Lon. 37° 33′ E.

History.—Moscow was founded in the middle of the 12th century, previous to which Kiov, or Kiev, was the residence of the sovereigns of Russia. In 1571 it was burned by the Tartars, and in 1610 was taken by the Poles. In 1703, Peter the Great transferred his residence to St. Petersburg, and, in 1812, it was occupied by the French, after the battle of Borodino. It was set on fire, and the French were forced to make their disastrous retreat.

MOSDOK, mos'-dok, a town of Russia, province of Caucasus, on a height above the Terek, 63 miles S.E. of Georgievsk. It is only accessible on two sides, and is strongly fortified. There are a Greek, an Armenian, and a Roman Catholic church. Manf. Morocco leather and brandy. Pop. 13,000.

MOSE, or MOOL, mose, an island of the Asiatic Archipelago, 20 miles in circumference. Lat. 6° 20′ S. Lon. 131° 30′ E.

MOSELLE, mo'-sel'. (See MEURTHE-ET-MOSELLE.)

MOSELLE, a large river of Europe, rising in the S.E. department of the Vosges, France, near the sources of the Saône, 2,260 feet above the sea level, and, after a course of 330 miles, joining the Rhine at Coblentz. The chief tributaries are the Meurthe, the Seille, and the Sarre, on the right, and the Orne, the Sure, and the Kyll on the left.

MOSER, GEORGE MICHAEL, mo'-ser, a gold-chaser and painter on enamel, who went from Switzerland to London at an early age, became celebrated for his artistic productions, and painted on a watch-case for George III., portraits of the prince of Wales and the bishop of Osnaburg. He was appointed keeper of the Royal Academy of Arts, being the first that held the office. Sir Joshua Reynolds states that he was unrivalled as a gold-chaser, and that his knowledge in every branch of painting and sculpture was universal.
Born in Switzerland, 1704; died 1783.

Born 1744; died 1819.

MOSES, mo'-ses ("drawn out" of the water), the Jewish lawgiver, and leader of the "exodus" of the Jewish people from Egypt, was the son of Amram and Jochebed, and was of the tribe of Levi. The story of his life is related in the books of Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, in the Old Testament, and of those books (with the exception of a portion of the last chapter of Deuteronomy, in which his death is described), he is supposed to have been the author. He was "learned in all the wisdom of Egypt," and, although he lived to the great age of 120, we are expressly told that even in his extreme old age "his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated." He was buried in the land of Moab, the exact place being a profound secret.
Born 1571, B.C.; died 1451, B.C.

MOSES, MICOSTI, a Spanish rabbi, who published, at Venice, a folio volume entitled "The Great Book of Precepts," which is explanatory of the Hebrew laws.
Lived in the 14th century.

MOSHEIM, JOHANN LORENZ VON, mos'-hime, a learned German divine and historian, who studied at Kiel, and in 1723 became professor of divinity at Helmstedt, and in 1747 at Gottingen, where he was afterwards chancellor of the university. He translated Cudworth's "Intellectual System of the Universe" into Latin, with learned notes; but his greatest work is the "Ecclesiastical History," written in Latin, which has been translated into English, and is well known to students of history and theology. Mosheim also wrote, among many other works of great learning and value, nine volumes on "The Morals of Holy Scripture."
Born at Lubeck, 1694; died 1755.

MOSSEL BAY, a seaport of Cape Colony, South Africa, 270 miles E. of Cape Town. There is good anchorage. Pop. 1,200.

MOSKVA, or MOSKWA, mosk-wa', a river of Russia, rising in the government of Smolensk, traversing the government of Moscow, and, after a course of 210 miles, falling into the Oka, at Colomna.

MOSQUITO COAST, mos-ke'-to, a maritime district of Central America, lying along part of the northern and eastern shore of Honduras, and forming a part of the republic of Nicaragua. It is mountainous in the interior, but elsewhere fertile and well watered. The coast is low, with many bays and lagunes. There are large swamps and dense forests furnishing valuable timber. The climate is temperate and not unhealthy for Europeans, but the rainfall is heavy. Sugar, cacao, indigo, cotton, rice, maize, logwood, and vanilla are cultivated. The chief exports are mahogany, cocoa, sarsaparilla, ginger, and tortoise-shell. There are large numbers of half-wild horses and cattle, deer abound, and there are many alligators and serpents. The capital is Bluefields.

Rivers.—The chief are the Rio Segovia and the Rio Escondido, both flowing into the Caribbean Sea.

Area.—15,000 square miles.

Pop.—15,000, chiefly aboriginal races, but including cross breeds with runaway negroes. The chief occupations are hunting and fishing, but cattle-breeding is attended to.

History.—The coast was discovered by Columbus in 1502, and claimed, but never occupied, by Spain. The king put himself, in 1660, under the protection of the British. In 1848 the Nicaraguans attacked the Mosquito subjects in San Juan; but they were defeated by a British force, and, in 1850, forced to retire from the territory by means of a treaty with the British, who exercised a protectorate until 1859, when it was ceded to Honduras; but by another treaty in 1860, the whole territory was handed over to Nicaragua.

MOSS, a seaport of Norway, on the bay of Christiania, 32 miles S. of the town of that name. There is a good harbour, and deals and iron are exported. Iron mines are in the vicinity. Pop. 3,200.

MÖSSINGEN, me(r)s'-ing-en, a town of Wurtemberg, circle of Schwarzwald, 7 miles S.E. of Rottenburg. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 4,500.

MOSTAGANEM, mos-ta-gan'-em, a town of Algeria, near the Mediterranean, 47 miles N.E. of Oran. The town is divided into two portions, separated by a valley with gardens. There are strong military works. Manf. Carpets, coverlets, woollens, and jewellery. Pop. 13,000, of whom about 3,000 are French.

MOSTAR, mos-tar', an inland town of European Turkey, capital of the Herzegovina, on both banks of the Narenta, 60 miles from Ragusa. It has embattled walls, 30 mosques, a Greek church, and an old Roman bridge, consisting of a single arch, with a span of 95 feet. Manf. Sword-blades and arms. Exp. Hides, wool, silk, fruit, wax, and cattle. Pop. 18,000.

MOSUL, mo'-sul, a large town of Asiatic Turkey, province of Al-Jezireh (the ancient Mesopotamia), on the right bank of the Tigris, 180 miles N. of Bagdad, opposite the ruins of Nineveh. It is surrounded by walls. It was formerly a very flourishing town, and its manufactures were known in all the markets of Western Europe. It is supposed that the name of muslin was derived from this town. The trade has much declined in consequence of the opening of new routes to the East, but the town is still an important station for caravans. The chief buildings are, a college, the tomb of Sheik Abdul Kassim, and the remains of a beautiful mosque, the minaret of which has a fine appearance from a distance. The coffee-houses, baths, khans, and bazaars, are also handsome buildings. Pop. 45,000, about one-fourth of whom are Nestorians and other Christians.

MOTHE LE VAYER, FRANCIS DE LA, le(r)-vai'-yai, historiographer of France during the reign of Louis XIV. He also completed the education of that monarch. He was one of the first members of the French Academy, and obtained several advantageous posts. His works were collected and published at Dresden in 1759.

Born at Paris, 1588; died 1672.

MOTHERWELL, muth'-er-wel, a town of Lanarkshire, Scotland, 11 miles S. E. of Glasgow. There are valuable coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 12,904 rapidly increasing.—A station on the Caledonian railway.

MOTHERWELL, WILLIAM, Scotch poet, whose earlier years were passed in the office of the sheriff clerk of Renfrew. In 1828 he became editor of the Paisley Advertiser, and, in 1830, of the Glasgow Courier. He published selections from the Renfrewshire poets, with biographical notices, "Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern," and some exquisitely tender poems, among them "Jeanie Morison," of almost unsurpassed beauty and pathos.

Born at Glasgow, 1797; died 1835.

MOTLEY, JOHN LOTHROP, mot'-le, a modern American historian, descended from a family which emigrated to New England about the middle of the last century. A maternal ancestor, the Rev. John Lothrop, was one of the Pilgrim Fathers, and settled in Massachusetts in 1634. The future historian was sent to Harvard University in 1827, at which time he had attained his 13th year. Leaving that establishment four years afterwards, he spent two or three years at the universities of Gottingen and Berlin. A course of continental travel, which embraced Germany, France, Italy, Switzerland, and England, succeeded. After his return to his native country he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1837, but devoted himself to study and to literary pursuits, the fruits of which were a number of articles contributed to the "North American Review," and other periodicals. He likewise produced some works of fiction. In 1840 he was appointed secretary to the American embassy at St. Petersburg, but soon resigned. Conceiving the idea of composing a history of the great struggle in which the provinces of the Netherlands threw off the Spanish yoke, he again visited Europe, settled with his family at Dresden, in the first instance, and subsequently resided, during three or four years, in Germany and the Netherlands. The first instalment of this great undertaking was given to the world in 1856, under the title of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic, a History." This work was brought out simultaneously in London and New York. It passed through several editions, both in England and America, and was reproduced at Amsterdam and at Leipzic. M. Guizot translated it into the French language; and there was, besides, a French version of it published in Brussels. A German and a Dutch translation were also made. A continuation, "The History of the United Netherlands, from the Death of William the Silent to the Synod of Dort." In 1861, Mr. Motley was appointed American ambassador at Vienna, and, in 1869, in England, but was recalled a year afterwards. In 1874 he published a biography of John of Barneveldt, including a history of the Thirty Years' War. He received the degrees of LL.D. and D.C.L.

Born at Dorchester, Mass., 1814; died 1877.

MOTRIL, mo-tril', a town of Spain, province of Grenada, 2 miles from the sea, and 35 miles S. of Grenada. It is the depôt for the exports and imports of the provinces of Grenada and Jaen. Manf. Rum, soap, pottery, coarse cloth, and oil. Pop. 16,665, chiefly engaged in fishing and agriculture.

MOTTA, mot'-ta, a town of Northern Italy, on the right bank of the Livenza, 28 miles N.E. of Venice. Manf. Linen and hats. Pop. 4,700.

MOTTE, ANTOINE HOUDAR DE LA. (See LAMOTTE.)

MOTTEUX, PETER ANTONY, mot'-te(r), a French writer. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he visited England, became a merchant, and was afterwards employed in the post-office. He was a master of the English language, and assisted in translating "Don Quixote" into English.

Born at Rohan, Normandy, 1660; died in London, 1718.

MOTTE-SERVOLEX, mot-sair-vo-lai', a town of France, department Savoie, 4 miles N.W. of Chambery. There is a trade in dairy produce, and there are limestone quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,700.

MOTTEVILLE, FRANÇOISE BERTAUT DE, mot'-veel, a French lady, who was attendant on Anne of Austria, whose memoirs she wrote. Her work is valuable for its information relative to the private life of the queen, and for its anecdotes of the Fronde.

Born in Normandy, about 1621; died 1689.

MOULIN, CHARLES DU, moo'-la, French writer on jurisprudence, who, on account of an impediment in his speech, quitted the bar, and applied himself to the composition of several legal works, which procured him the title of the Justinian of France. Being a Protestant, the people of Paris pillaged his house in 1552; on which he went to Basle, whence he removed to several other places. On his return to Paris, in 1564, he was thrown into prison for some reflections made by him on the council of Trent. At the solicitation of the queen of Navarre, he obtained his liberty. He subsequently embraced the Roman Catholic faith.

Born at Paris, 1500; died 1566.

MOULIN, PETER DU, French Protestant divine, who, after studying at Leyden, became minister at Charenton. In 1615 he visited England, and James I. gave him a prebend in the cathedral of Canterbury. He afterwards went to Sedan, where he was appointed professor of divinity, and was regarded as the chief minister of the Protestant faith in France. Among other works, he composed the "Anatomy of Arminianism," in Latin; "Treatise on the Keys of the Church;" "The Capuchin, or the History of the Monks;" "The Novelty of Popery;" and "A Defence of the Reformed Churches."

Born at Buhi, France, 1568; died at Sedan, 1658.

MOULIN, PETER DU, son of the preceding, was chaplain to Charles II., and prebendary of Canterbury. He wrote a "Defence of the Protestant Religion," and several other theological works.

Born in France, 1600; died at Canterbury, 1684.

MOZAMBIQUE, mo-zam-beek', a territory on the east coast of South Africa, nominally belonging to Portugal, which, however, exercises only a limited authority, except in a few stations. The limits inland are very uncertainly defined, but along the coast it extends from lat. 10° 41' S. to 26° S., from Cape Delgado to Delagoa Bay. It is divided by the Zambesi river into two portions, Mozambique proper on the north, and Sofala on the south. It is level and fertile near the coast, but mountainous in the interior. The climate is unhealthy, on account of the swamps near the shore, the heat is excessive, and the rainy season lasts from November to March. Wheat, maize, rice, manioc, sugar, indigo, and coffee are cultivated; ivory, hides, and horns are articles of trade, gold and copper are worked, and the forests yield valuable ornamental timber. The fisheries are productive; diving for pearls is successfully carried on, and gold-dust, gums, amber, tortoise-shell and grain are exported. The chief settlements are MOZAMBIQUE, QUILIMANE, SENA, and TETE.

Area.—About 283,500 square miles.
Pop.—350,000.
History.—The Portuguese settled here in 1497, and for many years carried on the slave trade with vigour; but during the last 30 years it has been discouraged.

MOZAMBIQUE, the capital of the Portuguese possessions in Africa, and of a small coral island of the same name on the east coast of Africa. It is large and well fortified, having a strong citadel to defend the harbour. It belongs to the Portuguese, who have generally a good garrison here, and trade with the natives for gold, elephants' teeth, and slaves. They have built a palace for the governor, a custom-house, several churches and monasteries, and a large hospital for sick sailors. The harbour is very commodious. Pop. 8,500, of whom about 7,000 are slaves. Lat. 15° 2' S. Lon. 40° 10' E.

MOZAMBIQUE CHANNEL, a strait of the Indian Ocean, between the east coast of Africa and the island of Madagascar. It is narrowest in the middle, where it is 240 miles over, and has a length of about 1,000 miles. At the northern extremity are the Comoro Islands.

MOZART, JOHANN CHRYSOSTOM WOLFGANG AMADEUS, mo-zart', German musical composer. He received his first instructions from his father, who was sub-director of the archiepiscopal chapel at Salzburg; and his genius was so great that he played the clavichord, and composed various pieces of music when only four years old, and, when six years, he played before the emperor Francis I., who called him "the little sorcerer." In the following year the youthful prodigy went with his father and sister (also a musical prodigy) upon a European tour. They visited Paris, where the child played upon the organ before the whole French court: there he also gave concerts, and published his two first works before he had completed his eighth year. In 1764 he went to London, where he exhibited his talents before the royal family, and passed through the ordeal in a most triumphant manner. Before leaving London, in 1765, Mozart composed, and dedicated to the queen, six sonatas. After visiting the Hague, and going a second time to Paris, Mozart and his father returned to Salzburg in 1768, in which year he composed music for a religious service at the dedication of the Orphan House Church at Vienna, and conducted it in the presence of the imperial court. At 13 he became director of the archbishop of Salzburg's concerts. He shortly afterwards visited Rome, where the pope bestowed upon him the order of the Golden Spur. At the age of 14 he composed the opera of "Mithridates," which was publicly performed at Milan, and continued to produce works in almost every class of music. In 1779 he took up his residence at Vienna, where he was appointed composer to the imperial camp, and, in the following year, was captivated by the charms of Mdlle. Constance Weber, an amiable lady and celebrated singer. He made a proposal of marriage to her, which was declined by the family of the lady, on the ground that his reputation was not sufficiently established. Upon this Mozart composed his "Idomeneo," and to Mdlle. Weber was assigned the principal part in the opera. It was received with enthusiasm, the composer was acknowledged to be the greatest of all musicians, and the hand of the lady upon whom his affections were fixed rewarded his efforts. In 1786 he produced his famous "Nozze di Figaro," and, in the following year, his chef-d'œuvre,—"Don Giovanni," which latter was coldly received by the Viennese; Mozart, declared, however, that he had written the opera to please himself and his friends, and the subsequent enthusiasm when the work was produced at Prague amply compensated him. "Die Zauberflöte" (the magic flute), was given to the world in 1791, and, in the same year, "La Clemenza di Tito" was first sung, during the coronation festival of Leopold II. Considerable space would be required for the bare enumeration of this great musician's masses, vocal pieces, symphonies, quintets, quartets, &c. His sublime "Requiem" (said to have been ordered by a mysterious stranger) was written on his deathbed. Nature, so bountiful of her intellectual gifts, had denied to Mozart physical strength; he was small and weak in body, and with a delicate constitution.

Born at Salzburg, 1756; died at Vienna, 1791.

MOZDOK, moz'-dok, a town and fortress of Asiatic Russia, government of the Caucasus, on the right bank of the Terek, 148 miles N.W. of Tiflis. It is built of wood, and inclosed by gardens. Pop. 11,000.

MÜLLER, FREDERICK PALUDAN, Danish poet, son of a parish priest who afterwards became bishop of Aarhuus. He studied at the cathedral school of Odense and the university of Copenhagen, and at the age of 23 published romances and a romantic comedy. A year afterwards he produced a poem, "The Dancer," which at once brought him into prominence. Several other poems followed, and, having travelled in various parts of Europe, he published, in 1841, his great satirical epic, "Adam Homo," followed by various poems exhibiting great elegance, tenderness, and occasionally sublimity of conception.

Born at Kjerleminde, Seeland, 1809; died at Copenhagen, 1876.

MÜLLER, FREDRICH MAX, philologist and Oriental scholar, son of the librarian of the ducal library of Anhalt-Dessau, was educated at Dessau and Leipsic, and afterwards studied Sanskrit at Berlin and Paris. In 1846 he came to England, and was engaged by the East India Company to edit the Rig-Veda, which appeared in four volumes, printed at the university of Oxford, in 1849, 1853, 1856, and 1863. In 1850 he was appointed deputy Taylorian professor of modern languages at Oxford, and succeeded to the professorship in 1854. He received the degree of LL.D. from Cambridge and Edinburgh, and is a foreign member of the French Institute. Besides translating and editing works from the Sanskrit, he has produced works on comparative mythology, the science of language, the "Science of Religion," "Chips from a German Workshop," a history of Sanskrit literature, and other works and lectures displaying profound erudition united with a most attractive style. No other writer or professor has done so much to stimulate the study of Oriental literature in this country.

Born at Dessau, 1823.

MÜLLER, GEORGE, philanthropist. He graduated at the university of Halle, came to England at the age of 24, and a year afterwards became minister of a small Independant chapel at Teignmouth. He soon refused to receive any salary, determined not only to obtain a supply for his wants, but for carrying out works of piety and charity, by prayer alone. In 1836 he determined to establish an orphanage at Bristol, where he had settled as a pastor, and money flowed in abundantly, although he never solicited a shilling, but trusted entirely to the power of prayer. The results have been of the most marvellous description. According to a statement published in 1874, he had received since 1830 £617,000, by which 38,000 children had been taught in schools, in Great Britain, Spain, Italy, India, and British Guiana, 467,000 Bibles and Testaments had been distributed, 50,000,000 tracts circulated, 4,418 orphans brought up, and 190 missionaries supported. The fine orphan houses at Bristol were erected at a cost of £115,000.

Born at Kroppenstädt, Prussia, 1805.

MÜLLER, GERARD FREDERICK, a German historian and traveller, who went to Russia in early life, as a teacher of history and geography. Having gained the favour of the empress Catherine, he became historiographer, member of the Academy of St. Petersburg, and conservator of the Russian archives. He was charged with several scientific expeditions, and accompanied Gmelin, in 1733-43, to Siberia. He was the author of "Memoirs towards the History of Russia," and "Travels and Discoveries in Russia."

Born in Germany, 1705; died in Russia, 1783.

MÜLLER, JOHANN, German physiologist. He began to study for the Catholic priesthood, but in 1819 turned his attention to medicine, and took his degree of doctor in medicine at the university of Bonn, in 1822. In 1830 he became professor of physiology and anatomy at the same place, exchanging to Berlin three years afterwards. In 1833 he published his great work, "The Physiology of Man," which was soon afterwards translated into French and English. His later writings, embracing every subject in comparative anatomy and physiology, have been chiefly published in his own journal, devoted to physiology, &c., which he conducted since its establishment, in 1834.

Born at Coblentz, 1801; died 1858.

MÜLLER, JOHANN, Swiss historian, who studied at Göttingen, in 1782 was chosen professor of Greek at Schaffhausen, in 1781 was appointed professor of statistics at Cassel, and, in 1786, became librarian and councillor of state to the elector of Mainz. In 1800 he received the appointment of first keeper of the imperial library at Vienna. In 1806, after the battle of Jena, Müller saw Napoleon at Berlin, and seemed to have been overcome by the attentions paid to him by the emperor. In 1807 he received from his new patron the post of secretary of state for the new kingdom of Westphalia, and, in the following year, became director of public instruction, zealously discharging these duties until his death, which soon followed. His chief works were "Histoire Universelle," "History of the Swiss Confederation," an invaluable book, which was written in German.

Born at Schaffhausen, Switzerland, 1752; died at Cassel, 1809.

MÜLLER, JOHANN. (See REGIOMONTANUS.)

MÜLLER, KARL OTFRIED, mu(r)l'-ler, German archæologist, and one of the greatest scholars of modern times. After completing his education at Breslau and Berlin, he became a teacher at the Magdalenum at Breslau, and in 1819 was appointed professor of archæology at Göttingen, whereupon he applied himself to a searching investigation of the principles of antique art, and visited collections in Germany, France, and England in furtherance of the same design. The ancient myths of Greece had a peculiar attraction for him. The nature of his later studies will be seen by the enumeration of a few of his great works,—"Manual of the History of Ancient Art," a "History of Greek Literature" (this was written for the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, and was left unfinished at the author's death); "The Dorians," which was a history of the religion, manners, and politics of one of the Greek races; "The Etruscans;" and an edition of the "Eumenides" of Æschylus.

Born at Brieg, Silesia, 1797; died at Athens, 1841.

MÜLLER, OTTO FREDERIK, a Danish naturalist, and one of the most original observers of the 18th century. After travelling in various countries as tutor to a Danish nobleman, he returned to Copenhagen in 1767, and married a lady of considerable property; whereupon he devoted his life to scientific pursuits. He was appointed by Frederick V. of Denmark, to continue the publication of the "Flora" of his native country, and, in 1779, he commenced a corresponding work on the Zoology of Denmark, but only lived to complete two parts. Müller also made researches relative to the minute animals, and published several treatises thereon, which Cuvier declared entitled their author to a "place in the first rank of those naturalists who have enriched science with original observations."

Born at Copenhagen, 1730; died 1784.

MÜLLER, WILLIAM JOHN, an English artist, of German descent, who made several long tours in Greece, Egypt, and Turkey, and painted a number of remarkable pictures, illustrative of Oriental life and scenery, but was overtaken by a severe illness, the result of the great mental labour he had undergone.

Born at Bristol, 1812; died 1845.

MULLINGAR, mul-lin-gar', the county town of Westmeath, Ireland, 50 miles N.W. of Dublin. It has a parish church, a Roman Catholic cathedral, and a barracks. Several important horse and cattle fairs are held. Pop. 4,787.—A station on the Midland Great Western Railway.

MULREADY, WILLIAM, mul-red'-e, a modern painter, of Irish birth, who evinced a taste for art in his earliest youth, and was accordingly sent, at the age of 15, to study at the Royal Academy, London. After some ineffectual attempts at the classic and high historic branches of his art, he fortunately acted upon the advice given to students by Sir Joshua Reynolds, and proceeded to make a diligent investigation of the methods pursued by the greatest masters of the Dutch school. In 1808 he exhibited at the Royal Academy a "Carpenter's Shop and Kitchen," and the "Music Lesson." Other paintings of a similar character followed; and, in 1815, his style was fixed and his fame established, by the production, among other works, of "Idle Boys," which, moreover, secured his election as an associate of the Royal Academy. In the following year he exhibited "The Fight interrupted," and became R.A. From this period down to the year 1852, Mulready continued to produce works of the very highest excellence, all, from first to last, characterised by the same soberness of effect, the same breadth and simplicity of treatment, the same truth of drawing and mellowness of colour.

Born at Ennis, Ireland, 1786; died 1863.

MULTNOMAH, mult'-no-ma, a county of Oregon, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 25,203, including about 500 Chinese. The capital is Portland.

MUMMIUS, LUCIUS ACHAICUS, mum'-mi-us, a Roman consul, who, for his victories over the Achæans, was called Achaicus. He destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, and sent the treasures of art these cities contained to Rome; but was so ignorant of the value of the works of the most celebrated artists of Greece, found at Corinth, that he is stated to have told those who conveyed them to Rome, that if they lost or injured them, they should make others in their stead.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

MUNCH, PETER ANDREAS, moonch, a Norwegian antiquary and philologist, who received his early education under his father, at Skien, and afterwards passed to the university of Christiana, where, in 1834, he underwent his examination in jurisprudence. The bent of his genius was, however, towards history and philology; and on his obtaining the appointment of professor of history at the university of Christiana, he devoted himself to an elucidation of the ancient history and languages of Norway and the North. He paid visits to England, Scotland, and Rome, to trace out the vestiges of the ancient Norsemen, either in books or in the customs of the people who are descended from those old sea-rovers. Professor Munch has written extensively, his most important works being "Historical and Geographical Description of the Kingdom of Norway during the Middle Ages," and "History of the Norwegian People." In the translated edition of the Transactions of the Northern Antiquarian Society, many articles by him are to be found: of these, the most interesting to English people is, perhaps, that entitled "Geographical Elucidations of the Scottish and Irish Local Names occurring in the Sagas." He has likewise written, for the use of schools, a "History of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark;" and has collected a series of entertaining stories from Norwegian history.

Born at Christiana, 1810; died at Rome, 1863.

MUNCHAUSEN, GERLACH ADOLPHE, Baron von, mu(r)n-chou'-sen, a Hanoverian statesman, who was, during 37 years, privy councillor to the electors of that kingdom. He had a principal share in founding the university of Göttingen, in which seat of learning he held the office of curator, and established professorships of political science, history, and geography. The Royal Society of Sciences of Göttingen was also much indebted to his liberality.

Born at Hanover, 1688; died 1770.

MUNCHAUSEN, HIERONYMUS KARL FRIEDRICH, Baron von, served in the Russian cavalry against Turkey from 1737 to 1739. He was so addicted to bragging of his wonderful exploits, that a collection of stories, more or less founded upon his adventures, was published in London by Rudolph Raspe, a German, in 1785, and a second series, including many burlesque stories, some of considerable antiquity, was published at Oxford in 1786. The name Munchausen has become proverbial, and expressive of extravagant fiction.

Born in Hanover, 1720; died 1797.

MÜNCHBERG, mu(r)nsh'-bairg, a town of Bavaria, or Upper Franconia, on the Pulsnitz, 18 miles N.E. of Baireuth. Manf. Linen and cotton. Pop. 3,500.

MÜNCHEBERG, a town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, 20 miles N.W. of Frankfort. Pop. 3,500.

MUNCHEN. (See MUNICH.)

MUNCHENGRATZ, moon'-chen-gratz, a town of Bohemia, on the Iser, 8 miles from Jung Bunzlau. There is here a castle, where the emperors of Austria and Russia and the king of Prussia met, in 1833. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and linens. Pop. 3,500.

MUNDEN, moon'-den, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, at the confluence of the Fulda and Werra, 14 miles S.W. of Göttingen. It has Calvinist and Lutheran churches, a synagogue, and an old castle, once the residence of the ancestors of the royal family of Great Britain. There is a harbour, and considerable trade is carried on. Manf. Earthenware, leather, brandy, and tobacco. Pop. 4,700.

MUNEEPOOR or MUNIPOOR, mu-ne-poor', a town of British India, formerly capital of Cassay. (See CASSAY). It was once a place of considerable importance, but is now in a ruinous condition. Lat. 24° 20′ N. Lon. 94° 30′ E.

MUNEEPOOR. (See CASSAY).

MUNGO ST, mun'-go, the popular name of St. Kentigern, said to have been the son of a British princess. He established a monastery at Caithness, near Glasgow, and was one of the three great missionaries of the Christian faith in Scotland. He was driven from Scotland and settled in Wales, where he founded the bishopric of St. Asaph. He was recalled to Scotland, where he died, and was buried on the spot where the cathedral of Glasgow now stands.

Born 514; died 607.

MUNGO PARK. (See PARK, MUNGO.)

MUNICH, (Germ. MUNCHEN) mu'nik, capital of Bavaria, on the left bank of the Iser, 194 miles S.E. of Frankfort, on a plain 1700 feet above the sea level. It consists of an old town, once surrounded by fortifications, which have been demolished, although some of the gates remain; a new and very beautiful town, the Maximilian's Vorstadt on the north and west, and three suburbs, Au, Haidhausen and Ober-Giesing. On the western side of the old town is a broad semicircular road, from the Sendlinger gate, where is an open place, at the south-west angle to the large Maximilian Platz, or open place, at the Neue Thor (new gate) on the north-west. The road is named Sonnen Strasse and Karls Platz. From this street at Karls Thor (gate), Neuhausen Strasse and a continued line of thoroughfare cross the city to Isar Thor (gate), on the eastern side, near the river; and from Maximilian's Platz, a new and handsome road, Maximilian's Strasse also crosses the city in an eastern direction to the new bridge over the Isar leading to the suburb of Haidhausen. Another main line of thoroughfare, Sendlinger Strasse, runs in a north-eastern direction from Sendlinger Thor Platz to Haupt Platz, on the Neuhasser Strasse line of road, and is continued beyond that, under the names of Wein Strasse and Theatner Strasse, in a more northerly direction, opening out into a broad new street, Ludwig's Strasse. On the southern side the limits of the city are marked by the Blumen Strasse, leading from the Sendlinger Platz, the river is crossed by three principal bridges, and others connecting some small islands with the banks. In the old town the houses are generally irregular and quaint in style, and the streets are narrow and winding; but the new town, laid out chiefly under the superintendence of the late King Louis I., is one of the finest in Europe. There are two circular open spaces, the Carolinen Platz and the Steighmair Platz, farther west, from which issue broad, regular streets, forming large parallelograms. The principal squares and streets are adorned with statues of Bavarian monarchs, and there are also public monuments of Goethe, Schiller, Gluck, Kaulbach, and Liebig. In the old town are the cathedral (Frauen Kirche), a brick building of great size, built in the latter half of the 15th century, with two square towers 333 feet high, surmounted by cupolas, and with 30 large decorated windows; St. Michael's, or Jesuit Church, in the Italian style; St. Peter's, the oldest church in the city; and the Theatner Kirche, completed in 1767, containing the tombs of the royal family. In Karl's Strasse in the new town is the church of St. Boniface, a round church in the Byzantine style, adorned with beautiful frescoes in the interior, and generally considered one of the most beautiful churches in Germany; and in the north-eastern district in the Ludwig's Strasse is the church of St. Lewis (Ludwig's Kirche), completed in 1842, and beyond the river in the Au suburb is the Maria Hilf Kirche, in pure Gothic style, with 19 painted windows, and in the Giesing suburbs, a noble cruciform church in the Gothic style. The Royal Palace, in the northern part of the old town, consisting of two parts, the old and the new, the latter the Königsbau, a beautiful edifice, after the model of the Petti Palace of Florence, containing magnificent saloons and apartments, decorated with paintings illustrating the classical and German poets, a room to each. There are also two "halls of beauties," with portraits of the most beautiful women of modern times. There are two other palaces, the Wittelsbach and the Leuchtenberg. The Glyptothek, or Gallery of Sculpture, in the new town—the Pinakothek, or Picture Gallery; the Ludwig-Maximilian University, with a large library, museum, and observatory, a new and magnificent Academy of Art, and the large Jesuits' College in the Ludwig's Strasse are the most important of the various art and literary institutions for which the town is famous. In the Carolinen-Platz is an obelisk made from the cannon taken from the Russians in 1812, and erected to the memory of the 30,000 Bavarians engaged in that campaign. About half-a-mile from the Sendlinger Gate is the colossal statue of Bavaria, in copper, 60 feet high, and standing on a pedestal 40 feet high, on the summit of a hill, in front of the Rumeshalle (hall of fame), which consists of a large Doric portico of Bavarian marble, forming three sides of a quadrangle, and with 48 columns with busts of eminent Bavarians. The Holfgarten, near the royal palace, is a large square inclosure, with a plantation, and surrounded by an ornamental arcade, and near it is a large public park, laid out in the English style.

Manf.—Articles of furniture, tapestry, gold, wine, pianofortes, mathematical, optical, and surgical instruments, musical instruments, carriages, leather, paper, cards, pencils, snuff, &c. There are royal bronze foundries, where many famous statues have been cast.
Pop.—260,005.
Lat. 48° 8′ N. Lon. 11° 36′ E.
History.—Munich was founded in 962 as a depository for salt, the warehouses belonging to monks, from whom the name was derived. It was walled by Otho IV. in 1157, and taken by the Swedes in 1632.

MUNIGOO, moo-ni-goo', a semi-independent province in the north-western part of Bornou, Central Africa. It is of a triangular shape, projecting from Nigritia to the borders of Sahara. The people are industrious and have large herds of camels, horses, and cattle. The chief town is Guré, situated in the midst of cotton plantations and gardens.

MUNKACS, or MUKATSOVO, moon-katch', a market town of Hungary, 70 miles S.E. of Kaschau. There are a Protestant, a Roman Catholic, and a Greek church, a synagogue, a monastery, and an old castle. Manf. Hosiery, iron, and saltpetre. In the neighbourhood are mines of crystal, called Hungarian diamonds. Pop. 7,400.—In 1687, after a siege of three years, the town was taken by the imperialists.

MÜNNICH, CHRISTOPH BURKHARD, Count de, me(r)'-nik, a German general in the service of Russia, who at first distinguished himself as an officer of engineers, under Prince Eugene. Peter the Great invited him to Russia, where he constructed the Ladoga canal. After terminating this great enterprise he was loaded with honours, and created field-marshal and privy councillor. At the head of the Russian troops, he defeated the Poles and Turks, in 1737, and made himself master of Perekop, Otchakow, and Choczim. He subsequently became prime minister; in which capacity he came into collision with Biren, who had been appointed regent, in accordance with the will of Anna Ivanovna, the late empress, whose favourite he had been. (See BIREN.) Marshal Münnich was at first successful over his rival, and Biren was banished to Siberia; but, upon the accession of the empress Elizabeth, Münnich was in turn sent into exile, in 1742, and remained in Siberia during twenty years. He was recalled by Peter III., upon his accession, and appeared at court in the sheepskin dress, which he used to wear in Siberia. The emperor restored him to his former rank, and he enjoyed the favour of Peter and Catherine until his death.

Born in Oldenburgh, 1683; died at Riga, 1767.

MUNOZ, FERNANDO, mun-noth', a Spanish soldier of low birth, who, while serving as a private in the royal guards, attracted by his handsome face and figure the attention of Queen Maria Christina, to whom he was privately married in 1833, three months after the death of her husband, Ferdinand VII. In 1844 the marriage was publicly celebrated, and Munoz was made duke of Rianzeres, a Spanish grandee of the first class, and a knight of the golden fleece. When the duke de Montpensier was married to the daughter of Maria Christina, Louis Philippe bestowed upon Munoz the French title of duke of Montmorot.

Born at Tarancon, in Cuenca, 1808; died at Havre, 1873.

MUNSTER, mun'-ster, a city of Germany, on the small river Aa, 65 miles N.E. of Dusseldorf. It is the capital of Prussian Westphalia. The houses are lofty but irregular, presenting many quaint specimens of mediæval architecture. There are 14 churches, mostly catholic, the most noted being the cathedral, built between the 13th and 15th centuries, Our Lady's church, which has a fine tower, and the Gothic church of St. Lambert, and the church of St. Ludgerus (the first bishop of Munster) noticeable for its tower. The Gothic town hall, recently restored, is memorable as the place where the peace of Westphalia was signed in 1648. The ramparts of the town have been converted into public promenades. There are, besides, a bishop's palace, botanic garden, and various hospitals and schools. It was the head-quarters of the Anabaptists in 1536, and was taken by the bishop, when the leader, John of Leyden, with Knipperdolling and Kretchting, two of his chief accomplices, were made prisoners, tortured to death, and their bodies hung up in three iron cages, which are still to be seen on the steeple of the church of St. Lambert. Manf. Woollens, leather, carriages, starch, beer, hams and sausages. Pop. of the district, 470,644; of the city, 44,391.

MUNSTER, a town of the German empire, in Alsace, 10 miles S.W. of Colmar. Manf. Cotton and paper. The cotton printing works are very extensive. Pop. 4,800.

MUNSTER, the largest of the four provinces of Ireland, comprising the counties of Clare, Kerry, Limerick, Cork, Tipperary, and Waterford. Previous to the Norman conquest, it was divided into the kingdoms of North and South Munster.

MUNSTER, SEBASTIAN, a learned German divine, who at first was a Franciscan monk, but afterwards embraced the reformed religion, and was nominated Hebrew professor at the university of Basel. Munster was called the Esdras and Strabo of Germany. He wrote a Hebrew Grammar and Dictionary, and published a Cosmography, in folio, and a Latin version of the Old Testament, with other learned works. He died of the plague.

Born at Inglesheim, 1489; died at Basel, 1552.

MUNSTERBERG, a walled town of Prussia, in Silesia, on the right bank of the Oklau, 37 miles S. of Breslau. Pop. 5,300.

MUNTHE, GERHARD, munt'-he, Norwegian antiquary and topographer. He belonged to an old and wealthy family, entered the army in 1811, and in 1815 began his topographical labour. In 1840 he published "Ancient Norway before 1500," and was for many years engaged in an elaborate survey of Normandy.

Born 1796; died 1876.

MUNTOK, moon-tak', capital of the island of Banca, Indian Archipelago. Pop. 4,500.

MUNZER, THOMAS, moont'-ser, a native of Stolberg on the Harz, one of the most violent of the Anabaptist leaders. He was a Master of Arts at Wittenberg, and for some time preached the doctrines of the Reformation, but adopted mystical and extravagant views, gained a great number of followers, who were rebaptised naked, and lived in common. These enthusiasts committed shocking outrages, and pretended to prophecy and divine visions. Munzer preached against Luther as well as against the pope. At Mulhausen he established a senate, and assumed the title of king. The landgrave of Hesse, and other princes, marched against Munzer, whose army was defeated, notwithstanding his promise of victory. He then fled to Franchausen, where he was discovered, and sent back to Mulhausen, and beheaded.

Born 1490; died 1525.

MURAD, or AMURATH. (See AMURATH.)

MURAD BEY, chief of the Mamelukes, who opposed the French in Egypt, but was defeated at the battle of the Pyramids, in 1798. He burned the French fleet on the Nile, 1799; but submitted to Kleber, 1800.

Born 1750; died 1800.

MURANO, moo-ra'-no, a town of Italy, province Venetia, on an island in the Lagunes, a little to the east of Venice. The cathedral of St. Donato, built in the 9th century, is a fine specimen of the Byzantine style, and there are another church and a palace. Manf. Venetian glasses and mirrors, and bead articles. Pop. 4,000.

MURASKINO, moo-ras-ke'-no, a town of Russia, 51 miles S.E. of Nijni-Novgorod. Manf. Hosiery, leather, and soap. Pop. 6,000.

MURAT, JOACHIM, a celebrated French marshal, and king of Naples, was the son of an innkeeper, near Cahors. His father intended him for the church, and succeeded in getting him admitted to the college of Cahors; but young Murat's disposition was ill-suited to the ecclesiastical profession. An amour was the cause of his quitting the college; after which he enlisted in a regiment of chasseurs, from which he was dismissed for insubordination. He went to Paris, where, after having served, it is said, as a waiter in a café, he enlisted in the constitutional guard of Louis XVI. The outburst of the Revolution gave to his impetuous and restless spirit an opportunity for action; he became one of the most energetic partisans of liberty and equality. He had again entered a cavalry regiment, and during the Reign of Terror he rapidly attained the grade of colonel. In 1795 he rendered good service to Bonaparte, for which the future emperor rewarded him by placing him upon his staff when he set out for the Italian campaign of the same year. The fortunes of Bonaparte and Murat were henceforth closely allied. He was confidential aide-de-camp to his patron in Egypt; and, having signalized himself on every occasion as a man of impetuous bravery, was, in 1799, nominated general of division. On the 18th Brumaire (9th Nov. 1799), he commanded the sixty grenadiers who dispersed the Council of Five Hundred. For this service Napoleon appointed him commandant of the consular guard, and gave him the hand of his sister Caroline in marriage. After the battle of Marengo, in which he commanded the cavalry with distinguished bravery, he was created governor of the Cisalpine republic, and afterwards governor of Paris. When Napoleon became emperor, he bestowed the field-marshal's bâton upon Murat, and created him prince, with the title of grand-duke of Berg and Cleves. "The handsome swordsman," as he was termed, went through the German campaign of 1805 with even more than his accustomed brilliancy. In the emperor's invasion of Spain, in 1808, he commanded the French army, and was ambitious of gaining the throne, which Charles IV. had vacated, for himself; but Napoleon preferred to place his brother Joseph upon the Spanish throne, at the same time bestowing the crown of Naples upon Murat. In 1808, he was proclaimed king of the Two Sicilies, under the name of Joachim-Napoleon. He reigned in peace until 1812, his rule being characterised by mildness and liberality. In the latter year he commanded the cavalry of the grand army sent to invade Russia, and in the advance performed his customary feats of personal valour; and, during the disastrous retreat, he commanded in chief from Smolensko to Wilna. After the disastrous battle of Leipsic, he hurried back to his kingdom, and having broken with Napoleon, by whom he imagined himself to have been slighted, entered into negotiations with the allies. The congress of Vienna, however, not recognising his kingly title, he declared in favour of Napoleon immediately after learning that the emperor had returned from the isle of Elba. Calling upon the Italians to fight for their national independence, he marched into Upper Italy, where he encountered the Austrians at Tolentino, in 1815, but met with a signal defeat; he lost at once his army and his throne. Subsequently, he attempted to regain the latter, and landed with a few followers upon the coast of Calabria; but being captured, was brought before a Neapolitan military commission, which condemned him to be shot. As a military commander, Murat was mediocre; but his impetuous bravery, his love of daring, and his uniform success in battle, would seem to entitle him to the praise which Napoleon bestowed upon him when he called his favourite "the best cavalry officer in Europe."

Born 1767; died, 1815.

MURAT, CAROLINE MARIA BONAPARTE, wife of the preceding. (See BONAPARTE, Caroline.)

MURATORI, LUDOVICO ANTONIO, moo-ra-to'-re, Italian historian, who has been termed "the father of the history of the Middle Ages." After completing his education at Modena, he entered into holy orders, and was invited, at the age of 23, to Milan, by Count Charles Borromeo, who appointed him librarian of the Ambrosian college. Thereupon Muratori commenced the study of the Italian Middle Age records, and subsequently published his "Rerum Italicarum Scriptores," in twenty-eight volumes; wherein he gave every chronicle of the mediæval period, accompanying them with learned and valuable commentaries. His "Antiquitates Italicæ" was first produced in 1742. Muratori was a member of the Royal Society of London, and of several other learned bodies; but he was exposed to the calumnies and persecutions of some bigots of his church, who accused him of holding heretical opinions. Besides the above-mentioned productionsc, he wrote a learned treatise upon Italian poetry, and an enlightened devotional work, wherein he combated much of the superstition and bigotry of the Roman Catholic church.

Born at Vignola, 1672; died at Modena, 1750.

MURAVIEFF, MIKHAIL, moo'-ra-veef Russian author, whose distinguished acquirements led to his being appointed tutor to the grand-dukes Alexander and Constantine in 1785. Nearly all his prose works were composed for the use of his imperial pupils. The most important of these productions were,—"Epochs of the Russian Empire," "Geographical Sketches of North and South Russia," and "Dialogues of the Dead;" which last was an imitation of the work of Lucian, but was composed in a more genial spirit. The poetical efforts of this writer were very popular in their day, but are little read at the present time.

Born at Smolensk, 1757; died 1807.

MURAVIEFF, NIKOLAI, Prince, Russian general, who entered the army in 1811, served in the Caucasus, and was employed on a political mission to Khiva. In 1828 he took part in the war with Persia, and in 1831 in the Polish campaign. He commanded the Russian corps which landed in Asia Minor, and arrested the march towards Constantinople of Ibrahim Pacha, and afterwards superintended the construction of the fortifications of Sebastopol. He fell into disgrace in 1838, for having, in a sham fight, made prisoners of the Emperor Nicholas and his staff, and for 10 years lived in retirement, but was recalled in 1848. In 1855 he conducted the siege of Kars, and was rewarded with the title of prince. This was the last military service in which he was engaged, and his last years were passed in retirement.

Born 1794; died 1866.

MURAZZANO, moo-rats-sa'-no, a market-town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 12 miles from Mondovi. Pop. 2,500.

MURCHISON, SIR RODERICK IMPEY, mur'-chi-son, a distinguished modern geologist, director-general of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom, and director of the Metropolitan School of Science applied to Mining and the Arts. After receiving a portion of his education at the Durham grammar-school, he entered the military college at Marlow in 1805, and left it two years subsequently, upon receiving a commission in the 36th regiment. He served at the battle of Vimeira, and shared the dangers and the glory of the retreat made by Sir John Moore upon Corunna. In 1815 he married, and quitted the military profession. Becoming acquainted with Sir Humphry Davy, he was urged by that great chemist to devote his leisure to scientific pursuits. Acting upon this advice, he proceeded to study the science of geology, and shortly afterwards explored the Highlands, Yorkshire, and other parts of the kingdom, in company with Professor Sedgwick. In 1828 he accompanied Mr. (afterwards Sir Charles) Lyell in a geological tour among the extinct volcanoes at Auvergne. After exploring the chain of the Eastern Alps, he published a memoir upon the subject, accompanied with a geological map, in 1829. He subsequently returned to the study of the geological formations of Great Britain, addressing himself more especially to an investigation of the strata below the "mountain limestone," which had previously received but little attention, and were generally designated both in this country and on the continent "Transition Rocks." Difficult as the task was, owing to their greatly disturbed condition, and the metamorphic changes which have taken place in their structure, it was successfully accomplished by Mr. Murchison and Professor Sedgwick. To the latter we owe the classification of the lowest rocks under the title of the Cambrian, and to Murchison the Silurian system, which includes the strata that overlie the Cambrian, though the exact boundaries of each are still matters of dispute. The term "Silurian" was adopted because the vast deposits which constitute the system are most fully displayed in those parts of England and Wales once inhabited by a tribe of Britons known to the Romans as the Silures. The results of his investigations were published first in the Transactions of the Geological Society, and in 1836 in a separate volume entitled "The Silurian System." About the same time the united labours of Murchison and Sedgwick led to the conclusion that the limestones of Devonshire were the marine equivalents of the old red sandstone of Herefordshire and to the consequent establishment of the "Devonian System" as an independent stratographical division, a conclusion which was confirmed by extended observations on the continent. In 1840, in company with M. de Verneuil, a French geologist, he set out for Russia, with the intention of investigating the geological formations of that country, hitherto very little known. The result of his several expeditions was published in 1845, in a magnificent volume, entitled "Geology of Russia and the Ural Mountains," in the production of which he was assisted by M. de Verneuil and the Count von Keyserling. His investigations in Russia led to the conclusion that a series of rocks largely developed in the district of Perm, were synchronous with the lower divisions of the red sandstone series of Worcester and adjacent counties, and the magnesian limestones of Durham, &c., and to their consequent elevation into a separate "system," under the designation of "Permian." Shortly after the publication of this book he was knighted by her majesty Queen Victoria, and was created a member of the order of St. Stanislaus by the Emperor Nicholas. About the same time the Royal Society awarded him its Copley medal, for his efforts in establishing the "Silurian System." He wrote extensively upon the subjects of his observations and explorations, and a large number of important contributions by him appeared in the Transactions and Journals of the learned societies of Great Britain. In 1854 he produced "Siluria; the History of the oldest known Rocks containing Organic Remains, with a Brief Sketch of the Distribution of Gold over the Earth." Sir Roderick Murchison likewise declared, in 1846, that gold would probably be found in the Australian Alps, and urged the government to organize an expedition to test the truth of his views. This appeal met with no official response; but his theories were rapidly confirmed through the actual discovery of the precious metal by private individuals. He was president of the British Association in 1846, for many years president of the Royal Geographical Society, twice president of the Geological Society, and received from the council the award of the Wollaston medal in 1864. He was D.C.L. of Oxford, LL.D. of Cambridge, received the honour of a baronetcy in 1866, and was a member of almost all the scientific bodies of Europe.

Born at Tarradale, Ross-shire, 1792; died 1871.

MURCIA, mer'-she-a (Sp. moor'-the-a), an old kingdom in the S.E. of Spain, included between Valencia on the E., Andalusia on the W., and the Mediterranean on the S. It now comprises the modern provinces of Murcia and Albacete.

MURCIA, a modern province of Spain. There are fertile valleys, but generally the soil is unproductive from the want of water. The principal river is the Segura. Goats, swine, and sheep are reared in great numbers. Minerals. Iron, lead, and copper, and there are mineral springs. Area, 4,478 square miles. Pop. 464,286.

MURCIA, the capital of the province of Murcia, on the left bank of the Segura, 28 miles from Carthagena. It stands in the centre of a beautiful and fertile region, the vale of Murcia. The principal public buildings are numerous churches, a decorated cathedral, with a lofty tower, surmounted by a dome; monasteries, convents, colleges, and hospitals. There are four public walks in Murcia,—the arsenal, which is merely a spot of ground gained from the river by an embankment; the botanical garden, on the south of the river; the Alameda, or public walk, properly so called; and the Malecon, or quay, a large dyke thrown up to prevent the encroachments of the Segura. In summer, the heat is excessive. Manf. Pottery-ware, woollen cloth, silk, linen, baskets, cordage, nitre, and gunpowder. Pop. 91,805.—Murcia is first mentioned in history in the year 713, when it was taken by the Moors. In 1810 it was taken and sacked by the French.

MURE, SIR WILLIAM, mure, a Scotch poet, whose works mostly remain in manuscript. Some of them, however, appeared in a volume entitled "Ancient Ballads and Songs," published in 1820. In the civil war, he took the popular side, served as captain in the Ayrshire regiment, and was wounded at Marston Moor.

Born at Rowallan, Ayr, 1594; died 1657.

MURE, WILLIAM, historian, member of an old family of Ayrshire, Scotland, educated at Westminster School, and the Universities of Edinburgh and Bonn. In 1824 and 1825 he contributed to the Edinburgh Review, some articles on Spanish literature, and afterwards published elaborate works on Egyptian chronology, and the introduction of the zodiac among the Greeks. In 1838 he visited Greece, and in 1842 published his journal, with remarks on the history and antiquity of the country. In 1846, and again in 1847 and 1852, he was elected member for Renfrewshire, but retired in 1855 on account of failing health. In 1847 he was elected lord rector of Glasgow university. He did not live to complete his great work, "Critical History of the Language and Literature of Ancient Greece," but superintended the publication of five volumes. As he held a commission in the Renfrewshire militia, he was generally styled Colonel Mure.

Born in Ayrshire, 1799; died at Kensington, 1860.

MURE, LA, meur, a town of France, department Isère, 20 miles S. of Grenoble. Manf. Coarse linen, nails, and leather. Coal is worked in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,000.

MURET, MARC ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, moo'-rai, a learned French critic, who, at the age of 18, read lectures upon Cicero and Terence in the college of Auch, whence he proceeded to Paris, and taught the classics and civil law with great reputation. His sarcastic and vivacious character, however, procured him many enemies, and, being accused of heresy and depraved habits, he was imprisoned; but, obtaining his release, he repaired to Toulouse, where fresh charges were brought against him. To avoid punishment, he fled to Italy. At Rome he was well received, was ordained a priest, and was presented to several rich benefices. He taught philosophy, theology, and civil law in the latter city, and enjoyed the esteem of Popes Pius V. and Gregory XIII. His works consist of valuable annotations upon the Latin classics, "Poemata," and "Orations." His commentaries upon Plato's "Republic," and upon Sallust, Cicero, Terence, and Aristotle, are regarded as excellent.

Born near Limoges, 1526; died at Rome, 1585.

MURET, a town of France, department Haute-Garonne, at the confluence of the Louge and Garonne, 11 miles S.W. of Toulouse. Manf. Coarse woollens, leather, and pottery. Pop. 4,000. —A great battle was fought here in 1213, between Simon de Montfort and Peter II. of Aragon, in which the latter was defeated and lost his life.

MURFREESBOROUGH, mur'-free-bur'-ro, a town of Tennessee, 35 miles S. of Nashville. There are a Baptist university, two colleges for women, and a military institution. Manf. Machinery. Pop. 4,000, about half being coloured.

MURGER, HENRI, moor-zhai, a modern French littérateur, who became, in 1838, secretary to Count Tolstoy, a wealthy Russian nobleman, resident at that period at Paris. He began by writing verse, and attacked the poet Barthélemy in a satirical poem. His next work was a volume of poetry, entitled "Via Dolorosa," for which he was unsuccessful in obtaining a publisher. He then lived that strange, irregular, but somewhat romantic mode of life, called by himself and other French novelists the "Bohemian." Fired with literary ambition, but painfully uncertain as to where he should procure a dinner, the young enthusiast mixed in the society of a number of young painters, musicians, and poets,—the strange bond of impecuniosity uniting them all. Champfleury became his friend during this time, and, with him, Murger wrote a number of small pieces for the Luxembourg theatre. After producing several poems and novels, with more or less success, he, in 1848, gave to the public the celebrated "Scenes of Bohemian Life," which fixed his fame. This fine recital of the adventures of his early days opened to him the pages of the "Revue des Deux Mondes," and to that journal he afterwards contributed several of his best works. M. Murger was less successful as a dramatist and poet, the particular charm of his style depending not upon invention and imagination, but on the truth and reality of his pictures of life.

Born in Paris, 1822; died 1860.

MURILLO, BARTHOLOMÉ ESTEBAN, moo-reel'-yo, Spanish painter. He studied under his uncle, Juan del Castillo, at Seville, sketched figures and animals in the market place, and supported himself by the sale of small religious pictures, whence, in 1643, he proceeded to Madrid, obtained instruction from the celebrated Velasquez, and studied the works of art in a royal collection. In 1645 he returned to Seville, where he rapidly rose to the highest distinction, and painted several historical works for the king of Spain. He founded the Academy of Seville in 1660. In his own country, his fame chiefly rests upon his numerous altar-pieces; but in England, where his works are highly prized, his simple works, such as "The Spanish Peasant Boy," in the National Gallery, are most highly esteemed. His death was the result of an accident he met with while working upon a scaffolding in the Capuchin convent at Cadiz, at his painting entitled the "Marriage of St. Catherine."

Born at Seville, 1618; died at the same place, 1682.

MURNER, THOMAS, moor'-nair, German satirist, who studied at the principal universities of Europe, and was crowned as poet laureate by the Emperor Maximilian, in 1506, and afterwards led an irregular life, preaching occasionally, but generally offending his congregations by his gross personalities, and was expelled from Freiburg, Treves, and Venice. He then went to Strasburg, and violently opposed the Reformation. In 1523 Henry VIII. invited him to England, but he soon returned to Strasburg, and set up a printing press, which was destroyed by the mob, and he fled to Switzerland, whence he was soon expelled. He translated Virgil, and other Latin works, wrote some German poems of considerable merit, and a notorious satirical work, "Von dem grossen Lutherischen Narren," against the Reformers.

Born at Strasburg, 1475; died at Heidelberg, 1536.

MURO, moo'-ro, a town of central Italy, 16 miles S. of Melfi. Pop. 8,400. Joan of Naples was strangled here in 1382.

MUROM, or MOOROM, moo-rom', an ancient town of European Russia, government of Vladimir, on the right bank of the Oka, a tributary of the Volga, 70 miles S.E. of Vladimir. There are large orchards and vegetable gardens in the vicinity. The fisheries of the river are productive, and there are large quarries of gypsum. Manf. Linen, sailcloth, and leather. Pop. 11,300.

MUROS, moo-ros', a seaport of Spain, province of Corunna, on a bay of the same name, 55 miles S.W. of Corunna. There is a handsome church. Manf. Linen. Pop. 4,800.

MURPHY, ARTHUR, mer'-fe, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer. After receiving some education at the college at St. Omer, in France, he, at the age of 18, returned to Ireland, and was placed in the counting-house of a merchant who was his relation; but not liking that occupation, he went to London, and, having a great inclination to the stage, he made an effort in the character of Othello, but without success. He then commenced a literary career, and produced "The Orphan of China," a tragedy, which was well received. He also established a weekly paper, called "The Gray's-Inn Journal," and two others in defence of government, entitled the "Test," and the "Auditor." Having studied the law, he was called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn, but never had much practice. His plays of the "Grecian Daughter," "All in the Wrong," "The Way to Keep Him," and "The Citizen," had great success, and produced the author wealth and fame. Mr. Murphy also acquired considerable reputation by his Lives of Fielding and Johnson, and, above all, by his translation of Tacitus. He was a commissioner of bankrupts, and, for the last two years of his life, had a pension of £200 a year. His last literary performance was the "Life of Garrick," which is by no means equal to his former works.

Born in Ireland, 1730; died in London, 1805.

MURPHY, ROBERT, mathematician, was the son of a poor shoemaker of Mallow, in Ireland. In his 11th year his thighbone was fractured by his being run over by a cart. This accident was the cause of his being confined to his bed during twelve months. Among other papers, an old Cork almanac, containing some mathematical problems, was given him wherewith to employ his mind. This led him to ask for a copy of Euclid, and a work upon algebra, both of which he mastered unaided, and before he had attained his 13th year. He next forwarded answers to the mathematical problems inserted in the newspapers by a gentleman at Cork. The latter sought out the lad, and succeeded in interesting some gentlemen in his behalf. He was received into a classical school in his native town, and subsequently went to the university of Cambridge, where, in 1829, he took the B.A. degree, and afterwards became fellow and dean of his college. Having fallen into dissipated habits, he was compelled to leave the university in 1832. After spending some time in Ireland, he went to London in 1836, and commenced as a mathematical teacher and writer. Two years later he was appointed examiner in mathematics and natural philosophy at the university of London. To the Cambridge Philosophical Transactions, he contributed many papers on mathematics, and wrote a treatise on the "Theory of Algebraical Equations." He likewise furnished the earlier parts of the "Penny Cyclopædia" with articles on natural philosophy.

Born at Mallow, Ireland, 1806; died in London, 1843.

MURR, CHRISTOPHER THEOPHILUS VON, mur, a learned German writer, who distinguished himself by his works upon language, bibliography, and antiquities, which he composed in Latin, French, and German. The principal of these were "Library of Painting, Sculpture, and Engraving," "Contributions towards the History of the Arts and Literature," and a Latin work upon the library of Nuremberg and the museum of Altdorf.

Born at Nuremberg, 1733; died at the same place, 1811.

MURRAY, JAMES STUART, Earl of, mur'-rai, was a natural son of James V., king of Scotland, by Margaret, daughter of the earl of Mar. He accompanied his sister Mary, queen of Scots, to France, in 1548, and was among her retinue when she was married to the dauphin of France; but after his return to his native country, he soon began to play an important part in the councils of the party of the Reformation. He was subsequently deputed to repair to France and invite his sister to Scotland. In 1561 he returned to Edinburgh, and upon the queen's arrival, a few weeks afterwards, he was appointed by her, prime minister. For his services in that office, Mary created him earl of Mar; but a rival claimant to the title having appeared in Lord Erskine, the minister received the earldom of Murray in its stead. Together with John Knox and Queen Elizabeth, he was opposed to the queen's marriage with Darnley; but though he became estranged from his sister, he took no active part in the murder of her husband. He is said, however, to have been aware of the plot for the assassination of Darnley, which, it is avowed, he declared he would neither aid nor hinder. Soon after the horrid deed, he left Scotland for the continent, visiting Elizabeth on his way. He returned after the coronation of James VI., and was proclaimed regent in 1567. After the queen's escape from Lochleven Castle, he took up arms against her, and defeated her at Langside. Subsequently, he complied with the summons of Queen Elizabeth, and appeared at the trial of his unfortunate sister, and bore witness against her. While riding through the streets of Linlithgow, he was shot by James Hamilton, of Bothwelhaugh, in revenge of a personal injury committed by him years before.

Born 1531; died 1570.

MURRAY, JOHN, English publisher, son and successor of a publisher in Fleet-street, whose name was originally M'Murray, but who dropped the Scotch prefix. The son afterwards removed to Albemarle Street, and devoted his attention to a much more extensive line of business. His first great undertaking was the establishment of the "Quarterly Review," in 1809. He published a few of Sir Walter Scott's, and all Lord Byron's works. His name was also to be found on the title-page of works by Campbell, Moore, Canning, Hallam, Croker, Disraeli, Washington Irving, Southey, Lockhart, Crabbe, and Bishop Heber.
Born 1778; died 1843.

MURRAY, LINDLEY, grammarian, was educated at an academy of the Society of Friends, to which body his family belonged, at first acted as clerk to his father, a merchant at New York, but was subsequently placed with a private tutor, to acquire some classical knowledge. He next applied himself to the study of the law, and, in his 21st year was called to the bar; but, upon the breaking out of the dispute between Great Britain and America, he entered upon a commercial career. Having acquired some property, he retired from business, and bought an estate near New York; but the summers of his native country proving too relaxing for his frame, he resolved to settle in England; and accordingly crossed the Atlantic, and purchased an estate near York, where he lived till his death. His "Grammar of the English Language," Key, and Exercises, were composed in England, and in a condition of such bodily infirmity, that he could take no exercise, except in a carriage. During the latter years of his life, he was entirely confined to his chamber. Besides the three works already named, he produced "The English Reader," "Lecteur Français," and a small work "On the Duty and Benefit of a Daily Perusal of the Holy Scriptures." The large sums obtained by him for his educational works were entirely devoted to charitable purposes.
Born at Swatara, Pennsylvania, 1745; died near York, 1826.

MURRAY, WILLIAM, earl of Mansfield. (See MANSFIELD, Earl of.)

MURRAY, a large river of Australia, formed by the junction of numerous streams west of the Australian Alps, in the Muniongrange. After passing through Lake Alexandrina, it enters the ocean in lat. 35° 30' S., lon. 139° E. The length is about 1,120 miles; and the chief affluents are the MURRUMBIDGEE, DARLING, Goulburn, and Compospe.

MURRAY, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 8,269. The capital is Spring Place.

MURRAY, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 3,604.

MURRAY, a county of New South Wales, Australia. Area, 2,278 square miles. The chief town is Queanbeyan.

MURRUMBIDGEE. (See MORUMBIDGEE.)

MURSHEDABAD. (See MOORSHEDABAD.)

MURVIEDRO, moor-ve-ai-dro, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, on the left bank of the Palancia, two miles from the mouth, 18 miles N.E. of the town of that name. It presents many vestiges of antiquity. A Roman theatre and circus are in good preservation. Manf. Brandy. Pop. 5,000.—The town stands on the site of the ancient Sagantum, which was taken by Hannibal 219 B.C.

MUSA, ANTONIUS, mu'-sa, a Greek physician, who cured Augustus of a dangerous illness, by bathing. He was the first who advised the use of the cold bath. The Romans erected a statue to his honour. Two tracts, "De Herbâ Betanicâ," and "De Tuendâ Valetudine," are attributed to him.
Lived in the 1st century.

MUSA, IBN-NOSSEYR, Arab conqueror, who, in 707, was nominated governor of Mauritania, and who quickly reduced the whole of the tribes inhabiting the northern shores of Africa. In 710 he landed in Spain with a small army, and, after some successes, returned to Africa laden with spoil. In the following year he despatched his subordidate, Tarik into Spain. The latter defeated and killed Roderick, the Gothic king, and pushed his victorious arms as far as the rich city of Toledo, which he plundered. Musa, unwilling to allow so much glory and wealth to fall to the share of his lieutenant, put himself at the head of 18,000 men, with whom he landed at Algesiras in 712. He rapidly reduced Seville, Beja, Merida, and marched upon Toledo, where he met Tarik, whom he caused to be beaten and thrown into prison. Tarik was, however, subsequently restored to his command by the caliph Al-Walid; whereupon he overran Spain in an easterly direction. Musa, on the other hand, pursued a northerly course, and took Salamanca and other considerable cities. The two Arab generals quickly reduced the whole of Spain, and were summoned to Syria by the caliph Al-Walid. Tarik obeyed instantly; but it was not until a second messenger had been despatched to Musa that he turned eastward. He arrived in Syria at the beginning of 715, accompanied by thousands of captives, among whom were four hundred of the Spanish nobility, and with a long train of camels laden with spoil. The caliph received him coldly; and upon his death, shortly afterwards, Suleyman, his successor, cast Musa into prison, and fined him 200,000 pieces of gold. One of his sons was also put to death, and his head brought to Musa by Suleyman himself, who asked him if he knew it. Upon which the afflicted parent replied, "Cursed be he who has slain a better man than himself." He died in poverty.
Born 640; died 717.

MUSÆ (MUSES), mu'-see, in Greek mythology, certain goddesses, who presided over poetry, music, dancing, and all the liberal arts. They were generally supposed to be the daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and were nine in number,—Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Apollo, their patron and conductor, had received the name Musagetes, or leader of the Muses. The palm tree, the laurel, and all the fountains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus, &c., were sacred to the Muses. They were generally represented as young, beautiful, and modest virgins, and commonly appeared in different attire, according to the arts and sciences over which they presided. The worship of the Muses was universally established, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Thessaly, and Italy.

MUSÆUS, mu-se'-us, an ancient Greek poet, who is stated, in Greek legend, to have lived in the mythic ages, and to have been the son and pupil of Orpheus. The introduction of the Eleusinian and other mysteries into Greece is attributed to him.
Lived in the 5th century.

MUSÆUS, a Greek poet, who wrote an amatory poem, "Hero and Leander."
Lived in the 6th century.

MUSÆUS, JOHANN KARL AUGUST, German writer, who studied theology at the university of Jena, with the intention of entering upon holy orders. He was appointed to a curacy, but the parishioners refused to receive him, as he had been once seen to dance, the result being that he relinquished the theological for the literary profession. He, in 1760, published a parody on Richardson's novel, entitled "Grandison the Second," the success of which urged him to make renewed efforts as an author. It was not, however, until after an interval of eighteen years that he gave to the public his "Physiognomical Travels," a satire upon Lavater. In the interim he had supported himself by teaching at the gymnasium of Weimar. His fame was secured by this last production; and he thereupon proceeded to collect and write his "Volksmärchen der Deutschen," or popular legends of Germany, which were a series of charming narratives gathered from the peasantry, and dressed up in a simple and beautiful style. His other works were a collection of novelettes and tales for children, and a number of satirical sketches, entitled "Freund Heins Erscheinungen," or Death's Advent, in which Musæus treated of the many human undertakings cut short by the summons of that inevitable visitor. Some of his posthumous sketches were collected by his relative pupil Augustus von Kotzebue, and published in 1791. He was witty and captivating as a writer, and kindly and generous as a man.
Born at Jena, 1735; died 1787.

MUSCAT, or MASKAT, mus'-kat, an independent state of Eastern Arabia, forming the sea-coast of Oman, extending from the Strait of Ormus, at the entrance of the Persian Gulf, to the island of Moseirah, or Massera, and extending inwards about 150 miles. The coast district, and a considerable portion of the interior, are barren, but there are fertile tracts or oases. The imaum, or sultan, exercises authority over some districts on the eastern coast of Africa.

MUSCAT, capital of the above state, a fortified town on the Persian Gulf, with a good harbour. Coffee, pearls, wheat, fruit, sulphur, drugs, and horses are exported, and a large transit trade is carried on. Pop. 60,000.

MUSCATINE, mus-ka-teen', a city of Iowa, United States, on the west bank of the Mississippi, 32 miles S.E. of Iowa city. The export of timber is very considerable, and a large general trade is carried on. Pop. 8,295.

MUSCATINE, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 440 square miles. Pop. 23,170. The capital is MUSCATINE.

MUSCOGEE, mus'-ko-je, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 19,322, rather more than half being coloured. The capital is COLUMBUS.

MUSGRAVE, WILLIAM, mus'-graiv, an English physician and antiquary, who, in 1684, was chosen secretary to the Royal Society. He edited Capitolanus's "Life of Geta Britannicus," and a number of medical works.
Born at Charlton, Somersetshire, 1657; died at Exeter, 1721.

MUSGU, mus'-goo, a country of western Africa, to the south of Bornou. It is hilly, with extensive swamps. The population is large, but no estimate has been made of numbers.

MUSHED. (See MESCHED.)

MUSHET, DAVID, mu'-shet, iron manufacturer, at an early age became connected with the Clyde Iron Works. He made many experiments in iron-smelting, took out several patents for improvements, and in 1801 accidentally discovered rich beds of ironstone in the western counties of Scotland. The discovery enabled him to attain the position of the first iron manufacturer in Scotland, and to develop an immense industry. He invented many valuable processes, and contributed to the literature of the iron manufacture.
Born at Dalkeith, 1772; died at Monmouth, 1847.

MUSKAU, or MUZAKOW, mus'-kow, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the right bank of the Laber, 66 miles N.W of Liegnitz. Pop. 3,000.

MUSKEGON, mus'-ke-gon, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 26,586. The capital is MUSKEGON.

MUSKEGON, capital of the above state, on Muskegon river, near its mouth in Lake Michigan, 175 miles N.W. of Detroit. It is an important place for the shipment of timber. Pop. 11,262.

MUSKINGUM, mus-king'-gum, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 655 square miles. Pop. 45,000. The capital is ZANESVILLE.

MUSPRATT, JAMES SHERIDAN, mus'-prat, chemist, was the son of the proprietor of large chemical works at Liverpool, where he received his first education. He afterwards studied at Glasgow and University College, London. Having passed some time in America, he studied under Liebig at Giessen, and afterwards established a college of chemistry at Liverpool. He was the author of a "Dictionary of Chemistry," and of many valuable papers on the science. In 1848 he married Miss Susan Cushman, the American actress.
Born at Dublin, 1821; died near Liverpool, 1871.

MUSSCHENBROEK, PIETER VAN, moosh'-shen-bro(r)k, an eminent Dutch natural philosopher and mathematician, who, with Gravesande, first introduced the Newtonian philosophy into Holland. He became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at his native place; and he was also a member of the Royal Society of London and of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. His "Course of Natural and Experimental Philosophy" is a valuable work, and has been translated into English by Rolson. He also wrote, in Latin, treatises on the Magnet, Capillary Attraction, Cohesion, and Meteorology.
Born at Leyden, 1692; died at the same place, 1761.

MUSSELBURGH, mus'-sel-bru(r), a seaport and royal and parliamentary burgh of Edinburghshire, Scotland, at the mouth of the Esk, 6 miles E. of Edinburgh. On the opposite side of the river, connected by three bridges, is the fishing village of Fisherrow. Betwixt the sea and the town, lie the extensive downs called Musselburgh Links, excellently adapted for the healthful exercise of the golf, and where there is a course for horse-racing, and where the Edinburgh races are run. Manf. Leather, sail-cloth, and hair-cloth. Pop. 7,500. Musselburgh unites with Leith and Portobello in sending a member to parliament.—A station on the North British railway.

MUSSET, LOUIS CHARLES ALFRED DE, moos'-sai, French poet, playwright, and novelist. After completing his education at the college of Henry IV., where his fellow pupil and intimate friend was the duke of Orleans, son of Louis Philippe, he essayed the most diverse studies. The law, medicine, finance, painting, were in turn engaged in, in turn abandoned. In 1830 he put forth a small volume of poetry, entitled "Tales of Spain and Italy." The success which the work obtained was quite underserved, in a moral point of view, at least; but this early favour encouraged its author to proceed, and to achieve better things. A celebrity at 23, the young poet made a journey to Italy with Georges Sand, under the name of confidential secretary. Between the years 1836-40, he produced several works, more or less characterised by an affectation of Byronic misanthropy and disgust of things mundane. Two or three collections of poems and a number of plays succeeded, the best of which last, however, were not adapted for the stage. At the revolution of 1848, he lost his post as librarian to the ministry of the Interior, but regained it after the establishment of the empire, with the additional appointment of reader to the empress. His last volume of verse was published in 1850, and showed a premature decay of the author's powers: he was nevertheless elected a member of the French Academy in 1852. At his death, he left some poems and a drama uncompleted.

Born at Paris, 1810; died 1857.

MUSTAPHA I., mus'-ta-fa, sultan of Turkey, succeeded his brother Ahmed I. in 1617; in the same year he was, however, deposed by the Janissaries, and thrown into prison. He was afterwards released and placed upon the throne, but again deposed by the Janissaries, in 1625, and ultimately strangled.

Born 1591; died 1639.

MUSTAPHA II., son of Mahomet IV., succeeded Ahmed II., his uncle, in 1695. He defeated the Austrians at Temeswar, and made war, with success, against the Venetians, Poles, and the Russians. Fortune, at length, turning against him, he was forced to make peace. He was deposed by his subjects.

Born 1664; died 1703.

MUSTAPHA III., the son of Ahmed III., ascended the throne in 1757. He disciplined the army and made war with Russia in 1768; was defeated and lost the Crimea, 1771, but repulsed the Russians from Moldavia in 1773. He was a patron of literature and science.

Born 1717; died 1774.

MUSTAPHA IV. ascended the throne in 1807, after the deposition of Selim III. Mustapha Bairaktar, pasha of Rudshuk, collected an army and marched upon Constantinople, demanding that the deposed Selim should be given up to him; but Selim had been already strangled, and his dead body was brought to Bairaktar, who thereupon deposed Mustapha IV., and placed his brother Mahmoud upon the throne. Mustapha IV., was put to death by his brother Mahmoud II.

Born 1779; died 1808.

MUSURUS, MARCUS, mu-su'-rus, a native of Candia, who taught Greek at Padua, and afterwards at Rome, with great reputation. Pope Leo X. made him archbishop of Epidaurus, in the Morea. He published editions of Aristophanes and Athenæus, and his "Etymologicum Magnum Græcum," is a valuable work.

Born 1470; died at Rome, 1517.

MUTIUS, CÆLIUS, mu'-shi-us, first named Codrus, and afterwards Scævola, an illustrious Roman, who distinguished himself when Porsenna besieged Rome, 507 B.C. Mutius entered the camp of Porsenna to assassinate him, and, by mistake stabbed one of his attendants. Being seized and brought before Porsenna, he said that he was one of 300 who had engaged, by oath, to slay him; and added, "This hand, which has missed its purpose, ought to suffer." On saying this, he thrust it into the coals which were burning on the altar, and suffered it to be consumed. Porsenna, struck with his intrepidity, made peace with the Romans. The name of Scævola, or left-handed, was given as a mark of distinction to Mutius and his family.

Lived in the 6th century, B.C.

MUTTERSTADT, moot'-ter-stat, a market town of Bavaria, in the Palatinate, on the Flo-sgraben, 20 miles E. of Landau. Tobacco is extensively grown in the vicinity. Pop 3,400.

MUTTRA, moot'-tra, a town of British India, on the right bank of the Jumna, 97 miles S.E. of Delhi. It is considered sacred as the birthplace of Krishna, and there are numerous ghâts or stairs leading to the river, and temples. Sacred monkeys and bulls abound. Near the town is a military cantonment. Pop. 47,483; of the district, 671,690.

MUTZIG, moot'-zig, a town of Germany, in Alsace, 14 miles S.W. of Strasburg. There is an old episcopal castle, now used as a manufactory of fire-arms. Pop. 3,600.

MYCENÆ, mi-se'-ne, an ancient city of the Morea, Greece, now in ruins, 22 miles from Corinth. It was the capital of the kingdom of Agamemnon, and excavations conducted by Dr. Schliemann in 1877 have resulted in some very remarkable discoveries of tombs and relics of great interest. There are some fine remains of Cyclopean architecture.

MYCONE, mik'-o-ne, a small island of the Grecian Archipelago, between Maxos and Tinos, 5 miles from the latter. It is hilly, but fertile, and producing corn, figs, and wine. The town of Mycone, on the north-west side, has a good roadstead. Pop. 6,000.

MYEENGYAN, mi-eeng-yan', a town of Burmah, on the left bank of the Irrawdi, 23 miles S.W. of Ava. It is a great mart for rice. Pop. 10,000.

MYLAU, mi'-lou, a town of Saxony, circle of Zwickau, 12 miles S.W. of the town of that name. Manf. Linen and straw-plait. There is a mine of alum-schist in the neighbourhood. Pop. 4,200.

MYLITTA, mi-lit'-ta, in Babylonian mythology, a female deity, symbolic of the maternal forces of nature. Her worship, which was accompanied by licentious acts, spread to Assyria and Persia.

MYNIAS, or MINYAS, mi'-ni-as, in Greek mythology, king of Jolcas, and gave his name to the people called Minyæ. His worship was celebrated in the city of Orchomenus, which he built. His daughters were changed into bats for deriding the mysteries of Bacchus.

MYNPOREE, or MYNPURI, min-poo-ree', a town of British India, on the banks of the Esun, a small affluent of the Ganges, 160 miles S.E. of Delhi, in a salubrious situation, 620 feet above the sea. There is a Jain temple. Pop. 22,000.

MYRON, mi'-ron, a celebrated sculptor of ancient Greece, whose praises were frequently sung by both the Greek and Roman poets. He was the modeller of the Discobolus, or Quoit-thrower, an ancient marble copy of which is in the British Museum.

MYSORE, or MAISUR, mi-sor', a province of British India, under the administration of the Governor-general of India, principally surrounded by districts of the province of Madras. It consists of a high table-land, elevated 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, with a slope, principally to the north and north-east. The climate is temperate and healthy to a degree unknown in any other tract of similar extent within the tropics. The grains and vegetables of other parts of India, and many of the fruits of Europe are produced, and coffee, cotton, betel nuts, rice, silk, and sugar are exported. The cultivation of the soil is much aided by means of reservoirs and wells, whence the farmers irrigate their fields and gardens. Horses, cattle, sheep, and swine, but none of them of a good size, are also reared. The chief town is MYSORE.

Rivers.—The chief are the Cauvery, flowing south-east, and the Tungabhadro, the Hugri, and the Pennar, flowing north and north-east.

Area.—29,325 square miles.

Pop.—4,186,188, of whom 30,000 are Christians, the remainder including Hindoos, Mahometans, Buddhists, and one Jew!

Lat. 11° 35′—15° N. Lon. 70° 45′—78° 45′ E.

Divisions.—There are 3 commissionerships, 8i executive districts, and more than 38,000 villages.

History.—In 1761, Hyder Ali dethroned the native sovereign, and was succeeded by his son, Tippoo Sahib, who was killed when his capital, Seringapatam, was taken by the English. A prince of the royal family was established as maharajah, under the protection of the English; a brother now holds the title, but since 1832 the administration of the country has been in the hands of the British.

MYSORE, or MAISUR, capital of the above province, 245 miles S.W. of Madras, on the slope of a lofty hill. It was destroyed by Tippoo, but has since been rebuilt by the British. There are a large quadrangular fort inclosing the palace of the maharajah, a British residency, and church. The houses are mostly built of teak. Manf. Carpets. Pop. 58,000; of district of same name, 902,566.

MYTENS, DANIEL, mi'-tens, a Dutch painter, who went to England, and became the best portrait painter at the court of James I. He painted portraits of James I., Prince Rupert, and the dwarf, Sir Jeffrey Hudson. When Vandyke became popular, Mytens retired to the Hague.

Born in Holland, 1590; died about 1660.

NAB, or NAAB, nab, a navigable river of Bavaria, rising in two branches in the Fichtelgebirge, and joining the Danube after a course of 100 miles, 3 miles W. of Ratisbon.

NABAJOA, RIO, na-va-ho'-a, a river of Upper California, falling into the Rio Colorado of California, after an estimated course of 250 miles.

NABAL, na-bal', a town of Tunis, North Africa, on a peninsula in the Gulf of Sydra, 43 miles S.E. of Tunis, near the ruins of the ancient Neapolis. Manf. Pottery. Pop. 4,800.

NABIS, nai'-bis, tyrant of Sparta, whom Philip, king of Macedon, appointed governor of Argos. He was guilty of the greatest cruelties, and had a statue, carved to resemble his wife, which, by springs, would embrace any one that touched it, and then pierce the victim through the body with spikes. This machine Nabis devised as a means of extorting money from his people; and when any one refused, he threatened to introduce him to his wife. He was at length killed.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

NABLUS, or NABULUS, nab-loos', a city of Palestine, the ancient capital of Samaria, 32 miles N. of Jerusalem. It occupies the site of the ancient Shechem, the Sychar of the New Testament. The present name is a corruption of Neapolis (new city). It stretches along a valley between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim. It has several mosques and bazaars. Manf. Soap, and cotton fabrics. It has also a trade in oil, cotton, and agricultural produce. Pop. 10,000, the great majority Mahometans.—Near it are several localities spoken of in Scripture; among which is Jacob's Well.

NABONASSAR, nai-bo-nas'-sar, king of Babylon. He is celebrated by the famous epoch which bears his name, and which commenced in the year 747 B.C. He is supposed to be the same with Baladan, the father of Merodach, mentioned in Scripture.

Lived in the 8th century, B.C.

NABOTH, nai'-both, an Israelite of the city of Jezreel, who had a vineyard near the place of Ahab. Ahab coveted the inheritance of his subject, and, to gain possession of it, his wife Jezebel caused Naboth to be stoned to death.

NACIMENTO, na-se-men'-to, a town of Spain, province of Almeria, 24 miles from the town of that name. It is irregularly built, with narrow streets. There is a trade in corn, maize, oil, wine, and silk. Pop. 3,000.

NACOGDOCHES, na-kog-do'-shes, a town of Texas, United States, on one of the upper branches of the Naches. It was formerly a strong military post of the Spaniards. Pop. 3,000.

NACOGDOCHES, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 886 square miles. Pop. 10,000, about one-third being coloured.

NADAB, nā'-dab, king of Israel, was son of Jeroboam, whom he succeeded B.C. 954. In the second year of his reign, he led "all Israel" against Gibbethon, but was slain during the siege of that city, by Baasha, son of Ahijah, who mounted the throne, and reigned 23 years, during which he "smote all the house of Jeroboam; he left not to Jeroboam any that breathed," as was prophesied by Ahijah the Shilonite.

Lived in the 10th century, B.C.

NADAB, eldest son of Aaron, the high priest. With his brother Abihu he offered unconsecrated fire on the altar, for which he was consumed by fire.

NADIR-SHAH, nā'-dir-shā', called also Tamasp Kouli Khan, king of Persia, and a famous conqueror. He was son of a maker of sheepskin coats, who belonged to the tribe of Affshar, a Turkish tribe, which had attached itself to the king of Persia. From his earliest youth he displayed great courage and boldness. At the age of 17 he was taken prisoner by the Usbeks in one of their annual incursions into Khorassan. After a captivity of four years, he effected his escape, returned to his native country, and subsequently entered the service of the governor of Khorassan, who appointed him to command an army sent against the Tartars. Nadir gained a complete victory with an inferior force, and took the Tartar general prisoner. The governor at first treated him with great distinction; but becoming jealous of his aspiring spirit, he refused him a grade in the army he had promised him, and when Nadir complained of this breach of faith, he caused him to be bastinadoed. Exasperated at this dishonourable treatment, he became the leader of a band of robbers. With this troop he rose to great power. In 1727 he joined Tamasp, son of the monarch of Persia, who had been pushed from the throne by the Affghan conquerors of Persia. His first act was to kill Futteh Ali, the commander of the Persian forces; after which he took the supreme command. In the same year, he drove the Affghans out of Mushed. After several great victories he took Ispahan, and put to death Ashraf, the Affghan king. He next took the name of Tamasp Kouli, or "the slave of Tamasp," and was also ennobled with the title of Khan. He was likewise granted the government of Khorassan, Mazenderan, Seistan, and Kerman, the four finest provinces of the kingdom. But this did not satisfy his ambitious nature, and upon the first opportunity, he deposed Tamasp, whose son, Abbas, an infant eight months old, he proclaimed king, at the same time constituting himself regent. In 1735 he gained the battle of Erivan, in which the Turks lost 50,000 men. The infant monarch died in the same year; upon which Nadir called a great council of the kingdom, at which more than a hundred thousand persons are said to have attended, by whom he was acknowledged king in 1736. With the view of destroying the Affghans as an independent power, he invaded the province of Candahar, and in 1738 the city of that name fell into his power. In the following year he marched into Hindostan, and after defeating the Mogul troops, entered Delhi, where he acquired immense riches, the famous Koh-i-noor diamond being among the jewels appropriated. After his return to Persia, he turned his arms against the king of Bokhara, who was compelled to submit. Nadir next marched along both banks of the Oxus, as far as the Caspian, which territory he conquered, and put its monarch to death in 1740. He had thus secured peace for Persia, whose dominions were extended in every direction. But his last years were characterised by cruel tyranny, which excited universal hatred against him, and at length a conspiracy of some of the highest officers of his court was formed, and he was assassinated. He is now, however, regarded as the great modern hero of Persia.

Born at the village of Abuver, Khorassan, 1688; died 1747.

NÆVIUS, Cnæus, nē'-vi-us, a Latin poet, who served in the first Punic war, upon which he wrote an epic poem. He likewise produced several comedies, one of which was so displeasing to Metellus, the consul, that he expelled him from Rome. Nævius retired to Utica, where he passed the remainder of his days.

Died 204 B.C.

NAFELS, nā'-fels, a village of Switzerland, canton of Glarus, in a valley 5 miles N. of the town of Glarus. The valley was the scene of the great battle in 1388 (still annually commemorated), in which 1,500 Swiss defeated 7,000 Austrians.

NAGA, nā'-ga, in Hindoo mythology, the name of deified serpents, the chief of which is the sacred serpent of Vishnu.

NAGAPATNAM, nā-ga-pat-nam', a seaport of British India, on the Coromandel coast, province of Tanjur, 15 miles S. of Karikal. It is situated on an open sandy plain, and carries on some trade with Ceylon. Pop. 60,000, many of whom are of Dutch descent.

NAGARANU, nā-gar-a-nu', a town of British India, in Oude, 70 miles S.E. of Lucknow. Pop. 6,000.

NAGARJUNA, or NAGASENA, nā-gar-joo'-na, a famous Buddhist teacher, one of a family of Brahmins, who travelled through various countries, and acquired much learning. A wild life leading to repentance, he was converted to Buddhism, and became the founder of the Madhyamika school.

Lived in the 1st or 2nd century B.C.

NAGASAKI, or NANGASAKI, nā'-ga-sā'-ke, an important seaport of Japan, standing on the western side of a peninsula, on the north-west of the island of Kiu-siu. It is regularly built, and is one of the chief commercial cities of Japan, having an excellent harbour, six miles wide and four long. The shops are numerous and well supplied. The foreign settlement, occupied by the British, French, German, Prussian, and Portuguese consulates, lies to the south of the native town, and on the opposite side of the bay are a Russian settlement, and a steam factory under the direction of Dutch officers. There are two government palaces. Behind the town are lofty hills, on the slopes of which are temples dedicated to Sinto, the Japanese sun goddess, and numerous Buddhist temples. Tea, tobacco, camphor, silk, silkworms' eggs, coal, copper, and wax are exported. The port was opened to foreign commerce by the treaty of 1858. Pop. 39,000. Lat. 32° 44′ N. Lon. 129° 44′ E.

NAGOLD, nag'-old, a town of Wurtemberg, circle Schwarzwald, on the Nagold, 26 miles S.W. of Stuttgart. There are a bathing establishment, with mineral springs, and the ruins of an old castle. Manf. Woollens and linen, worsted and leather. Pop. 2,500.

NAGORE, na-gor', a seaport of British India, on the Coromandel coast, 4 miles N. of Negapatam. There are a lofty minaret and several pagodas, forming conspicuous landmarks. There is a considerable trade in piece goods, and many trading vessels belong to the port. Lat. 10° 49' N. Lon. 79° 55' E.

NAGORE, a town of British India, province of Bengal, 63 miles S.W. of Moorshedabad. It is of great antiquity, and was formerly of great strength. There are the ruins of a fine palace, a large tank, and several mosques.

NAGORE, a town of India, in Rajpootana, 68 miles N.E. of Joudpoor. Manf. Articles of brass and iron. Pop. 40,000.

NAGPORE, or CHOTA-NAGPUR, nag-poor', an inland province of British India, in the Bengal presidency. Branches of the great Vindhya mountain range traverse the northern part, and the general slope is towards the Bay of Bengal on the south-east. There are large tracts of low marshy land, and about one-third of the entire area is jungle, abounding in tigers. Rice, maize, oil seeds, and vegetables are cultivated. The capital is Nagpore.

Rivers.—The principal are the Mahanadi and Wain Gangá, the latter a tributary of the Godavary.

Area.—22,343 square miles.

Pop.—4,225,989, including a considerable number of the semi-savage Gonds, supposed to be the Aborigines.

History.—The raj of Nagpore is formed out of a part of the great Mahratta Kingdom. The last of the rajahs died in 1853, and the territory came into the possession of the British.

NAGPORE, or NAGPUR, capital of the above province, situated in a swamp, 430 miles N.E. of Bombay. There are large suburbs, the entire circumference being about seven miles. There are no important buildings, but only mud huts. The British residency is on the Seetabuldee Hills, to the west of the town. Manf. Cotton cloth, chintzes, woollens, silks, brocades, and articles in copper and brass. Pop. 98,300.—In 1817, a native army of 18,000 was defeated here by a British force of only 1,350, commanded by Colonel Scott.

NAGY ENYED. (See ENYED NAGY.)

NAGY KAROLY. (See KAROLY NAGY.)

NAHUM, nai'-hum, one of the twelve minor prophets, was a native of Galilee, and prophesied in the reign of Hezekiah. He prophesied with great force against Nineveh. His language is vehement, and his descriptions glowing.

Lived early in the 8th century B.C.

NAIADS, nai'-ads, in Grecian mythology, nymphs who presided over rivers, springs, wells, and fountains. They generally inhabited the country, and resorted to the woods or meadow near the stream over which they presided. Ægle, according to Virgil, was the fairest of the Naiads.

NAIN, nane, a town of British India, in Oude, 45 miles N.W. of Allahabad. Pop. 10,000.

NAIRN, nairn, a royal, parliamentary, and municipal burgh (one of the Inverness burghs), the county town of Nairnshire, at the mouth of the river Nairn, where it falls into the Moray Firth, 15 miles N. of Inverness. It is a neat little town, with a harbour for small vessels, and excellent accommodation for bathing. A new church was built in 1857, and there is a new marine hotel. The inhabitants prosecute the white, salmon, and herring fisheries. Pop. 5,368.—A station on the Highland railway.

NAIRNSHIRE, a maritime county of Scotland, formerly nearly all included in the ancient province of Moray. It is bounded N. by the Moray Firth, E. and S. by Elginshire, and W. by Inverness-shire. The soil is generally light and sandy, with the exception of a border along the coast, from one to six miles in breadth, and the valley of the river Nairn, which is extremely fertile and well cultivated. The climate is remarkably equable and salubrious. Area, 215 square miles. Pop. 10,454.

NAJIRA, na-hé'-ra, a town of Spain, province of Logrono, on the left bank of the Najerilla, 6 miles W. of Logrono, and once the seat of the court of Navarre, but now in a state of decay. In the Benedictine monastery, 35 members of the royal families of Castile and Navarre are buried. Pop. 2,600.—Here, in 1367, a battle was fought between the troops of Peter the Cruel and his brother Henry.

NAKHICHEVAN, nak-i-che-van', a town of Asiatic Russia, province of Transcaucasia, 80 miles from Erivan. It is mostly in ruins, and claims to be the oldest city in the world, and to have been founded by Noah. Manf. morocco leather and earthenware. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 6,200.

NAKHICHEVAN, a town of European Russia, government of Ekaterinoslav, on the right bank of the Don, 2 miles E. of Rostov. Manf. Woollen goods. There is a considerable trade. Pop. 17,000 mostly Armenians.

NAKHIMOV, NICOLAVITCH, nak-hé'-mof, a Russian poet, who received his education at the university of Moscow; after which he entered the army; but soon quitted it, and devoted himself to literature. Possessed of considerable wealth, he retired to his estates, where he occupied himself with the composition of his "Fables" and a large number of prose satirical pieces. His satire in verse, entitled "The Speaking Monkey," was written in derision of the French, subsequently to the invasion of Russia by Napoleon I. This production is pronounced to be not inferior to the writings of Voltaire.

Born at Kharhov, 1782; died 1814.

NAKSKOV, nak'-skov, a town of Denmark on the island of Laaland. Near it is the old castle of Aalholm, or Christiansholm, once a place of great strength, and attached to which is a fine garden, with a rich collection of exotic plants. Corn is exported. Pop. 3,700.

NALA, na-la', in Indian legend, a king of Nishadha, whose love adventures and troubles were a theme for various Hindoo poets, and the poems have been translated into several European languages.

NALDA, nal'-da, a town of Spain, province of Logrono, on the right bank of the Iregua. There is a trade in fruit, vegetables, and wine. Pop. 4,700.

NAMAQUALAND, GREAT, na-ma'-kwa-land, an extensive region of South Africa, north of Cape Colony, extending along the Atlantic coast from Walvisch Bay, lat. 23° S. to the Orange River, lat. 29° 30' S., and inland to the great Kalihari Desert. There are a few small bays on the coast, but not one river discharging into the ocean. It is generally a barren region, rising in the northern part into extensive and lofty plateaux, and towards the coast are vast sandy downs. Cattle are reared; there are productive fisheries off the coast, and the little island of Ichaboe is valuable for the rich deposits of guano. Lions, giraffes, hippopotami, and other large game are numerous, and there are large herds of eland, gemsbok, and other antelopes; the snakes are venomous. Copper ore appears to be abundant. The great extremes of climate, very cold in early morning, and tropical heat at noon, are very trying to English constitutions. Pop. Probably 40,000, consisting chiefly of wandering tribes of Namaquas. The country was first visited by an English traveller, Sir J. Alexander, in 1837.

NAMAQUALAND, LITTLE, a division in the N. part of the Western Province of Cape Colony, bounded—on the N. by the Orange River; S. by the Divisions of Clanwilliam and Calvinia; E. by Bushmanland; and W. by the Atlantic Ocean. The coast line, 100 miles long, is rocky, and there are only a few small bays, but there is safe anchorage at Port Nolloth and Hondeklip. The district is a vast expanse of barren and rugged country, perfectly waterless, with an almost rainless climate, and chiefly valuable for its immense mineral wealth, as yet but partially developed. That part known as Bushmanland is a large table-land, 3,000 feet above the sea. The rivers, except the Orange, are only periodical torrents, frequently dry. Along the coast the country is covered with deep sand, making transport difficult, but a railway across the desert conveys the copper ores of the mountains to the port of shipment. The seat of magistracy is Springbok Fontein, about 60 miles from the coast.

Minerals.—The most valuable is copper, and the district being remarkably rich in the ores they are well worked. Argentiferous lead is known to be abundant, but has not yet been worked. Some silver ore has also been found.

Area.—21,000 square miles.

Pop.—10,000.

NAMIESCHT, na-meescht', a market town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, on the Oslawa, 27 miles N. of Znaim. On the opposite side of the river is an old castle, now used as a cloth factory. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 3,200.

NAMSLAU, nams'-lou, a walled town of Prussia, in Silesia, on the left bank of the Weida, 31 miles E. of Breslau. There are a castle and two churches. Manf. Woollens, linen, and ribbons. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 5,000.

NAMUR, na'-moor, a province of Belgium, bounded S. by the French frontier, N. by the provinces of Brabant and Liége, W. by Hainault, and E. by Luxembourg. The surface of the country is generally undulating, with fertile valleys, and there are large tracts of bog and heath on the south-west. Some offshoots of the Ardennes are of considerable elevation and well wooded. There are abundant crops of grain and flax, and fine pastures.

Rivers.—The Meuse, Sambre, and Lesse.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, lead, coal, marble, slate, sulphur, and alum.

Area.—1,414 square miles.

Pop.—331,095.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 3 arrondissements, named after the principal towns, NAMUR, DINANT, and LUNEVILLE.

History.—In the 11th and 12th centuries, Namur was an independent countship. It was then united to Luxembourg, and in the 13th century, purchased by the house of Flanders, in whose possession it remained till 1420, when it was sold to Philip, duke of Burgundy.

NAMUR (Flemish NAMEN), the capital of the foregoing province, stands at the conflux of the Sambre and the Meuse, 30 miles from Liége. It is well built, with wide and clean streets, and is defended by a citadel, built in 1772, on the summit of a craggy rock. The cathedral, St. Aubin's, a modern edifice, is very beautiful, and there are 16 other churches, (some fine edifices, especially St. Loup, Notre Dame, St. Nicholas, St. Joseph, and St. Jean Baptiste), the town hall, and a belfry tower, 2 colleges, a conservatoire of music, an academy of painting, and a museum. Manf. Fire-arms, swords, knives, scissors, and other articles of iron, copper, and brass, leather, paper, thread, and tobacco. Pop. 27,067.—Namur has often changed masters, and is noted for the long siege which it sustained in 1692, against Louis XIV.; and again in 1695, against William III. of England. In the beginning of the 18th century it was seized by the French, but in 1713 was ceded to Austria. In 1746 it was taken by the French, but restored to the Dutch in 1748. In 1792 it was taken by the French; in 1793 retaken by the Austrians. In 1794 it was again occupied by the French, who defended it against the Prussians in 1815. After the battle of Waterloo, it was annexed to the Netherlands. Under the French empire it was the capital of the department Sambre-et-Meuse.

NAN-CHANG-FOO, nan-tchang-foo', a city of China, capital of the province of Keang-se, on the right bank of the Kan-Kiang, surrounded by a wall 6 miles in circumference. Pop. Large, but unascertained. Lat. 28° 24′ N. Lon. 115° 40′ E.

NANA SAHIB, an adopted son of Bajee Rao, Pieshwa of Poonah, India. He was well-educated, and had polished manners. On the outbreak of the great mutiny, he joined the rebels and besieged Cawnpore, which he took; and massacred in the most horrible manner all the British residents, without respect to age or sex. (See CAWNPORE.) He was defeated by Sir H. Havelock at Futtehpore, but made his escape. He is supposed to have died shortly afterwards of fever, but some doubt on the matter existed, and various arrests of persons supposed to be the veritable Nana have since been made, the mistakes, however, being speedily discovered.

Born, 1824.

NANAS, na-nas', a town of Hungary, county Szabolcz, on the borders of an extensive morass, 50 miles E. of Erlau. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church. A considerable trade in cattle and agricultural produce is carried on. Pop. 11,500.

NANCHE, nan-tché', a town of China, province of Che-keang, on the Horay-chow, 40 miles W. of Yen-chow-foo. It is said to resemble an English town in appearance. There is a large trade by boats. Pop. 200,000.

NANCOWRY, nan-kow'-re, one of the Nicobar islands, in the Bay of Bengal. It is about 25 miles in circumference and very fertile, yielding cocoa-nuts, tamarinds, limes, betel nuts, and a species of bread-fruit. Lat. 7° 57′ N. Lon. 93° 43′ E.

NANCY, nan'-se (Fr. nan-se'), a city of France, capital of the department Meurthe-et-Moselle, on the Meurthe, 30 miles S. of Metz. It is divided into the Old and New towns and has two suburbs. The fortifications were destroyed by Louis XIV. The gates are particularly fine, and are more like triumphal arches than the mere entrance of a city. The Place Royale (communicating by a triumphal arch with the Place Carrière), built by Stanislaus, ex-King of Poland (a statue of whom is in the centre), contains some of the finest buildings in the town. Of its public edifices, the chief are the town-hall, the cathedral, a large modern edifice, the church of St. Sebastian, the church of Notre Dame, and the theatre, all in the New town; the Palais de Justice, exchange, the arsenal, and barracks. Manf. Embroidery, for which it is celebrated, woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics, and candles. Pop. 73,225.—In 1475, this place was taken by Charles the Bold, and in 1477 he was killed here, while besieging it. In 1634, it was taken by Louis XIII.

NAN-HIOUNG, or NAN-YANG, he-eung', a town of China, on the northern frontier of the province of Kwang-tung; near the source of the Pe-kiang, 175 miles N.E. of Canton. There is a large port for junks from Canton.

NANI, JOHN BAPTIST, na'-ne, a Venetian historian, who in 1641 was admitted of the college of senators, and sent ambassador to France. He returned to Venice in 1648, having obtained from Louis XIII. considerable succour for carrying on the war against the Turks. In 1654 he was sent as ambassador to Germany, where he rendered great services to the republic. He continued to serve his country on many great occasions, and was appointed procurator of St. Mark. He wrote the History of Venice.

Born 1616; died 1678.

NANKIN, or NANKING, or KIAN-NING-FOO, nan'-kin, "the southern capital," a city of China, capital of Keang-soo province, and formerly the capital of China. It is situate on the river Yang-tse-kiang, and the space inclosed by the walls (70 feet high, and 30 thick at base), nearly 20 miles in circumference, is divided into the inhabited and uninhabited parts. The former lies to the west, away from the river. There is a Mantchoo military colony, or garrison, separated by a wall from that portion occupied by the Chinese. Its chief ornaments now are the gateways, which are very lofty and splendid, with temples attached to them. Beyond the modern city are the remains of the summer palace of the emperor, and the "tomb of the kings," supposed to be the Ming dynasty. The famous porcelain tower, 322 feet high, erected by the emperor Yang-Loh in the 15th century, was totally destroyed by the rebels, during their occupation of the town between 1853 and 1864. Manf. Artificial flowers, paper, crape, satin, China or Indian ink, and nankeen, which derives its name from that of the city. It is the centre of a very extensive trade. Pop. recorded as 150,000. Lat. 32° 40′ N. Lon. 118° 47′ E.

NANNI, JOHN, nan'-ne, an Italian ornamental artist, who received instructions from Raffaelle, and decorated the Vatican with groups of birds, plants, fruits, &c.

Born at Udine, 1490; died 1564.

NANSEMOND, nanse'-mond, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 444 square miles. Pop. 15,903, about half being coloured. The capital is Suffolk.

NANTERRE, nan-tair', a town of France, department Seine, 6 miles N.W. of Paris. The chapel of St. Geneviève, is much resorted to by pilgrims. Manf. Glue and chemicals. Large numbers of pigs are slaughtered for the Paris market. Pop. 4,000.

NANTES, nants (Fr. nant), a commercial city and seaport of France, the capital of the department Loire Inférieure, on the right bank and several islands of the Loire, 30 miles from the mouth. The river, crossed by a magnificent stone bridge, or rather a succession of bridges, extending in nearly a straight line over several islands. There are other bridges, especially the Exchange bridge, rebuilt in 1866. Immediately below the town, the different branches unite into a single channel. The older parts of the town have been rebuilt, and Nantes is now one of the most beautiful towns of France. The public edifices are, the cathedral of St. Pierre, containing splendid monuments of Duke Francis, of Bretagne and his wife, a new church, St. Nicholas, completed in 1854, the town-hall, mint, and the prefecture; the old castle, built in 938, situate on the quay, at the eastern extremity of the town, and in a good state of repair, a theatre, college, museum, public library, observatory, and a magazine of munitions for the marine. The quays are two miles long, affording fine promenades, and there is a beautiful public walk, the Cours St. Pierre and the Cours St. André, planted with trees, ornamented by statues, and bordered by noble residences. The harbour is large, and will accommodate vessels of considerable size. Manf. Woollen and linen goods, cordage, earthenware, glass, musical and mathematical instruments, sugar, chemicals, leather, hardware, and spirituous liquors. Shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent. The foreign trade of Nantes, though not great, extends to a number of different countries in Europe, as well as to America, the West Indies, and in a small degree to the coast of Guinea. The canal of Nantes connects the Vilaine and the Loire. Pop. 124,319. Nantes is noted in history for the celebrated edict issued there in 1598, by Henry IV., in favour of the Protestants, the recall of which, in 1685, by Louis XIV., is justly considered a fatal error in that memorable reign. In 1793 the town was attacked without success by a Vendean army.

NANTEUIL, ROBERT, nan'-te(r)-e, a celebrated French miniature-painter and engraver, who drew the portrait of Louis XIV., in crayons, with such elegance, that the king appointed him designer and engraver to his cabinet. His engravings of portraits are highly valued.

Born at Rheims, 1630; died at Paris, 1678.

NANTUA, nan'-too-a, a town of France, department Ain, in a gorge of the Jura, at the eastern extremity of a lake of the same name, 20 miles E. of Bourg. There is an abbey church, in the Romanesque style. Manf. Cotton, muslin, cashmere, silk, carpets, woollen threads, combs, paper, and nails. There is a trade in corn, wine, and cheese. Pop. 3,700.

NANTUCKET, nan-tuk'-et, an island of Massachusetts, United States, in the Atlantic, 20 miles from the mainland. Ext. 15 miles long, with a breadth of 4 miles.

NANTUCKET, a township and port on the above island, 123 miles from Boston. There is a good harbour. Manf. Woollen ropes, and there are corn and fulling-mills. Pop. 4,200.

NANTWICH, or NAMPTWICH, nant'-wich, a market-town of Chester, on the Weaver, 19 miles S.E. of Chester. It consists of several regular streets, and many of the houses are ancient and picturesque. The church is an ancient building, in the form of a cross, and was restored in 1864. The Chester canal terminates here with a handsome broad basin, forming a kind of harbour. In the beginning of the 18th century, large mines of rock-salt were discovered here. The salt-quarries, with their pillars and crystal roof, afford a very curious and singular appearance. Manf. Cotton goods, shoes, and gloves. Pop. 7,483.—A station on the Great Western and London and North Western railways.

NAOS, na'-ose, a port of the Canary Islands, on the south-east coast of Lanzarote.

NAPA, na'-pa, a county of California, United States. Area, 828 square miles. Pop. 13,235. The capital is Napa City.

NAPHA, nap-ha', a town on the south-western shore of the island of Great Loo-choo, in the North Pacific, 3 miles S.W. of Shendi or Shui, the capital, of which it is the port. It is a large and busy town, with very good streets, a temple, and Chinese and English educational establishments. There are two harbours.

NAPIER, JOHN, Laird of Merchiston, napeer', a Scotch mathematician. He was educated at St. Andrews, after which he travelled for some years on the continent. After his return to Scotland, he published, in 1593, a work professing to be an interpretation of the Book of Revelations. He then devoted considerable attention to the invention of warlike machines of amazing power, and in 1596 proposed the use of salt as manure, a proposition laughed at at the time, though now adopted. In 1614 he published the method of superseding long and laborious arithmetical operations by the invention of his logarithmic tables, which, says Laplace, in his "Système du Monde," "by reducing to a few days the labour of many months, doubles, as it were, the life of an astronomer, besides freeing him from the errors and disgust inseparable from long calculations." The principles of this great invention were detailed by Napier in two works, published in the years 1614 and 1619. Besides other works, he wrote a curious pamphlet, entitled, "Secret Inventions profitable and necessary in these Days for the Defence of the Island," the original of which is kept in the archbishop of Canterbury's library at Lambeth, and the description of an invention for simplifying calculations, known as "Napier's bones."

Born at Merchiston Castle, near Edinburgh, 1550; died at the same place, 1617.

NAPIER, SIR CHARLES JAMES, a distinguished modern general, descendant, by the female line, from the preceding. Before he attained his 12th year, he obtained his commission as ensign in the 22nd regiment. His first services were during the Irish rebellion of 1798. In 1806 he became captain, and was ordered to Spain, where he held the command of the 50th foot during the memorable retreat of Sir John Moore upon Corunna. At the battle which terminated that terrible march, he was wounded in five places, was taken prisoner, and, on repairing to England upon parole, he found his relatives in mourning for his supposed death. Remaining for some time without a command, he occupied himself with writing upon military law, colonization, and the state of Ireland; but, in 1811, he again went to Spain as a volunteer, received a severe wound at Busaco, participated in the terrible battle of Fuentes de Onoro, and was present at the second siege of Badajoz. His next services were in North America, in the year 1813. There he especially distinguished himself by cruising off the Chesapeake, capturing American vessels, and making descents on the coast. He returned to Europe, and, although a few days too late to share in the British triumph at Waterloo, was present at the storming of Cambray; and when the British army entered Paris, he accompanied it. His great talents for administration were first displayed while governor of Cephalonia, to which post he was nominated in 1818. In that capacity he co-operated with Lord Byron in a scheme for the independence of the Greeks. In 1841 he was sent out to India as commander-in-chief of the Bengal army, and, in a short time, his energetic mind was busy with numberless plans of military reform. Upon the arrival of Lord Ellenborough, who had been created governor-general of India, Sir Charles Napier submitted to him a plan for an Affghan campaign. The Ameers of Scinde were at that period strongly disposed to dispute the authority of British arms, the prestige of which had been much shaken by the recent disasters in Affghanistan. Napier decided to attack them at once; he invaded their territory, blew up the fortress of Emaum Ghur (hitherto deemed impregnable), and finally routed them with immense slaughter at the battle of Meanee, in 1843, although he had only 1,600 men, and the enemy were 60,000 strong. A few days afterwards, at Hyderabad, Napier, with only 5,000 men, gained a decisive victory over Shere Mahomed with 25,000, and made himself master of Scinde. His military operations brought to an end; his great talents for administration came into play in his capacity of governor of Scinde, but his quick temper involved him in quarrels with the directors of the East India Company. In 1847 he returned to England, where he was enthusiastically received. During the reverses of the Sikh campaign, however, he was once more called upon to repair to India. The Duke of Wellington, it is said, sent for Napier, and said, "Either you or I must go to India." Napier set out immediately; but when he reached the country, the tide of battle had turned, and the Sikhs were utterly defeated. He set seriously to work on the subject of army reform, but he returned to his native country in 1850. From that time, his shattered frame, worn out by so many fatigues, began to grow rapidly weaker and weaker, till, three years after his return, his gallant soul passed away in death, under the colours of his first regiment, the 22nd foot. He was impetuous and irascible in temper, but possessed of extraordinary military abilities and dauntless courage, and beloved by the army, and he was the first English general who mentioned in despatches the names of private soldiers who had distinguished themselves. A statue, in bronze, of Sir Charles Napier, was erected, by subscription, in Trafalgar Square.

Born in London, 1782; died at Oaklands, near Portsmouth, 1853.

NAPIER, SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS PATRICK, a British general and distinguished military historian, brother of the preceding. Like him, he entered the army at an early age, being only 15 when he was gazetted to his first commission as ensign, in 1800. He was engaged at the siege of Copenhagen in 1807, served under Sir John Moore at Corunna, and passed through the subsequent campaigns in the Spanish peninsula till its conclusion in 1814. He was severely wounded at Cazal Nova, during Massena's retreat from Portugal, and again while defending the churchyard of Arcangues. At the peace he had attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1828 he published the first instalment of his great work, entitled "The History of the War in the Peninsula and the South of France, from the Year 1807 to the Year 1814," which was completed, in six volumes, in 1840. Two years afterwards, by which time he had reached the grade of major-general, he was nominated lieutenant-governor of Guernsey; which post he held till 1848, when he became knight commander of the order of the Bath. His other publications were "The Conquest of Scinde," "History of General Sir Charles Napier's Administration of Scinde, and Campaign in the Cutchee Hills," and some pamphlets connected with military matters. His "History of the Peninsular War" occupied him during sixteen years, and both the duke of Wellington and Marshal Soult supplied him with valuable materials during its composition. The many editions this work has passed through, and the high estimation in which it is held, attest its great merits. There is a monument to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Born at Castletown, Kildare, Ireland, 1785; died 1860.

NAPIER, SIR GEORGE THOMAS, brother of the preceding, served in all the campaigns in the Peninsula, was present at the battles of Talavera and Orthes, and was wounded at the battle of Talavera and at the siege of Ciudad-Rodrigo. He was sent out as governor of the Cape in 1837, where he effected many civil reforms, and dealt successfully with the Boers and Kaffirs. He returned to England in 1844, and, while staying in Italy, in 1849, was offered the command of the Piedmontese army, which he refused. Shortly afterwards, he attained the rank of lieutenant-general.

Born in London, 1784; died at Geneva, 1855.

NAPIER, SIR CHARLES JOHN, British admiral, cousin of the preceding, and grandson of the 5th Lord Napier. In 1799, at the age of 13, he entered the navy, and served in the North Sea, on board the Martin sloop of war. In the following year he went to the Mediterranean station, where he took part in several minor actions. In 1808 he had his thigh broken by a shot, during an engagement between the Recruit brig, of which he was the commander, and a French corvette. In 1809 he displayed signal bravery at the taking of Martinique, being the first to scale the walls. For this and some subsequent services he was created post-captain; after which he served as volunteer on land in Spain. In 1811, while in command of the Thames, 32 guns, he stormed the heights near Palinuro, in Sicily, under a tremendous fire, and captured a number of the enemy's merchant vessels. He was engaged in 1814 in North America, where he won for himself the thanks of his superior officer for his bravery during the operations which took place before Baltimore. At the conclusion of the war, in 1815, he struck his flag and went ashore; upon which he was created C.B. He remained without employment during 14 years, living for some time in Paris, where he established the first steamer on the Seine; but, in 1829, he was appointed to the command of the Galatea, 42 guns, and was sent to Portugal to procure the restoration of some ships which Don Miguel had seized. As commander of the Portuguese fleet, he, in 1833, gained a victory over Don Miguel's squadron; for which service Don Pedro created him admiral of the Portuguese fleet and Viscount Capo Santo Vincent, adding to these honours the order of the Tower and Sword. He resigned this command, however, at a later period, and returned to England. In 1839 he was appointed captain of the Powerful, 84 guns, and second in command of the Mediterranean squadron under Sir Robert Stopford. In this capacity he maintained his former reputation for personal fearlessness, and took a distinguished part in the storming of Sidon, the defeat of Ibrahim Pasha at Beyrout, and the taking of Acre. He blockaded Alexandria, and concluded a convention with Mehemet Ali. For these services he received the thanks of parliament, and was created K.C.B., as well as obtaining several military and naval orders from the European potentates. He was shortly afterwards created rear-admiral, and, during two years, commanded the Channel fleet. In 1841, he was elected member for Marylebone, and republished his letters upon Naval Reform, in which, amongst many other important suggestions, he advocated the abolition of flogging. In 1854 he was appointed to the command of the Baltic fleet, about to be dispatched against the forts and ships of Russia in that sea. His operations in that quarter induced a large amount of ill-feeling between himself and the ministry of the day. It is true, he himself declared, in an after-dinner speech, that, in less than a month, he would be within Cronstadt; while, after his return, he maintained that the fortress was impregnable. He returned to England at the end of the year 1855, and was soon afterwards elected to parliament by the borough of Southwark, in the place of the late Sir William Molesworth. He soon engaged in a parliamentary warfare with the ministry, whom he charged with fettering him with galling restrictions, and with otherwise hampering him during his command in the Baltic. A few years before his death, he paid a visit to Russia, where he had an interview with the grand-duke Constantine, who agreed with him in asserting Cronstadt to be impregnable. Sir Charles Napier undoubtedly possessed all the personal bravery and daring which belonged to his name, and a strong spice of the family vanity and irritability withal. A good sailor, and a good friend of the British sailor, he was undoubtedly.

Born at Merchiston Hall, N.B., 1786; died 1860.

NAPIER, ROBERT CORNELIS, Baron Napier of Magdala, was educated at Addiscombe Military Academy, and entered the Bengal Engineers when 16 years of age. For nearly 20 years he was in the Public Works Department, and superintended the construction of barracks, especially at Umballa. He took part in several of the fiercest battles of the Sikh war, and was afterwards engineer at Lahore. In 1848 he was senior engineer at the siege of Mooltan, and the following year was appointed engineer-in-chief of the Punjab, where he constructed canals, roads, and barracks. He was in England on sick leave when the great mutiny of 1857 broke out, but quickly returned to India, and was chief of the staff to Outram's relieving force at Lucknow, where he was wounded. He was knighted for his services, and appointed engineer-in-chief at Lucknow under Sir Colin Campbell. In the following year he distinguished himself under Sir Hugh Rose in Central India and Rajpootana against Tantia Topee, and in 1860 commanded a division in Sir Hope Grant's expedition to China. In 1861, he was raised to the rank of major-general, made a Knight of the Bath, and military member of the governor-general's Council, and in 1865 lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief of the Bombay army. He was selected for the command of the military expedition to Abyssinia in 1867, and superintended the whole of the arrangements, achieving the objects of the expedition in the most successful manner. For this important service he was raised to the peerage, received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, was granted an annuity of £2,000 a year, and made G.C.B. and Knight of the Star of India. In 1870 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of India, and in 1876 governor of Gibraltar.

Born in Ceylon, 1810.

NAPIER, chief town of the province of Hawke's Bay, North Island, New Zealand, on a peninsula in the estuary of the rivers Esk and Tuttaekuri, on the east coast, 370 miles S.E. of Auckland. There is a harbour for small vessels. There are an Anglican and a Roman Catholic church, and places of worship for Presbyterians and Wesleyans, several good hotels and banks. The bishop of Waiapu resides here. Pop. 6,600.

NAPIERVILLE, a county of the province of Quebec, dominion of Canada. Area, 152 square miles. Pop. 11,700, the greater part of French origin. The capital is Napierville.

NAPLES, FRANCIS MARIE-LEOPOLD, ex-King of, was the son of Ferdinand II., by Maria Theresa Isabella, daughter of the archduke Charles of Austria. He succeeded his father Ferdinand II. in 1859, having previously married the princess Maria Sophia Amelia, daughter of Maximilian Joseph, king of Bavaria. From the outset of his reign he evinced a disposition to pursue the same arbitrary and detestable rule as his father. He was deposed, and fled 1860.

Born 1836.

NAPLES, or THE TWO SICILIES, Kingdom of, nai'-pels, a former kingdom of Italy, comprising the southern portion of the Italian peninsula and the island of Sicily. (See ITALY.)

History.—This portion of Italy was subjugated by the Normans under Roger Guiscard, in 1131; and about the end of the 12th century the German imperial house of Hohenslaufen obtained possession of the kingdom by marriage, but their power was destroyed by Manfred, at the battle of Benevento, in 1266. For 250 years the country was the scene of incessant dynastic conflicts, and in 1503, Naples became a Spanish province. During the war of the Spanish Succession, Austria obtained possession, and the continental portion of the kingdom was secured to that power by the treaties of Utrecht and Radstadt, the island of Sicily being handed over to Savoy, about 1725; they were reunited under Don Carlos, third son of Philip V. of Spain, who founded the Bourbon dynasty. From 1808 to 1815, Joachim Murat, the French general, was king of Naples; but the Bourbons were restored by the Peace of 1815, and, notwithstanding the deceit and tyranny of the sovereigns, lasted until 1860, when the king was deposed, and Naples became a portion of the kingdom of Italy.

NAPLES, or NAPOLI, a province of the kingdom of Italy, a part of the old kingdom. This is the most beautiful and fertile of all the Italian provinces. The eastern part is mountainous, being traversed by part of the Apennines. It is divided into five districts. Area, 429 square miles. Pop. 1,013,592. The chief town is NAPLES.

NAPLES, BAY OF, an indentation of the Mediterranean, on the south-west coast of Italy. It is 20 miles long from Cape Miseno on the north-west to Cape Campanella on the south-east, and the greatest width is 10 miles. The scenery is very beautiful.

NAPLES, a city of Italy, former capital of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and now of the province of Napoli, situate on the Bay of Naples, near the foot of Mount Vesuvius. The situation of Naples is one of the most delightful that can be imagined. In the form of an amphitheatre, it is built partly on the declivity of two hills, partly on the margin of a spacious bay, and covering the shelving coasts and adjacent eminences with its villas and gardens. The streets, though in general narrow, are straight and tolerably regular, and are handsomely paved with large flags of lava. The city is divided into the Old and New Towns, the former on the east, containing the chief public buildings; the latter more regularly laid out, extending along the shore, and having many fine palaces and beautiful gardens. The new town is known as the Chiaia, or quay. A broad promenade along the shore is connected with the Villa Nazionale, a noble pleasure-ground and fashionable resort, 5,000 feet long, 200 feet wide, planted with evergreens, oaks, and acacias, and with winding paths, temples, grottoes, and a terrace extending into the sea. The most noticeable gate is the Capua gate, or Porta Capuana, with fine bas-reliefs, on the eastern side of the town. The Strada di Toledo, extending half the length of the city, and having at the northern end the Piazza di Mercato, or market-place; on the southern the royal palace, is the finest street in Naples, and equal to any in Europe. The number of squares is considerable; several are spacious, but few handsome. The principal are the Largo di Castello, the Largo di Palazzo, and Piazza di Mercato; several of them are decorated with obelisks and fountains. The buildings of Naples are rather remarkable for their size than for their taste or elegance. The quays and buildings along the water-side extend, in the form of a crescent, along the bay, for the space of nearly five miles. The line east of the harbour is known as the Strada Nueva, and the Marinella. Beyond the Porta del Carmen, crossing the Strada Toledo, near the Piazza di Mercato, in an eastern direction, is a broad street, Strada Trinita, and further north, in a parallel direction, the Strada de Tribunel, leading to the Piazza de Tribunel. From the Piazza delle Pigne (an open space in the northern part of the city) is a very wide road, the Strada San Carlo dell' Arena, leading to the Botanical Garden. The harbour, properly so called, is small, and is entirely artificial, being formed by a large mole projecting into the sea, and inclosing a basin nearly square, which is little more than a quarter of a mile across. The arsenal adjoins the sea, and is defended by bastions. There are several fortifications, the chief being the Castel Nuovo, near the harbour, with a fine triumphal arch, erected in honour of Alfonso of Aragon; the Castel dell' Ovo (or egg-shaped), on a bold promontory, or rather island, connected by a bridge with the mainland, and the Castel Sant' Elmo, on the hill of Martino, west of the new town, a fortress of immense strength, from the ramparts of which a noble view is obtained. Of the public edifices, the churches (nearly 300 in number), are the most conspicuous; but their splendour consists less in the elegance of architecture than in the richness of their paintings, marbles, and other decorations. The cathedral, dedicated to St. Gennaro, or Januarius, in the Strada de Tribunel, is built on or near the substructure of a temple of Apollo, is a handsome Gothic edifice, is supported by more than a hundred columns of granite. It is here that the miracle of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius is said to take place twice a year, and there are some interesting historical tombs and statues. The Santi Apostoli, or Church of the Holy Apostles, erected on the ruins of a temple of Mercury, is, perhaps, the most ancient in Naples it is supposed to have been founded by Constantine the Great. That of St. Paul is said to occupy the site of a temple of Castor and Pollux; its interior is spacious, well-proportioned, and finely incrusted with marble. The church of St. Filippo Neri is remarkable for the number of ancient pillars that support its triple row of aisles on both sides of the nave. The Spirito Santo is of a more pure and simple architecture than the other churches of Naples. The Santa Chiara, or second cathedral, is one of the finest. The royal palace, Palazzo Reale, is an immense building in three different styles of architecture. The palace of Capo di Monte, on an eminence to the north of the town, was formerly the summer residence of the sovereign; it has a fine collection of sculptures and paintings, and is surrounded by beautiful gardens. The Museo Borbonico has a noble library, and collection of gems and antiquities from Pompeii and Herculaneum. The university (occupying the buildings of an old convent, near the centre of the old town), was founded in 1224, and has 1,500 students. Attached to it is the hospital and school of Gesù Maria. The schools and academies are numerous. The charitable establishments are many and well endowed. The Hospital dell' Annunziata is chiefly intended for foundlings. There are several theatres, the largest being that of San Carlo, near the palace. Manf. Silk fabrics, stockings, carpets, flannels, gloves, lawn, lace, cotton stuffs, diaper, firearms, china, glass, soap, leather, wax, musical instruments, furniture and carriages, snuff-boxes from lava and tortoise-shell, printing-types, and iron; but the most important of all the manufactures is that of macaroni. Pop. about 476,089. Lat. 40° 51′ N. Lon. 14° 15′ E.

History.—The origin of this city is lost in the fables of antiquity; it is said, however, to have been founded by the Greeks, and named Parthenope, and afterwards Neapolis. It has suffered, at different periods, from war, earthquakes, and the eruptions of Vesuvius. In 1799 it was taken by the French, who, in June following, evacuated it, but again occupied it in 1806. Joseph Bonaparte was soon afterwards proclaimed king; and in 1808, on his removal to Spain, the crown was conferred on Murat. In 1815, king Ferdinand, after an absence of nine years, made his entrance into his capital. In 1848 it was plundered by the lazzaroni, of whom 1,500 lost their lives. In August, 1860, Francis II. was forced to retire to Gaeta, on the approach of Garibaldi, the Italian liberator, from Salerno. (See NAPLES, Kingdom of.) Among the numerous objects of interest in the vicinity are the island of Capri, in the bay, Vesuvius, Herculaneum, and Pompeii. It is the centre of several railways.

NAPO, RIO, na′-po, a river of Ecuador, South America, rising in the mountain deserts of Cotopaxi, and, after an estimated course of 530 miles, joining the Amazon, in lat. 3° 25′ S., lon. 71° 38′ W.

NAPOLEON I., NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, na-polé′-yon (Fr. NAPOLÉON, na-po′-lai-on), emperor of the French, was the second son of Charles Bonaparte, assessor to the Royal tribunal of the island of Corsica. At the age of 10 years, the young Napoleon, a "dusky-complexioned, taciturn boy," obtained admission to the celebrated military school of Brienne, through the interest of Count de Marbœuf. He remained there during five years, distinguishing himself by his steady application to his studies. In 1784 he passed to the Royal Military School at Paris, which establishment he left a year afterwards, upon his appointment as sub-lieutenant to an artillery regiment. He paid two visits to Corsica, in the years 1790 and 1792, but was banished from the island by Paoli in the latter year. For about a year he resided at Marseilles with his mother and sisters, but was created captain in 1793, for having cannonaded the Marseilles federalists. In the same year he petitioned the Convention for employment, was made lieutenant-colonel, and was sent to the siege of Toulon, then holding out against the Convention, and supported by an English fleet under Lord Hood. Now came Napoleon's opportunity, and the astute Corsican was quick to avail himself of it. Several attacks had been made, and had failed, when young Napoleon suggested an entirely new plan of attack. The plan was tried, and was perfectly successful, the English admiral being compelled to put to sea. Toulon surrendered, and Napoleon was created general of brigade by the Committee of Public Safety. In 1794 he was attached to the army of the Alps, as commander of the artillery, but becoming an object of suspicion with the government, he was recalled to Paris, and had his name struck off the army roll. For some time he remained in poverty and obscurity, and at one period thought of offering his sword to the Turks. The Parisian insurrection of the 13th Vendémiaire (4th Oct. 1795) changed his situation. His friend and admirer Barras was appointed by the Convention to command the 6,000 troops they had at disposal. Barras chose Napoleon as his second in command. He repulsed 40,000 insurgents, killing some 1,200 of them with grapeshot. The Convention rewarded him by creating him general of division, and appointing him to the command of the army of the Interior. In the following year he married Josephine, widow of Viscount de Beauharnais, who had lost his head during the Reign of Terror. Shortly afterwards he received the command of the army of Italy, then in a defeated and disorganised condition. In a year and a half, the "little corporal," as he came to be called by his admiring soldiery, had either routed or destroyed four armies, each stronger than his own,—that of Beilieau, at Cairo, Montenotte, Millesimo, Dego, and the Bridge of Lodi; that of Würmser, at Castiglione, Roveredo, and Bassano; that of Alvinzi, at Arcola, Rivoli, and Mantua; and that of Prince Charles, whom he pursued into Germany as far as Leoben, upon the road to Vienna. The result of this unexampled career of victory was the treaty of Campo-Formio, which secured to France a vast accession of territory. The young general was now the most popular man in France, and the Directory, eager to get rid of their dangerous rival, accepted a proposal made by him for the invasion of Egypt, and appointed him commander-in-chief of a finely-equipped expedition, which sailed for the East in 1798. He sailed from Toulon, with 30,000 men, and a number of savans to investigate the antiquities of the country. He took Alexandria, gained the battle of the Pyramids over Murad Bey, and, although the fleet had been destroyed by Nelson at Aboukir, the French were soon masters of Egypt. Disturbances at Cairo were suppressed by terrible massacres, and then Bonaparte went into Syria, took Jaffa by storm from the Turks, and attempted, but unsuccessfully, to capture Acre, the defence of which was aided by Sir Sidney Smith, the English admiral, with a small force of sailors. Bonaparte retreated to Egypt, and defeated a Turkish army at Aboukir. Suddenly, quitting his army, having heard of disasters in Italy and confusion in France, he set sail for France, and, after narrowly missing capture by the English cruisers, appeared, unexpectedly, at Paris, at the end of the year 1799, at a time when the administration of the Directory had grown irksome to the nation. Bonaparte at once became the head of a very powerful party, and, aided by Sièyes, his brother Lucien, and General Leclerc, he overthrew the Directory on the famous 18th Brumaire, year 8 of the Republic (9th Nov. 1799), caused himself to be named first consul, having for his colleagues Cambacères and Lebrun, also dignified by the title of consul, but mere tools to his ambition. In 1800 he placed himself at the head of the army of Italy, crossed the Alps, and gained the battle of Marengo. General Moreau having about the same time beaten the Austrians at Hohenlinden, the peace of Luneville was signed with Austria in 1801, and in the following year the treaty of Amiens with England concluded the second war of the French Revolution. In the same year he was proclaimed consul for life, and displayed amazing administrative ability and energy. Under his direction the famous Code Napoleon was compiled, and public works were forwarded. In 1803 England renewed the war, and Bonaparte assembled an immense army at Boulogne intending to invade England, but so active and powerful was the English fleet, that he abandoned the idea of attempting to cross the Channel. About this time he committed an act which forms one of the foulest blots upon his memory. Some time previously his life had been threatened by a plot, in which the Bourbon princes were implicated. Resolved to make an example of one of them, he caused the young duc d'Enghien to be seized, and after a disgraceful mockery of a trial, the innocent prince was shot at Vincennes. Napoleon gloried in this odious act. "I had never personally offended these Bourbons," he wrote, "a great nation had chosen me to govern it, almost all Europe had sanctioned its choice. My blood, after all, was not ditch-water, and it was time to place it on a par with theirs." In 1804 he became emperor of the French. Pope Pius VII. went to Paris to assist at the ceremony, but Napoleon placed the crown upon his own head, and also crowned his consort Josephine. (See JOSEPHINE.) Six months later he erected the Cis-Alpine Republic into a kingdom, and crowned himself king of Italy at Milan. In 1805, the destruction of the combined French and Spanish fleets by Nelson at Trafalgar completely overturned his long-cherished scheme for the invasion of England. In the same year, England, Russia, and Austria entered into a new coalition against France, and the battle of Austerlitz was fought, and terminated so successfully for France, that a large accession of territory was gained, and what she already possessed was confirmed to her by the treaty of Presburg. In 1806 he placed his brother Joseph upon the throne of Naples, Louis becoming king of Holland; the victory of Jena was obtained towards the close of the same year, destroying the Prussian power, and leading to the triumphant entry of Napoleon into Berlin. Russia was next attacked, and the emperor Alexander was compelled to sign the peace of Tilsit. Jerome Bonaparte was then placed upon the throne of Westphalia. In 1808, Napoleon made his unprincipled invasion of Spain, sending Murat and 80,000 men thither. Charles IV. and his family retired to French territory, where they virtually became prisoners of Napoleon, who placed his brother Joseph upon the throne of Spain, and gave Naples to Murat. But Spain, assisted by the British, resisted the French invaders, and the defeat and capitulation of Dupont at Baylen, and Junot at Cintra, were the commencement of the declining fortunes of the self-created emperor. Notwithstanding the greatest efforts of Soult, Massena, and Suchet, Spain, backed by the brilliant genius of Wellington, and his fine army, repulsed the French. This struggle cost France, in five years (1808—13), more than 400,000 men. Meanwhile, Josephine, having given no heir to the empire, was divorced by Napoleon, in 1809, and Maria Louisa, daughter of his old enemy the emperor of Austria, became empress of the French. The fruit of this union was a son, who, at his birth, was styled king of Rome. (See NAPOLEON II.) About this time, Fouché, Bernadotte, and several others, began to withdraw from him; Pope Pius VII., who had been stripped of his temporal dominions, excommunicated him; finally, the prohibitive system of continental commerce, which he had organised with the view of ruining England, begat, instead, universal poverty and misery throughout France. Having drained France of her treasure, he next conceived a formidable invasion of Russia, which was to rob France of the flower of her youth and manhood. In 1812 he assembled the largest army that was ever led by a European general, and, at the head of 500,000 men, he passed into Russia, being victorious in several engagements. In September he entered Moscow, which had been previously evacuated, and during his five weeks' stay was almost destroyed by fire, and at length the frost and snow of a Russian winter compelled him to commence a precipitate retreat. Harassed by innumerable foes, the French army, deprived of everything, perished in the snow, or found a grave in the icy waters of the Beresina. The campaign cost the lives of about 475,000 men of the invading army, the survivors being in the most miserable condition. Hastily returning to France, the emperor succeeded in creating another army 350,000 strong, and opened the campaign in Germany with the victories of Lutzen, Bautzen, and Dresden; but Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Sweden were now in arms against him; and at Leipzic, where, in three days, the French lost upwards of 50,000 men, his power received a death-stroke. The allies entered France, and Napoleon, finding his army disorganised, and most of his ministers and generals disaffected towards him, abdicated the throne of France, at Fontainebleau, on the 4th of April, 1814. The Bourbons were re-established in France, Napoleon accepting the island of Elba for his retreat. In less than a year he again appeared in France, and, by the time he had reached the capital, the whole army had declared for him. Immediately, the coalition that had dethroned him was renewed; but Napoleon, at the head of his brave and enthusiastic troops, took the initiative, and defeated the Prussians at Ligny, on the 16th of June. Upon the 18th he suffered defeat at the hands of Wellington, at the memorable field of Waterloo. Four days afterwards he abdicated in favour of his son. His new reign lasted for, and is generally styled, the Hundred Days. He set out for Rochefort, with the intention, it is stated, of escaping to America; but not being able to evade the English cruisers, he surrendered to Captain Maitland, of the Bellerophon, and claimed the hospitality of England. The English cabinet, however, declared him to be the prisoner of the allies, and he was dispatched to the island prison of St. Helena. For nearly six years did this extraordinary man remain in his island prison, perpetually quarrelling with Sir Hudson Lowe, the governor of the place. (See LOWE.) For administrative ability, energy, quickness of perception, ambition, military skill, and a marvellous power of subordinating other wills to his own, Napoleon is unique in history; but the greatness of his intellectual powers and mental force was counterbalanced by vulgar arrogance, meanness, falsehood, utter disregard of moral obligation, and a reckless disregard of human life if any sacrifice would further his personal views. The French nickname of "Jupiter Scapin," implying a mixture of greatness and trickery, is no inapt description of his character. A thoughtful writer, who can scarcely be charged with exaggeration, says, "He would steal, slander, assassinate, drown, and poison, as his interest dictated. He had no generosity, but mere vulgar hatred; he was intensely selfish; he was perfidious; he cheated at cards: he was a prodigious gossip, and opened letters, and delighted in his infamous police; he rubbed his hands with joy when he had intercepted some morsel of intelligence concerning the men and women about him, boasting that 'he knew everything,' and interfered with the cutting of the dresses of the women, and listened after the hurrahs and the compliments of the street, incognito. His manners were coarse; he treated women with low familiarity; he was in the habit of pulling their ears, and pinching their cheeks, when he was in a good humour, and of pulling the ears and whiskers of men, and of striking and horseplay with them to his last day." At St. Helena he dictated his memoirs, which were afterwards published with many interpolations, as the "Memoirs of Las Casas," and again as the "Memoirs edited by Count Montholon." He died from a cancer in the stomach, and was interred at St. Helena; but his remains were brought to France, on board of a ship of war, by Prince de Joinville, in 1840. They now rest under the dome of the Invalides, in the midst of the ashes of many who were his companions in victory.

Born at Ajaccio, Corsica, 1769; died at St. Helena, 1821.

NAPOLEON II., FRANCIS CHARLES JOSEPH NAPOLEON, duke of Reichstadt, was the son of Napoleon I. and Maria Louisa, and at his birth was styled king of Rome. After the abdication of his father, an attempt was made to proclaim him emperor, but it was soon abandoned. When the allies entered Paris, his mother fled with him to her father's court. He was brought up by his grandfather Francis, emperor of Austria, by whom he was created duke of Reichstadt in 1818, and appointed colonel of a regiment of cavalry. This young prince, who was apparently born to such a brilliant destiny, died shortly after he had attained his 21st birthday, of consumption.

Born at Paris, 1811; died at Schönbrunn, 1832.

NAPOLEON III., CHARLES LOUIS NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, emperor of the French. He was the third son of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, king of Holland, and of Hortense Beauharnais, daughter of the empress Josephine. Queen Hortense's three sons were decreed to be successors to the French throne in the event of the death of the son of Napoleon. The eldest, Napoleon-Charles, who was brought up by Napoleon, died in 1807. After the fall of Napoleon I., Queen Hortense went into exile with her two sons, residing in succession at Geneva, at Aix in Savoy, in the duchy of Baden, in Bavaria, and finally repairing to the château of Arenenberg, on the banks of Lake Constance, where she resided until her death. There, Queen Hortense, or duchess of St. Leu, as she was now called, employed herself with the education of her two sons. Louis Napoleon displayed the greatest eagerness for study, and distinguished himself by his ardent pursuit of all knowledge bearing upon military matters. After Louis Philippe ascended the throne, Louis Napoleon and his brother asked to be allowed to return to France, but were refused. The brothers next took part in a revolution in Italy; but, their party being defeated by the papal troops, they became fugitives, the elder dying of fever at Forli, in 1831, and Louis Napoleon only escaping the Austrians by assuming the disguise of a footman. He reached Cannes in safety, and subsequently went to Paris with his mother, who asked permission to remain there a short time, as her son was ill. The king refusing to accede to this request, Hortense and her son repaired to London. In a short time they returned to Switzerland. Until the year 1836, he occupied himself with military studies, and with composing political and military treatises; but in the last-named year, considering that he had only to present himself to the French soldiery in order to shake their allegiance towards Louis Philippe, he went to Strasburg, where, after an absurd attempt at carrying out his project, he was made prisoner, and placed in a dungeon of the garrison. Louis Philippe regarded the affair with contempt, and shipped off the pretender to the United States. He remained but a short time in America; for, hearing his mother was dangerously ill, he repaired to Aronenberg, in defiance of the French government. The duchess of Saint Leu died two months after his arrival. The French government demanded of Switzerland the extradition of the refugee; and, to prevent a war, Louis Napoleon quitted the country for England in 1837. In London he lived the life of a fashionable lounger, was well-known in literary coteries, and took part in the famous Eglinton tournament, and wrote his "Napoleonic Ideas;" but, in 1840, he resolved to make another attempt at subverting the government of Louis Philippe. A steamer was hired, a number of disaffected Frenchmen were collected, and Louis Napoleon, provided with a tame eagle and a carved and gilded effigy of the same emblem of imperialism, steamed from Margate and landed at Boulogne. He presented himself to the officers, displayed his wooden eagle, and set free the living bird; but the soldiers would not listen to the representative of Napoleonism, the eagle refused to soar aloft and perch upon the top of the Napoleon column. The baffled conspirators next attempted to regain their steamer, Louis himself being captured, after shooting a French soldier who had tried to oppose his retreat. For this absurd affair he was arraigned before the Chamber of Peers, found guilty of high treason, condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and conducted to the castle of Ham, whence he contrived to effect his escape in the disguise of a workman, in 1846. He reached London in safety, and continued to reside there till 1848. When the Chartist outbreak was threatened, he served as a special constable in the parish of St. James's. The Republic permitted his return to France, with the other members of the Bonaparte family, and subsequently, with Cavaignac and Ledru Rollin, he put himself in nomination for election as president of the republic, and was voted to that office by an overwhelming majority. At the close of the year 1851, he destroyed the last vestige of French liberty by the celebrated coup d'état, and contrived to secure his re-election, not for four, but for ten years. He was now emperor of France in all things but the name, and this latter title was given to him, after an appeal to universal suffrage, in December, 1852. In the following year he married Eugénie, comtesse de Téba, who bore him a son. He became the ally of England in the struggle against Russia, which terminated with the fall of Sebastopol and the treaty of Paris in 1856. In the same year he paid a visit to Queen Victoria in London. Two attempts against his life were made; the first by Pianori in 1855, and the second by the Count Orsini, Pierri, and others, at the beginning of 1858. Upon this latter occasion Napoleon III. demanded of the British government that the English laws affecting political exiles should be altered. This attempt at dictation and interference created a strong feeling in England against the French emperor, which was heightened by the insults of several colonels of the French army. The Palmerston administration, by appearing disposed to yield, became highly unpopular, and was compelled to quit office. At the beginning of the year 1859, Napoleon treated the Austrian ambassador with marked coolness, which clearly foreshadowed what was speedily to occur. Francis Joseph declared war against the king of Sardinia and his French ally. The French army crossed the Alps into Italy, and the emperor, leaving the empress as regent during his absence, hastened to put himself at its head. The Austrians lost battle after battle, till at length they were obliged to evacuate Lombardy. Terms of peace were concluded even more suddenly than war had been declared. At Villafranca the two emperors met: Lombardy was given up to France, and by France ceded to Sardinia; Austria remaining in possession of Venetia and the celebrated Quadrilateral. Shortly afterwards he declared himself a partisan of the principles of free trade; whereupon Mr. Cobden was charged by the British government to effect between France and England a treaty of commerce. In 1870, the long animosity between France and Prussia broke out into an open quarrel, and the terrible Franco-Prussian war was the result. The German armies were irresistible; and after the memorable battle of Sedan, in September, Napoleon (who had previously abdicated in favour of his son, and the Empress Eugenie as regent) surrendered to the king of Prussia, and was imprisoned at the palace of Wilhelmshöhe, until the conclusion of peace. The empress had fled to England, and taken up her residence at Chiselhurst, in Kent, where she was joined by the ex-emperor in March, 1871, and where he died, after undergoing operations for the stone. His son was killed in Zululand, June 1, 1879.

Born at Paris, 1808; died at Chiselhurst, 1873.

NAPOLEON, PRINCE. (See BONAPARTE, Napoleon Joseph Charles.)

NARBONNE, nar-bun', a town of France, department Aude, situate in a hollow between mountains, 8 miles from the sea, 32 miles from Carcassonne. It has a cathedral, dedicated to St. Just, founded in 1271, but still uncompleted, admired for the elegance of its architecture and the boldness of its vaults, also an ancient archiepiscopal palace, which has the appearance of a fortress. There is a trade in honey, for which it is famed, wine, brandy, oil, and salt. Pop. 28,000.—A town occupied the site at a very remote period, and it was the Gallia Narbonensis of the Romans, by whom it was colonized, B.C. 119. There were many fine buildings, a capital, amphitheatre, and aqueduct. The Moors took it in 719, and the churches were destroyed. In 859 it was conquered by the Northmen.

NARBOROUGH, SIR JOHN, nar'-bur-o, an English naval commander, who served with distinction in the first Dutch war, and was present at the desperate naval engagement between the English fleet and the Dutch under De Ruyter and Van Tromp, in 1666. Three years afterwards, he went out on a voyage of discovery to the South Seas, and explored the Straits of Magellan. In 1672 he again fought against the Dutch at the battle of Solebay, and was for his bravery knighted, and created rear-admiral. In the following year he compelled the Bey of Tripoli to give up all British captives, and to pay 80,000 dollars for the injuries British shipping had received at the hands of Tripoline pirates. He cannonaded the city of Algiers in 1677, and captured five Algerian frigates. In 1770 he became commissioner of the navy, which post he held during the reigns of Charles II. and James II.

Died about 1688.

NARBOROUGH'S ISLANDS, a group in the South Pacific, off the western entrance of the Strait of Magalhaens, consisting of about 10 principal and a great number of smaller islands. They are barren and uninhabited.

NARCISSUS, nar-sis'-sus, in Greek legend, a beautiful youth, son of the river god Cephisus and the nymph Liriope, who saw his image reflected in the fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitless attempts to approach this beautiful object so provoked him, that he grew desperate and killed himself. His blood was changed into a flower, which still bears his name.

NARCISSUS, a freedman and secretary of Claudius, who abused his trust, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himself. Messalina, the emperor's wife, endeavoured to remove him; but Narcissus sacrificed her to his resentment. Agrippina, who succeeded Messilina, was more successful. Narcissus was banished by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himself.

Died 54.

NARDI, JACOPO, nar'-de, an Italian historian, who wrote the history of the republic of Florence, which forms a continuation of the work of Machiavelli. He likewise acted as ambassador from Florence to Venice in 1527.

Born at Florence, 1476; died 1555.

NARDO, nar'-do, a town of Italy, province of Terra de Otranto, 9 miles N.E. of Gallipoli. It is the see of a bishop, and there are nine churches. Manf. Linen and cotton goods. Pop. 10,508.

NARENTA, or NARENA, na-rain'-ta, a river of European Turkey, rising in the Dinaric Alps, forming the eastern frontier of Herzegovina, and, after a course of 170 miles, falling into the Adriatic. The chief affluents are the Dretsnitza, Jossinetze, and Tebisat, on the right, and the Drinornck and Krupa on the left.

NAREW, na'-rev, a river of European Russia, rising in the government of Grodno, and after a south-western course of nearly 300 miles, falling into the Bug at Sierock.

NARNI, nar'-ne, a town of Italy, on the left bank of the Nera, 21 miles S.W. of Spoleto. There are a Gothic cathedral, seven other churches, seven monasteries, and five nunneries. The town is situated on a lofty hill, and has a striking appearance from a distance, but is irregularly built and dirty. There are the remains of a very fine bridge of Roman construction. Pop. 11,312.

NARNOUL, nar-nool', a town of British India, district of Agra, on an affluent of the Jumna, 86 miles S.W. of Delhi. It is a place of considerable antiquity.

NARO, na'-ro, a town of Sicily, province of Girgenti, on a river of the same name, 14 miles E. of Girgenti. It stands in a fine country, and has a trade in oil, wine, and sulphur. Pop. 11,000.

NAROVTCHAT, na-rov'-chat, a town of European Russia, government of Penza, on the Mokcha, 82 miles N.W. of Penza. Several annual fairs are held. Pop. 4,000.

NARRA, EASTERN and WESTERN, two large branches of the Indus river, in Scinde, India.

NARRAGANSET BAY, nar-ra-gan'-set, an inlet of the United States, almost wholly in Rhode Island State, penetrating 25 miles inland, with a breadth of about 12 miles. It contains 15 islands, the principal being Rhode Island, Canonicut, and Prudence, and the rivers Providence, Pawtucket, Taunton, and Pawtuxet flow into it. The bay is one of the best naval stations in the United States.

NARRAINGUNGE, nar-rain-gun'-je, a town of British India, province of Bengal, on the left bank of the Situl, a branch of the Bramahpootra. It is a very busy trading place, and a great mart for salt, grain, tobacco, and lime. Pop. 15,000.

NARSAPOOR, or NARSIPORE, nar-si-poor', a town of British India, near the mouth of the western branch of the Godavery. In the limits of the town are included the remains of Maddapollam, once so famous for cloth. Pop. 8,000.

NARSES, nar'-sees, king of Persia, succeeded his brother Varennes in 294. He conquered Mesopotamia and Armenia. Maximianus Galerius being sent against him by Diocletian, was repulsed; but afterwards he defeated the Persians, whom he laid under tribute. He abdicated in favour of his brother Hormisdas in 303.

NARSES, nar'-sees, a eunuch, who from a menial office in the Imperial household at Constantinople, rose to be chamberlain to the Emperor Justinian, and subsequently became one of the greatest generals of his time, commanded the Roman army against the Goths, whom he defeated in battle in 552, their king, Totila, being slain. As exarch of Italy, he administered with wisdom and discretion, and established order throughout the country; but he was charged with avarice, and after the death of Justinian, he was deprived of his office. He is supposed to have lived to the age of 95.

Died at Rome, 568.

NARVA, nar'-va, a town of European Russia, in the government of St. Petersburg, on the Narova, 10 miles from its mouth in the Gulf of Finland. In the suburb called Ivangorod are the remains of an extensive fortress built by the czar Ivan Vassilievitz. There is a brisk traffic in corn, timber, and flax, which it exports, and in salt. It has also a salmon fishery. Near the town is a waterfall which supplies valuable power to mills. Manf. Cotton. Pop. 6,200.—Near this town, in 1700, Charles XII., at the head of 8,000 Swedes, defeated Peter the Great, with 60,000 Russians. Narva was retaken by the czar five years after.

NARVAEZ, DON RAMON MARIA, duke of Valentia, nar-va-aith', a modern Spanish general and statesman. After the return of Ferdinand VII., he entered the army as cadet of the Walloon Guards. In 1822, when the royal party attempted to destroy the constitutional régime, he ranged himself upon the liberal side, and, by his gallantry, contributed to suppress the émeute. Shortly afterwards, while serving against the guerillas of Catalonia, he was severely wounded; upon which he retired to his native city, and lived in retirement during ten years. In 1836 he attained the grade of brigadier, under Espartero. Charged to pursue the notorious Carlist general Gomez, who had hitherto baffled all attempts at capture, Narvaez came up with him near Arcos and completely routed him. This was the turning point of his fortunes, and he became one of the most popular men in Spain. He now abandoned the constitutional party, became a royalist, and aspired to a rivalry with Espartero, against whom he took part in an insurrection at Seville in 1840, and was compelled to fly to France. There he plotted successfully, producing the downfall of Espartero in 1843. In 1844 he was nominated president of the council, and was created duke of Valentia. Three years afterwards he lost the royal favour; but, in 1856, he supplanted O'Donnell, and once more became president of the council. His opponents were for a period completely foiled; but the tenure of power in Spain is too intimately dependent upon court intrigue to be either durable or secure: accordingly, one turn of the political wheel brought General O'Donnell to the position from which he himself had already been ousted by Narvaez. At the end of 1859, Narvaez was again out of office. He returned to power in 1864, suppressed a military revolt in Madrid in 1866, and retained power until his death.

Born at Loja, 1805; died 1868.

NASEBY, nais'-be, a village of Northamptonshire. Pop. 700.—Here, in 1645, Charles I. was totally defeated by Oliver Cromwell and compelled to fly, leaving 5,000 Royalists prisoners.

NASH, RICHARD, nash, commonly known as "Beau Nash," master of the ceremonies at Bath. He was the son of a Welsh gentleman, and received his education at Caermarthen, whence he was sent to Jesus College, Oxford, where he remained but a short time. He afterwards obtained an ensign's commission, but soon quitted the army, and entered of the Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. A love of pleasure and gaming drew him, in 1704, to Bath, which place of amusement became, through his tact and management, a centre of fashionable resort. He was chosen master of the ceremonies, and was so much esteemed as to be called King of Bath; but commonly he was termed, from the peculiarity and foppery of his dress, Beau Nash. Though much given to gambling, he was very liberal, and numerous instances are recorded of his benevolence; and to his efforts, combined with those of two other gentlemen, the foundation of Bath Hospital is due. In his old age he fell into great poverty.

Born at Swansea, 1674; died at Bath, 1761.

NASH, JOHN, English architect, who studied under Sir Robert Taylor, and about 1792 established himself in London. He soon acquired a high position, and was employed to design mansions for the nobility, both in England and Ireland. In 1812 he designed plans for the new Marylebone, afterwards Regent's Park, and for Regent Street. In 1820 he improved the Opera-house, and designed the Haymarket Theatre. As surveyor to the Crown estates, he was engaged during several years in improving the street architecture of the metropolis, chiefly at the west end of the town. The terraces in the Regent's Park, Buckingham Palace (since altered), Carlton-House Terrace, and the improvements in the garden of St. James's Park, were the principal of his subsequent works in London. The whimsical piece of architecture known as the Pavilion, at Brighton, was also from his designs.

Born in London, 1752; died at East Cowes Castle, 1835.

NASH, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 17,731, about one-third being coloured. The capital is Nashville.

NASHIK, na-shik', a town of British India, on both sides of the Gadovery, 2,000 feet above the sea level. The northern part of the town is called Panchawata, and is considered to be a place of great sanctity, as the birth place of Râma. There are temples of Siva, but the black temple of Râma is the principal building. It stands in a stone inclosure 260 feet long, and 120 feet broad. It was built in the last century by Rang Rao Odhekar, a Mahratta prince, at a cost of £50,000. On the south side of the river is a small, but very beautiful temple, known as the Surdar Navayan, built about 1720, and there are other temples of great interest. The main portion of the town stands on the southern side of the river. In the vicinity are some remarkable caves, known as the Lena, excavated in the 3rd century for the use of Buddhist pilgrims. Pop. 22,500.

NASHUA, nash'-u-a, a city of New Hampshire, United States, at the junction of the Merrimack and Nashua rivers. The latter river has falls which afford water power. There are 10 churches. Manf. Cotton and machinery. Pop. 11,000.

NASHVILLE, nash'-vil, a city and port, the capital of Tennessee, United States, on the south side of Cumberland river, near the centre of the state. It is situate in the midst of a very fertile and populous country, and is a great railroad centre. The steamboats ply between this place and New Orleans. The public buildings include a noble state house, university, 27 churches, orphan asylum, and near the city the state lunatic asylum. Manf. Engines and machinery. A large trade is carried on. The Cumberland is navigable for vessels of 30 or 40 tons during the greater part of the year, and in the highest floods for vessels of 400 tons. Pop. 43,500, about one third being coloured.

NASIELSK, na-seelsk', a town of Poland, 25 miles from Warsaw. Pop. 3,000, mostly Jews.—Here, in 1806, the Russians were defeated by the French.

NASIRABAD, or NESSERABAD, na-sir-a-bad', a town of British India, in Oude, 65 miles S.E. of Lucknow. Pop. 21,320.

NASMYTH, ALEXANDER, nai'-smithe, Scotch landscape painter, who repaired to London at an early age, and became pupil of Allan Ramsay. He subsequently studied at Rome; after which he went to Edinburgh, and established himself there as a portrait-painter. Ultimately he abandoned portrait for landscape-painting, and produced some of the best works in that class of which the British school can boast. He had likewise a considerable share in suggesting the architectural improvements that were made in Edinburgh.

Born at Edinburgh, 1758; died there, 1840.

NASMYTH, PATRICK, Scotch landscape-painter, son of the preceding. He repaired to London in his 20th year, and soon became popular enough to gain the title of the English Hobbima. All his pictures were painted with the left hand, he having early in life lost the use of his right through an accident.

Born at Edinburgh, 1786; died in London, 1831.

NASMYTH, JAMES, a practical engineer, and inventor of the steam-hammer, steam pile-driver, and other great mechanical contrivances. He was brother of the preceding, and from his earliest youth displayed a love for any kind of mechanical employment. After studying at the High School and university of Edinburgh, where he rendered great assistance to the professors by his skill as a mechanical draughtsman and practical mechanic, he, in 1829, set out for London, where he succeeded in obtaining employment in the engineering firm of Maudsley and Co. He remained there until 1832, at which time he returned to Edinburgh, and during two years worked incessantly in the construction of tools and machinery, with the intention of establishing himself in business. In 1834 he took a floor in an old cotton-mill at Manchester, and soon obtained so many orders for machinery, that his shop became too small for his operations. He then removed to Patricroft, near Manchester, and in a few years so rapidly had his business increased, was in a position to build the well-known Bridgewater foundry, from which establishment emanated those fine mechanical inventions, which have made the name of Nasmyth familiar wherever modern mechanism is required. In 1856 he retired from business, having resolved to devote his remaining years to artistic and scientific pursuits.

Born at Edinburgh, 1808.

NASO na'-so, a town of Sicily, the ancient Agathyrnum, 43 miles S.W. of Messina. It is walled, carries on a large trade, and near it are mineral springs, containing iron. Pop. 8,000.

NASSAU. (See WIESBADEN).

NASR-ED-DIN, nas-er-ed-din', shah of Persia, who succeeded to the throne in 1848. In 1873 he visited Europe, being the first Persian monarch who had done so. While in England he made arrangements for establishing railways, and other important public works in Persia, but nothing resulted. He wrote a diary of his tour, a translation of which was published.

Born 1829. Died 1873.

NASSAU, nas'-saw, capital of New Providence, one of the Bahamas. There are good public buildings, and an excellent harbour. Cotton, pimento, and salt are exported. The climate is salubrious, and the town is a great resort of invalids. Pop. 21,320. Lat. 25° 5′ N.; Lon. 71° 21′ W.

NASSAU. (See POGGY ISLANDS.)

NASSAU, a town of Rensselaer county, New York, United States, 15 miles from Albany. Pop. 3,000.

NASSAU, a county of Florida, United States Area, 610 square miles. Pop. 4,300, nearly half being coloured. The capital is Fernandina.

NASSAU, ADOLPHUS OF. (See ADOLPHUS, Emperor.)

NASSAU, MAURICE OF. (See MAURICE of Nassau.)

NASSAU, WILLIAM OF. (See ORANGE, William of.)

NASSAU, WILLIAM OF. (See WILLIAM III. of England.)

NASSICK, nas-sik', a large town and place of pilgrimage in British India, in the district of Ahmednuggur, 92 miles N.W. of Bombay. Near the town are some remarkable Buddhist caves. Pop. 25,000.

NASTATTEN, na-stat'-ten, a town of W. Germany, in the duchy of Nassau, 20 miles from Wiesbaden. It has numerous mineral springs. Pop. 3,000.

NATAL, na-tal', a British colony of South Africa, on the south-eastern coast. It is of compact shape, with about 150 miles of sea-coast, chiefly rocky and broken with reefs, and is bounded S.E. by the Indian Ocean, N.E. by the rivers Buffalo and Tugela, dividing the colony from the Transvaal and Zulu land; S.W. by the Drakenberg Mountains and the Umzumkulu and Umtamfuna rivers, beyond which are the Basutoland and Nomansland districts of the Cape Colony, and N.W. by the Drakenberg, which divides it from the Free State. The only large harbour on the coast is Port Natal, or D'Urban, which is landlocked, but has a bar which prevents large vessels entering, good anchorage being outside. The whole district lies between the great interior table land of South Africa and the coast, the boundary ridge being about 10,000 feet in elevation. From this the land subsides in broken steps, irregular hills, and in the midland districts broad undulations, well covered with grass. The coast region is the most fertile, and sugar, coffee, cotton, indigo, tobacco, arrowroot, ginger, and pine apples, are produced in abundance. The cereals are successfully cultivated in the midland district, a terrace of greater elevation, and there are very extensive pastures at the foot of the mountains. Timber of good quality is abundant. Some elephants, hippopotami, lions, leopards, wolves, and hyænas, are still met with; the smaller antelopes are numerous, alligators are seen in the rivers, and there are poisonous snakes, some of great size. The climate is on the whole salubrious, though moist. In summer rain falls every day, and thunderstorms are very frequent. In winter the thermometer seldom sinks below 50°, and the greatest average heat in summer is 85°. The spring and autumn are very agreeable periods of the year. Near the mountains, some of which are covered with snow for three or four months, the winters are very cold. Sheep-farming is a very profitable industry, and the chief articles of export are sugar and arrowroot.

Rivers.—There are no navigable streams. The chief rivers which skirt or pass through the colony are the Tugela (or Buffalo), the Umvoti, the Umgeni, the Ilovo, the Umkumanzi, the Umzimkulu, and the Umtamfuna, each having numerous small tributaries, some of them in the rainy season being considerable streams.

Minerals.—Coal is known to be in the Drackenberg and other places; there are considerable traces of copper, lead, and iron; gold is supposed to exist; there are valuable beds of marble and slate, and there is reason to believe that the colony will be found to be rich in minerals.

Area.—About 21,000 square miles.

Pop.—361,586, of whom only 25,000 are of European descent. The bulk of the remainder are Zulus and other South African tribes, and there are about 17,000 Hindoo and Chinese coolies. The white population consists chiefly of English, Dutch, and Germans. The Zulus are a little more civilized than the Kaffirs in the adjoining regions, but still retain many of their barbaric beliefs and practices. They are, however, less warlike than others of their race, and on the whole are tractable and orderly.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 9 divisions or counties. The chief town is PIETERMARITZBURG, and DURBAN, Greyton, Lady Smith, Pinetown, Richmond, Verulam, and York, are other towns of some importance.

Government.—There is a lieutenant-governor, who is aided by an executive council of five members, and there is a legislative council of 28 members, eight of whom are nominees of the government, 15 are elected, the other five being the members of the executive council.

History.—The coast of Natal was discovered on Christmas Day, 1497, by Vasco da Gama, who, from that circumstance, named it Terra Natalis. About 1760 the Dutch formed a settlement at Port Natal, but soon abandoned it, and no other settlement was made till 1823, when a few traders from the Cape obtained permission from the natives to occupy a small tract of land in the same neighbourhood. About 1835, there was a considerable immigration of Dutch boers from the Orange River Free State, who founded Pietermaritzburg, the present capital. Quarrels arose between the Dutch and the British, and in 1842 a detachment of soldiers was sent from the Cape, the result being that in 1843 Natal was formally declared a British colony. The first bishop was appointed in 1853, and in 1856 a royal charter made Natal independent of the Cape Colony.

NATAL, or RIO GRANDE DO NORTE, a fortified seaport of Brazil, S. America, capital of the province Rio Grande do Norte, near the mouth of the river of that name in the Atlantic, 100 miles N. of Parahiba. It was formerly an important military post, and has several churches, a governor's residence, and a harbour. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 5° 45′ S. Lon. 35° 15′ W.

NATAL, or NATAR, a Malay town on the south-west coast of Sumatra. It has an export trade in camphor and gold dust. Lat. 0° 18′ N. Lon. 99° 5′ E.

NATCHEZ, natch'-ez, a city and port of entry of Mississippi, United States, on the east bank of the Mississippi, 80 miles from Jackson. The greater part of the town stands upwards of 150 feet above the surface of the river, and is regularly laid out on very uneven ground, the streets intersecting each other at right angles. A portion of the town at the foot of the bluffs is known as Natchez-under-the-hill. There are a court-house, gaol, market-house, marine hospital, and eight churches. It is a great shipping port for cotton, has an extensive export trade, and is in constant communication with the various towns on the Mississippi and its tributaries. Pop. 7,059. The name of the place is taken from the Indians who inhabited the district when the town was settled by the French in 1716.

NATCHITOCHES, natch-i-to'-tches, a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 2,260 square miles. Pop. 19,707. more than half being coloured. The capital is NATCHITOCHES.

NATCHITOCHES, the capital of Natchitoches county, Louisiana, on the Red River, about 200 miles above its junction with the Mississippi. Pop. 3,000.

NATHAN, na'-than, a prophet who lived in the reign of David. At the Divine command, he reproached that monarch for his guilt in the murder of Uriah and adultery with Bathsheba, and predicted that the glory of erecting the temple would be reserved for Solomon. On that occasion he brought the monarch to repentance, by relating the beautiful parable of the poor man's lamb.

NATHAN, ISAAC, or MORDECAI, a rabbi, was the first who compiled a Hebrew Concordance, which he began in 1438 and finished in 1448. It was printed at Venice in 1523, and afterwards at Basle in 1632.

Lived in the 15th century.

NATHPORE, or NAUTHPOOR, nath'-por', a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, on the right bank of the Cosi. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 26° 17′ N. Lon. 87° 3′ E.

NATOLIA, or ANATOLIA. (See ASIA MINOR.)

NATRON LAKES. (See EGYPT.)

NATUNA ISLANDS, na-tu'-na, a group of wooded and mountainous islands, north-west of Borneo. The largest is Ranay, or Great Natuna, which has an area of about 600 square miles. Rice, maize, sago, cocoa-nuts, and other tropical products are cultivated. Pop. 1,300. Lat. 2° 28′—4° 56′ N. Lon. 107° 57′—108° 15′ E.

NAUDÉ, or NAUDÆUS, Gabriel, no'-dai, a learned French writer. After studying at Paris, he went to Padua, where he took his degrees in physic. He next became librarian to Cardinal de Bagni at Rome, and, on his death, was patronized by Cardinal Barberini. On being recalled to France in 1642, he was made librarian to Cardinal Mazarin, who conferred on him several benefices. Christina, queen of Sweden, invited him to her court, but he soon returned. His principal works are, "An Apology for Great Men who have been accused of Magic," "Advice for Forming a Library," "Addition to the Life of Louis XI.," "Bibliographia Politica," and a commentary upon the Rosicrucians.

Born at Paris, 1600; died at Abbeville, 1653.

NAUHEIM, nou'-hime, a watering-place of Hesse-Darmstadt, 17 miles N. of Frankfort. The springs are saline. The Kurhaus is a fine building, surrounded by a park. Pop. 2,000; visitors about 3,000 annually.

NAUMBURG, noum'-boorg, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, in the government of Merseburg, on the Saale, 28 miles from Leipsic. It is divided into three parts,—the Town proper, the Liberties, and the Suburb. The town is surrounded with walls, and contains a royal mansion, several churches, an orphan-house, hospital, and schools. The part called the Liberties contains the cathedral, a fine Gothic building, completed in 1249, and containing fine sculptures. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, leather, playing-cards, and chemicals. A large quantity of wine is made in the vicinity. Five fairs are held annually. Pop. 17,868.

NAUNDORFF, CHARLES GUILLAUME, noun'-dorf, claimed to be Charles Louis Duke of Normandy, son of Louis XVI. of France. He was imprisoned as an impostor in Brandenburg from 1825 to 1828, but in 1833 went to Paris, and asserted his claim to the throne. He was expelled from France in 1836.

Born 1785; died at Delft, 1847.

NAUPLIA, or NAPOLI DI ROMANIA, naw'-ple-a, a fortified seaport-town of Greece, in the Morea, at the northern extremity of the Gulf of Argos, and 7 miles S.E. of the town of Argos. The town is well laid out, and there is an excellent roadstead. It is a place of considerable antiquity, and from 1824 to 1835 was the capital of Greece. Pop. 4,000.

NAUPLIA, GULF OF, an inlet of the Ægean Sea, Greece, between the the two arms of the Morea, 30 miles long, with a breadth of 20. It contains several small islands, and receives the Xeria river, on which Argos is situate.

NAUPLIUS, naw'-pli-us, in Grecian mythology, a son of Neptune and Amymone, king of Eubœa. He was father to Palamedes, who was sacrificed to the resentment of Ulysses by the Greeks, during the Trojan war. The death of Palamedes irritated Nauplius. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius saw them distressed in a storm on the coasts of Eubœa, and to make their disaster still more complete, he lighted fires on such places as were surrounded with the most dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be shipwrecked on the coast. This succeeded: but when he saw Ulysses and Diomedes escape, he threw himself into the sea.

NAUSICAA, naw-sik'-a-a, in Homeric legend, a daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phæacœans, who met Ulysses shipwrecked on her father's coasts; and it was to her humanity that he owed the kind reception he received from the king.

NAUTA, naw'-ta, a town of Ecuador, South America, on the Amazon, near the confluence of the Ucayale. Manf. Sugar, which gives employment to nearly all the inhabitants. Pop. 5,000.

NAUVOO, naw-voo', a town of Illinois, United States, on the east bank of the Mississippi, 200 miles above St. Louis, formerly a city of the Mormons, and afterwards occupied by a colony of French communists, who failed to establish themselves. The place is now an insignificant village.

NAVA-DEL-REY, na'-va-del-rai', a town of Spain, province of Valladolid, 28 miles S.W. of the town of that name. There are a beautiful church, a college, theatre, hospital, and very fine granary. Manf. Cloth, linen, serges, chocolate, cutlery, and earthenware. Pop. 4,900.

NAVALMORAL (DE LA MATA), na-val-mor'-al, a town of Spain, province of Caceres, 50 miles N.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Linen, leather, wax candles, oil, and soap. Pop. 3,900.

NAVAN, nav'-an, a market-town of Ireland, county of Meath, at the junction of the Boyne and Blackwater, 28 miles N.W. of Dublin. It is a place of considerable trade. Manf. Sacking, paper, and leather. Pop. 4,000.—A station on the Great Northern of Ireland railway.

NAVARINO, or NEO CASTRO, na-va-re'-no, a seaport of Greece, on the south-west coast of the Morea, at the entrance of a bay of the same name. It stands near the site of Old Navarin, the Pylos of antiquity, and has a large harbour, sheltered by the island of Sphagia, or Sphacteria, famous in antiquity for the defeat of the Spartans by the Athenian navy. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1827, the combined fleets of England, France, and Russia defeated those of the Turks and Egyptians.

NAVARRA. (See NAVARRE.)

NAVARRE, na-var', a province and formerly a kingdom of Spain, bounded N.E. by France, and S.W. by Old Castile. It is divided from France by the western part of the Pyrenees, the heights of which are in general rugged and bare, but their base is covered with wood, and affords excellent pasturage. The principal peaks within the province are Altovisear, Adi, Alcorrunz, and Ruña. Some of the valleys are very fertile; but the mountain districts are uncultivated, and generally covered with forests, in which are bears, wolves, wild cats, goats, deer, and other game. In the cultivated districts grain and wine are produced; but not in sufficient quantities for native consumption. Hemp, flax, fruit, pulse, and a little oil are produced. Iron abounds at Vedrin and Lugarchuelo: at Pampeluna is a copper-mine: in the neighbourhood of Valtierra is a mine of rock-salt, between strata of gypsum.

Rivers.—The Bidassao, Areso, and the Ebro, with tributaries of the latter, the Ega and Aragon.

Area.—2,450 square miles.

Pop.—310,560, mostly of Basque origin, and in the mountain districts speaking the Basque language.

Chief Towns.—PAMPLONA, the capital; ESTELLA, TAFULLA, and TUDELA.

History.—This was a small kingdom before Henry d'Albret, afterwards King Henry IV., ascended the throne of France, and from this place the kings of France took the title of king of Navarre. It retained its ancient boundaries in the new division of the country in 1833.

NAVARRE, PEDRO DE, a famous Spanish soldier-seaman in the 16th century, was a Biscayan of low extraction. He commenced his career as a sailor, after which he became a menial servant in the family of the cardinal of Aragon. He next took service among the Florentine troops; but subsequently returned on board ship, where he displayed great skill and courage. The reputation he acquired recommended him to Gonsalvo de Cordova, who was employed in the war of Naples. To the taking of that city Navarre principally contributed, by the construction of a mine. The emperor recompensed him for this service by creating him count of Alvito, in that kingdom, and henceforth he styled himself Count Pedro de Navarre. Being appointed to the command of a naval expedition against the Moors, he took Oran, Tripoli, and other places. On his return to Italy, he served in the army, and was taken prisoner by the French at the battle of Ravenna, in 1512. After remaining in France two years, in hopes of being ransomed, he entered into the French service, and signalised himself on several occasions; but being sent to the succour of Genoa, in 1522, he was taken prisoner by the Imperialists, and conducted to Naples, where he was confined in the Castel dell' Ovo. After the treaty of Madrid, he regained his liberty, and, in 1528, served under Lautrec at the siege of Naples; but, in the unfortunate retreat of that general at Aversa, he was again captured, and sent to the Castel dell' Ovo. The prince of Orange, by command of the emperor, having ordered a number of prisoners to be beheaded, barbarously included Navarre with the rest; but the governor, as is asserted by some, possessing more humanity, passed him over, and he died there soon after. Others pretend that he was strangled in that citadel.

NAVARRETE, FERDINAND, na-var-rai'-tai, a learned Spanish friar, who went as missionary to the Philippine islands in 1647. He afterwards set out for China, where he laboured during many years, but was at last imprisoned by the Chinese authorities. He contrived, however to effect his escape to Macao, after which he returned to Europe. He was employed to preach against the Jesuits before the pope. His "History of the Moral and Political Condition of China" was published at Madrid, at the end of the 17th century; but the latter volumes of the work were suppressed by the Inquisition.

Born 1620; died 1689.

NAVARRETE, JUAN FERNANDEZ, "el Mudo," from being deaf and dumb, Spanish painter, surnamed the Titian of Spain. In 1568 he was appointed painter to the king; but having introduced a cat and a dog into some of his religious pictures, Philip caused him to enter into a contract never to employ such accessories again.

Born at Logrono, Castile, 1524; died at Madrid, 1577.

NAVARRETE, MARTINO FERNANDEZ, Spanish historian. He entered the navy at the age of 15, and saw some active service. When 24 years old, he was employed by the government to compile a history of Spanish maritime discovery. On the declaration of war with France, he returned to sea, and in 1797 was appointed to a post in the ministry of marine. In 1814 he resumed literary work, assisted in the preparation of the dictionary of the Spanish Academy, and wrote a life of Cervantes. In 1823 he was appointed chief of the hydrographical department. He published four volumes of his great history of the discoveries by Columbus, and other navigators, and left two more unfinished. His labours have afforded valuable material for later historians. He also assisted in the preparation of a collection of unpublished documents for the history of Spain.

Born at Abalos, 1765; died at Madrid, 1844.

NAVARRO, na-var'-ro, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 1,040 square miles. Pop. 21,702, about 2,500 being coloured. The capital is Corsicana.

NAVAS (DEL MADRONO), na'-vas-del-madron'-no, a town of Spain, province of Caceres, 17 miles N.W. of the town of Caceres. Manf. Cloth, linen, black thread, oil, and soap. Pop. 4,000.

NAVAS (DE TOLEDO), a little village of Spain, province of Jaen, 39 miles N. of the town of Jaen, memorable for a great victory obtained over the Moors, by the kings of Castile, Aragon, and Navarre, aided by 110,000 English and French Crusaders. The Moors lost 200,000 men; the others only 725.

NAVIGATORS', or SAMOAN ISLANDS, nav'-i-gai-tors, a cluster of nine lofty islands and some islets, in the South Pacific Ocean. They are of volcanic formation, and are both fertile and populous. The four largest are SAVAII, Mauna, Tutuela, and Upolu. Area, 2,650 square miles. Pop. 56,000, a fine race, many of whom have embraced Christianity. They are governed by hereditary chiefs. Lat. 13° 30'—14° 30' S. Lon. 168°—173° W.

NAXOS, or NAXIA, nax'-os, an island of the Grecian archipelago, and the largest of the Cyclades, in the Ægean Sea, midway between Greece and Asia Minor. It is 20 miles long and 15 broad, fertile, and producing fruits, wine, olive-oil, and cheese. A ridge of mountains, rising to 3,000 feet, traverses the island. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 37° N. Lon. 26° 31' E.—This island was taken by the Turks in the 13th century, but now forms a government of the kingdom of Greece.

NAXOS, capital of the island of the same name, on the north-west coast. There are a citadel built by the Venetians, 16 Greek and 4 Catholic churches, and the town is the seat of a Greek and Latin bishop. Pop. 5,000.

NAZAIRE, ST., na-zair', a seaport of France, department Var, 9 miles W. of Toulon. There are a capacious roadstead and small harbour, defended by a tower 130 feet high, and three batteries. There is a considerable coasting trade. Pop. 2,500.

NAZAIRE, ST., a seaport of France, department Loire-Inférieure, on the right bank of the estuary of the Loire. There are docks occupying 200 acres, and a large foreign trade is carried on and the importance of the town is rapidly increasing. Pop. 20,000.

NAZARETH, naz'-a-reth, a village of Palestine, 65 miles N. of Jerusalem. It stands in a valley of the same name, celebrated as the residence of our Saviour and his family during the first thirty years of his life. It occupies part of a declivity, and has a Latin convent, with a church said to be built on the site where took place the annunciation of the advent of Christ. Pop. 3,200.

NEAGH, LOUGH, lok'-na, a lake of Ireland, the largest in the British Islands, surrounded by the counties of Armagh, Tyrone, Londonderry, Antrim, and Down. It is 18 miles long and 11 miles broad, with an extreme depth of 120 feet. There are several islands, and the Upper Bann, Blackwater, Moyola, Main, and other rivers flow into it. The Lower Bann carries off the superfluous water to the North Channel.

NEAL, DANIEL, neele, an English non-conformist divine. After receiving his education at Merchant Taylors' school, he went to Utrecht and Leyden. In 1706 he was chosen pastor of an Independent congregation in Aldersgate Street, and afterwards in Jewin Street. He wrote, "A History of New England," "A History of the Puritans," and some sermons.

Born in London, 1678; died at Bath, 1743.

NEANDER, CHRISTOPHE FRIEDRICH, nai-an'-dair, a German sacred poet. After completing his studies at the university of Halle, he acted, for a short time, as tutor in a family, but was, in 1750, appointed pastor of a small country congregation; whence he removed to a more lucrative charge at Gränzhof. In 1784 he was appointed clerical superintendent of the duchies of Courland and Semigallia; but continued to reside at Gränzhof, where he supported a widowed sister and her family. His songs are esteemed as among the best specimens of devotional poetry in the German language.

Born at Ekau, Courland, 1724; died 1802.

NEANDER, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, German ecclesiastical historian, was born of Jewish parents, and by his mother's side related to Moses Mendelssohn, but, while pursuing his studies at the Johanneum College at Hamburg, became a convert, at the age of 17, to the Christian faith, and changed his name from Mendol to Neander, signifying, in Greek, "a new man." He also discontinued the name David, receiving new Christian names in baptism. He subsequently studied at the Universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Heidelberg. His great attainments led to his being appointed, in 1812, professor of theology at the last-named establishment, and in 1813 he was chosen to fill the chair of theology at the university of Berlin, where he remained until his death. In the same year he published "The Emperor Julian and his Times," which established his reputation as a theological historian. His greatest work, entitled "Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church," was given to the world between the years 1825—1845, and was comprised in five volumes. He wrote several other elaborate works. In 1835 he produced a refutation of Strauss' "Life of Jesus," in a work entitled "The Life of Jesus in its Historical Relations."

Born at Göttingen, 1789; died 1850.

NEARCHUS, ne-ar'-kus, one of the captains of Alexander the Great, who ordered him to load the fleet he had built upon the Hydaspes to the Persian Gulf. Nearchus wrote an account of this voyage, the original of which is lost; but Arrian, Strabo, and Pliny have preserved a great portion of it: Arrian's extract is, however, the fullest and most correct. Subsequently to the death of Alexander, Nearchus became governor of Lycia and Pamphylia.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

NEATH, neeth, a parliamentary and municipal borough, and river port of South Wales, in Glamorganshire, on the Neath, 7 miles N.E. of Swansea. The principal public buildings are the townhall, an old and a new church. There are the remains of an ancient castle, and in the vicinity the large ruins of Neath Abbey, the finest abbey in Wales. In the neighbourhood are iron-forges, extensive tin-works, and smelting-works for copper. Coal is raised and stone quarried. There is water communication with Swansea. Pop. 10,000.—A station on the Great Western, and the Neath and Brecon railways.

NEBRASKA, ne-bras'-ka, one of the United States of America, bound N. by the Dakola Territory, S. by Kansas and Colorado, W. by Wyoming, and E. by Iowa and Missouri. It consists for the most part of rolling prairie, gently undulating plains, with here and there extensive tablelands, or broad valleys, while along the rivers bold bluffs relieve the monotony of the landscape. The rolling plains rise gradually towards the west from an altitude of 1,000 feet above the sea at Omaha in the east, to 5,000 feet at the western boundary of the State. In the western parts, near the Rocky Mountains, is a desert valley 90 miles long, and 30 wide, with rocky pinnacles. The depression of this valley (which is rich in fossil remains) is 300 feet. The Platte valley, running through the centre of the state is a wide fertile tract, and the prairies afford fine pasturage for domestic animals, and also for large herds of buffaloes. The state possesses, for the most part, an extremely fertile soil, yielding bountiful crops of wheat, maize, flax, tobacco, and fruits, while extensive prairies afford unlimited pasturage for sheep and cattle. Hostile and troublesome Indians have been settled on "reservations," or driven away to other hunting-grounds by the resistless advance of the whites. The climate is dry and salubrious.

Rivers.—The Missouri forms the eastern border of the state; the Niobrava is partly on the northern boundary, and the other principal streams are the Platte, or Nebraska, and the Republican fork of the Kansas, with various contributory streams.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, cinnabar, sandstone, and coal.

Area.—75,995 square miles.

Pop.—452,500, and rapidly increasing, including about 6,000 Indians, of the Omaha, Pawnee, Otol, and Sioux tribes.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 65 counties, two unorganised territories, and two Indian reservations. The chief towns are OMAHA, the capital; LINCOLN, and NEBRASKA CITY.

History.—The district was organised as a territory in 1854, and became a state in 1867.

NEBRASKA CITY, capital of Otoe county, Nebraska, on the Missouri, 45 miles S.E. of Lincoln. It is handsomely situated on a rising ground, and has good public buildings. Pop. 4,183.

NEBRASKA, or PLATTE, a river of Nebraska, rising in the Rocky Mountains, lat. 42° 30′ N., lon. 109° W., and flowing easterly 600 miles to the Missouri.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR I., NABUCODONOSOR, or NABU-KUDURI-UZUR, neb-u-kad-nez'-zar, king of Nineveh and Babylon, 606 B.C. He invaded Judæa, took Jerusalem, and carried the treasures of the temple and a number of captives to Babylon, including Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar, having lost his reason, became an outcast from the society of men, and lived among wild beasts in the forest; but, on his recovery, he again ascended the throne. The public works carried on by him were of the most stupendous character, including canals, reservoirs, harbours, strong cities, and splendid palaces, extensive remains of which, with inscriptions attributing their origin to this king, have been discovered by recent explorers.

Died B.C. 561.

NECHAM, NECKAM, or NEQUAM, ALEXANDER, nek-am, also known as Alexander de Sancto Albano, scholar and poet. He received his early education at the abbey of St. Albans, and was for some time a schoolmaster at Dunstable. In 1180 he was a professor of logic and other arts at Paris, and shortly afterwards became an Augustine monk at Cirencester, where he became abbot in 1213. He had the reputation of being a universal scholar, proficient in all the sciences as then known, including canon law, medicine, and theology, was an excellent grammarian, and had a knowledge of most trades and handicrafts, and of agriculture, on which subjects he wrote. His Latin poems are considered the models of elegance and purity. He wrote an elaborate and scientific treatise in verse, which traversed the entire field of scientific and theological knowledge as ascertained in his day, and a prose work of a similarly comprehensive character, but enlivened by anecdotes of animals. He also wrote many purely theological and philosophical works, and commentaries on the classical authors.

Born at St. Albans, 1157; died at Kemsey, Worcestershire, 1217.

NECHES, ne'-shes', a river of Texas, United States, rising in the eastern part of the state, and flowing in a generally south-eastern direction, 200 miles to Sabine Bay, and thence into the Gulf of Mexico.

NECHO, ne'-ko, a king of Egypt, called in Scripture Pharaoh-Necho, succeeded his father Psammetichus, 617 B.C. He planned a canal from the Nile to the Arabian Gulf, which undertaking he was forced to abandon, after losing a great number of men. It is stated that the ships of Necho sailed from the Red Sea round the coast of Africa into the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt, after a voyage of three years. (See AFRICA.) This monarch invaded Assyria, and, on his march, was attacked by Josiah, king of Judah, who was slain in the battle. Necho was in turn defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, and obliged to return to his own country.

Died 601 B.C.

NECHOW, ne'-tchow, a town of China, province of Che-Keang. A very active trade is carried on. Pop. 25,000.

NECKAR, nek'-ar, a river of the south-west of Germany, and the chief river of Wurtemberg, rising in the mountains of Schwarzwald, and, after a winding course of 240 miles, joining the Rhine at Mannheim.

NECKAR, a district of Wurttemberg, with an area of 1,286 square miles. Pop. 622,912.

NECKER, JACQUES, nek'-er, French minister and financier, descended from an Irish family, who went to Paris at an early age, obtained employment in a banking-house, in which he rose to a partnership, and, in 13 years, having made a number of successful speculations, and acquired a reputation as a writer on finance, retired from business with a large fortune. He commenced his political career by becoming a member of the council of Two Hundred at Geneva. He was afterwards appointed minister of the republic of Geneva at Paris, where, by degrees, he rose to the highest employments. In 1765 he was appointed syndic of the French East-India Company; in 1775 director of the royal treasury; and in 1777 was appointed director-general of the finances of France. So great was his reputation as a financier, that loans to an almost unprecedented amount were negotiated by him. But his Protestantism, and desire to make retrenchments in the royal household, obliged him to retire to Switzerland. Necker wrote three volumes on the finances of France, a book on the influence of religious opinions, and other works. In 1788 Louis XVI. recalled him, and appointed him comptroller-general of finance and minister of state, and he recommended the assembly of the States-General; he was dismissed a few months afterwards, and ordered to leave the country, but in a few days the king begged him to return. He endeavoured to obtain a constitution, but failing, resigned in 1790, and retired to his estate of Coppet, near Geneva. He married the daughter of a Protestant clergyman, by whom he had a daughter, Madame de Staël Holstein, the wife of the Swedish ambassador. She afterwards became celebrated by the name of Madame de Staël.

Born at Geneva, 1734; died in Switzerland, 1804.

NEDENAES, ned'-en-ais, a mountainous district of Norway, inclosed by the districts of Bradsberg, Stravanger, and Mandals, and on the S.E. by the Skager-rack. The chief town is ARENDAL. Area, 4,266 square miles. Pop. 73,415.

NEDERBRAKEL, ned-er-brak'-el, a town of Belgium, province of East Flanders, 16 miles S. of Ghent. There are salt refineries, dye works, and oil, mustard, and flour mills. Pop. 3,800.

NEDRIGAILOW, ned-re-gail'-ov, a town of Russia, government of Kharkov, on the left bank of the Soula, 104 miles N.W. of Kharkov. There is a considerable trade in tobacco, grown in the neighbourhood. Pop. 5,000.

NEDSHEFABAD, ned-shef-a-bad', a town of Persia, province of Irak-Ajemi, 18 miles W. of Ispahan, regularly built, and surrounded by beautiful gardens. Cotton is cultivated. Pop. 15,000.

NEEDHAM, MARCHAMONT, need'-ham, an English writer, who, during the civil war, distinguished himself by his political pamphlets, first against the parliament, and afterwards against the king; so that, at the Restoration, he obtained his pardon with difficulty.

Born at Burford, Oxfordshire, 1620; died 1678.

NEEDHAM, JOHN TUBERVILLE, English naturalist, who was educated at Douay, where he entered into orders as a Roman Catholic divine. His superiors appointed him professor of philosophy in the English college at Lisbon. He afterwards became travelling tutor to a nobleman; and, on his return, settled in London, where he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote observations inserted in Buffon's "Natural History;" also "New Enquiries upon Microscopical Discoveries," the "Generation of Organic Bodies," and "Observations on Spallanzani's Microscopical Discoveries."

Born in London, 1713; died at Brussels, 1781.

NEEDLES, THE, need'-els, a cluster of five pointed rocks on the extreme western coast of the English Channel, off the Isle of Wight. Lat. 50° 40′ N. Lon. 1° 34′ W.—The Needles lighthouse, on the cliff, on the island, is 469 feet high.

NEEMUCH, or NIMACH, na-much', a town of India, in Scindia's Dominions. It stands at an elevation of nearly 1,500 feet above the sea level, in a district fertile in rice, wheat, maize, and barley. Pop. 4,000, exclusive of the cantonment. Lat. 24° 27′ N. Lon. 75° E.

NEERWINDEN, nair-vin'-den, a small village of Belgium, province of Liége. Here William III. of England was defeated by the duke of Luxembourg, in 1693; and here, in 1793, the French were defeated by the allies.

NEFF, FELIX, nef, Swiss Protestant pastor, who for his zeal and the success which attended his ministry among the mountaineers was known as "the apostle of the Alps."

Born 1798; died 1829.

NEFF, TIMOLEON CARL VON, Russian painter. He studied at Dresden and Rome, and went to St. Petersburg in 1826. In 1832 he was appointed court painter, afterwards receiving a pension, and in 1839 was made an academician. Some of the paintings in St. Isaac's Cathedral were executed by him, and in 1865 he was appointed professor in the Academy of Fine Arts. He excelled in portraits, frescoes, studies of nymphs and scenes of Italian life.

Born in Esthonia, 1805; died 1877.

NEF-SCHEHR, nef-shair', a town of Turkey in Asia, in Karamania, 340 miles S.E. of Constantinople. It was only a village named Maschkara, until the early part of the last century, when one of its natives, Ibrahim Pacha, who rose to be grand vizier, raised it into great importance, and gave it the present name, which means "new town." There are no public buildings of any interest. Pop. 28,000, mostly Greeks, with some Turks and Armenians.

NEGAPATAM, neg-a-pa-tam', an ancient seaport of British India, on the Coromandel coast, 20 miles S. of Tamquebar. Under the Dutch, who took it from the Portuguese in 1660, it was a place of considerable importance, and the capital of the Dutch settlements in India. It was ceded to the British in 1783. Very little trade is now carried on. It is well fortified and has a large pagoda, or Hindoo temple. Pop. 53,860. Lat. 10° 45′ N. Lon. 79° E.

NEGAUNEE, ne-gau'-ne, a city of Marquette county, Michigan, United States, in the midst of a rich iron district, and having productive mines and large blast furnaces. Pop. 4,500.

NEGOMBO, ne-gom'-bo, a seaport of Ceylon, near the mouth of the Kaymel, 24 miles N. of Colombo. It is the residence of an assistant governor, and famous for vegetables, fruit, mushrooms, and fish.

NEGOTINA, neg-o-te'-na, a town of Servia, on a circle of the same name, 19 miles N.E. of Widdin. There are several annual markets, much frequented. Pop. 3,300.

NEGRAIS, neg-rise', an island at the mouth of the western branch of the Irrawady, Burmah. It is small, but has a very secure harbour. A settlement was formed here by the Madras government in 1607, but after repeated contests with the natives, who massacred the settlers, it was abandoned in 1759, and the island is now almost deserted. Lat. 16° 1' N. Lon. 94° 12' E.

NEGREPELISSE, nai'-grai-pai-leese', a town of France, department Tarn-et-Garonne, 10 miles N.E. of Montauban. It suffered terribly during the persecution of the Protestants, the greater number of the inhabitants being of that faith. Louis XIII. ordered an indiscriminate massacre of the inhabitants. Manf. Cotton, cutlery, and leather. There is a trade in corn. Pop. 3,100.

NEGRO, RIO. (See RIO NEGRO.)

NEGROPONT, neg'-ro-pont. (See EUBŒA and CHALCIS.)

NEGROS, nai'-grose, one of the Philippine islands, in the Asiatic Archipelago, S. of Luzon. A lofty range of mountains traverses the island from north to south, but very little is known of the interior, where the wild tribes cultivate coffee and cocoa. Area, 3,780 square miles. Pop. 204,669, exclusive of the semi-savage tribes, number unknown.

NEHAVEND, or NAHAWUND, ne-ha-vend', a town of Persia, province of Irak-Ajemi, situated among productive orchards, at the junction of two streams forming the Koon. There are a citadel and well supplied bazaar, and a considerable trade is carried on. In 641 a great battle was fought here, resulting in the overthrow of the Persian monarchy by the Arabs.

NEHEMIAH, ne'-he-mi'-a, a Hebrew, the son of Hachaliah, and born in Babylon, during the captivity. He became cupbearer, at Shushan, to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, who permitted him to return to his own country, and to rebuild Jerusalem. He achieved this work 454 B.C., though greatly opposed by the enemies of the Jewish nation. After governing that people with great wisdom and zeal, he died at Jerusalem.

Died 430 B.C.

NEIDENBURG, ni-den-boorg, a walled town of Prussia, province of Prussia, district of Königsberg, on the Neida, 95 miles S.W. of Königsberg. Manf. Woollens, leather, and hats. Pop. 3,800.

NEILGHERRY, or NILGIRI HILLS, nile-gar'-re (from the Sanskrit words meaning blue mountains), a range of mountains in southern India, occupying a triangular area, the western base being about 40 miles in length. There is a dense forest at the foot of the mountains abounding in elephants, tigers, and other wild animals. The highest peak, Dodabetta, 8,760 feet high, is near the centre. A portion of the range is fine undulating grass land, inhabited by a very fine race, the Tudas (herdsmen). Among the hills are different stations resorted to by Europeans, on account of the salubrity of the climate, the principal being Oolamacund, or Utakamund.

NEISSE, ni'-se, a river of Germany, which after a course of 90 miles, falls into the Oder, 51 miles from Oppeln.—Another, which, after a course of 115 miles, joins the Oder, 20 miles from Frankfort.

NEISSE, a fortified town of Prussia, in Silesia, on the Neisse, 30 miles S.W. of Oppeln. It consists of the town proper, on the right bank, Friedrich's Town and Preussen Fort on the left bank. It contains eight Catholic and two evangelical churches, with a theatre, arsenals, barracks, and hospitals. Manf. Woollens, linens, ribbons, stockings, arms, tobacco, and chemicals. Pop. 20,000.

NEIVA, or NITZA, ni'-va, a river of Asiatic Russia, rising on the eastern slope of the Ural Mountains, 35 miles N.W. of Ekaterinburg, and after a winding course of 300 miles, joining the right bank of the Tura at Nitzinka. The chief affluents are the Rij and the Irbit, both joining on the right.

NEJD, nejd, "elevated country," the general name of the central portion of the Arabian peninsula.

NEJIN, or NEISHIN, nej-in', an ancient town of Russia, on the Oster, an affluent of the Dneiper, 80 miles N.E. of Kier. It is enclosed by earthen walls, and has 25 churches, two monasteries, and a college. Manf. Chiefly tobacco; leather, soap, confectionery, and liqueurs. Pop. 21,000.—This town belonged to the kingdom of Poland from 1386 to 1654, when it was annexed to Russia.

NELEDINSKY, MELETZKY YURII, nel-e-dins'-ke me-letz'-ke, Russian ballad writer, who at first served in the Russian army, and fought against the Turks during the campaigns which took place between the years 1770—1774. He was afterwards attached to the mission dispatched to Constantinople, and was selected by the emperor Paul, in 1797, to accompany him in his journey to White Russia. In 1809 the Czar bestowed upon him the order of St. Alexander Nevski, having previously rewarded his services by the grant of an estate, with several hundred serfs, together with the order of St. Anne. As a song-writer, he was graceful and charming to an extent far beyond any thing that had been hitherto attained by the authors of his country, combining tenderness with warmth of feeling.

Born 1751; died 1829.

NELEUS, ne'-le-us, or ne-le'-us, in Greek mythology a son of Neptune and Tyro, brother to Pelias, with whom he was exposed by his mother. They were, however, preserved, and brought to Tyro, who had then married Cretheus, king of Iolchos. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus seized the kingdom of Iolchos, which belonged to Æson, the lawful son of Tyro by the deceased monarch. After they had reigned for some time conjointly, Pelias expelled Neleus from Iolchos. Neleus went to Aphareus, king of Messenia, who treated him with kindness, and permitted him to build a city, which he called Pylos. Neleus married Chloris, the daughter of Amphion, by whom he had a daughter and 12 sons, who were, all except Nestor, killed by Hercules, together with their father.

NELLORE, nel-laor', a town of British India, on the right bank of the Pennar, 20 miles from its mouth, in the Bay of Bengal, 110 miles N.W. of Madras. A large trade is carried on; the principal street, three-quarters of a mile long, being lined with good shops. Many Roman coins were discovered here under the ruins of a Hindoo temple. Pop. 27,505; of district, 1,220,236.

NELSON, HORATIO, Viscount, nel'-son, the greatest of British admirals, was the fourth son of the Rev. Mr. Nelson, rector of Burnham-Thorpe, in Norfolk, and by his mother's side related to the famous Sir Robert Walpole. He received his education at the school of North Walsham; but at the age of 13 years was taken to sea by his maternal uncle, Captain Suckling, of the Raisonable man-of-war. Soon afterwards, the ship was put out of commission, and young Nelson went on board a West Indiaman. Southey, speaking of this step taken by Nelson, says, "He returned a good practical seaman, but with a hatred of the king's service, and a saying then common among sailors, 'aft the most honour, forward the better man.'" To remove this objection he was again placed with his uncle, who had obtained the command of the Triumph. In 1773, a voyage was undertaken for the discovery of a north-west passage, under the command of Commodore Phipps, and Captain Lutwidge. The young seaman entered on board the ship commanded by the latter, and distinguished himself in that perilous voyage by his skill, courage, and promptitude. Soon after his return, he was appointed to the Seahorse, in which he sailed to the East Indies. He passed his examination for lieutenant in 1777, and received his commission as second of the Lowestoft frigate, in which he cruised against the Americans. In 1779 he obtained the rank of post-captain, and was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbroke, with which he sailed to the West Indies, and while there essentially contributed to the taking of Fort San Juan, in the Gulf of Mexico. His health having given way, he returned home, and after going through a course of Bath waters, was again employed in the Albemarle, and was subsequently appointed to the Boreas, having under his orders the duke of Clarence, afterwards William IV., who was captain of the Pegasus. While thus engaged, he married the daughter of William Woodward, Esq., judge of the island of Nevis, and the widow of Dr. Nesbit, a physician of that island, but had no children of the marriage. In 1793 he was appointed to the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, on board of which he sailed to the Mediterranean, and was present with Lord Hood before Toulon. He also engaged and captured the Ca-Ira at the siege of Bastia, where he served in the batteries with a body of seamen, as he afterwards did at Calvi; and while employed before that place he lost an eye. He was so active on that station, that his name became dreaded throughout the Mediterranean. Under Admiral Hotham he was in the action with the French fleet, March 15, 1795. In 1796 he was appointed commodore on board the Minerva, in which frigate he captured La Sabine, a 40-gun ship; but was compelled to abandon the prize upon the approach of the Spanish fleet. He immediately steered with the intelligence to Sir John Jervis, off St. Vincent. He had scarcely communicated the news, and shifted his flag on board the Captain, of 74 guns, when the enemy hove in sight. A close action ensued, which terminated in a complete victory on the side of the British, who were inferior in numbers. On this occasion, Commodore Nelson attacked the Santissima Trinidada, of 136 guns, and afterwards boarded and took the San Nicolas, of 80 guns; whence he proceeded in the same manner to the San Josef, of 112 guns, both of which surrendered to him. For his share in this glorious victory, the commodore was honoured with the order of the Bath, and having soon afterwards hoisted his flag as rear-admiral of the blue, he was appointed to command the in-shore squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. He there made a bold but unsuccessful attempt to bombard the city, heading his men himself. The next exploit in which he was engaged was an attempt to take possession of Teneriffe, which design also failed, with the loss of Captain Bowen, of the Terpsichore. In this expedition, Admiral Nelson lost his right arm by a cannon shot, and was carried off to the boat by his step-son, Captain Nesbit, on his back. He now returned to England for the recovery of his health, and received the grant of a pension of £1,000 a year. The memorial which he was required to present upon this occasion stated that he had been four times in action with the enemy's fleets (in three with boats, upon cutting-out expeditions); had assisted at the taking of three towns; had served at Bastia and Calvi; had assisted in capturing seven sail of the line, six frigates, four corvettes, and eleven privateers; had taken fifty merchant vessels; had been in action a hundred and twenty times; had lost his right eye and arm, besides receiving other severe wounds. The brave admiral, however, did not long remain inactive; he rejoined Earl St. Vincent, who, on receiving intelligence of the sailing of Bonaparte from Toulon, detached Sir Horatio Nelson, with a squadron, in pursuit of him. After exploring the east of Italy, this infatigable commander steered for Alexandria, where, to his great mortification, not a French ship was to be seen. He then sailed to Sicily, and having taken in fresh supplies, and obtained more correct information, returned to Alexandria, which he descried, August 1, 1798, at noon. The enemy, consisting of one first-rate, three second-rates, nine seventy-fours, and four frigates, were discovered in Aboukir Bay, lying at anchor in line of battle, supported by strong batteries on an island, and strengthened by gunboats. Notwithstanding this formidable appearance, the British admiral made the signal for battle, and, by a masterly and bold manœuvre, gave directions for part of his fleet to steer inside the enemy, who were thus exposed between two fires. Several of the French ships were soon dismasted, and at last the admiral's ship, L'Orient, of 120 guns, took fire, and blew up. The firing, however, continued; but, by the dawn of day, only two sail of the line were discovered with their colours flying, all the rest having struck: these two cut their cables and stood to sea. On the British admiral honours were deservedly poured: he was created Baron Nelson of the Nile, received the thanks of parliament, together with the captains engaged, and was granted a pension of £2,000 per annum. The king of Naples created him duke of Bronté, and gave him an estate worth £3,000 a year. Soon after this he sailed for Sicily, and thence to Naples, where he quelled a rebellion, and restored the king. His reputation in connection with his career at Naples suffered in consequence of the influence exercised over him by an adventuress, Lady Hamilton, the wife of the English ambassador. (See HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM.) The execution of Prince Caraccioli, it was suspected, was one of the results of this influence. (See CARACCIOLI.) Lord Nelson returned to England, and was received with enthusiastic joy. A confederacy of the northern powers having alarmed the government, he was employed in 1801 to dissolve it. A fleet was fitted out, the command of which was given to Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, Lord Nelson being appointed as second in command. On their arrival off the Cattegat, and being refused a passage, Lord Nelson offered to conduct an attack on the Danish fence, which was stationed to oppose an entrance. This being accepted, he shifted his flag to the Elephant, and passed the sound with little loss. On the 2nd of April the action commenced near Copenhagen, and, after a sharp conflict, seventeen sail of the Danes were sunk, burnt, or taken. This victory was obtained by a daring refusal to obey the signal from Sir Hyde Parker to discontinue action. A negotiation was then entered into between Nelson and the crown prince, in consequence of which the admiral went ashore, and an armistice was settled. He next obtained from the Swedish government an order for taking off the embargo on English ships in the Baltic. Having accomplished these great objects, he returned to England, and was created a viscount. In 1801 he bombarded the enemy's flotilla, which had been collected at Boulogne, to assist in Napoleon's projected invasion of England. After experiencing some loss, Nelson withdrew without producing any material effect upon the enemy. Peace having been suddenly concluded, Nelson retired to his seat at Merton, in Surrey; but hostilities recommencing he sailed for the Mediterranean, and in March, 1803, took the command of that station on board the Victory. Notwithstanding all his vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and was joined by that of Cadiz; on learning which, he pursued them to the West Indies with a greatly inferior force. The combined squadrons, however, struck with terror, returned without effecting anything, and, after a partial action with Sir Robert Calder off Ferrol, re-entered Cadiz. Admiral Nelson returned to England; but soon set sail to join his fleet off Cadiz. The French under Admiral Villeneuve, and the Spaniards under Gravina, ventured out with a number of troops on board, October 19, 1805, and on the 21st, about noon, the action began off Cape Trafalgar. The combined French and Spanish fleets consisted of 33 sail of the line and 7 frigates; the English squadron mustered 27 sail of the line and 4 frigates. It was while bearing down upon the enemy that Nelson hoisted his celebrated signal, "England expects every man to do his duty." Lord Nelson ordered his ship, the Victory, to be carried alongside his old antagonist, the Santissima Trinidada, where he was exposed to a severe fire of musketry; and, not having taken the precaution to cover his coat, which was decorated with his star and other badges of distinction, he became an object for the riflemen, placed purposely in the tops of the Bucentaur, which lay on his quarter. During the heat of the action, a bullet from one of these entered just below his shoulder, he died in about three hours from the effects of the wound. After the fall of Lord Nelson, the command devolved on Admiral Collingwood, by whose bravery and skill the victory was completed, and the naval power of France virtually annihilated. Eighteen French and Spanish ships were taken: eleven escaped into Cadiz, six of which were reduced to mere wrecks; four French line-of-battle ships, which hauled off in the action, were afterwards taken by Sir Richard Strachan. "The death of Nelson," says Southey, "was felt in England as a public calamity; yet he cannot be said to have fallen prematurely whose work was done; nor ought he to be lamented who died so full of honours and at the height of human fame." His brother, the Rev. William Nelson, was created an earl, with a grant of £6,000 per annum. Lord Nelson's sisters were voted each £10,000, with £100,000 for the purchase of an estate. The remains of Lord Nelson were publicly interred in St. Paul's Cathedral, January 9, 1806.

Born at Burnham-Thorpe, Norfolk, 1758; died off Cape Trafalgar, 1805.

NELSON, the most northern province of Middle Island, New Zealand, bounded N. and W. by the South Pacific Ocean, E. by the province of Marlborough, and S. by that of Canterbury. The surface is rugged and mountainous, and the scenery very grand. In the valleys the soil is very fertile, and the climate is soft and genial.

Rivers.—The Grey, Buller, Aorere, Takaka, Motueka, Waimea, and Harunui.

Minerals.—Very extensive beds of iron, lead, and copper ore; gold (both alluvial and quartz), especially near the Grey and Buller rivers; coal, and limestone.

Area.—10,957 square miles.

Pop.—30,000.

Chief Towns.—Nelson, the capital; Brighton, Charleston, Cobden, and Westport.

History.—The province was founded by the New Zealand Company in 1841.

NELSON, capital of the above province, and an episcopal city, is situated in a well-sheltered harbour, in Blind Bay, 78 miles W. of Wellington. The town is neatly laid out, with a central square, several churches, a court house, and other public offices, a college and handsome bank, business premises, and private warehouses. The city is lighted with gas, and there is an ample supply of pure mountain water. Pop. with suburbs, 9,000.

NELSON, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 16,609, about one-fourth being coloured. The capital is Bardstown.

NELSON, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 340 square miles. Pop. 16,536, about one half being coloured. The capital is Lovingston.

NELSON RIVER, in British North America, issues from the northern end of Lake Winnipeg, passes through several states, and falls into Hudson Bay after a course of 350 miles. Owing to numerous rapids and falls, it is nearly unnavigable.

NEMAHA, ne-ma'-ha, a county of Kansas United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 7,500. The capital is Seneca.

NEMAHA, a county of Nebraska, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 8,000. The capital is Brownville.

NEMAUR, or NIMAWAR, ne-mor', a district of India, comprising a large portion of the valley of the Nerbudda and of the Vindhya mountains. About one-eighth part is British territory. Pop. 250,000.

NEMESIANUS, Marcus Aurelius Olympius ne-me'-si-ai'-nus, a Latin poet, who is supposed to have perished in the proscriptions that disgraced the commencement of the reign of Diocletian. He wrote a poem on hunting, and four eclogues; these were included in the collection edited by Sterne in 1832.

Lived in the 3rd century.

NEMESIS, nem'-e-sis, in Greek mythology, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddess of vengeance, always prepared to punish impiety, and at the same time, liberally to reward the good and virtuous. Her power not only existed in this life, but she was also employed after death to find out the most effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemesis was particularly worshipped at Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated statue, ten cubits long, carved in Parian marble by Phidias. The Romans were also particularly attentive to her adoration. Her statue at Rome was in the Capitol. The Greeks celebrated a festival called Nemesia in memory of deceased persons, as the goddess Nemesis was supposed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all insult.

NEMESIUS, ne-me'-si-us, bishop of Emesa, in Syria, and a learned philosopher. He wrote a work entitled "The Nature of Man," from some passages in which it has been asserted that he was acquainted with the circulation of the blood and the functions of the liver. The work is certainly a very remarkable one.

Lived in the 4th century.

NEMOURS, ne-moor', a town of France, department Seine-et-Marne, on the Loing, 9 miles S. of Fontainebleau. There are a handsome church and the remains of an old castle. Manf. Vinegar, leather, tiles, bricks and lime. It trades in corn, wine, cheese, wood and charcoal. Pop. 3,800.

NEMOURS, Dukes of. Nemours is an old French title of nobility, derived from the town of that name. A branch of the Armagnac family first bore the title. The last of that line, Louis d'Armagnac, duke of Nemours, was killed while fighting against the Spaniards at the battle of Cerignola, in Apulia, 1503. Gaston de Foix next bore the title. The duchy was subsequently granted by Francis I. to his uncle, Philip of Savoy. The last male descendant in this line was Philip, duke of Nemours.

NEMOURS, LOUIS CHARLES PHILIPPE RAPHAEL, Duke of, second and eldest surviving son of the late Louis Philippe, king of the French. In 1831 he was elected king of the Belgians; but at the advice of his father, refused that dignity. In 1836 he went to Algeria, as adjutant-general of of the French army, and commanded a brigade of infantry at the siege of Constantine. In 1840 he espoused Victoria Augusta Antoinette, duchess of Saxe-Coburgh-Gotha, and in the following year, he signalized himself in the decisive campaign against Abd-el-Kader. During the Revolution of 1848, he accompanied his brother's widow, the duchess of Orleans to the Chamber of Deputies. He afterwards resided at Claremont, but returned to France, with the other Orleans princes, after the fall of Napoleon III.

Born at Paris, 1814.

NEMOURS, MARY DE LONGUEVILLE, Duchess of, was the daughter of the duke de Longueville, and the wife of the last-named duke de Nemours. Her "Memoirs of the Court of France during the Minority of Louis XIV." are written with spirit and fidelity.

Born 1625; died 1707.

NEN, or NENE, nen, a river of England, rising in Northamptonshire, in two streams which unite at Northampton. It forms a part of the boundary between the counties of Northampton and Huntingdon, and, after a course of 90 miles, falls into the North Sea at the Wash. It has communication with the Ouse by means of the Wisbeach canal.

NENAGH, nai-na', a market town of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, 95 miles S.W. of Dublin. There is an old keep, or fortress, and the public buildings are large and handsome. Manf. Woollens, soap, candles and tobacco. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 5,422, nearly all Roman Catholics. A station on the Great Southern and Western railway.

NENNIUS, nen'-ne-us, a British chronicler, probably a monk of Bangor, to whom is attributed a legendary history of Britain from the earliest times to the 7th century.

Lived in the 9th century.

NEOGRAD, nai'-o-grad, a county of Hungary, traversed by ranges of the Carpathians, but level at the south, and very fertile. The hilly parts are well wooded. The capital is BALASSA-GYARMATH. Pop. 173,000.

NEOPTOLEMUS, ne-op-tol'-e-mus, king of Epirus. (See PYRRHUS.)

NEOPTOLEMUS II. or III. upsurped the throne of Epirus during the minority of Pyrrhus the Great, but was subsequently put to death by that king.

NEOPTOLEMUS, a relation of Alexander the Great. He was the first to scale the walls of Gaza, when that city was taken by Alexander, after whose death he received Armenia as his province, and made war against Eumenes. He was supported by Craterus; but an engagement with Eumenes proved fatal to his cause. Craterus was killed and Neoptolemus mortally wounded by Eumenes.

Died B.C. 321.

NEOSHO, ne-osh'-o, a county of Kansas, United States. Area, 596 square miles. Pop. 15,121, The capital is Erie.

NEOTS ST. (See ST. NEOTS.)

NEPAUL, ne-pawl', an independent country of Northern Hindostan, on the southern slope of the Himalayas, and bounded W. and S. by British India, and E. by Sikkim. The valley of Nepaul proper, whence the country takes its name, is nearly of an oval figure, and is covered with wood. This is separated from the plains of India, by a strip of unhealthy marshy land, with jungle, the Terai, abounding in tigers and other large animals. Farther north is a parallel strip 8 to 10 miles wide, the forest of Nepaul, and in the north the surface rises rapidly into mountains, among them some of the loftiest points of the Himalayas. The soil is generally very fertile, producing cotton, sugar-cane, tobacco, and tropical fruits. The climate varies greatly, from extreme heat to considerable cold, according to elevation. The capital is KHATMANDU.

Rivers.—The Kurnalli, Rapti, San Kosi, and Gunduk, with its tributaries.

Area.—54,000 square miles.

Pop.—2,000,000, consisting of two principal tribes, the Ghoorkas, or Ghurkas, mostly warriors of Hindoo extraction, and the Newars, who follow peaceful pursuits, and are Buddhists.

Lat. 26° 25'—30° 17' N. Lon. 80° 15'—88° 15' E.

History.—In 1814, the Nepaulese were engaged in a war with the British, who, though they were repulsed at first, again invaded their territories, and dictated to them a treaty of peace in 1816. Since that time, all the country situate between the Kalee and Sutlej rivers has been ceded to the British.

NEPEAN, ne-peen', a river of eastern Australia, New South Wales, joining the Warragamba to form the Hawkesbury.

NEPHELE, nef'-e-le, Greek legend, the first wife of Athamas, king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle, was repudiated on pretence of being subject to fits of insanity, and Athamas married Ino, the daughter of Cadmus. Ino became jealous of Nephele, because her children were to succeed to the throne by right of seniority, and she resolved to destroy them. Nephele was apprised of this, and removed her children beyond the power of Ino, by giving them a celebrated ram, on whose back they escaped to Colchis. Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud; whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds.

NEPISS, a Canadian lake.

NEPOS, CORNELIUS, ne'-pos, Roman historian in the reign of Augustus, whose patronage he enjoyed. Of all his works there remains only his "Lives of Illustrious Greek Generals." This work (which has been translated into many languages, and is in general use as a schoolbook), contains short biographies of twenty Greek and two Carthaginian generals; the best sketches being those of Alcibiades, Epaminondas, and Pomponius Atticus.

He appears to have also written the lives of the Roman generals; but the work has been lost.

Lived in the 1st century B.C.

NEPOS, FLAVIUS JULIUS, emperor of the West, was a native of Dalmatia, and having married a niece of Leo I., that monarch gave him the Western empire. Nepos marched to Rome to secure his throne, after which he fixed the seat of government at Ravenna, but was obliged to quit that city by his general Orestes. He then retired to Dalmatia, where he was assassinated by two officers of his court.

Died 480.

NEPTUNE, nep'-tune, in Roman mythology, the equivalent of the Greek Poseidon. (See POSEIDON.)

NERAC, nai-rak', an ancient town of France, department Lot-et-Garonne, on the Baise, 16 miles S.W. of Agen. The old town is connected with the new by two stone bridges. There is a famous old castle, where Calvin and other Reformers found refuge, and where Henri IV. spent part of his youth. Manf. Woollens, leather, ship-biscuits, and cork. Many interesting Roman remains have been found in the vicinity. Pop. 7,800.

NERBUDDA, ner-bud'-da, "the bestower of pleasure," a river of India, which has its source 4,000 feet above the sea level, in the Vindhya Mountains. Lat. 22° 40. N., Lon. 81° 52′ E. After a course of about 800 miles, it falls into the Gulf of Cambay, on the western coast. A division of India of the same name. Pop. 1,763,105.

NERCHINSK, or NERTCHINSK, ner-tchinsk', a mining town of Russia in Asia, in the Trans-Baikal territory, Eastern Siberia, on the Wercha, a tributary of the Shilka. A considerable quantity of gold is obtained in the vicinity, and silver, lead, iron, tin, and precious stones are abundant. The soil of the surrounding district is fertile, and the climate mild and agreeable. The town was founded in 1658. Pop. 6,000.

NEREIDES, or NEREIDS, ne-ré'-i-des, in Greek mythology, nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. They were fifty, according to the greater number of the mythologists. They had altars chiefly on the coast, where milk, oil, honey, and often the flesh of goats were offered up. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the sea, and to be subservient to the will of Neptune. They are represented as young and handsome virgins, sitting on dolphins, and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or sometimes garlands of flowers.

NEREKHTA, ne-rek'-ta, a town of European Russia, government of Kostroma, on the left bank of the river Nerekhta, 27 miles S.W. of Kostroma. There are seven churches. Manf. Linen. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 2,800.

NEREUS, ne-ré'-us, in Greek and Roman mythology, a marine divinity, who dwelt at the bottom of the sea.

NERI, FILIPPO DE', nai'-re, founder of the congregation of the order of the Oratory in Italy. He was a member of a distinguished Florentine family, and in his youth was noted for his piety and benevolence. A wealthy uncle destined him for his heir, but he relinquished all his prospects for the purpose of devoting himself to a religious life. In 1534 he went to Rome to study theology and philosophy, and exerted himself actively in many works of charity. In 1551 he took priest's orders, and about the same time formed a confraternity for the care of pilgrims, the poor, and the sick, which was the germ of the famous Confraternity of the Oratory, which was sanctioned by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1575, and soon afterwards found members in France and other countries. He lived to a great age, and 27 years after his death was canonized by Gregory XV.

Born at Florence, 1515; died 1595.

NERI, POMPEIO, an eminent Italian political economist. He became professor of law at Pisa, and was employed in state affairs by the duke of Lorraine and the empress Maria Theresa. He founded the Academy of Botany at Florence. He wrote "Observations on the Ancient and Present State of the Tuscan Nobility," on the "Imposts of Milan," on the "Legal Value of Coin, and the difficulty of fixing and maintaining the same."

Born at Florence, 1707; died at the same city 1776.

NERIAD, ne-ri-ad', a town of British India, presidency of Bombay, 35 miles N.W. of Baroda. Tobacco is extensively cultivated in the vicinity. Pop. 25,000.

NERJA, nair'-ha, a town of Spain, province of Malaga, near the Mediterranean, 13 miles E. of Malaga. It is well built, and there are good public buildings, and a small harbour. Manf. Linen, paper, and sugar. Pop. 4,600.

NERO, CLAUDIUS CÆSAR DRUSUS GERMANICUS, ne'-ro, sixth Roman emperor, was the son of Caius Domitius and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus, and his original name was Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus. He was adopted by Claudius in A.D. 50, and four years after succeeded him on the throne, the Prætorian guard preferring him to Britannicus, the son of Claudius. The commencement of his reign was characterized by justice and clemency. He was liberal, affable, polished, complaisant, and his heart seemed to possess every excellent quality. But all this was mere exterior, and a mask, which hid the most depraved mind that ever disgraced a human being. He soon laid aside his artificial virtues, instigated the poisoning of Britannicus, released himself from the control of his mother (who, it must be admitted, had set him a very bad example), whom he caused to be assassinated to please a mistress, and vindicated the unnatural act to the senate on a pretence that Agrippina had plotted against him, and the senate was base enough to congratulate him on the deed. At the instigation of the same mistress (Poppæa Sabina, wife of Otho, afterwards emperor), he repudiated and murdered his wife, the sister of Britannicus. Many of the courtiers shared the same fate, and Rome was deluged with the blood of her best citizens. Nero plunged himself as deep in debauchery as in cruelty. He turned actor, pretended to excel in music, and even appeared as a competitor in wrestling at the Olympic games, where, though he was defeated, the assessors and spectators, out of flattery, adjudged him the victor. He also commenced a dreadful persecution of the Christians, and is stated by Suetonius and Dion (who however, is not accepted as an undoubted authority), to have caused Rome to be set on fire in several places, and during the conflagration to have beheld the scene from a high tower, where he amused himself by singing to his lyre. It is certain that he attributed the fire to the Christians, numbers of whom were torn to pieces by dogs, and burned during the night in the gardens of his palace. He rebuilt the city with great magnificence, and erected a splendid palace, the Aurea Domus, or "golden house," on the Palatine Hill. He afterwards kicked Poppæa to death, put to death Antonia, the daughter of Claudius, who refused to marry him; and married Statilia Messalina, whose husband he had killed. The philosopher Seneca, who had been his tutor, and the poet Lucan, were also put to death by his order. His cruelties, extravagance, and debauchery, at length roused the public resentment. Piso formed a conspiracy against the tyrant, but it was discovered and defeated. That of Galba, however, proved more successful, and Nero, being abandoned by his flatterers, was, at his own request, put to death by one of the officers of his court.

Born at Antium, in Latium, A.D. 37; died A.D. 68.

NERTCHA, ner'-tch^a, a river of Asiatic Russia, in Siberia, rising on the eastern frontier of the government of Irkutsk, and after a circuitous course of 140 miles, joining the Schilka, on the left bank, at Nerchinsk. The chief affluent is the Uldurga, on the right.

NERVA, MARCUS COCCEIUS, ner'-va, Roman emperor, succeeded Domitian, A.D. 96. He became the favourite of the Romans by his mildness and generosity, but would not allow any statues to be erected to his honour. At the close of life, his soldiers mutinied against him; on which occasion he behaved with calmness and intrepidity. He then appointed Trajan his successor, amidst the acclamations of the people. He was the first Roman emperor of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete.

Born at Narnia, Umbria, 32; died 98.

NESCHIN, nes'-chin, a town of European Russia, government of Czernigor, on the Ostar, 36 miles S.E. of Czernigor. It is surrounded by an earthen rampart, and has 15 churches, several convents, a castle, town-house, and several educational establishments. Manf. Confectionery, for which it is famous, silk, leather, soap, and perfumes. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 16,000.

NESHOBA, nesh-o'-ba, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 600 square miles. Pop. 8,741, about 1,800 being coloured. The capital is Philadelphia.

NESS, LOCH, ness, a long, narrow lake of Inverness-shire, Scotland, forming a natural portion of the Caledonian canal. It is 23 miles long, with an average breath of 1½, and an extreme depth of more than 700 feet. It lies in the valley of Glenmore, and is enclosed by lofty mountains. It receives the Oich, Foyers, Morristen, and other streams, and its surplus waters are carried by the river Ness to the Moray Firth.

NESS, an almost uninhabited county of Kansas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. When the census of 1870 was taken, there were only two inhabitants. In 1880, 3,722.

NESSELRODE, KARL ROBERT VON, nes'-sel-rod, Count von, a modern Russian diplomatist, whose ancestors, Hanoverian nobles, settled in Livonia about the latter end of the 17th century. At the time of his birth his father was Russian ambassador in Portugal. After a short career in the army, he became attached to the diplomatic service, and was employed in a minor capacity at Berlin, the Hague, and other places. In 1807 he went to Paris, as ambassador from Russia; but on the accession of Alexander, he was appointed his secretary. In 1814, he accompanied Alexander to France and he signed the famous treaty of the Quadruple alliance at Chaumonts, and took a principal part in the negotiations which ended in the treaty of Paris. He also acted as the plenipotentiary of Russia at the congress of Vienna, and went with his master to the congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle Troppau, Laybach, and Verona. During the subsequent half-century, he continued to serve the successive sovereigns of Russia as minister of foreign affairs. He endeavoured to avert the war with England and France in 1854. On the accession of Alexander II. he resigned the office of minister of foreign affairs; but remained chancellor of the empire, and retained a seat in the ministerial council.

Born at Lisbon, 1780; died at St. Petersburg, 1862.

NESSIR-KHAN, nes'-sir-kan, sovereign of Beloochistan, who accompanied Nadir-Shah into India, and signalized himself there by his bravery and wisdom. He dethroned and killed his brother, Hadji Mahommed, khan of the Belooches, who had rendered himself odious to his subjects, re-established order in the country, encouraged trade and commerce, and caused himself to become so powerful as to proclaim the independence of his kingdom, which he extended by many conquests.

Died 1795.

NESSUS, nes'-sus, in Greek legend, a celebrated centaur, son of Ixion and the cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had entrusted to his care, with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately discharged a poisoned arrow, which struck the centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave his tunic to Dejanira, assuring her it had the power of calling a husband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received the present which afterwards caused the death of Hercules. (See HERCULES.)

NESTOR, nes'-tor, in Greek legend, son of Neleus and Chloris. His father and eleven brothers were killed by Hercules; but the conqueror spared Nestor's life and placed him upon the throne of Pylos. As king of Pylos and Messenia, he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself among the rest of the Grecian chiefs by eloquence, wisdom, and justice. After the Trojan war he retired to Greece, where he enjoyed the peace and respect due to his old age and his surpassing prudence of mind. The ancients declare that he lived three generations of man.

NESTOR, the father of Russian history, was a monk at Kiev. His principal work is a Chronicle, which dates from the year 862 to 1110, and is the source of the history of the Sclaves. It was published at St. Petersburg in 1767, by order of Peter the Great.

Born 1056; died 1114.

NESTORIUS, nes-tor'-i-us, a bishop of Constantinople, under Theodosius II. He received priest's orders at Antioch, and soon achieved distinction by his abilities as a preacher. In 428 he was appointed by the emperor patriarch of Constantinople, but, in 431, was deposed from his bishopric for denying the doctrine of the incarnation, or the two natures of Christ, and, as he persisted in his opinions, was imprisoned in Constantinople for four years, afterwards banished to Egypt, and after several changes of his place of confinement, died in exile. His opinions spread widely over the East, and still have followers in those parts.

Died 439.

NESTVED, nest'-ved, a town of Denmark, on the island of Seeland, on the left bank of the Susawe, 44 miles S.W. of Copenhagen, connected by a bridge, with a suburb. There is a small harbour, but the place is now of much less importance than formerly. Pop. 3,700.

NESVIG, or NIEZWITSCH, nes'-vitch, a town of European Russia, government of Minsk, on the Uscha, 60 miles S.W. of Minsk. The fortifications are now in a dilapidated condition. There is a Benedictine abbey. Pop. 5,600.

NETHERLANDS, KINGDOM OF THE, or HOLLAND, neth'-er-lands (Dutch NEDERLAND, nai'-der-lant), in the central part of Europe, is bounded W. and N. by the North Sea, S. by Belgium, and E. by Prussia. In the northern provinces, the face of the country presents one continued plain, intersected, in all directions, by an infinity of canals and ditches, exhibiting vast meadows of the freshest verdure, and covered with numerous herds of cattle. Sheets of water may be seen, sometimes flowing and sometimes stationary; and at intervals clusters of trees, with here and there some gentle elevations, chiefly between the Prussian boundary and the district between the Maas and the Waal. In some parts there are sandy plains, peatlands, and morasses, considerable tracts of which have been drained and planted. The southern provinces exhibit a great variety of woods, meadows, and corn-fields. The maritime provinces have been the scene of great physical revolutions. There seems little doubt that the northern provinces formed, at one time, part of the bed of the sea. The western coast is protected from the sea by sand-hills, or dunes, and in other parts the Dutch have endeavoured to secure their coasts by dykes, or mounds of earth, the erection of which has been justly considered one of the greatest efforts of human industry. The most important of these dykes are those of the Welder, and of West Kapelle, on the east coast of Walcheren. The large rivers are bordered with similar dykes; and in particular situations, portions of the country have been redeemed from the sea, and rendered available to the necessities of man. A remarkable reclamation of this kind has been the drainage of the great Haarlem Lake. The whole nature of the country is, perhaps, sufficiently defined by its names, the words Netherlands and Holland signifying nothing more than nether or low land, and hollow land. The climate is moist and foggy. In the maritime provinces this is especially the case; but in the interior it is less variable. To the moisture arising from a marshy situation is attributed the extreme cleanliness of Dutch houses, the furniture requiring frequent rubbing and scouring to preserve it from the effects of the damp. Agriculture has long been carefully and successfully followed; and this, joined to its excellent soil, has rendered the Netherlands one of the most productive countries in Europe. The northern provinces do not produce much grain; but they have excellent pasturage. Here are fattened the lean cattle brought from Denmark and Germany, and the horses of Friesland, Guelderland, and Zeeland are valuable animals. Butter and cheese of superior quality are made and in vast quantities for export to England and other countries. The other products, in both the northern and southern provinces, are rye, buckwheat, oats, barley, vegetables, potatoes, beetroot, rapeseed, chicory, hops, mustard, flax, hemp, tobacco, madder, and fruit: a little wine is made in the south. Horticulture is generally pursued, and Haarlem exports tulips and other flower-roots. Rabbits and water-fowl are abundant; storks are also numerous, and the coasts abound in cod, turbot, soles, and other flat fish, the fisheries being remarkably productive and profitable.

Rivers and Canals.—The chief rivers are the RHINE, MAAS, SCHELDE, Yssel, Lek, Roer, and Waal. There are many canals, affording communication between every part of the kingdom. The most important are the North Holland Canal, connecting Amsterdam with the North Sea, the Voorne Canal is from the north side of the island of Voorne to Helvoetsluys, which affords shorter access to Rotterdam; The South Willemsvaart, through North Brabant and Belgian Limburg to Maastricht; and a large ship canal, recently constructed, shortening the distance between Amsterdam and the North Sea by 15 miles. There are innumerable smaller canals.

Islands.—There are two main groups, the northern consisting of a number of small islands at the entrance of the Zuider Zee, and along the coasts of Groningen and Friesland; and the southern, formed by the mouths of the Schelde and Maas. The largest of the northern group are North and South Beveland, Walcheren, Schouwen, Duiveland, Thoben, St. Philipsland, Goeree, Voorne, Putten, Beyerland, Ysselmonde, Rozenburg, and Dordrecht. The chief southern islands are Texel, Wieringen, Vlieland, Terschelling, Ameland, Schiermonnikoorg, and Rottum. In the Zuider Zee are Marken, Urk, and Schokland.

Minerals.—Coal, sandstone, pipe and pottery clay.

Manf.—Woollen, linen, cotton, and silk fabrics, including blankets, pilot cloths, damasks, calicoes, tablelinen, dimity, and carpets; leather, paper, glass, firearms, boots and shoes, sugar, and printing-types.

Trade and Commerce.—The leading exports are dairy produce, cattle, sheep, pigs, refined sugar, flax, and gin. The annual value of the exports is about £55,000,000; of the imports, £66,000,000. The mercantile navy consists of about 1840 vessels, including 90 steamers, with an aggregate tonnage of about 527,000 tons.

Railways and Telegraphs.—About 1,500 miles of railway are in operation, rather more than half belonging to private companies, of which there are 12, the remainder being under state control. There are 2,200 miles of telegraph lines.

Area.—12,680 square miles.

Pop.—4,278,272. There are three towns with a population exceeding 100,000, and 15 with a population of above 20,000. The written language is Dutch, but five dialects are spoken in Groningen, Guelderland, Holland, Zeeland, and Friesland, the last being most understood by the natives of the other provinces.

Divisions.—There are 11 provinces:—North Brabant, Guelderland, North and South Holland, Zeeland, Utrecht, Friesland, Overyssel, Groningen, Drenthe, and Limburg. Connected with the kingdom in the person of the sovereign, though possessed of a separate administration, is the grand-duchy of Luxemburg. (See LUXEMBURG.)

Constitution and Government.—The Netherlands is a limited monarchy. The present constitution received the royal sanction October 14, 1848, and was solemnly proclaimed November 3, 1848. It vests the whole legislative authority in a parliament composed of two chambers, called the States-General. The upper house, or first chamber, consists of 39 members, elected by the provincial states. The second chamber is elected by ballot, at the rate of one deputy to every 45,000 souls. Each member of the second chamber receives an annual allowance of £166, besides travelling expenses. Every two years one-half of the members of the second chamber, and every three years one-third of the members of the upper house retire by rotation. The sovereign has the right to dissolve either of the chambers separately, or both together, at any time, but new elections must take place within forty days. The second chamber alone has the initiative of new laws, together with the government, and the functions of the upper house are restricted to either approving or rejecting them, without the right of inserting amendments. The constitutional advisers of the king, having a seat in the cabinet, must attend at the meetings of both houses, and have a deliberative voice, but they cannot take an active part in the debate. The king has full veto power, but it is seldom, if ever, brought into practice. Alterations in the constitution can only be made by the vote of two-thirds of the members of both houses, followed by a general election, and a second confirmation, by two-third vote, of the new States-General. The executive authority is, under the sovereign, exercised by a responsible council of ministers. There is also a state council of 14 members, nominated by the government, which the sovereign may consult on extraordinary occasions. The regular army stationed in the Netherlands is about 62,000 strong, formed partly by conscription and partly by enlistment. The colonial army consists of 27,500 men, including 15,000 native troops. The navy consists of 17 ironclads and 50 other steam vessels, with three floating batteries for coast defence.

Religion and Education.—Entire liberty of conscience and complete social equality is granted to the members of all religious confessions. The number of Calvinists, or members of the Reformed church, number about 2,100,000; Lutherans, 68,500; Roman Catholics, 1,314,000; other Christian denominations, 56,000; and of Jews, 68,000. The government of the Reformed church is Presbyterian; while the Roman Catholics are under an archbishop, of Utrecht, and four bishops, of Haarlem, Breda, Roermond, and Herzogenbosh. The salaries of several British Presbyterian ministers, settled in the Netherlands, and whose churches are incorporated with the Dutch Reformed Church, are paid out of the public funds. There are three universities, at Leyden, Groningen, and Utrecht, with 1,400 students, and a polytechnical institution at Delft. The ecclesiastical training schools comprise five Roman Catholic and three Protestant seminaries. There are about 2,600 public primary schools, and the proportion of attendance is one in eight of the entire population of the kingdom; and for higher education 82 schools of middle instruction, and 55 Latin schools. In the rural districts, one-fourth of the grown-up men, and one-third of the women, can neither read nor write.

Colonial Possessions.—EAST INDIES:—Java and Madura, Sumatra (west coast), Benkulen, Lampongs, Palembang, Riau, Banca, Billiton, Borneo (west coast), Borneo (south and east districts), Celebes, Menado, Molucca Islands, Timor and Sumba, Bali and Lombok, New Guinea. WEST INDIA ISLANDS:—Curaçao, Aruba, St. Martin, Bonaire, St. Eustace, Saba. SURINAM.

History.—The name of the Netherlands was, for several centuries, applied to the 17 provinces formed after the dissolution of the empire of Charlemagne, and now forming the kingdoms of Belgium, the Netherlands, and part of the north of France. Charles V., emperor of Germany and king of Spain, as heir to the duke of Burgundy, about the year 1530, constituted the country one of the ten circles of the empire, under the title of the Circle of Burgundy. This prince was the first who began to encroach upon the liberties of the inhabitants, by introducing foreign forces, and putting foreigners into places of trust and profit in the administration. His son, Philip II., proceeded to deprive the states of the several provinces of their share in the government, and, endeavouring to render himself arbitrary, occasioned a general insurrection. The counts Hoorn and Egmont, and the prince of Orange, appearing at the head of it, and Luther's reformation gaining ground about the same time in the Netherlands, his disciples joined the malcontents; upon which Philip attempted to introduce a kind of inquisition, in order to suppress them. The counts Hoorn and Egmont were taken and beheaded; but the prince of Orange retired into Holland, and, with the assistance of England and France, preserved that, with some of the adjacent provinces, which, in 1579, entered into a treaty for their mutual defence, at Utrecht. They were then styled the United Provinces, and several of them were reduced to the obedience of Spain by the duke of Alva and other Spanish generals; their ancient privileges were, however, in a great measure restored; every province was allowed its great council or parliament, the concurrence of which was required to the making of laws and the raising of money for the government, though these assemblies were too often obliged to follow the dictates of the court. The Spaniards remained possessed of ten provinces, till the duke of Marlborough, general of the allies, gained the memorable victory of Ramilies, in 1706. After this, Brussels, the capital, and great part of these provinces, acknowledged Charles VI., afterwards emperor of Germany, for their sovereign; and his daughter, the empress-queen, remained possessed of them till the war of 1741, when the French made an entire conquest of them, except part of the province of Luxemburg. They were restored, however, by the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in the year 1748, the French retaining only Artois, Cambresis, part of Hainault, and part of Luxemburg. In 1793 the armies of the French Convention overran the country. William prince of Orange escaped with difficulty, and the United Provinces became the Batavian Republic. In 1806, Louis Bonaparte was made by his brother king of Holland, but abdicated four years afterwards, and his dominions became part of the French empire. After the fall of the Emperor Napoleon, the prince of Orange returned, and in 1830 the southern provinces became the kingdom of Belgium.

NETTUNO, net-too'-no, a seaport town of Central Italy, 30 miles S.E. of Rome. It has the ruins of a temple of Neptune. The situation is very unhealthy, and very little trade is carried on. About two miles to the south-west, are some remains of the city of Antium, of which it was formerly the port. Pop. 3,000.

NETZSCHKAU, natsh-kow', a town of Saxony, circle of Zwickau, on the Golzsch. Manf. Paper and tiles. Pop. 3,200.

NEUBURG, noi'-boorg, an ancient town of Bavaria, on the right bank of the Danube, 30 miles N.E. of Augsburg. There is a handsome palace, the residence of the dukes of Bavaria in the 16th and 17th centuries. Pop. 6,400.

NEUFCHATEAU, nu(r)sh-a-to', an old town of France, department Vosges, on the Mouzon, near the confluence with the Meuse. Manf. Woollen covers, lace, wickerwork, and nails. Pop. 3,600.

NEUFCHATEL, NEUCHATEL, or NEUENBURG, nu(r)sh'-a-tel', a canton in the west of Switzerland, bounded by the canton of Bern, the Lake of Neufchatel, the Pays de Vaud, and a part of the frontier of France. It is mountainous, being traversed by chains of the Jura, some of the passes in which have an elevation of 4,000 feet. Near the French frontier are barren hills, separated by elevated valleys. The surface is mostly devoted to pasturage, and numerous vineyards skirt the shores of the lake. With the exception of wine, which is made in considerable quantities, there is no other produce of importance. Corn is imported, and there are not sufficient vegetables grown for native consumption. Cattle are reared, and cheese is an export of consequence.

Rivers.—The Reuse and Seyon, flowing into the Lake of Neufchatel, and the Serriere.

Manf.—Watches (in the production of which about 20,000 persons are employed), cotton fabrics, hosiery, lace, metallic wares, and cutlery. Muslin printing gives employment to about 10,000 of the inhabitants.

Area.—304 square miles.

Pop.—103,732, nearly all Protestants.

History.—This district was, previous to the 11th century, a portion of the dominions of Burgundy. It then belonged to the counts of Chalons, until the extinction of the Neufchatel branch of that family in 1707, when Frederick I. of Prussia, claiming to be a descendant of the house, obtained possession. In 1806, Napoleon gave it to General Berthier, but the peace of 1814 restored it to Prussia. In 1857 it became a canton of the Swiss Confederation.

NEUFCHATEL, or NEUENBURG, capital of the above canton, is situate in the midst of vineyards and gardens, near where the rivulet of Seyon falls into the Lake of Neufchatel, 25 miles S.W. of Berne. It rises in the form of an amphitheatre, is well built, and has some fine streets. The public buildings are, an old castle, the town-house, an old Gothic church, built in the 12th century, a handsome new church, a fine museum, college, observatory, and two hospitals. Manf. Printed cottons and linens. Pop. 15,612.

NEUFCHATEL, LAKE OF, a considerable lake in the north-west of Switzerland. It is 25 miles long and 4 broad, 142 feet above the sea level, and the greatest depth is about 400 feet. It receives several rivers, and discharges its surplus waters by the Thiele, through the Lake of Bienne, into the Aar.

NEUFCHATEL (EN BRAY), a town of France, department Seine-Inférieure, near the right bank of the Bethune, 27 miles N.E. of Rouen. Manf. Woollen and cotton articles, hosiery, glass, and leather. There is a large trade in a famous cheese, and other agricultural produce. Pop. 3,600.

NEUHALDENSLEBEN. (See HALDENSLEBEN.)

NEUHAUS, noi'-hous, a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the Nescharka, 70 miles S.E. of Prague. There is a splendid palace belonging to Count Czorny. Manf. Cloth, paper, and chemicals. Pop. 9,000.

NEUHAUSEL, noi'-hou-sel, a town of Hungary, on the right bank of the Neutra, 74 miles N.W. of Pesth. Pop. 9,500, chiefly engaged in agriculture and the rearing of cattle.

NEUHOFF, THEODORE ETIENNE VON, noo'-hof, an adventurer, called "King of Corsica." He was the son of Anthony, baron von Neuhoff, a German, serving in the French army. Theodore was for some time in the suite of baron von Gortz, the Swedish minister; but, when that statesman was executed at Stockholm, he entered the Spanish service, and rose to the rank of colonel. He soon afterwards married one of the queen's maids of honour, by whom he had a son, who became known in England as Colonel Frederick. After deserting his wife, whose jewels he carried off, Theodore von Neuhoff went to Sweden, Holland, Italy, France, and England, travelling under different names and titles. In 1736 he engaged with several Corsican leaders, who promised to hail him king of Corsica, on the condition that he should procure aid for the islanders in their struggle against Genoa. Theodore thereupon set out for Tunis, whose Bey he induced to give him ten cannons, 4,000 muskets, munitions of war, food, and 10,000 gold sequins. Thus provided, he set out from Tunis with a suite of sixteen persons, and landed upon the east coast of Corsica. Shortly afterwards, the Corsicans elected him their king, and, during several months, he exercised regal power, created an order of knighthood, and put three persons to death. The state of Genoa, however, declared him and his followers traitors, and, in a short time, the Corsicans grew tired of their monarch. He thereupon quitted the island to seek succour, which he declared had been promised him, but first appointed deputies to manage affairs during his absence. He next travelled in Italy, France, and Holland. At Amsterdam he was imprisoned for debt, but found means to procure his release, as well as to fit out a frigate and three merchant vessels, with which he set sail for Corsica in 1738. The Genoese and French were now, however, almost masters of the island, and the "king" was afraid to disembark. Four years afterwards he again went to Corsica, but could not succeed in obtaining recognition from his former subjects. He subsequently repaired to London, where he was reduced to poverty, and became a prisoner in the King's Bench for debt. In 1756 Horace Walpole procured his release, Theodore registering his kingdom of Corsica for the benefit of his creditors. He died in London in a state bordering upon destitution. Horace Walpole wrote a singular epitaph for his tombstone, which was set up in St. Ann's, Soho.

Born at Metz, about 1690; died 1756.

NEUILLY-SUR-SEINE, nu(r)'-ye. (See PARIS.) Pop. 25,235.

NEUKIRCH, BENJAMIN, noi'-keersh, a German poet, who made a versified translation of Fenelon's "Telemachus," and produced several other works.

Born in Silesia, 1665; died at Anspach, 1759.

NEUKOMM, SIGISMOND, CHEVALIER, noi'-kom, a modern German musical composer, who was a relation of, and received his first instruction in music from, Michael Haydn, elder brother of the composer of the "Creation." He was appointed director of court music at St. Petersburg, in 1804, and afterwards passed several years at Vienna, Paris, and Rio Janeiro, acquiring a great reputation. He visited England in 1829, and produced there his greatest works, the oratorios "David" and "Mount Sinai." His song of "The Sea" was at one time the most popular song of the day. In 1853, the Society for the Revival of Sacred Music in Scotland published "Twenty Psalms" composed by him, which are classed amongst the most simple and beautiful productions of their kind in existence. In 1851 he acted as one of the jury at the Great Exhibition.

Born at Salzburg, 1778; died at Paris, 1858.

NEUMANN, KARL FRIEDRICH, noi'-man, German orientalist, of Jewish parentage. He studied at Heidelberg, Munich, and Göttingen, and at the age of 24 was appointed professor of history at Spires. His liberal views excited hostility, and he was compelled to retire. He then began the study of Chinese, Armenian, and other eastern languages, and in 1829 visited China, bringing back more than 12,000 volumes of Chinese books. In 1831 he was appointed professor of Munich. In 1847 and the following year he took an active part in liberal politics, and in 1852 was removed from his professorship. In 1863 he took up his residence in Berlin. He wrote many works on eastern, especially Chinese, history and languages, and made numerous translations. One of his latest productions was an account of the supposed discovery of America by Buddhist monks in the 5th century.

Born near Bamberg, 1798; died at Berlin, 1870.

NEVA, nai'-va, a large river or strait of Russia, connecting Lake Ladoga with the Bay of Cronstadt, in the Gulf of Finland. The city of St. Petersburg stands at one end of it, and Schlusselberg at the other, where it issues from the lake. The length, including windings, is about 40 miles. By means of the Ladoga canal it communicates with the Volga, and so with the Caspian Sea. The current is very rapid, but it is covered with drift ice for more than five months of the year.

NEVADA, or SIERRA NEVADA, ne-va'-da, "snowy mountain," the most elevated mountain-chain in the Spanish peninsula. It runs through the whole kingdom of Granada, and is at its base covered with groves of oranges, chestnuts, and olives. The culminating peaks are Mulhacen and Veleta, respectively 11,678 and 11,378 feet high. The line of perpetual snow begins at 9,500 feet. Min. Iron, zinc, argentiferous lead, antimony, and copper.

NEVADA, ne-va'-da, one of the United States, bounded W. by California, E. by Utah and Arizona, N. by Oregon and Idaho, and S. by California and Arizona. The state is in the centre of the elevated basin between the Sierra Nevada and the Rocky Mountains, and has an average elevation of 4,000 feet above the sea-level. The finest portion is the Carson valley, famous alike for fertility and mineral treasures.

Rivers and Lakes.—The chief river is the Humboldt, and the lakes, Mud, Pyramid, Walker, and Carson.

Minerals.—Silver, in considerable quantities; gold, quicksilver, lead, antimony, bituminous coal, and salt.

Area.—112,090 square miles.

Pop.—62,200, including about 3,500 Chinese.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 17 counties. Carson City is the capital; but the largest and most important place is VIRGINIA CITY.

History.—This region formed part of the Mexican cession of 1848, and was separated from Utah, and made a territory of the United States, in 1861. In 1864 it was declared a state.

NEVADA, a new county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 625 square miles. Pop, is very small. The capital is Mount Moriah.

NEVADA, a county of California, United States. Area, 1,026 square miles. Pop. 20,000, including nearly 3,000 Chinese. The capital is Nevada.

NEVEL, ne-vel', a town of Russia, government of Vitebsk, on a small lake of the same name, at the mouth of the Emenka. Pop. 5,000.

NEVERS, ne-vair', a city of France, capital of department Nievre, at the confluence of the Loire and Nievre, on an elevated situation, 140 miles S.E. of Paris. There are a beautiful cathedral of the 10th century, a triumphal arch erected to commemorate the battle of Fontenay, and the Loire is crossed by a fine bridge of twenty arches. Manf. Plate, hardware, earthenware, and enamel. In its neighbourhood are the forges of Fourchambault, the copper-works of Imphy, and the foundry of La Choussade, where cables and anchors are made for the marine. There is also a cannon foundry. Pop. 23,846.—The town occupies the site of the old Gallic town, named Noviodunum, by the Romans. In the 6th century it was made a bishop's see, and named Nevirnum. It became a county in the 10th century, and Francis I. made it a duchy in 1538.

NEVERS, PHILIP-JULIEN MANCINI-MAZARIN, Duke de, nev'-air, was the nephew of the Cardinal Mazarin. He distinguished himself as the patron of Pradon against Racine, which produced sharp controversies among the wits. The duke wrote some sonnets on that occasion, and other poems of little merit.

Born at Rome, 1641; died at Paris, 1707.

NEVIANSK, ne'-vi-ansk, a mining town of Russia, government of Perm, near the source of the Neva, in the Ural Mountains. There is a large castle, built about 1702 by Prince Demidoff. There are valuable silver mines. Manf. Painted ironworks. Pop. 18,000.

NEVIS, ne'-vis, an island of the West Indies, belonging to Great Britain, separated from the south-east end of St. Christopher by a channel, the Narrows, 2 miles across. It is little more than a single mountain, rising to an elevation of 2,500 feet, well watered, and, in general, fertile at its base. It contains one town, CHARLESTOWN, which is fortified. Pop. 11,800, mostly blacks. Lat. 17° 14' N. Lon. 62° 35' W.

NEVREKOP, nev'-re-kop, a walled town of European Turkey, 78 miles N.E. of Salonica, on the Kara-su. Pop. 2,500.

NEW ALBANY, awl'-ba-ne, a city and port of Indiana, United States, capital of Floyd county, finely situated on the north bank of the Ohio, at the foot of the falls, 2 miles below Louisville, Kentucky. It has 30 churches, a court-house, city hall, a theological college, and an engine-factory. The town is an important railway centre. Manf. Glass, machinery, iron, and woollens. Shipbuilding is carried on, and there is a good river trade. Pop. 17,000.

NEW BEDFORD. (See BEDFORD, NEW.)

NEW BRIGHTON, a town of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, United States, on the east bank of Beaver river, 3 miles from its junction with the Ohio, 25 miles N.W. of Pittsburgh. Manf. Woollens, flax, chains, and machinery. Pop. 4,500.

NEW BRITAIN, a manufacturing town of Connecticut, United States, 8 miles S.W. of Hartford. There are six churches. The water supply is excellent, the public fountains throwing jets of water 140 feet high. Manf. Locks, hooks and eyes, hosiery, lace, hardware, and jewellery. Pop. 11,800

NEW BRITAIN, one large and several small islands in the Pacific Ocean. The largest, 300 miles long, is separated by Dampier's Straits, from New Guinea (or Papua) on the west. It is mountainous, with active volcanoes in the interior, but there are fertile plains near the coast, and large forests. Palms, sugar-cane, and bread fruit are among the productions. The number of the inhabitants is unascertained, but they are a fine race, and more civilized than some other of the Polynesian races.

NEW BRUNSWICK. (See BRUNSWICK, NEW.)

NEW CALEDONIA. (See CALEDONIA, NEW.)

NEW ENGLAND, the name given to the six eastern states of the United States; comprising the states of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Maine, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. (See UNITED STATES.) The nickname Yankee is limited to the inhabitants of these states, and is supposed to be derived from "Yengees," the Indian way of pronouncing "English."

NEW FOREST. (See HAMPSHIRE.)

NEW GRANADA. (See COLOMBIA.)

NEW GUINEA. (See PAPUA.)

NEW HAMPSHIRE, one of the United States, bounded N. by Canada, E. by the Maine and the Atlantic, S. by Massachusetts, and W. by Connecticut river, which separates it from Vermont. This state has only about 18 miles of seacoast, at its south-eastern corner; but, in this extent, there are several coves for fishing-vessels, and a good harbour for ships at Portsmouth at the entrance of Piscataqua river. The shore is mostly a sandy beach, adjoining to which are salt marshes, intersected by creeks; but the soil of the lower hills, valleys, and banks of the rivers, is fertile. To the distance of 20 or 30 miles inland from the sea, the country is generally level, after which it rises gradually, swelling into hills, and lastly into a chain, called the White Mountains, which form an elevated ridge, the highest summits being Mount Washington (6,285 feet) and Mount Lafayette (5,500 feet). The scenery is very striking, and the state has been called "The Granite State," and "The Switzerland of America."

Rivers and Lakes.—The principal are the Connecticut, Merrimac, and Piscataqua, besides many other smaller streams. There are many waterfalls, giving valuable water-power for manufactures. The chief lakes are Winnipiseogee (25 miles long, with 360 islands), Umbagog, Sunapee, Squam and Great Ossipee.

Zoology.—The animals are the moose deer, the black bear, which commits great ravages among the sheep, the racoon, the wild cat, the beaver, &c.—The birds are the partridge, quail, wild pigeon and wild turkey. The bays and rivers abound with cod, salmon, shad, eels, trout, &c.

Pro.—Agriculture is the chief occupation.

Minerals.—Few, and not of great importance.

Manf.—Woollen and cotton fabrics, iron wares and paper.

Area.—9,280 square miles.

Pop.—348,000. In respect of population, this ranks as having a small proportion of coloured people.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 10 counties. CONCORD is the capital, and DOVER, MANCHESTER, NASHUA and PORTSMOUTH are important towns.

History.—The district was settled in 1623 by colonists from Hampshire, in England, and was organised, as one of the 13 original states of the Union, in 1776.

NEW HANOVER, han'-o-ver, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 995 square miles. Pop. 21,376, great numbers being coloured. The capital is WILMINGTON.

NEW HEBRIDES, the name of a group of islands in the Southern Pacific Ocean, with a latitude from 14° to 20° south, and a longitude from 166° to 170° east. The chief of the islands are Mallicolo, Vaté, Erromanga, Api, Ambryon, Tanna, Aneiteum and Espiritu Santo, which last is the largest, it being about 150 miles round it. There are considerable active volcanoes in Ambryon and Tanna, otherwise the islands are attractive and fertile, producing in much abundance maize, yams, bananas, cotton, sandal-wood, &c. There is but one kind of aboriginal quadruped, which is a diminutive pig about the size of an average rabbit. The inhabitants are mixed savage races, speaking innumerable dialects. Erromanga is signalised as the scene of the murder of the Rev. John Williams, the celebrated missionary, in 1839; and this bad record was followed by the murder of another missionary, the Rev. Mr. Gordon, and his wife, in 1860. But the group subsequently acquired political importance from the apparent design of France to effect a permanent settlement there, and the strongly manifested objections of the Australian colonies to such a course. A crisis was arrived at in 1886, when the French landed a military force, against which much protest was made; but Lord Salisbury (then newly in office as premier) informed a deputation that operations to induce the French to desist were outside the range of practical politics. Area, 2,500 square miles. Pop. perhaps 20,000.

NEW HOLLAND. (See AUSTRALIA.)

NEW IRELAND, an island in the Pacific, separated by St. George's Channel from New Britain, which lies to the south-west.

NEW JERSEY. (See JERSEY, NEW.)

NEW JOHORE, or TANJONG PATRI, a settlement at the southern extremity of the Malay peninsula, Asia. There are immense forests of valuable timber, a trade in which is developing, and pepper and other spices are cultivated. Pop. about 20,000, chiefly Chinese.

NEW KENT, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 4,500, rather more than half being coloured. The capital is New Kent Court House.

NEW LONDON. (See LONDON, NEW.)

NEW MADRID, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 880 square miles. Pop. 6,500, about 1,500 being coloured. The capital is New Madrid.

NEW MEXICO, a territory of the United States, formerly a state of Mexico. It is traversed in the eastern part by two great chains of the Rocky Mountains, and on the west are mountain ranges, 12,000 feet high. Wheat, maize, fruits and tobacco are cultivated, and there is extensive pasturage. The climate is healthy, heavy rains falling in July and August.

Rivers.—The Rio Grande, with its affluent, the Pecos; the Colorado and the Gila, which flows into it.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, iron and salt.

Area.—121,200 square miles.

Pop.—118,500 whites and about 19,000 Indians.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 14 counties. The chief towns are SANTA FE, the capital; Albaquerque, Mesilla, Socorro and Taos.

History.—The Spaniards explored the territory and worked mines in 1537. At the close of the Mexican war in 1848, the district was ceded to the United States, and erected into a territory in 1850.

NEW MILFORD, a town of Litchfield county, Connecticut, United States, chiefly on the left bank of the Housatonic river, 40 miles S.W. of Hartford. This town is the centre of the tobacco trade of the district. Manf. Paper, woollens and buttons. Pop. 3,600.

NEW ORLEANS, city, seaport and capital of Louisiana, United States, extending about 6 miles along the left bank of the Mississippi, situated below the high water level, and protected from inundations by levees, or embankments, extending for several hundred miles on each bank. The river forms two curves, and the older portion of the city, on the larger curve, is consequently named the "Crescent City." The streets generally slope down from the river banks, and the drainage is by canals to Lake Pontchartrain, on a lower level. The public buildings are very handsome and extensive, including a Roman Catholic cathedral, 60 churches and many fine hotels. The swampy nature of the soil prohibits the formation of underground rooms or cellars, and there are no graves in the cemeteries (of which there are 33, some very ornamental), but only raised tombs. The yellow fever is very prevalent, and terribly destructive to strangers; but to the acclimatised population the city is not unhealthy. Next to New York, this is the greatest commercial port of the United States.

Manf.—Tobacco, manures, cotton-seed, oil, sirups, vinegar, soap and sugar.

Pop.—216,200, including a large number of foreigners.

Lat.—29° 58′ N. Lon. 90° W.

History.—A French settlement was formed here in 1718, and named after the regent Orleans. It was included in the vast territory sold by Napoleon to the United States in 1803. In the war of Secession the town was blockaded, and compelled to surrender to Commodore Farragut, in April, 1862.

NEW PLYMOUTH, chief town of the province of Taranaki, North Island, New Zealand, on the west coast, 120 miles S. of Auckland. There is a handsome church, St. Mary's, and the Roman Catholics, Wesleyans and Presbyterians have good chapels. The Taranaki Institute is used for various purposes connected with the business of the town. The government offices are on a hill facing the roadstead, the custom house is on the beach, and the post office is in Devon-street. There are hotels and banks. A noticeable feature of the locality is the iron sand which forms the beach for miles. Pop. 4,000.

NEW PROVIDENCE, prov'-i-dence, the most important of the Bahama Islands, 17 miles long, and 7 miles in greatest breadth. On the north side is the town of Nassau, with a harbour. Pop. 7,000.

NEW ROSS, a seaport and parliamentary borough of Ireland, mostly in the county of Wexford, but partly in Kilkenny, 84 miles S.W. of Dublin, on the estuary of the Barrow. The modern part is on the Wexford side, and is well built. An iron swivel bridge connects this with Rosbercon, a straggling suburb on the Kilkenny side, and affords passage for vessels of considerable size. Pop. 6,670.

NEW SIBERIA, a group of uninhabited islands, in the Arctic Ocean, lying north-east of the mouth of the Lena, in Eastern Siberia. The largest is Kotelnov, and the others are named Liakov, Fadievskoi, and New Siberia. There are very extensive deposits of bones of mammoths and other large animals. Area, 20,480 square miles. Lat. 73° 20′—76° 12′ N. Lon. 135° 20′—150° 20′ E.

NEW SOUTH SHETLANDS, an archipelago to the south of Cape Horn, South America. There are volcanic mountains, many of the peaks being covered with perpetual snow. The largest is Coronation, or Mainland; the more conspicuous of the others being Smith, Saddle, and Desolation Islands. Lat. 60° 32′—67° 15′ S. Lon. 44° 53′—68° 15′ W.

NEW SOUTH WALES, the oldest of the British colonies in Australia, occupying the south-eastern part of the island. The greatest length is 900 miles, but averaging only 500. The greatest breadth is about 850 miles, but the average does not exceed 500 miles. Its boundaries are, on the north, the colony of Queensland, from which it is separated by Macpherson's Range, the Dividing Range, and the Dumaresque River; on the east, the Pacific Ocean; on the south, the colony of Victoria; on the west, South Australia. The 141st meridian is the dividing line from South Australia; the 29th parallel, with an irregular line to Point Danger, from Queensland, and an imaginary line drawn from Cape Howe to the nearest source of the Murray, and by the westerly course of that river, separates it from Victoria. The boundaries of New South Wales constitute an irregularly shaped four-sided figure, of which the southern frontier deviates most widely from a straight line. The surface of the colony is diversified with alternate hills, valleys, and plains. A range of lofty hills runs parallel to the sea coast, at about an average distance of thirty miles from it, and partially divides the colony, the country to the eastern side of this range being an undulated plain, intersected by numerous streams. On the western side of the range the country extends to the interior for some breadth in table lands, still farther west it develops into vast plains, deteriorating as regards its adaptation to agricultural purposes. The coast line has a total length of about 800 miles; from the sea it presents a bold appearance, though in some places there are long stretches of sandy beach. The coast is fringed by about 22 important capes or headlands. Among the principal are Cape St. George, Cape Howe, Smoky Cape, Cape Hawk, Cape Byrou, Cape Banks, and Cape Solander. There are about 18 bays and inlets. The most important are Port Jackson, Port Stephen, Port Hunter, Botany Bay, Jervis Bay, and Twofold Bay. Along the coast are several salt water lagoons, the entrances to which are sometimes closed to navigation after severe storms. The surface of the colony may be divided into three parts: the coast district, the table lands, and the plains of the interior. The coast district is a comparatively narrow strip of undulating land lying along the sea-coast, often not more than 35 miles wide, and sometimes considerably less. Speaking generally, this district has fine fertile soil, and is settled on throughout the whole of its area, from the north to the south. It is well watered by many fine rivers, most of which periodically overflow their banks from the rainfall in the mountains; and although these floods undoubtedly do much mischief to farmers, they cover the flat and bottom lands with a fine, rich, alluvial deposit, that will produce any kind of crop in abundance, and can be cropped for years without fallowing. The table-lands are a high plateau or elevated district, furrowed here and there with precipitous valleys, frequently presenting, on the seaward side, nearly perpendicular escarpments. These high lands traverse the entire length of the country, and extend westward to about the 151st meridian. The shape of the plateau is irregular, and its area is not easily estimated. On it, at a distance of sixty or seventy miles from the coast, are found the loftiest mountains in the colony; while, from the 151st meridian to the westward, there is a gradual fall to the great inland plains which form the chief pasture-lands of the colony. The principal of these plains are the Liverpool Plains, extending over nearly 17,000 square miles; the extensive plains on the Hunter River; the Macquarie Plains, near Bathurst, and in the north-western part of the colony. The Manero Plains (or Brisbane Downs), 70 miles long, and with an average elevation of 2,000 feet above the sea level, are between the Murrimbidgee River on the west, and the Coast Range of mountains on the east. The district is gently undulating, well watered, and very fertile. Owing partly to climatic circumstances, and in part to the absence of water, there is much land utterly useless for agricultural purposes, though much of this is adapted for pastoral use, and is so employed. Of land rich in decayed vegetable matter, containing in great profusion the ingredients and constituents necessary for the formation of plants, there is no great breadth away from the river banks. The most fertile land in the colony, perhaps in the world, is to be found on the margins of the rivers, particularly the bottom lands of the Clarence, Macleay, Manning, Hunter, Hawkesbury, and Shoalhaven. This fertility is almost counterbalanced by the liability of inundation, when the year's harvest may in a few hours be swept away.

Mountains.—The mountains extend over a large area. The principal ranges are the Interior Ranges, the Great Dividing Chain, and the Coast Ranges. The Interior lie near the western boundary of the colony, and form the western watershed of the Darling River. The chief are the Grey Range, and the Stanley or Barrier Range. The loftiest elevation in the former is Mount Arrowsmith, 2,000 feet; and in Stanley Range, Mount Lyell, about the same height. The Great Dividing Chain extends throughout the whole length of the eastern and south-eastern coasts of Australia, and forms the main watershed of the country. It consists of seven main branches, viz.: (1) the New England Range (highest point Ben Lomond, 5,000 feet); (2) the Liverpool Range (highest point, Oxley's Peak, 4,500 feet); (3) the Blue Mountain Range (highest point, Mount Beemarang, 4,100 feet); (4) the Cullarin Range (highest point, Mundoonen, 3,000 feet); (5) the Gourock Range (highest point, Jindulian, 4,300 feet); (6) the Manero Range (highest point, Head of Kybean River, 4,010 feet); and (7) the Muniong Range (highest point, Mount Kosciusko, 7,308 feet). This last is about 700 feet below the line of perpetual snow. All this series is connected with the Cordillera, dividing the eastern and western watersheds. The Coast Ranges lie on the east side of the Great Dividing Chain and parallel to it for a very considerable distance. They generally form the edge of the elevated table-land, upon which lies the Great Dividing Chain. The loftiest peaks of these are Mount Seaview, 6,000 feet, Mount Coolungubbera, 3,712 feet, and Mount Budawang, 3,800 feet high. The most remarkable of the isolated mountains and groups are Mount Doubleduke, Whoman, Elanie, Yarrahappini, Kibbora, The Three Brothers, Mount Talpwah, Dromedary, Mumbulla, and lastly, Imlay, or Bamboon—2,900 feet high.

Rivers and Lakes.—All the rivers of the colony with three exceptions, have their sources in the Great Dividing Chain, and flow thence into the sea by the eastern or the western watershed. The great rivers of the western watershead are the Darling, the Lachlan, the Murrumbidgee, and the Murray, with their affluents. All these rivers unite their streams with the Murray, which flows into Lake Alexandrina in South Australia, and thence into the ocean. The inland rivers flowing to the west are, at certain seasons of the year, traversed by small steamers from Lake Alexandrina to Wagga-Wagga on the Murrumbidgee, and to Bourke on the River Darling. Tributary to these rivers are the Namoi, the Bogan, the Gwydir, the Barwan, the Castlereagh, and the M'Intyre. The Tumut is a tributary of the Murrumbidgee; and the Warrego and Macquarie are tributaries of the Darling. The rivers on the eastern watershed all fall into the Pacific Ocean. The largest in the order of their length are the Hawkesbury, the Hunter, the Shoalhaven, the Clarence, the Macleay, the Richmond, and the Manning. Smaller streams are the Hastings, Karuah, Clyde, Moruya, Tuross, Bega, and the Towamba. Several of them are partially navigable for steamers of a light draught; all vary greatly in their volume of water in the summer and winter seasons, the Hawkesbury and the Hunter particularly fluctuating greatly, and frequently in the winter causing very disastrous floods, that detract much from the almost incredible fertility of the land on their margins. The largest lakes are Lake George, about 25 miles S.W. of Goulburn, 25 miles in length by 8 in breadth—this is by far the most important inland lake of New South Wales; it is situated on the top of the table-land of the dividing range, 2,129 feet above the level of the sea, and is surrounded on its two sides by gigantic towering mountains. At the two ends of the lake the country is grassy and more level. There is no outlet for the water, which is consequently saline, from the accumulation of salt held in solution, and although unfit for human use is freely drank by cattle. The surface of the lake literally teems with aquatic birds, and its waters abound with fish, amongst which may be found cod of from 8 to 10 lbs. weight. A large animal somewhat resembling a seal has been seen in its waters, and that curious bird-beast the platypus lives on its banks. Other lakes are Lake Bathurst, about 10 miles distant from Lake George, with an area of 8 square miles; Tarrago Lake; Burra Burra Lake; Lake Macquarie, more properly an inlet of the sea, 20 miles long by 3 miles wide; and Lake Illawarra, also formed by the sea.

Climate.—The climate of the colony is most genial and highly favourable to health; every variety of temperature is to be found within so vast an area, and with such varied physical features. On the table-lands, frost, snow, and hail are common; on the inland plains the thermometer is over 100° in the shade for the greater part of the summer; and there are occasional droughts at the very time that part of the coast districts may be flooded; but in Sydney, which is central, the mean temperature is only 62°.4, similar to that of Lisbon, the extreme range in the shade being 106° in summer and 36° in winter. On the whole there are few parts of the colony where the heat is more trying than the hot summer months of England; while nowhere, except at a few places on the summit of the mountain ranges, is there anything of the rigorous English winter. The air is clear and bracing, the light gorgeous, the sky, for an average of 200 days in the year, cloudless. December, January, and February are the summer months, and June, July, and August the winter. Small-pox and many ailments of children, and infectious diseases, as native to the country, are quite unknown, and some that have been imported quickly die out.

Pro.—Among the indigenous trees, shrubs, and plants are the acacias, upwards of 100 varieties of which are known to flourish. The Eucalyptus, or gum tree, is peculiar to Australia, and abounds in all parts; it is a most valuable wood for many purposes. The ironbark is noted for its hardness, and in its very dry state is scarcely workable; the blue and white gums are also of value for constructive purposes. The most valuable timber of all is the cedar, which is found in the northern parts of the colony, its home being principally the alluvial flats of the tributaries of the eastern rivers. For all indoor uses the wood is in general requisition. The Casuarina tribe, more popularly known under the name of the she oak, are very numerous, as are also the Banksia family, which pass usually under the name of honeysuckle. Fig trees are plentiful, and of great variety; the fruit is pleasant, but the wood of little use. The cabbage-tree palm is found in the coast districts; its leaves or fronds are much used in the manufacture of hats. Ferns of large size and endless diversity grow in profusion in the mountain gullies. On the plains the mysenbryanthemum, or salt bush, is largely found. It is a valuable grazing food for both sheep and cattle. The mallee scrub covers some portions of the plains; it is a dense, almost impenetrable thicket. With the exception of the quandong and the native cherry, there are no indigenous fruits of any kind in the colony. Wild flowers of great variety and beauty adorn the landscape in the spring; of these the waratah, or native tulip, the Christmas tree, and varieties of the lily are the most striking. Everything that can be grown in England can be cultivated in the colony. Grain and potatoes, English vegebles and fruit, are extensively grown; nearly every European variety of grape flourishes, and excellent wine, wanting only the ripening of age, is made. Indeed, wine-making is now one of the prominent industries of the colony. Tobacco is grown, but not of the finest quality. The colony possesses special advantages for sericulture. The Italian, French, Egyptian, and other varieties of silkworm, have been produced without any trace of diseases which prove so destructive in Southern Europe; and there are all the descriptions of vegetable food they can require. The most important product of the colony, however, is wool, the value of the annual export being about £3,500,000. Recently means have been discovered of preserving the meat, which is now a considerable article of export.

Zoology.—(See AUSTRALIA.)

Minerals.—Gold in Australia was first discovered in New South Wales, and the actual search for the precious metal was commenced, in 1851, in the western districts of the colony. The discovery made at Ophir led to the finding of gold in the soil and rocks of the colony over tracts many miles in extent. It was quickly ascertained that the country drained by the Macquarie, the Turon, the Abercrombie, and the Meroo, and more recently that watered by the Lachlan, the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, the Cudgegong, the Shoalhaven, and the Clarence, was all auriferous. The proclaimed gold fields, extending with short intervals the entire length of the country, and westward about 200 miles from the coast, comprise an area of about 13,656 square miles, and number more than 80 distinct fields. The richest of these are on the western side of the Great Dividing Range. Silver and lead are found, but at present not much worked. Copper is widely distributed, and there are about 15 mines in operation. Tin is abundant, not only in veins and lodes, but in the beds of rivers and creeks. Antimony, manganese, arsenic, platinum, and plumbago, are also worked. Diamonds are found, but the result has not been commensurate with the expense of obtaining them. Iron is generally distributed, and there are important works in operation. The coal measures are extensive and valuable. They extend from the 29th to the 36th parallel of S. latitude; they crop out to the water's edge along many miles of the seaboard. Nearly 1,000,000 tons are annually raised. The New South Wales coal is admirably adapted for steam purposes.

Area.—323,437 square miles, nearly four times that of Great Britain.

Pop.—Estimated at 921,268. There is no return of the number of the aborigines.

Subdivisions.—The colony of New South Wales is divided into thirteen pastoral districts; Monaro, a high table-land, 40 to 50 miles from the coast, at the south-eastern extremity, with an area of 8,335 miles; Murrumbidgee, to the south-west, with an area of 26,897 miles of grazing country; Lachlan, to the north of the Murrumbidgee district, area 22,800 square miles; Wellington, to the north-west, has an area of 16,695 square miles; Bligh, to the eastward of the Wellington district, has a area of 5,000,000 acres of grazing land; Liverpool Plains, to the north-east, area 16,901 square miles; Gwydir, adjacent to the northern boundary of the colony, contains an area of 11,075 square miles; New England lies to the eastward of the Gwydir district, area 13,100 square miles; Macleay is on the north-east coast, area 3,180 square miles; Clarence occupies the north-eastern corner of the colony, and contains an area of 5,000 square miles; Darling is situated at the north-western extremity of New South Wales, area 50,000 square miles; Albert comprises the whole of the north-western portion of the colony, having an area of 60,000 square miles; Warrego lies to the eastward of Albert, in a north-central position, and the area is about 10,000 square miles. There are 118 counties, known as the old, or proclaimed counties, and the new. The former (20 in number) are on the coast, are more clearly defined.

and more densely inhabited than the new counties of the interior.

Chief Towns.—The capital is SYDNEY; ALBURY, BATHURST, GOULBURN, MAITLAND, NEWCASTLE, and PARAMATTA, are other considerable towns.

Railways and Telegraphs.—About 2,000 miles of railway are completed or in progress, which, together with the telegraphs, mostly belong to the government.

Government.—The constitution of New South Wales vests the legislative power in a parliament of two houses, the first called the legislative council, and the second the legislative assembly. The legislative council consists of not less than 21 members, nominated by the crown, and the assembly of 72 members, elected from 60 constituencies. There is no property qualification for electors, and the votes are taken by ballot. The executive is in the hands of a governor nominated by the Crown, and a council consisting of colonial secretary, colonial treasurer, minister for lands, minister for mines, minister for public works, attorney-general and solicitor-general. The parliaments are triennial. The imperial laws have effect in the colony, unless superseded by local acts. All enactments passed by the houses of legislature require the sanction of the queen before becoming legal. A branch royal mint was established in 1855. All religious sects are on a footing of equality.

History.—This portion of Australia was first discovered by Captain Cook, in 1770, and named by him New South Wales, from a fancied resemblance to the configuration of that country. A design was formed, in consequence of his recommendation, to settle a colony of convicts at Botany Bay. Captain Phillip being appointed governor of the intended settlement, as well as commodore on the voyage, sailed from Portsmouth in May, 1787, with a detachment of marines and 778 convicts, of which 220 were women. He arrived at Botany Bay in January, 1788; but finding this place ineligible for a colony, he fixed upon Port Jackson, about 10 miles north of Cape Banks; and here a settlement was begun, which he named Sydney Cove. Transportation was discontinued in 1840. The legislative council was constituted in 1842. In 1851 the colony of Victoria was separated; in the same year the discovery of gold was announced, an immense influx of population being the result, and in 1856 the Constitution Act came into force. In 1859 the Moreton Bay district was separated, and became the colony of Queensland.

NEW WESTMINSTER, a city, and formerly the capital, of British Columbia, North America, on the north bank of the Fraser river, 15 miles above its mouth. Several inhabited islands are in the river. There are five churches for various denominations. Pop. 2,000, many engaged in salmon fishing, the fish being exported in cans and barrels.

NEW YORK, one of the United States of America, bounded N. by Lake Erie, Lake Ontario, the river St. Lawrence, and Canada; E. by Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the Atlantic; S. by the Atlantic, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; and W. by Pennsylvania, Lake Erie, and the river Niagara. At its southern extremity it includes Long Island. The state is greatly diversified in its general aspect. On the west side of the Alleghany Mountains it is generally level, but on the eastern side it swells into hills and ridges of various forms, with rich interveuing valleys. Round Top, one of the Katskill Mountains, attains an elevation of 3,804 feet above the level of the sea. West of Lake Champlain, near the eastern border of the state, are Mount Marcy (5,337 feet), and Mount Anthony (5,000 feet), peaks of the Adirondack range. The coast is sandy, the N. parts rough and mountainous; but the soil of the interior is generally rich. There are numerous picturesque lakes in the centre of the state, and the scenery on the banks of the Hudson is very fine, the Blue Ridge of the Alleghanies rising to an elevation of 1,500 feet. There is a seacoast, including Long Island, and Staten Island, of 246 miles, and a lakecoast of 352 miles. Wheat is raised in greater abundance than any other kind of grain. Indian corn, rye, oats, flax, hemp, pease, beans, and various kinds of grass, are extensively cultivated. Orchards are abundant, and great quantities of excellent cider are made Various other kinds of fruit, such as pears, peaches, plums, cherries, &c., flourish well. Sheep are abundant, and horses and cattle are more numerous than in any other state.

Rivers and Lakes.—The principal are the Hudson, Mohawk, St. Lawrence, Delaware, Susquehannah, Black, Alleghany, Genesee, Oswego, and Niagara. The great falls of Niagara, the three falls of the Genesee, and the falls of the Trenton, Taghanic, and Katskill, are within the state. A part of the lakes Erie, Ontario, and Champlain belongs to New York, with lakes George, Cayuga, Seneca, Oneida, Oswegatchie, Canandaigua, Onondaga, Skaneatiles, and several smaller ones. Canals have been constructed in various parts, by which internal communication is greatly facilitated. They generally connect the Canadian lakes with the Atlantic rivers; and the Erie Canal has an extent of 364 miles.

Minerals.—Iron, gypsum, limestone, marble, slate, and lead. There are also petroleum wells, salt springs, and mineral waters, especially at Saratoga and Ballston.

Manf.—Important and flourishing, comprising almost every description of goods. They command an extensive sale, and render the commerce of this state greater than that of any other in the Union.

Commerce.—Beef, pork, wheat, flour, Indian corn, rye, butter, cheese, pot and pearl ashes, flax-seed, pease, beans, horses, cattle, lumber, &c., are exported, to the amount of more than three-fifths of the total exports of the Union.

Area.—47,000 square miles.

Pop.—5,084,200, of whom about 53,000 are coloured. In respect of population, this ranks as the first state in the Union.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 60 counties. The chief towns are NEW YORK, ALBANY (the state capital), AUBURN, BROOKLYN, BUFFALO, COHOES, ELMIRA, HUDSON, KINGSTON, LONGPORT, LONG ISLAND CITY, NEWBURGH, OGDENSBURG, OSWEGO, POUGHKEEPSIE, ROCHESTER, ROM, SCHENECTADY, SYRACUSE, TROY, UTICA, WATERFORD, and YONKERS.

History.—This part of America was explored by Hudson in 1609, and afterwards by Champlain, the French explorer. It was then occupied by the Indian tribes of the Iriquois, or Five Nations, and the Algonquins. The Dutch settled on Manhattan Island in 1621. (See NEW YORK city.) New York was one of the 13 original states of the Union, and the constitution was adopted in 1777.

NEW YORK, the most important city of the above state, the largest commercial city and seaport of the United States, and third in importance in the world, 187 miles S.W. of Boston. It occupies the southern part of Manhattan Island, which is rather more than 13 miles long, but only about 2 miles wide, formed by the Hudson river, which separates it from the state of New Jersey on the west, and a small stream, the East river, which opens into Long Island Sound, and divides Manhattan from LONG ISLAND. The Hudson, or North River, as it is called at this part, opens out into a broad estuary, forming the harbour, and on the western side of North River is JERSEY CITY, practically a suburb of the greater town, as are BROOKLYN and WILLIAMSBURG on Long Island. Manhattan Island is divided from the mainland of the state of New York by Shuyten Daywel creek, and a small stream, the Haarlem river, which connects the Hudson with the East river, and is crossed by several bridges. At the point where East River enters Long Island Sound, known as Hell Gate, the navigation was formerly greatly obstructed by sunken rocks, which were removed by an explosion of dynamite in 1876. The city includes the small islands, Randall's, Ward's, and Blackwell's on the East River. The older and most crowded part of New York is at the narrow southern end of Manhattan Island, where the streets are narrow and irregular. At the extreme point is the Battery, a promenade of 21 acres, protected by a sea wall, and beautifully laid out. From this proceeds, nearly in a straight line, the famous Broadway, the principal street of New York, about three miles long and 80 feet wide, lined with public buildings, and some of the finest hotels and commercial establishments in the world. Many of these are built of white marble, and some are seven stories high. The Bowen, farther east, and running in a parallel direction, is another fine thoroughfare. Wall Street, opening into the Broadway, has many fine edifices, and is the centre of financial operations in stock and shares. West Street, the line of the Hudson, and South Street, along the East River, are the chief localities for shipping business. Pearl, Pine, Cedar, Water, and Front Streets, are occupied by merchants and traders, especially in connection with dry goods and groceries. About a mile and a half north of the Battery, the newer part of the city commences. It is laid out with great regularity, noble avenues, as they are called, some eight miles long and about 100 feet wide, traversing the island in a longitudinal direction, and crossed at right angles by streets generally about 80 feet wide, but in some instances more. The avenues are named First Avenue, Second Avenue, &c. Some of the streets are similarly numbered, and others are designated alphabetically, A street, B street, &c. The exceptions are a few prominent localities, as Madison Avenue and Madison Square. A ridge of elevated land traverses the island, from some parts of which, especially in Mount Morris Square, which rises to upwards of 100 feet, noble views are obtained. In various parts of the city are statues of Washington, Franklin, and General Werth. New York harbour, or the inner harbour, as it is generally styled, one of the finest in the world, is a magnificent bay 8 miles long and 25 in circuit, approached from the sea in two directions, from the north-east through Long Island Sound and East River, and from the south-east by way of Sandy Hook, the latter bay the great ocean thoroughfare. In the inner harbour are small islands, Ellis's, Governor's, Bedloe's, and Oyale. The three former are very strongly fortified. On Governor's Island, nearest to the city, are Fort Columbus and Fort William, and another strong fort commanding the channel between it and Long Island. There is also Fort Schuyler, at the point where the East River is entered from Long Island Sound. The outer harbour is a noble sheet of water, connected with the inner harbour by the Narrows, a channel about three miles long and less than a mile wide, defended by heavily armed forts. A large inlet in the western part of the outer harbour is Rariton Bay, the north-western side of which is formed by the large Staten Island, which is divided from New Jersey by a narrow, but navigable channel. The wharfs and piers of New York extend along the Hudson and East Rivers for about 7 miles.

Public Buildings.—The City Hall, occupying a commanding situation in the centre of City Hall Park, erected between 1803 and 1812, is built chiefly of white marble, in the Italian style, is 216 feet long, and 105 feet wide, and is surmounted by a cupola, on which is a colossal statue of justice. The new court-house is 250 feet long, 150 feet wide, and 210 feet high, of the Corinthian order of architecture, with walls of white marble, and the principal entrance is reached by 30 broad steps. The new post-office and United States court-house, completed in 1875, form a massive and lofty edifice, partly in the Doric and partly in the Renaissance style, with with several Louvre domes. The height is 195 feet. It is built mostly of granite, and has three fronts, each about 280 feet long, facing City Hall Park, Park Row, and the Broadway. The Custom House, formerly the Merchants' Exchange, is in Wall Street. It is built of granite, is 200 feet long and 170 feet wide, is 124 feet high, and has a recessed portico of 18 massive Doric columns. The Sub-Treasury, previously used as the Custom House, at the corner of Wall and Nassau streets, is a noble edifice of white marble, modelled on the Parthenon at Athens, 200 feet long, 90 feet wide, and 80 feet high, with a fine Doric portico, approached by 18 marble steps. There are about 330 churches, of which 72 are episcopal, and 41 Roman Catholic, and the remainder belonging to almost every variety of denominations, the Jews alone having 12 synagogues. Among the finest of the episcopal churches are Trinity, in the Broadway, a beautiful but small Gothic structure, with a spire 286 feet high; Grace Church, farther north, a fine Gothic structure of white marble, with a spire 216 feet high; St. Thomas's, having a large Gothic window and a spire 215 feet high; St. John's, which has a very fine Corinthian portico and a spire 215 feet high; and St. George's, Stuyvesant-square, in the Byzantine style, with two spires. The largest church in the city is St. Patrick's, Roman Catholic cathedral, in Fifth Avenue. It was commenced in 1858, and opened in 1879. It is in the decorated Gothic style, of white marble, is 352 feet long, with a breadth at the transepts of 174 feet. There are two spires, each 328 feet high. St. Peter's Roman Catholic church is a massive granite structure, with an Ionic portico. Among the finest churches belonging to other denominations are the First Presbyterian church, in the Gothic style, with buttresses, pinnacles, and a spire 160 feet high; the church of the Puritans, of white marble; the Baptist church, in Broome-street, Gothic, with octagonal towers; the French Protestant church, white marble, with a fine Ionic portico; and the Dutch Reformed church, in Washington-square, a very fine example of the Gothic. A very striking edifice, recently completed, is the Masonic Temple, of granite, with five stories, and a dome rising to 155 feet. Great height is a feature of many of the new and magnificent business establishments. The Western Union Telegraph office is 230 feet high, and the new office of the Tribune newspaper 260 feet. The hotels are very extensive and splendid buildings, and luxuriously furnished, some of them capable of accommodating 1,000 visitors. The most noticeable are Astor House, St. Nicholas, Metropolitan, Grand Central, Fifth Avenue, Windsor, and Buckingham.

Educational, Scientific, and Literary Institutions.—Columbia College, founded in 1754, has a library of 17,000 volumes, and a museum. The university of the city of New York is a fine marble building, in the English collegiate style, with a chapel, and a medical school attached. The Astor Free Library has 140,000 volumes; the Mercantile Library, 116,000; the Society Library, 60,500; and the Historical Society, 50,000. The Free Academy, opened in 1849, occupies a handsome Gothic building, is now one of the most important high schools of the city, and there are 142 public schools of various kinds.

Exhibitions and Places of Amusement.—The Academy of Music will hold 4,700 persons. The Grand Opera House is built of white marble, in the Italian style.

Public Parks.—The Central Park, so named from being near the centre of Manhattan Island, is 2½ miles long, and about half a mile wide, with an area of 843 acres. It was opened in 1858, is beautifully laid out with plantations, fountains, and statues, has 18 gates, and there are four subterranean roadways connecting the streets on the opposite sides. At the south-eastern angle, in a building formerly used as the arsenal, is a zoological and other natural history collection. Two large reservoirs of the great Croton aqueduct are also in this park. The City Hall Park, of about 6 acres, is also a favourite resort; and there are 17 other parks, among them Fleetwood and Jena parks, where races are held.

Institutions and Asylums.—These are numerous, including among the most important the Lunatic Asylum at Bloomingdale, on an elevated site overlooking the Hudson, with 40 acres of well laid-out gardens; the New York Hospital, a large building in the Broadway; asylums for the deaf and dumb and blind, for penitent females, for aged and indigent coloured persons, and a retreat for seamen. An immigrants' asylum is on Ward's Island.

Cemeteries.—The only cemetery within the city is that connected with Trinity church, consisting of 25 acres, tastefully laid out. Woodlawn cemetery is on the mainland, north of the city; and there are other cemeteries near Jersey City, and on Long Island.

Market, Sanitary, and Police Arrangements.—There are 11 markets for meat, poultry, fish, and vegetables. The city is supplied with water by the famous Croton aqueduct, 40 miles long, which brings an abundant supply from an immense reservoir near the Hudson river, and crosses the Haarlem river by a bridge of 15 arches.

This great engineering work was completed in 1842, at a cost of about £3,000,000 sterling. There are a police force of about 2,860 men, and a fire brigade of more than 700, with 45 steam fire-engines. The city prison, known as the Tombs, is a massive structure in the Egyptian style, and there is a large penitentiary on an island in East River.

Railways and Traffic Arrangements.—New York is in communication with nearly all the leading railway lines of the United States. The Grand Central Depôt (or station), between Fourth and Madison Avenues, is the largest in the country, and has frontages of 240 and 692 feet. The Freight Depôt of the Hudson river railway is also a massive building of granite, brick, and iron. There are 16 horse and one steam tramway lines in the city; 15 steam ferries across East River to Brooklyn and other places, and an immense suspension-bridge to unite New York and Boston is in course of construction.

Manf.—These are of infinite variety, the most important being iron castings, machinery, and sugar. There are in the city about 7,650 manufacturing establishments, giving employment to 130,000 persons.

Commerce and Shipping.—More than half the foreign commerce of the United States is carried on at New York. About 7,000 vessels engaged in the foreign trade enter at the port annually, and nearly 3,000 engaged in the coast trade. There are more than 20 lines of steamers to various ports of the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, 12 to British ports, and 7 to ports of the continent of Europe.

Pop.—1,206,600, including generally more than 400,000 foreigners.

History.—The Dutch established themselves on Manhattan Island and founded Nieu Amsterdam in 1621. In 1664 it was taken by the English, and the name changed to New York, and the possession was confirmed to the English by the peace of Breda in 1667. In 1673 it was again taken by the Dutch, but surrendered the following year. It surrendered to the British forces in the Revolutionary War in 1776, but was evacuated in 1783.

NEW ZEALAND, a British colony, in the South Pacific Islands, about 1,200 miles S.E. of Australia, and very nearly the antipodes of Great Britain. It consists of three islands—North Island, of very irregular shape, 500 miles long, and 250 in extreme width; Middle, sometimes named Southern Island, 500 miles long, with a breadth varying from 150 to 200 miles, and, farther south a small island, Stewart's, 30 miles long, and 25 broad. It has been proposed to name the three islands New Ulster, New Munster, and New Leinster, but the names are not generally adopted. There are numerous small islands belonging to the New Zealand group, for the most part near the shores of North and Middle Islands. North and Middle Islands are separated by Cook's Strait, varying from 20 to 80 miles in width, and between Middle and Stewart's is Fouveaux Strait. There is a coast line of about 4,000 miles, about 1,500 belonging to the North Island, which is deeply indented with many large inlets and long narrow peninsulas. (See AUCKLAND.) The principal inlets are the Gulf of Hauraki, Hawke's Bay, the Bay of Islands, Tauranga Bay, and the Bay of Plenty, on the east side of the North Island; the harbours of Manakau and Kaipara on the west side. In Middle Island, Blind Bay in the north, and Pegasus Bay, Molyneux Bay, Port Lyttleton, Akaroa Harbour, Port Chalmers, and Bluff Harbour, on the east coast, are the greatest indentations. The principal headlands are North Cape, Cape Brett, Cape Colville, East Cape, Cape Kidnappers, Cape Pallisser, Cape Egmont, and Reef Point in the North Island; and Capes Farewell, Campbell, Saunders, Providence, Foulwind, and the Bluff in the Southern Island. A great portion of the islands is occupied by mountains, generally covered in the North Island with evergreen forests, but in the Middle Island they are mostly comparatively barren and isolated peaks, or elevated table-lands. In the Middle Island especially are vast plains forming some of the finest grazing grounds in the world, with fertile tracts admirably adapted for agriculture. Of the entire surface of the islands, about one-fourth consists of dense forests, and one-half has excellent soil. Every fruit, flower, and edible that flourishes in Great Britain can be cultivated, and many that will not grow in the warmer regions of Australia. The vine thrives in the open air, and maize and sweet potatoes are grown in the valleys of the North Island. The fern-tree grows in great variety and almost endless profusion; other specimens of vegetation are the wild flax, the toetoe, and ranpo, which have many uses, and which may some day serve for paper-making purposes; the first-named is also used largely in the manufacture of rope, and possesses a tenacity and endurance equal, if not superior, to the best manilla. The prepared article is now officially known under the name phormium. All the native trees and shrubs are evergreens. The larger trees are the kauri, well suited for constructive uses, two or three kinds of pine, and the Totara motai and some others. In all, there are in New Zealand about 120 indigenous forest trees. The climate is agreeable, having neither the extreme of heat nor cold; but it varies considerably according to the different portions of the colony. Compared with Great Britain, New Zealand, so far as its general salubrity can be ascertained, possesses a marked superiority. January and February are the warmest months, and June and July the coldest. The average climate of London is seven degrees colder than the climate of the North Island, and four degrees colder than the climate of the Southern Island of New Zealand. The nights are about twelve degrees colder than the days. The mean temperature is lower than that experienced in corresponding latitudes in Europe; but higher than that experienced in corresponding latitudes in America.

Mountains.—The whole country is of volcanic origin, and chains of mountains run through the islands from north to south. In the North Island are the Coromandel Range, the Pakaroa Range, the Wairoa Range, traversing the province of Auckland, and in the province of Wellington is the Ruahine Range. There is also an active volcano called Tongariro (6,500 feet): the peak of Ruapehu rises to an elevation of 9,100 feet above the sea-level. Mount Egmont is about 8,300 feet. Though not the highest, it is in many respects the most strikingly remarkable mountain in the colony. It rises in an almost perfect cone from a base of 30 miles in diameter, and its summit, which is an extinct crater, is covered with perpetual snow. In Middle Island are the Southern Alps, covered with perpetual snow, of which Mount Cook, in the province of Canterbury, is the loftiest peak, being 13,000 feet high. Mount Arthur, near Nelson, is about 8,000 feet high; many of the extreme points of elevation are covered with snow all the year round. In the province of Otago the country is very hilly, and some of the mountains attain to a considerable altitude. Amongst these peaks may be named Mount Earnslaw, at the head of Lake Wakatipu, 9,000 feet, and Mount Tutoko, near Martin's Bay, 8,000 feet.

Rivers and Lakes.—The principal rivers are, in the North Island, the Waikato, rising near Lake Taupo, and flowing about 170 miles north, entering into the sea to the south of Manukau harbour; the Thames, also taking a northerly course, and emptying itself into the Gulf of Hauraki; the Wanganui, about 120 miles long, discharging its waters into Cook's Straits; the Hutt, flowing into the sea at Port Nicholson. In the Middle Island the chief rivers are the Molyneux, flowing in a southerly direction into the sea at Molyneux Bay; the Avon, on which the city of Christchurch is situated; the Waimakariri, entering the sea at Kaipai harbour; the Mathura; the Teremakau, on the west coast above Hokitiki; and the Hollyford, flowing into the South Pacific Ocean at St. Martin's Bay. The largest lake in the colony is Lake Taupo, which has a diameter of 20 miles, and an area of about 200 square miles, situated in the province of Auckland. Other inland sheets of water are, in Middle Island, Lakes Coleridge and Tekapo, in the province of Canterbury; Lakes Wanaka, McKerrow, and Wakatipu, in the province of Otago, and Lake Brunner, in the county of Westland.

Minerals.—As regards mineral resources, New Zealand is almost as rich as any of the colonies of Australia. Gold was first discovered in the province of Otago, and afterwards, in 1865, at Hokitiki, very rich deposits were found. It is obtained in two forms, as veins and nuggets in quartz reefs, and as alluvial gold, washed from the sand and gravel in the valleys and river beds on the mountain ranges. Machinery is extensively employed in the mining operations. Gold to the value of about £32,000,000 has already been obtained. Copper exists in several places, but not in sufficient quantities to pay for working. Silver has been found in various localities. Tin has also been found, but not yet regularly worked. The iron-sand which abounds in large quantities on the sea-coast is found to smelt into a metal equal to the best Staffordshire iron. Coal seams of considerable thickness are being worked at several places—in the North Island at Kawa Kawa, Bay of Islands at Waikato, in the Southern Island at the Grey river, Mount Rochfort, in the province of Otago. In the neighbourhood of Napier and Taranaki is petroleum, in the form of springs. Sulphur is found in several parts of the North Island. Building stone of superior character, also marble and granite, are regularly quarried in several localities.

Zoology.—There are scarcely any indigenous animals; at least, they are comprised in the native dog and rat. None of the animals of the marsupial tribe peculiar to the Australian continent are to be found in New Zealand, nor are there any snakes. In years past the moa, a gigantic bird of the ostrich tribe, of which bones have been found, must have been common; but it has long since disappeared. There are about 133 species of birds peculiar to the colony. Among the land birds are wild ducks, pigeons, hawks, parrots, rails, and kiwis. There are some lizards. There are wild pigs, descended from the tame animals left by Captain Cook. Domestic poultry have been introduced in large numbers, as well as many species of game, such as hares, pheasants, partridges, quail, grouse, &c. Valuable breeds of sheep from Europe, and the llama, from South America, thrive well. Several descriptions of fish, such as trout, perch, tench, carp, have been satisfactorily acclimatised. The seas around New Zealand teem with fish, and it is thought that there is considerable opening for fishing pursuits, which as yet have not met with much attention. Oysters, mussels, crayfish, and other molluscs and crustacea of excellent quality abound.

Pop.—636,229, including 50,000 Maoris and 5,000 Chinese, the latter being all males except nine! Average density of the population throughout the colony about 4·7 per square mile, mostly in the towns, as the rural districts record only 2·9 to the square mile. The white population includes about 500,000 of British birth. The Maoris, who formerly declined in numbers, have subsequently increased considerably.

Divisions.—There are nine provinces—Auckland, Taranaki, Wellington, and Hawke's Bay in North Island; and Canterbury, Marlborough, Nelson, Westland, and Otago in Middle Island. (See headings.) There are 63 counties.

Commerce.—The exports consist chiefly of gold, wool (average annual value nearly £3,500,000), mineral ore, timber, grain, phormium fibre, hides, sheepskins, kauri gum and preserved meats.

Railways and Telegraphs.—The government railways extend to about 1,500 miles, and private lines to about 100 miles. The postal and telegraph departments are amalgamated.

Religion and Education.—There are six episcopal sees of the Church of England. Catholics and Protestant denominations are also fully represented. Primary education is provided by an Act of 1877, under which public schools are universal, entirely secular, and free. Secondary and higher education is secured by the University of New Zealand, the University of Otago, Canterbury College, and numerous collegiate and high schools.

Government.—In 1853 responsible government was conferred on New Zealand. It is represented by a governor appointed by the crown, a ministry who form the executive, and a parliament of two chambers. The legislative council consists of 45 members, appointed by the crown for life. The house of representatives consists of 78 members, 30 for the North Island, 44 for the South Island, and 4 Maori members, whose term of office is five years. The members of both houses receive £100 each for every session, to cover travelling and other expenses. Every owner of a freehold worth £50, or tenant householder in the country at £5, in the towns at £10 a year rent, provided he be 21 years of age, is qualified both to vote for, or to be a member of, the house of representatives. Each province has its own separate local government, being in this respect similar to each state in the United States. The governing power is vested in a provincial council, consisting of 20 to 40 councillors, presided over by a superintendent. Both council and superintendent are chosen for four years. The council makes all the local laws, and regulates all matters appertaining to land, rates, roads, public works, and municipal affairs. Every provincial council act requires the sanction of the governor previous to its becoming law. The seat of government is WELLINGTON.

History.—The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1642. Captain Cook visited them and surveyed the coasts in 1770. They were afterwards occasionally called at by ships, and some white men settled there, intermarrying with the native women. In 1814, the Church Missionary Society established a small missionary settlement, and traders, especially from Sydney, formed whaling and lumber establishments. The following are the dates of some of the leading events in the history of the colony:—

New Zealand Company established, and Wellington founded	1839
The first governor appointed, and Auckland founded	1840
Created an independent colony and a bishop's see	1841
Nelson and Taranaki (New Plymouth) established	,,
Legislative council opened by the governor	1848
The settlement of Otago founded	,,
Canterbury settlement established	1850
New constitution granted	1853
Hawke's Bay separated from Wellington	1858
Marlborough settlement formed out of the province of Nelson	1860
War with the natives	1860-61
Gold discovered at Otago	1861
Another war with the natives	1863-66
Seat of government changed from Auckland to Wellington	1864

NEWARK, nu'-ark, a market-town, municipal and parliamentary borough of Nottinghamshire, on the Newark river, a branch of the Trent, 17 miles N.E. of Nottingham. It is handsome and well built. The public buildings are, the castle, which was called the New Work, and gave name to the town, and was built in the reign of King Stephen, by the bishop of Lincoln. It is now in a ruinous state. The church of St. Mary Magdalene is a cruciform building, some part dating from 1230, recently restored; the tower is light, and supports a lofty stone spire. In the market-place stands the town-hall, and a corn exchange has been recently erected. Manf. Linen sheetings and tiles; and there are metal-foundries. It has also a good trade in corn, coal, cattle, wool, and other commodities. The corn-market is the largest in that part of the kingdom, and the business of malting is carried on to a greater extent than in any other town in England. Pop. 14,019.—A station on the Great Northern and Midland railways.

NEWARK, a city and port of entry of New Jersey, United States, on the west bank of the Passaic river, 9 miles W. of New York. It is a fine city, with 58 churches, a post-office, and custom-house. There are three public parks, and the principal street is two miles long and 132 feet wide, planted with tall elm trees. Manf. Leather, leather-cloth, saddlery, carriages, boots and shoes, chemicals, machinery, cotton thread and sewing silk, and jewellery. More than 90 vessels belong to the port. Pop. 136,500, including many Germans. The town was settled by a Puritan colony from Connecticut, in 1666.

NEWARK, capital of Licking county, Ohio, United States, 30 miles N.E. of Columbia. In the vicinity are quarries of sandstone, a large coal-field, and factories for coal-oil. Pop. 9,600.

NEWAYGO, ne-wa'-go, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 875 square miles. Pop. 14,688. The capital is Newaygo.

NEWBERN, nu'-bern, a city and port of entry of North Carolina, United States, capital of Craven county, and formerly the capital of the state, on the south bank of the Neuse river, at its confluence with the Trent, 40 miles from its mouth. Naval stores, lumber, turpentine, and flour are exported. Pop. 5,500.

NEWBERRY, nu-ber'-re, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 616 square miles. Pop. 26,947, of whom about 13,500 are coloured. The capital is Newberry Court House.

NEWBOLD, nu'-bold, a township of Derbyshire, near Chesterfield. Manf. Earthen and stone ware. There are extensive iron and coal-mines. Pop. 6,158.

NEWBRIDGE, nu'-brij, a market-town of the county of Kildare, Ireland, on the left bank of the Liffey, 5 miles N.E. of Kildare. There are a handsome Roman Catholic chapel and large cavalry barracks. Pop. 3,300.

NEWBURGH, nu'-berg, a city of the State of New York, United States, on an elevated site on the right bank of the Hudson, 54 miles N. of New York. There are numerous churches, and a theological seminary. Manf. Machinery, chains, leather, cordage, candles, and carriages. There is a large trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 17,500.

NEWBURGH, nu'-bru(r), a seaport of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the right bank of the Tay, 9 miles N.E. of Fife. There are a very fine parish church, a Gothic church of the United Presbyterians, several other places of worship, and a large town-hall. The harbour will admit vessels of 500 tons to the quay, and there is a large trade with the West Indies and South America. Ruins of the famous abbey of Lindores are in the vicinity. Manf. Dowlas sheeting and other linen goods. Pop. 2,800.—A station on the North British railway.

NEWBURY, nu'-ber-e, a market-town and municipal borough of Berkshire, on the Kennet, which runs through the centre of the town, 17 miles S.W. of Reading. There are, besides the parish church, in the Perpendicular style, built in the 16th century, various chapels, a market-place, town-hall, a corn-exchange, and numerous endowed hospitals for the poor. There is an annual wool market; the chief trade of the town consists in malting and flour-making. Pop. 10,143.—A station on the Great Western railway. To the north of this place is Donnington Castle, where the poet Chaucer died in 1400. In 1643 and 1644 two severe actions took place here between the Royalists and the Parliamentarians.

NEWBURYPORT, nu'-bre-port, a city and port of entry of Essex county, Massachusetts, United States, on the south bank of the Merrimack river, near its mouth, 34 miles N.E. of Boston. It occupies an elevated situation, and the principal street is three miles long, and shaded with trees. There are 16 churches, in one of which Whitefield, the famous English preacher, is buried. Manf. Extensive of woollen cloth, machinery, hats, and clothing. There are shipbuilding yards. Pop. 12,600.

NEWCASTLE, nu-kas'-sel, a county of Delaware, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 77,716, square miles, about 10,500 being coloured. The capital is Newcastle.

NEWCASTLE, capital of the above state, on the right bank of the Delaware. There is an extensive railway establishment for the manufacture of steam-engines and machinery. Pop. 2,800.

NEWCASTLE, capital of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania, United States, on the Shenango river, 45 miles N.W. of Pittsburg. Manf. Iron and glass. Pop. 8,418.

NEWCASTLE, a city and shipping port of New South Wales, and in importance the second in the colony, 75 miles N. of Sydney, at the mouth of the river Hunter. The harbour is commodious, but the entrance is dangerous. Nearly all the produce of the Hunter River district is shipped here, but the great export is coal, of which on an average 1,000,000 tons are shipped annually. The city occupies an elevated site, and there are several large churches, a good court-house, hospital, and lunatic asylum. The hotels, banks, and places of business are well-built and handsome. There are direct lines of steamers to Sydney, and railway communication with several of the northern towns. Pop. 8,986. resident; but there are frequently nearly 3,000 seamen in the town.

NEWCASTLE, Duke and Duchess of. (See CAVENDISH, WILLIAM AND MARGARET.)

NEWCASTLE, THOMAS PELHAM HALLES, Duke of, British Minister, succeeded his father as Lord Pelham at an early age, and was afterwards created Earl of Clare and Duke of Newcastle. At the age of 30 he was appointed Secretary of State, which office he held for 30 years, succeeding his brother, Mr. Pelham, as prime minister in 1754. He resigned office in 1762, soon after the accession of George III. but in 1765 was Lord Privy Seal in the Rockingham ministry. He was a man of a very low order of ability and of grotesque manners. The only brilliant period of his administration was when the first Pitt was really the ruling power in the cabinet. Smollett and other writers of the day caricatured his fussy incompetence, his twaddling talk and great ignorance, but he had the support of the selfish and equally ignorant king, and the command of a subservient Parliament.

Born 1692; died 1768.

NEWCASTLE, HENRY PELHAM CLINTON, Duke of, a modern British statesman. He was the eldest son of the fourth duke of Newcastle, and after completing his education at Christ Church, Oxford, was chosen as the parliamentary representative of the southern division of Nottinghamshire in 1832. In 1834 he became a lord of the Treasury, and retained the appointment until April of the succeeding year. Between the years 1841—1846 he acted as chief commissioner of Woods and Forests, which post he vacated to assume the functions of chief secretary for Ireland. He lost his seat in the last-named year (his father using his influence against him) for supporting Sir Robert Peel in the repeal of the corn laws. He was, however, returned shortly afterwards by the Falkirk burghs, and remained in the House of Commons until 1851, at which time he succeeded to the dukedom of Newcastle, upon the death of his father. He became secretary of state for the Colonies in 1852, in the Aberdeen administration. Upon the separation of the War business from that of the Colonies, with which it had hitherto been joined, the duke accepted the duties of the former department, but the mismanagement of the army during the first winter in the Crimea, led to his incurring the odium of the nation, before which he was compelled to resign office. Lord Panmure, his successor, stated, however, that the after and more successful arrangements, emanating from the war-office, were inaugurated by the duke himself. In 1859 he was appointed secretary for the Colonies, and in 1860 he accompanied the Prince of Wales in his travels in Canada and the United States. On his return, he received the Order of the Garter.

Born 1811; died 1864.

NEWCASTLE, or NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME, a parliamentary and municipal borough, 16 miles N.W. of Stafford. It stands on the east bank of the river Lyme, a branch of the Trent. There are two churches, one with an old tower, several other places of worship, and a handsome town-hall. Manf. Silk and cotton goods, paper, sugar, nails, boots and shoes, carriages, and pottery. Around the town, the villages, to a considerable distance, are entirely occupied with the manufacture of porcelain, earthenware, and stoneware, and there are coal mines and iron works in the vicinity. Pop. 17,506.—A station on the North Staffordshire railway.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, a Parliamentary and municipal borough, and a county of itself, in Northumberland, of which county it is the most important town. It stands partly on an elevated site, on the left bank of the Tyne, about 10 miles from its mouth, and opposite Gateshead, which is virtually a part of the town. (See GATESHEAD.) The river is crossed by five bridges, one a fine swing bridge, completed in 1874. The High Level Railway bridge, one of the most remarkable structures of the kind in the world, was constructed by Robert Stephenson. The length is 1,337 feet and the height of the railway 112 feet above high water mark. There are six cast-iron arches supported on piers of masonry, and beneath the railway are a broad carriage-road and paths for foot-passengers. The old streets near the river are narrow, irregular, and steep, and the buildings on the slope of the hill much crowded together; but, with its progress in wealth and importance, several of the streets have been widened, and a great number erected, especially in the north and west quarters of the town, where are many noble mansions and elegant villas. These newer quarters are judiciously laid out, in fine streets and squares and in a superior style of architecture. St. Nicholas's church, a fine building, chiefly in the Decorated style, remarkable for its spire of admirable symmetry, rises conspicuous above all the other churches in Newcastle. This church is supposed to have been erected in 1359. There are also the churches of All Saints (a handsome structure in the Greek style), St. Andrew's (very old and partly Norman), St. John's, the fine modern church of St. Peter's, St. Thomas's (in the early English style), the magnificent Roman Catholic Cathedral, and numerous other places of worship for various denominations. The new and very fine town-hall, the old guild-hall, the new county-hall, the exchange-buildings, central exchange, central police station, new Postal and Telegraph offices, and two theatres are among the prominent public buildings. There are statues of Earl Grey, and George Stephenson, the former at the head of Grey Street, the finest street in the town. The railway station (a very fine building) is near the centre of the town. The meat market occupies nearly three acres. A Free Library was opened in September, 1880. Armstrong Park, 26 acres in extent, was presented to the town by Sir W. Armstrong in 1878. The remains of the ancient castle stand on an eminence. It was built by Henry II., in the latter part of the 12th century, has been restored, and is now used as a museum. The great tower is about 80 feet high, 62 feet by 54 on the outside, and its walls 14 feet thick. The charitable institutions are the infirmary, the dispensary, a fever hospital, lunatic asylum, for the counties of Durham and Northumberland; and asylums for orphans, and for the blind, deaf, and dumb. Newcastle is well supplied with the means of education, besides being the seat of a literary and philosophical society, a society of antiquaries, the institute of mining engineers, a college of physical science, a college of medicine, and several other learned institutions. Very large corn, hay, and cattle markets are held. The river Tyne, between the sea and Newcastle forms a safe harbour, and has been greatly improved by dredging operations on a large scale, increasing the depth of water on the bar, at low tide to 33 feet. Three large locks have been constructed and the quay formed at an immense expense. The town is the great centre of the northern coal trade, and the great port of shipment, not only of coal, but of iron and steel manufactured in the district. Manf. Very extensive. For miles above and below the town, the Tyne is lined with immense establishments. Some of the largest engineering establishments in the country are there, and on the western part of the town, at Elswick, are the great ordnance works of Sir William Armstrong. Iron ship-building is a marked feature of the industry of the Tyne, and the chief manufactures, all on a most extensive scale, may be briefly enumerated as comprising iron, steel, lead in sheet, and pipes, red and white lead, shot; soda, bleaching powder, vitriol and other chemicals; glass, earthenware, fire-bricks, gas retorts, sanitary pipes, cements, and grindstones. Pop. 145,228. Lat. 54° 58′ N.; Lon. 1° 36′ W.—A station on the North-Eastern railway, and reached by the Great Northern, London and North Western, Midland, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and North British railways.

NEWCHURCH, a town of Lancashire, near the sources of the Irwell, 19 miles N. of Manchester. It is a manufacturing town which has rapidly risen into importance. Manf. Cottons and woollens. In the neighbourhood are large quarries of freestone. Pop. 28,271.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

NEWCOME, WILLIAM, nu'-kom, a learned English divine, who became successively bishop of Ossory and Waterford, and archbishop of Armagh. He published "The Harmony of the Gospels," "Letter to Dr. Priestley on the Duration of Our Lord's Ministry," "Observations on Our Lord's Conduct," an improved version of the twelve Minor Prophets, another of Ezekiel, a "Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to Our Lord's Resurrection," and other important works.

Born in Berkshire, 1729; died 1800.

NEWCOMEN, THOMAS, nu'-ko-men, a locksmith of Dartmouth, who, about 1695, invented the engine which is called after his name, and which was the first in which steam was employed as a motive power. That engine was afterwards perfected by Watt. (See WATT.)

Died 1713.

NEWFOUNDLAND, nu-found'-land, an island of British North America, and a British Colony, and the most eastern part of North America, on the eastern side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It is separated from the coast of Labrador on the North by the Strait of Belleisle, which is about 12 miles wide. It is triangular in shape, the angles being marked by Cape Bauld on the north, Cape Race on the south-east, and Cape Ray on the south-west. The coast in some parts, more than 1,000 feet high, has many fine bays, some of great size, with excellent harbours. The principal are, from south to north, St. John's, St. George's, Fortune, Placentia, St. Mary's, Conception, Trinity, Bonavista, Notre Dame, White, and Hare. The peninsula of Avalon on the south-east, connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, is very hilly, and generally the surface of the country is very unequal, covered with hills and mountains, everywhere overgrown with pines, so as to be practicable only in those parts where the inhabitants have cut roads. There are a large number of lakes, of various sizes, occupying together nearly one-third of the total area. The capital is ST. JOHN'S. (See JOHN'S, ST.) In winter the cold is excessive, nothing but snow and ice being seen, and the bays and harbours entirely frozen. The soil being ill-adapted to agricultural purposes, kitchen vegetables are the principal crops. Timber is scarce. The plains abound with large herds of Caraboa deer, and there are dogs, bears, foxes, wolves, and beavers.

Rivers.—The principal is the Exploit river, of which the Humber and the Great Rattling are affluents. None of the streams are navigable, and their course is narrow and winding.

Minerals.—Lead, silver, and copper are worked, and there are marble, limestone, slate, and coal.

Fisheries.—There are the "shore," and the "bank" fisheries. The "banks," an enormous submarine plateau, extend in length for nearly 600 miles, and in breadth 200. Cod, salmon, and herring are abundant; the seal fishery is very important; and immense quantities of dried fish and seal skins, seal oil, and cod oil are exported, of the average annual value of £1,600,000.

Area.—40,200 square miles.

Pop.—162,000.

Government.—There are a governor and executive council, with a legislative council of 15 members, nominated by the crown, and an elected house of assembly of 31 members. The form of government was established in 1855.

History.—Newfoundland was discovered by John Cabot in 1497 and about 1300 fisheries were established there by the Portuguese, Spaniards, and French, several hundred vessels being engaged. Sir HumphryGilbert took possession of the island in the name of Queen Elizabeth in 1583, and in 1621 Sir George Calvert, afterwards Lord Baltimore, settled on the peninsula, which he named the province of Avalon. For about a century there were continual disputes between the English and French, but by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, the island was ceded to England. In 1728 a governor was appointed, and in 1809 the adjacent coast of Labrador and the island of Anticosta were included in his jurisdiction.

NEWHAVEN, nu-hai'-ven, a fishing-village and watering place of Scotland, 1 mile from Leith, and connected with Edinburgh by the Northern Railway. There are both a stone pier and a chain pier. There are valuable oyster and other fisheries. Pop. 2,500.

NEWHAVEN, a seaport of Sussex, at the mouth of the Ouse, 8 miles S.E. of Brighton. It has a good tidal harbour, and there is steam communication with Dieppe, in France. Some ship-building is carried on. Pop. 2,000.—A station on the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway.

NEWHAVEN, a county of Connecticut, United States. Area, 640 square miles. Pop. 156,523. The capital is NEWHAVEN.

NEWHAVEN, a seaport and capital of Newhaven county, at the head of a bay of the same name in Long-Island Sound, 65 miles N.E. of New York. It is beautifully situated, on a beautiful plain, sloping to the shore, and enclosed by hills of the Green Mountain range. The central square is open, and is said to be one of the handsomest in the United States, and there is a beautiful public park. There are 22 churches, some of them very fine buildings, a synagogue, a large state house, and Yale College, an extensive range of buildings, with a fine frontage, and possessing a large library, museum, and picture gallery; several other educational establishments, and a state hospital. There is a beautiful cemetery near the town. The harbour is well defended from winds, and is furnished with excellent wharfs. Manf. Leather, rope, carriages, clocks, hardware, cutlery, and machinery. Pop. 62,900. Lat. 41° 18′ N. Lon. 72° 56′ W.

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY, D.D., nū'-man, a modern English divine, who was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and, in 1822, was elected fellow of Oriel College, was ordained in 1824, and subsequently became vice-principal of St. Alban's Hall. In 1828 he became vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, in 1833 he assumed a leading position in what was then termed "the Oxford movement;" and, in conjunction with Messrs. Pusey, Keble, and others, commenced the publication of the "Oxford Tracts," which so deeply affected the theological world, and in which an attempt was made to recede from the principles of the English Reformation, and restore the Catholic character of the English Church. The last and 90th number was written by Dr. Newman himself; and after its publication the bishop of Oxford was called upon by the heads of houses in the university to put an end to the series. In 1845 Dr. Newman entered the communion of the Roman Catholic church, was admitted to orders at Rome, and on his return in 1848 established a branch of the oratory of St. Philip Neri, of which he was appointed superior; and in 1852, became rector of the new university established by that religious body in Dublin. He subsequently resigned that office, and settled in Birmingham. Before quitting the Anglican Church he had written many learned theological histories and dissertations, and afterwards published "Development of Christian Doctrine," "Lectures on Catholicism in England," "Apologia pro Vitâ Suâ," (a history of his own religious development); and, besides other works, two works of fiction. He also edited a series of "Lives of the English Saints." He is generally regarded as one of the leading thinkers and ablest writers of the Catholic Church.

Born in London, 1801.

NEWMAN, FRANCIS WILLIAM, brother of the preceding. After completing his education at Worcester College, Oxford, he was chosen fellow of Balliol in 1826, but resigned the office and withdrew from the university, in consequence of objecting to sign the Thirty-nine Articles, in 1830. During the three succeeding years he travelled in the East, and, in 1834 became classical tutor in Bristol College, which he vacated in 1840, to assume the professorship of classics at Manchester New College. In 1846 he was nominated professor of the Latin language and literature in University College, London. As a philologist, he ranks as a highly accomplished and acute writer. In this department of knowledge, his most important works have been "A Grammar of the Berber Language," "The Odes of Horace, translated into unrhymed metres," and the "Iliad" of Homer. His political and theological views, as an advocate of extreme rationalistic opinions, have been expressed in his "Lectures on Political Economy," "The Crimes of the House of Hapsburg against its own Liege Subjects," "The Soul; its Sorrows and its Aspirations," "Phases of Faith," and a "History of the Hebrew Monarchy, from the Administration of Samuel to the Babylonish Captivity." He has likewise contributed a number of political and other articles to the Eclectic, Prospective, and Westminster reviews. Some elementary works have also emanated from him; such as "Difficulties of Elementary Geometry," "An Introduction to Roman History," "Contrasts of Ancient and Modern History," &c.

Born in London, 1805.

NEWMARKET, nu-mar'-ket, a market-town of England, partly in the county of Cambridge, but principally in that of Suffolk, 13 miles N.E. of Cambridge. The town is well-built, and chiefly depends upon its raceground for its support. This course is formed out of an extensive heath, and is the finest in the kingdom. Pop. 5,160, one-half of whom are trainers, jockeys, grooms, and stable-keepers.—A station on the Great Eastern railway.

NEWPORT, nu'-port, a market-town, river port, and parliamentary and municipal borough, of the Isle of Wight, of which it is the chief town. It stands near the centre of the island, on the banks of the navigable river Medina, which is navigable up to that point. The houses are mostly of brick, and some of them are handsome. In the centre of one of the squares stands St. Thomas's church, built in 1854, on the site of an ancient structure built in the 13th century. It contains a beautiful monument erected by Queen Victoria to the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Charles I., who, after the execution of her father, died a prisoner in Carisbrook Castle, and was buried in the church. It has, besides, a town-hall, assembly-rooms, theatre, a free grammar-school, founded by James I., and within which the treaty of Newport was concluded; an ancient guildhall, market-house, public library, literary institutes, and, in the neighbourhood, Parkhurst prison, for juvenile convicts, a house of industry, barracks. Manf. Lace. Pop. 9,430. A station on the Isle of Wight railway.

NEWPORT, a market town, river port, and Parliamentary (with Monmouth) and municipal borough of Monmouthshire, on the Usk, four miles from the mouth and 24 miles S.W. of Monmouth. The greater portion of the produce of the large collieries and iron and tin works of the neighbourhood is shipped here. There are spacious docks, and about 11,500 vessels enter and clear the port annually. Manf. Nails. Pop. 35,382. A station on the Great Western and London and North-Western railways, and reached by the Midland lines.

NEWPORT, a market-town of Salop, on the Strine, 16 miles from Shrewsbury. It has a free school and almshouses. In the vicinity are coal and iron mines. Pop. 3,000.

NEWPORT, a market-town and port of Wales, Pembrokeshire, on the Nevern, 6 miles from Fishguard. It has the ruins of a castle, and a trade in agricultural produce, slates, coal, and timber. Pop. 2,000.

NEWPORT, a county of Rhode Island, United States. Area, 136 square miles. Pop. 24,180. The capital is NEWPORT.

NEWPORT, a city and port of entry and watering-place of Rhode Island state, United States, on Narraganset Bay, 24 miles S.E. of Providence. There is a good harbour, defended by two forts. The scenery is very attractive, and it is one of the most fashionable maritime resorts in the States. The public buildings include a state house, custom house, the Redwood Library, and several large hotels. Manf. Cotton. Eighty sailing and 11 steam vessels belong to the port. Pop. 15,693.—A settlement was made here in 1638 by a few adherents of Roger Williams, when he was banished from Massachusetts (see WILLIAMS, ROGER), and was formerly the state capital.

NEWPORT, a city of Kentucky, United States, on the Ohio and the Licking rivers, opposite Cincinnati, and Covington, with which it is connected by a suspension-bridge and street railroad. There is a United States arsenal. Manf. Iron. Pop. 20,433.

NEWPORT, GEORGE, English comparative anatomist and physiologist, whose earliest efforts at acquiring scientific knowledge were made under the most disadvantageous circumstances. He was at length enabled to become apprentice to a surgeon at Sandwich, in Kent, and subsequently concluded his medical education at the University of London. At a later period he produced a number of valuable memoirs, chiefly upon the insect tribes, which were read before the Royal Society, and published in the "Philosophical Transactions." In 1844 he was elected president of the Entomological Society. He was twice awarded the medal of the Royal Society, and was fellow of the Linnæan and Royal societies. His researches upon the respiration, temperature, and the structure of the blood-globules in insects are of the highest value.
Born, 1803; died, 1854.

NEWPORT-PAGNELL, pag'-nel, a market-town of Buckinghamshire, on the Ouse, at its junction with the Ousel, which divides the town into two unequal parts, 50 miles N.W. of London. It has an ancient and spacious church, and several other places of public worship. Manf. Lace. There is a good trade in corn, coal, and timber. Pop. 3,660. A station on the London and North-Western railway.

NEWRY, nu'-re, a river port and parliamentary borough, chiefly in the county of Down, but partly in Armagh, Ireland, on the Newry Water, 38 miles S.W. of Belfast. The town spreads along the side of a steep hill, and was formerly a pass and military post of considerable importance, as well as the seat of an abbey, of which the possessions were very important. Below it lies the river, over which are two handsome stone bridges, one of six arches, and the quays are lined with spacious warehouses. The town is handsomely built. Carlingford Loch, recently improved at a great expense, is the harbour. Manf. Linen, yarn, cotton, and cordage, leather, iron, and brass. Pop. 14,808. A station on the Great Northern of Ireland railway. This town originated in a monastery founded in 1183, and a castle subsequently erected by De Courcy. It was incorporated as a borough by James I.

NEWTON, nu'-ton, a township of Massachusetts, United States, on Charles River, 8 miles W. of Boston. It is divided into two portions, known as Upper and Lower Falls. There are 12 churches, and a Baptist theological seminary. Manf. Cotton, hosiery, and paper. Pop. 16,995.

NEWTON, the name of six counties in the United States:

ARKANSAS.—Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 6,120. The capital is Jasper.
GEORGIA.—Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 13,623, more than 6,000 being coloured. The capital is Covington.
INDIANA.—Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 8,167. The capital is Kentland.
MISSISSIPPI.—Area, 625 square miles. Pop. 13,436, about one-third being coloured. The capital is DECATUR.
MISSOURI.—Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 18,947. The capital is Neosho.
TEXAS.—Area, 964 square miles. Pop. 4,339. The capital is Newton.

NEWTON, SIR ISAAC, the greatest of English mathematicians and natural philosophers, was descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire.

losing his father in his childhood, his care devolved on his mother, who gave him an excellent education, though she married a second time. In 1654 he was sent to Grantham grammar-school, where, says Brewster, in his life of the philosopher, he made little progress, until one day "the boy who was above him having given him a severe kick in the stomach, from which he suffered great pain, he laboured incessantly till he got above him in the school; and from that time continued to rise until he was the head boy." At the age of 19 he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had the learned Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Isaac Barrow for his tutor. Under that able mathematician, Newton made rapid progress. After going through Euclid's Elements, the most difficult problems in which were very easy and familiar to him, he proceeded to the study of Descartes' Geometry, with Oughtred's Clavis, and Kepler's Optics, in all of which he made marginal notes as he went along; and this always continued to be his method of study. It was in this early course that he invented the method of series and fluxions which he afterwards brought to perfection, though his claim to the discovery was unjustly contested by Leibnitz, who obtained a knowledge of it in 1676 from the author himself. At the age of 22, Mr. Newton took his degree of bachelor of arts; and, about the same time, he applied himself to grinding optic-glasses for telescopes; and, having procured a glass prism, in order to try the phenomena of colours lately discovered by Grimaldi, the result of his observations was his new theory of light and colours. On the breaking out of the plague in 1665, he retired to Woolsthorpe, his native place, where, secluded from conversation and books, his active and penetrating mind conceived that hint which gave rise to his celebrated system of the universe. There is a story, not very authentic, perhaps, that he was sitting alone in his garden, when some apples falling from a tree led his thoughts to the subject of gravity; and, reflecting on the power of that principle, he began to consider, that, as it is not diminished at the remotest distance from the centre of the earth, it may be extended as far as the moon, and to all the planetary bodies. This subject he afterwards resumed on the occasion of the great comet in 1680; and in 1685 the important principle which forms the foundation of the Newtonian philosophy was first published in a treatise, "De Motu Corporum," and in 1687, in a larger work, "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica." On the author's return to the university in 1667, he was chosen fellow of his college, and took his degree of master of arts. Two years afterwards he succeeded Dr. Barrow in the mathematical professorship, on which occasion he read a course of optical lectures in Latin. These he had not finished in 1671, when he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to which learned body he communicated his theory of light and colours, which was followed by his account of a new telescope invented by him, and other interesting papers. The second telescope "made with his own hands" is still preserved in the library of the Royal Society. When the privileges of the University of Cambridge were attacked by James II., Newton was appointed to appear as one of her delegates in the High Commission court, where he pleaded with so much ability, that the king thought proper to stop his proceedings. He was next chosen to represent his university in parliament, in which he sat till it was dissolved, in 1690, and was again elected in 1701. In 1696 he was made warden of the Mint, and three years afterwards master of that office; which place he discharged with the greatest honour till his death. On his last promotion, he nominated Mr. Whiston to fill his chair at Cambridge, with all the profits of the place, and resigned it entirely to him in 1703. The same year he was chosen president of the Royal Society, which office he retained during twenty-five years. He was also a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, having been chosen in 1699. In 1704 he published his treatise of the "Reflections, Refractions, Inflections, and Colours of Light," which was afterwards translated into several languages, and went through many editions. The year before Queen Anne had conferred on him the honour of knighthood. In the succeeding reign, he was very often at court, and the princess of Wales, afterwards Queen Caroline, frequently conversed with him on philosophical questions. About 1718 he communicated to her royal highness the outlines of his treatise on Ancient Chronology, with which she was so pleased, that she never would part with it. A surreptitious copy of it was, however, obtained and carried to France by the Abbé Conti, who translated and printed it, with observations. On this, Sir Isaac published a paper on the subject in the "Philosophical Transactions," and the work at length in English, in 4to. After enjoying an uncommon share of health, owing to his activity and temperance, till he was fourscore years old, this great man began to be afflicted with a disorder of the bladder. The last twenty days of his life were attended with much pain; yet, amidst the severest agonies, he never cried out, or expressed the slightest impatience. After his death, he lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber, and was interred in Westminster Abbey, the lord chancellor, the dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, and three earls, bearing the pall. A stately monument was erected over his remains, at the entrance to the choir. Sir Isaac was of a middling stature, and his countenance was pleasing and venerable. He was of a very meek disposition, and a great lover of peace: to his other great qualities, he added a serious and devout reverence of religion. His favourite study was the Bible, the prophecies of which he illustrated by his researches. He conformed to the Church of England, but he lived in friendship with good men of all communions, and he was an enemy to every kind of persecution. He was never married, and, perhaps, had never time to think of it, being constantly immersed in the profoundest studies, and not being willing to have them broken by domestic concerns. Dr. Pemberton states of him, "that neither his age nor his universal reputation had rendered him stiff in opinion or in any degree elated;" and, shortly before his death, the great philosopher spoke of his sublime efforts in the following humble manner:—"I know not what I may appear to the world; but, to myself, I seem to have been only like a boy playing on the seashore, and diverting myself in now and then finding a smoother pebble, or a prettier shell, than ordinary, whilst the great ocean of truth lay all undiscovered before me." Upon the mantelpiece of the room in which Newton was born, at Woolsthorpe, is placed a marble tablet commemorative of the fact; beneath which are Pope's lines:—

"Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night:
God said, 'Let Newton be!' and all was light."

There are statues of him at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Grantham.

Born at Woolsthorpe, near Grantham, 1642; died at Kensington, 1727.

NEWTON, THOMAS, an English divine, and physician, was educated first at Oxford and afterwards at Cambridge. He taught a school at Macclesfield, and practised physic; after which he obtained the living of Ilford, in Essex. He wrote "The History of the Saracens," "Approved Medicines and Cordial Receipts," "Directions for the Health of Magistrates and Students," "Herbal of the Bible," &c.

Born in Cheshire, 1543; died 1607.

NEWTON, THOMAS, an eminent English prelate. His education was commenced at Westminster school, whence he was elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow. After entering into orders, he became curate of St. George's, Hanover Square. In 1749 he published an edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost," with notes selected from various authors, and many of his own. He also prefixed a curious and well-written life of the author. In 1756 he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king; and in 1761 was appointed bishop of Bristol. His principal work is a course of "Dissertations on the Prophecies."

Born at Lichfield, 1704; died 1782.

NEWTON-ABBOT, a market town of Devonshire, on the Lemon, 15 miles S.W. of Exeter. The part of the town on the left side of the stream is known as Newton-Bushel. Pop. 14,233.—A station on the Great Western railway.—It was here that William of Orange, after landing at Torbay, in 1688, made his first public declaration.

NEWTON-LIMAVADY, lim-a-va'-de, a market town of Londonderry, Ireland, 16 miles N.E. of the town of Londonderry. There are a Protestant church and other places of worship, and a town hall. It is an important centre of the flax trade. Pop. 2,920.

NEWTON-IN-MAKERFIELD, a market town of Lancashire, 15 miles W. of Manchester, the place of election for South Lancashire. Newton Mere is a beautiful lake in the town. Manf. Cotton, iron, glass, paper, sugar, oil, tiles, bricks, and earthenware. There are two horse and cattle fairs held annually. Pop. 10,580.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

NEWTON-STEWART, a town of Scotland, in Wigtounshire, on the right bank of the Cree, 7 miles N.W. of Wigtoun. It has a large Gothic church and several other places of worship. Manf. Leather, woollens and cotton. There are lead mines in the vicinity. Pop. 2,900.

NEWTON-UPON-AYR. (See AYR.)

NEWTOWN, a town of Montgomeryshire, North Wales, on the right bank of the Severn, 8 miles S.W. of Montgomery. Manf. Flannels, for which there are 40 factories. Pop. 7,170.—A station on the Cambrian Railway.

NEWTOWNARDS, a market town of Ireland, in the county of Down, at the northern extremity of Lough Strangford, 12 miles E. of Belfast. There are a Protestant church, a Roman Catholic chapel, and several places of worship for Presbyterians. Manf. Muslin and flax. Pop. 8,676.—A station on the Belfast and County Down Railway.

NEW-YEAR'S ISLANDS, in the S. Pacific Ocean, on the north coast of Staten Land. Lat. 54° 41′ S. Lon. 64° 28′ W.

NEY, MICHAEL, nai, marshal of France, prince of the Moskwa, and duke of Elchingen. In his 13th year he was placed with a notary; but this occupation being little in accordance with his adventurous and energetic disposition, he, in 1787, enlisted in a regiment of hussars. His courage and activity were so conspicuous, that, in seven years, he rose to a captaincy. Attracting the notice of General Kleber, by whom he was surnamed "the Indefatigable," he was created adjutant-general. In 1796 he displayed signal valour at the battles of Altenkirchen, Montabour, and Dierdorf, at which last he was taken prisoner. Upon being exchanged, he was appointed to the army of the Rhine: while serving with which, he, with only a handful of cavalry, took 2,000 prisoners, and made himself master of the town of Mannheim. For that gallant affair he was created general of brigade; and, throughout the campaign, his brilliant courage was only surpassed by his humane treatment of the French emigrants who fell into his hands, and whom he contrived to put beyond the power of the Directory, who sought their lives. Under General Moreau, he fought at Worms, Frankenthal, Mannheim, and Iller; and to his unyielding bravery was due in great part the victory achieved at Hohenlinden. After the peace of Luneville, he went to Paris, where Napoleon gave him a cordial reception, and, in order to attach him to his cause, brought about a marriage between him and Mademoiselle Augnié, the friend of Hortense Beauharnais, and appointed him inspector-general of cavalry. He went to Switzerland in 1803 as minister plenipotentiary of the French republic. Upon his return he was nominated to the command of the army encamped near Boulogne, and raised to the dignity of marshal of France. In 1805 he commanded the eighth corps of the army in Germany, and stormed the village of Elchingen, where the Austrians lost 1,500 killed and wounded, and 2,000 prisoners. It was in commemoration of this brilliant deed, that Napoleon, who was witness of it, subsequently created Ney duke of Elchingen. He signalised himself still further in the subsequent Prussian campaign. He caused Erfurt to capitulate; took Magdeburg, with 23,000 prisoners and 800 pieces of artillery. At Deppen he destroyed a whole Prussian corps, cut off the retreat of the Russians at Königsberg, and defeated the left wing of the enemy at Friedland. In Spain he was placed under Massena; and it was to his persevering skill that the capture of Ciudad-Rodrigo and Almeida was due. Although he greatly assisted Massena in his retreat from the lines of Torres Vedras, the latter and himself became engaged in serious disputes, which led to the recall of Ney. When the grand army set out for Russia, in 1812, Ney was placed in command of the third corps. In that disastrous expedition, he is stated to have urged Napoleon to winter at Smolensk; but, although his counsel remained unheeded by the emperor, he won from him the surname "Bravest of the Brave," by his intrepidity upon every occasion, especially at Moskwa, for which he received the title of prince. During the terrible retreat that ensued, Ney performed prodigies of valour. When Napoleon's star had begun to decline, Ney's courage and ability remained as fresh as before. He was at Bautzen, Lutzen, and Dresden, helping in all to bring victory to the French standard; but at Dennewitz he was defeated by Bernadotte. Upon the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, Ney retired to his country seat, from which he was summoned to Paris to assume the command of the eighth military division. When he had reached Paris, he learned for the first time that he was called upon to oppose his old master, who had returned from Elba, and was advancing towards the capital. Instead of capturing, he went over to Napoleon, and his example was followed by almost his whole army. At Waterloo he displayed astonishing bravery: five horses were shot under him; but on foot, his dress torn with balls, he headed the columns of the Guard, and urged them to the charge. All was unavailing, however, and, in the retreat, he was one of the last to quit the disastrous field. After the fall of the emperor, he repaired to Paris, where he was soon afterwards proscribed as a traitor to France. Fouché provided him with a passport, by means of which he was enabled to gain the frontiers in safety; but, unhappily turning back for some slight cause, he was arrested, brought to trial, and condemned to death. The garden of the Luxembourg was chosen for the place of execution, and there the brave soldier calmly met his death;—there, "he who had fought five hundred battles for France—not one against her, was shot as a traitor."

Born at Sarre-Louis, Lorraine, 1769; died, 1815.

NEYRIZ, naï-riz, a town of Persia, province of Fars, 7 miles E. of Lake Bakhtegan. It occupies a large space, most of the houses having gardens. Pop. 6,000.

NEZ PERCÉ, naï-pair-sai, a county of Idaho Territory, United States. Area, 7,350 square miles. Pop. 2,000, more than one-third being Chinese. The capital is Lewiston.

NGAMI, LAKE, nya'-me, a lake in Africa, discovered by Dr. Livingstone in 1849. It is a shallow, weedy lagoon, and the size varies according to the season. Lat. 20°—21° S. Lon. 22° 10′—23° 30′ E. (See AFRICA.)

NGAN-HOEI, or GAN-HIVUY, ngan-ho'-i, an inland province of China, with an even surface, and traversed by the Yang-tse-Kiang, and Hoai-ho, with their tributaries. It produces green tea, and is rich in minerals. The capital is NGAN-KIANG-FOO. Area 48,460 square miles. Pop. 34,300,000. Lat. 29°—34° N. Lon. 113°—119° E.

NHATRANG, na-trang', capital of a province of Aram, near the mouth of a river of the same name. There is a harbour for small vessels, defended by a fort, and a coasting trade is carried on. Lat. 12° 20′ N. Lon. 109° 10′ E.

NIAGARA, ni-ag'-a-ra, a river of North America, which issues from Lake Erie, and flows northwards into Lake Ontario, and forming part of the boundary between the United States and Canada. It has a course of 36 miles, and a fall in that distance of 334 feet. It is about three-quarters of a mile wide at its point of issue from Lake Erie, but widens considerably, and has many islands, the largest of which, Grand Island, is 12 miles long, and from 2 to 7 broad. Beyond this isle the stream narrows considerably, and there are dangerous rapids, the descent being about 60 feet in a mile and a half, where the entire body of water is precipitated over the famous Falls of Niagara. At this point the waters are divided by Goat Island into two distinct cataracts. The most stupendous of these is that on the north-west or Canadian side of the river, and is commonly called the Great or Horseshoe Fall, from the resemblance to the shape of a horse-shoe which it once bore, but which has been considerably altered by the wearing away of the rock. The height of this fall is estimated at 154 feet, and it is 2,000 feet across. The fall on the American side is 660 feet in breadth and 163 in depth. It has been estimated that these falls discharge 100,000,000 tons of water per hour. Below the Falls the channel of the river is three-quarters of a mile wide, and about a mile and a half below, is crossed by a railway suspension bridge, 821 feet long, 40 broad, and 245 feet above the surface of the water. This bridge, which has a carriage and footway below the railway, was constructed in 1855, and much nearer the falls is another suspension bridge 190 feet above the river, and 1,268 feet long, built in 1869.

NIAGARA, capital of Lincoln county, province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, on the mouth of the Niagara river, 36 miles from Toronto. It was destroyed by the American General, M'Clure, in 1813, but afterwards rebuilt. Pop. 3,000.

NIAGARA, a county of New York, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 54,173. The capital is Lockport.

NIAGARA, a town of the above county, including the two villages of Niagara Falls and Suspension Bridge (formerly Niagara City), on the right bank of the Niagara river, near the Falls. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 5,500.

NIAMREI, ni-am'-re, a town of Western Africa, 25 miles S.E. of the mouth of the Senegal. It is a busy place. Pop. 3,500.

NIAS, or NEAS ISLE, ne'-as, an island of the Asiatic archipelago, belonging to the Netherlands, off the west coast of Sumatra, from which it is separated by a strait 60 miles broad. It is fertile; producing large quantities of rice, tobacco, sugar, cocoa-nuts, bananas and pepper. Mountain chains run from east to west, the coast is steep in some parts, and there are coral reefs. Area, 1,575 square miles. Pop. About 170,000 of the Malay race. Lat. 19°—1° 35′ N. Lon. 97°—98° E.

NIBBY, ANTONIO, nib'-bi, Roman archæologist, who first became known by a translation of Pausanius, with antiquarian and critical notes. In 1820 he was appointed professor of archæology in the University of Rome. His works on Roman archæology are numerous and valuable.

Born, 1792; died, 1839.

NICÆA, or NICE, ni-se'-a, an ancient city of Bythinia, in Asia Minor. (See ASIA MINOR.) It was built on the site of an older town, 316 B.C., and was a handsome place, of great importance under the Roman and Byzantine empires. It is famous in ecclesiastical history for the two councils held there—the first, in the year 325, at which the Nicene Creed was adopted—and the second in 787.

NICANDER, ni-kan'-der, a Greek poet, physician, and grammarian. He was a voluminous writer; but only two of his works have come down to us. He is supposed to have been born at Claros, a town of Colophis.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

NICANDER, CHARLES AUGUSTUS, a modern Swedish poet, who commenced his literary career in 1820, with the production of "The Runic Sword; or, the First Knight." In 1827 he visited Italy, and upon his return published "Recollections of the South," a prose work, but interspersed with some poems of great beauty and pathos.

Born at Stregnäs, 1799; died 1839.

NICANDRO, ST., ne-kan'-dro, a town of Naples, in the province of Foggia, 24 miles from Manfredonia. Pop. 8,000.

NICARAGUA, nik-a-rag'-u-a, a republic of Central America, bounded N. by Honduras, S. by Costa Rica, E. by the Pacific, and W. by the Caribbean Sea. There are two ranges of mountains, the eastern being a part of the great Cordillera range, with branches towards the Caribbean Sea. The western range, running nearly parallel to the Pacific coast line, is volcanic and in some parts of considerable elevation. Between these ranges is an extensive depression in which are the lakes of Nicaragua and Managua. The eastern coast is known as the MOSQUITO COAST. There are large forests, chiefly of mahogany, cedar, log-wood, brazil and other valuable timber, and extensive pastures, on which vast herds of cattle are fed. The soil is fertile. The chief cultivated products are cotton, coffee, maize, rice, tobacco, indigo, cocoa, and nearly all the fruits of the tropics are abundant. Sarsaparilla, ginger, gum-arabic, aloes, and other vegetable products are largely exported.

Rivers.—The Segovia, or Rio Coco, forming part of the boundary between the republic and Honduras; the Blewfields river, or Escondido, and the San Juan, all flowing into the Caribbean Sea.

Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, iron, and lead.

Area.—49,500 square miles.

Pop.—About 350,000, including about 25,000 of European birth or descent, and 10,000 negroes. The remainder, forming the great majority, are Indians, and mixed races.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 5 departments, Rivas, Granada, Leon, Segovia, and Matagalpa. The chief towns are MANAGUA, the capital; LEON, the old capital; CHINANDEGA, GRANADA, and NICARAGUA.

Government.—The constitution of the republic was proclaimed on August 19, 1858. It vests the legislative power in a congress of two houses, the upper called the senate, comprising 14 members, and the lower, called the house of representatives, 18 members. Both branches of the legislature are elected by universal suffrage, the members of the house of representatives for the term of four, and those of the senate for the term of six years. The executive power is with a president elected for four years. The president exercises his functions through a council of responsible ministers, composed of four members, presiding over the departments of finance, of foreign affairs, of public instruction, and of war and marine.

History.—This part of Central America was discovered by the Spanish explorers in 1521, and conquered by the governor of Panama in 1522. In 1821, the inhabitants separated from Spain, after a sanguinary struggle, and became a state of the republic of Central America, and an independent state in 1839.

NICARAGUA, a town of the above State, near the west bank of Lake Nicaragua, in the midst of a fertile district. Pop. 8,500.

NICARAGUA, or COCIBOLCA, a lake of fresh water in the above republic. It is 110 miles long, with an average breadth of 40, and is navigable for the largest vessels, and is of immense depth. Its surface is about 1,130 feet above the level of the Pacific. The scenery around the lake is very beautiful, and there are numerous groups of islands, on some of which are extensive ruins and huge stone idols, and many of the smaller islands are volcanic. Lat. 11°—12° 12′ N. Lon. 84°—86° W.

NICASTRO, ne-kas'-tro, a town of Italy, province of Catanzaro, near the coast, and 24 miles S. of Cosenza. It is the see of a bishop. There are hot springs in the vicinity. The town suffered greatly by an earthquake in 1638. Pop. 13,935.

NICCOLA PISANO, or DI PISA, nik'-ko-la, Italian sculptor and architect, of Pisan birth, whose statues were characterized by all the vigour and grace of the antique, while, as an architect, he rivalled the greatest masters of his country. The most elaborate works which still attest his great ability are the beautiful pulpit of the baptistery of Pisa, adorned with bas-reliefs; the shrine of St. Dominic of Bologna, which has six large bas-reliefs; and the pulpit of the cathedral of Siena. His son Giovanni and his pupil Andreas both attained celebrity as sculptors.

Died 1276.

NICCOLINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, nik'-ko-le'-ne, Italian dramatist and poet, member of a noble, but poor family. He early exhibited great poetical ability, and at the age of 25 was crowned by the Crusca Academy. He was afterwards appointed secretary of the Academy of Fine Arts of the Napoleonic kingdom of Etruria, but resigned when it was incorporated with the grand duchy of Tuscany. In 1805 he was appointed librarian of the Pitti Palace of Florence, but court life was disagreeable to him, and he resigned. He afterwards came into possession of property, which enabled him to devote himself to literature. In 1819 he published "Nabuco," representing the pope and other living characters; in 1827, "Antonio Foscarini;" and in 1844 his finest work, "Arnoldo da Brescia," appeared anonymously. Niccolini ranks among the very first of modern Italian poets.

Born near Pisa, 1785; died at Florence, 1861.

NICE, or NIZZA, neece, neet'-za, a town of France, capital of the department Alpes Maritimes, is situate at the mouth of the small river Paglione, on the Mediterranean, 100 miles S.W. of Turin. The old town, on the left bank of the river, is a narrow crowded district, communicating by two bridges with the new town, or Quartier de la Croix de Marbre (from a marble cross, commemorating the reconciliation of Charles V. and Francis I.), known as the English town, from the number of English residents. There is a third portion, the Port, separated from the old town by the Castle Hill, and chiefly occupied by a seafaring population. The Castle Hill is a limestone rock, 800 feet high, the summit formerly occupied by a strong castle, some ruins of which exist, but now laid out as a promenade and gardens, commanding a splendid view. In the new town there are four quays, with handsome shops, and a noble square, the Jardin Publique. The principal public buildings are in the Corso, and adjacent streets, and include an English Episcopalian and Presbyterian church, library, and reading-room. The Promenade des Anglais extends for a mile along the shore, with elegant villas and hotels. In the old town there is a good public promenade, the Terrace, overlooking the sea. In the most sheltered part of the town is the Quartier Carabecel, resorted to by invalids. The harbour admits vessels of considerable size, but is difficult of entrance. In the winter and spring the climate is generally delightful, but there are occasionally very cold winds, known as the "mistral." Pop. 66,270. Lat. 43° 42′ N. Lon. 7° 17′ E. —This town, on the site of the ancient Ligurian Nicea, came into the possession of the dukes of Savoy in 1388, and remained a portion of the dominions until ceded to France in 1860.

NICEPHORUS, CALLISTUS XANTHOPULUS, ni-sef'-o-rus, a Greek historian, who, among other works, produced an "Ecclesiastical History," in twenty-three books, the date of which commences with the year 610.

Lived in the 14th century.

NICEPHORUS, patriarch of Constantinople, who opposed the emperor Leo's decree against images, and wrote in Greek an abridged history of Constantinople. He was chosen patriarch in 806, and deposed in 815.

Born 758; died 828.

NICEPHORUS GREGORAS, Byzantine historian and chronologist. He published a computation of the time of Easter. Having involved himself in theological disputes, he was persecuted.

Born 1295; died 1359.

NICEPHORUS I., emperor of Constantinople, was at first chancellor of the empire, but usurped the throne in 802, from the empress Irene, whom he banished to the isle of Mitylene. The beginning of his reign was marked by wisdom and clemency; but afterwards he committed such cruelties, that his subjects revolted, and proclaimed Bardanes, surnamed the Turk, emperor. Bardanes was defeated, however, and sent to a monastery, where he was deprived of his eyes. The Bulgarians having invaded the empire, and ravaged Thrace, Nicephorus marched against them; but was vanquished and slain.

Died 811.

NICEPHORUS II. (PHOCAS), a general under the Emperor Constantine VII. He gained several great victories, and his character was so popular, that he was raised to the imperial throne in 963. He married the widow of his predecessor, Romanus II., and drove the Saracens out of a great part of Asia. He was assassinated by John Zimisces and other conspirators.

Died 969.

NICEPHORUS III. (BOTONIATES), a brave general, on the death of Michael VII. was invested with the purple by the army in 1078. He was deprived of this dignity in 1081, by his general Alexis Comnenus, who sent him to a convent, where he became a monk.

Died 1081.

NICERON, JOHN PETER, nis'-e-rawng, an eminent French biographer. He entered the religious order of the Barnabites, and became a celebrated preacher. He was also successively professor of philosophy and theology, and librarian to his society. His works are "Memoirs of Men illustrious in the Republic of Letters, with an Account of their Works," a translation of Dr. Hancock's treatise on the "Virtues of Common Water," "The Conversion of England to Christianity."

Born at Paris, 1685; died 1738.

NICETAS, ACOMINATUS, ni-se'-tus, a Byzantine historian, who wrote the Annals of the Byzantine empire, in twenty-one books. He was employed in various posts at the court of Constantinople, until the year 1204, when he retired to Nicæa.

Died 1216.

NICHOLAS, nik'-o-las, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 11,869 about 1,300 being coloured. The capital is Carlisle.

NICHOLAS, a county of West Virginia, United States. Area, 880 square miles. Pop. 7,223. The capital is Summerville.

NICHOLAS, ST., one of the Cape Verd Islands, in the Atlantic, between Santiago and St. Lucia. It is very irregular in shape, and generally elevated, having two remarkable peaks, one of a conical shape, the Peak of Trade, in the centre of the island, and Monte Gordo, at the western end. The principal bay, Grand, or St. George's, is on the western side. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 16° 42′ N. Lon. 24° 20′ W.

NICHOLAS I. (THE GREAT), Pope, member of a noble Roman family, was elected in succession to Benedict III., in 858. He excommunicated Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, whose schism led to the separation of the Roman and Byzantine churches.

Died at Rome, 868.

NICHOLAS II. (GERARD of Burgundy), who became archbishop of Florence, and succeeded Stephen IX. in 1058. He was opposed by a rival, who styled himself Benedict X.; but being disavowed by the council of Satri, the latter was obliged to forego his claim to the papal chair.

Died 1061.

NICHOLAS III. (GIOVANNI GAETANO ORSINI), was of a noble Italian family, and elected pope in succession to John XXI., in 1277. He obtained from the emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg large grants of Italian territory; among the rest, the exarchate of Ravenna. He dispatched a number of missions to heathen countries, and deprived Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, of the dignity of a senator of Rome.

Died 1280.

NICHOLAS IV. (ASCOLI) was elected to the papal chair upon the death of Honorius IV., in 1288. He excommunicated James of Aragon and his followers in the island of Sicily, and advanced the claims of Charles II. of Anjou to that kingdom. He likewise endeavoured to excite a new crusade, but without success. This disappointment hastened his death.

Died 1292.

NICHOLAS V. (TOMMASO PARANTUCELLI, of Sarzana), cardinal bishop of Bologna, became pope after Eugenius IV., in 1417. He restored peace to the Romish and Western churches, and caused the sovereigns and states of Italy to forget their feuds. He collected books and manuscripts, and ordered translations to be made of the Greek classics. The Vatican library was also founded by him, and he embellished Rome with numerous fine edifices. He was an enlightened and distinguished pope.

Died 1455.

NICHOLAS I., or NIKOLAI PAULOVITCH, emperor of Russia, was the third son of the emperor Paul I. by his second wife, Sophie Dorothea, daughter of Frederick Eugene, duke of Würtemberg. His father having been assassinated while Nicholas was only in his fifth year, his education devolved upon his mother, who caused him to be most carefully instructed in letters, the sciences, and the arts. He was taught to speak the French and German languages with as much fluency as his native Russian; while in the theory of the arts of war, for the study of which he evinced great aptitude from his earliest years, his progress was rapid and brilliant. In 1816 he travelled, visiting England, and making a tour through the Russian provinces. In July 1817 he married the Princess Frederica-Louisa, eldest daughter of Frederick William III. of Prussia. He ascended the throne of Russia in 1825, after the death of his eldest brother Alexander, who had no issue. Constantine, the next brother, was the legitimate heir; but he had renounced his claim two years previously. Before becoming emperor, Nicholas had, however, to repress a formidable insurrection, fomented by powerful members of the military and nobility. During that critical period, Nicholas displayed a fearless and energetic character, which rapidly awed the insurrectionists, many of whom were shot down, or subsequently executed, or banished to Siberia. Shortly after his coronation, he sent his troops against the Shah of Persia, whose army was defeated in several engagements by marshal Paskiewitch. The Shah was compelled to sign the treaty of Turkmanshai, by which the provinces of Erivan and Nakhichevan were ceded to Russia, an additional indemnity of about three millions sterling being exacted from him. Nicholas also joined with England and France in aiding the Greeks to achieve their independence, and the Russian fleet co-operated with those of the two first-named powers in annihilating the Turkish flotilla at Navarino. In 1828 war broke out between Russia and Turkey, and the treaty of Adrianople was concluded, which gave to Russia, besides large tracts of territory in Asia, the right to trade in all parts of Turkey and upon the Danube, and the free passage of the Dardanelles. In virtue of this concession, Nicholas likewise became the protector of the Danubian principalities. In 1830 he displayed considerable hostility towards the revolution that had brought about a change of dynasty in France; and in the same year an insurrection burst forth in Poland, which was not repressed until after a terrible struggle of ten months. The brave but unsuccessful Poles were treated with the utmost rigour; many were sent to Siberia or the army of the Caucasus; the universities were suppressed, the libraries and other great establishments were transferred to St. Petersburg; and finally, in 1832, the kingdom of Poland became extinct. In 1839 a formal declaration of war was made against the Circassians, with whom the Russians had long been engaged in a desultory warfare. This struggle was vigorously maintained by the emperor throughout his whole life, but it remained for his successor Alexander to thoroughly subdue the brave mountaineers. In the same year he despatched an unsuccessful expedition to Central Asia, for the conquest of Khiva. Nicholas visited England for the second time in 1844, and was cordially received by Her Majesty Queen Victoria. During the Hungarian insurrection of 1849, the troops of Nicholas enabled Austria to triumph over her revolted subjects, and to complete the subjugation of Hungary. In 1853 he dispatched prince Menschikoff to Constantinople, to exact from the Porte a treaty whereby Russia might be permitted to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey, and secure to herself the prerogative of protecting the Greek subjects of the Ottoman empire. The result of prince Menschikoff's mission was the Crimean war, the repeated defeats of the Russians by the allies hastening the death of the emperor, who suffered from atrophy of the lungs, and succumbed, whilst busily engaged in preparing renewed efforts against the allies. The emperor Nicholas was a man of abstemious habits and prodigious industry; his energetic character enabled him to assume the position of defender of order and legitimacy throughout the continent of Europe. His dignified manners and majestic stature made him very popular with his subjects. Order and legitimacy signified to him, however, a total repression of national liberty. With respect to his own country, he was professedly despotic.

Born at St. Petersburg, 1796; died at the same city, 1855.

NICHOLS, JOHN, nik'-ols, a learned antiquary and preacher, who early in life was placed in the office of William Bowyer, "the last of the learned printers." He was afterwards manager and partner of that printing-office; and at Bowyer's death, in 1777, the establishment fell into his hands. Nichols was author, or editor and printer, of a very large number of learned works. The most important of these were, "Biographical and Literary Anecdotes of William Bowyer, F.S.A.," "Illustrations of Literary History," "History of the County of Leicester," "The Progresses and Processions of Queen Elizabeth," and "Illustrations of the Manners and Expenses of Ancient Times." From the year 1778 until his death, he conducted the "Gentleman's Magazine."

Born at Islington, 1745; died 1826.

NICHOLS, JOHN GOUGH, a modern English antiquary, grandson of the preceding, and also a printer. His first important work was produced in 1829, with the title, "Facsimiles of Autographs, with Biographical Memoirs of Royal, Noble, Learned, and Remarkable Persons." His later productions included, among others, "The Chronicle of Queen Jane," a translation from Erasmus's "Pilgrimage to St. Mary of Walsingham," and "The Chronicle of the Grey Friars of London." During many years he was at the head of the "Gentleman's Magazine," but vacated the post in 1856. Subsequently, however, he contributed to the pages of that periodical "The Autobiography of Sylvanus Urban, Esq.," which contained much interesting matter relative to the early writers and affairs of that magazine.

Born in London, 1806; died 1873.

NICHOLSON, JOHN, distinguished British general in India, was the son of a Dublin physician, and at the age of 16 went as a cadet to Calcutta. He served at Afghanistan, and was imprisoned at Ghiznee. He afterwards took part in the campaign of the Sutlej, in the Sikh war of 1845, on the termination of which he was appointed assistant to the resident at Lahore. He greatly distinguished himself in repressing the Sikh rebellion of 1848, and was afterwards a deputy commissioner in the Punjab. On the outbreak of the great mutiny he greatly assisted to save the Punjab, and assisted in the siege of Delhi, but was killed in the assault. He was a most energetic and able soldier, and a fine-natured religious man.

Born at Dublin, 1821; died 1857.

NICHOLSON, PORT. (See WELLINGTON.)

NICIAS, nish'-i-us, Athenian commander and statesman, who, by his merit, rose to the highest offices in his country. He belonged to the aristocratic party, and was an opponent of Cleon, the demagogic leader. He signalised himself in the war of the Peloponnesus, which he had the honour of concluding. Afterwards he was appointed to command, with Eurymedon and Demosthenes, against Sicily. These three generals laid siege to Syracuse for three years; but, finding it impregnable, they were about to retire, when they were attacked by the Syracusans, and Nicias and Demosthenes, with a great part of their troops, made prisoners. Nicias was put to death by the Syracusans.

Died 413.

NICIAS, physician to Pyrrhus, king of Epirus. He made an offer to Fabricius, the Roman consul, of poisoning his master for a sum of money, B.C. 280. Fabricius disdained the proposal, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. Thereupon Pyrrhus is stated to have exclaimed, "This is that Fabricius whom it is harder to turn aside from justice and honour than to divert the sun from its course." Nicias is said to have been put to death, and his skin used for covering the seat of a chair.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

NICIAS, a celebrated Grecian painter, who was contemporary with Apelles. His greatest picture was that which illustrated the passage in Homer's "Odyssey," where Ulysses invokes the shades of the departed. Ptolemy I., king of Egypt, offered Nicias sixty talents (about £15,000) for the picture, but the painter preferred to present it to his native city of Athens. One of his pictures was taken to Rome by Augustus, in whose temple it was afterwards fixed. He is likewise stated to have painted some of the statues of Praxiteles.

Lived in the 3rd century B.C.

NICKOLAI, nik'-o-lai, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, 51 miles S.E. of Oppeln. Pop. 3,300.

NICOBAR ISLANDS, nik'-o-bar, the name of a group situate in the Bay of Bengal, and forming, with the Andamans, the extension of the great volcanic band of Sumatra and Java. They consist of two groups, divided by Sombrero Channel, 36 miles broad. The southern group consists of Great and Little Nicobar, respectively 30 miles long and 12 broad, and 14 miles long and 6 broad, and some little islets, and a northern group. They are all fringed by coral reefs, but there are some good harbours. The names of the principal are Carnicobar, Teressa, Chowry, Bomboocha, Katchull, Carmorta, Noncowry, Tonlongar, Sambelong, and Nicobar, or Great Sambelong. In the southern group are dense forests of valuable timber. These islands are almost all inhabited, are very fertile, and yield large quantities of sugar, and various kinds of fruits. They are, however, exposed to frequent hurricanes, and are deemed unhealthy. Pop. about 6,500, of the Malay type. Lat. 6° 40′—9° 20′ N. Lon. 93° 94′ E.

NICODEMUS, nik'-o-de'-mus, a Jewish senator, of the sect of Pharisees, who visited our Saviour by night, and afterwards became his disciple, though secretly; and when Jesus Christ was crucified, he avowed himself, and, together with Joseph of Arimathea, paid the last duties of regard to his master. The Jews, it is said, intended to have put him to death, but were hindered by his relation Gamaliel: they, however, deposed and excommunicated him. There is a pretended gospel under the name of Nicodemus; but it is full of errors, and was composed by the Manichæans.

NICOLAI, CHRISTOPH FRIEDRICH, nik'-o-lai, a learned German bookseller, who taught himself Greek, Latin, and English, and, in the 18th century, established several critical journals at Berlin, being the associate of Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn. He wrote many philosophical, critical, and satirical works, which led to his being attacked by Goethe, Schiller, Herder, Fichte, and Lavater.

Born at Berlin, 1733; died 1811.

NICOLAI, NICHOLAS DE, an old French geographer and valet-de-chambre to Henry II. of France. During sixteen years he travelled over Europe and the East, and wrote a curious account of his wanderings, in a work entitled "Navigations and Peregrinations of Nicholas de Nicolai."

Born 1517; died 1583.

NICOLAI, KARL OTTO EHRENFRIED, German musical composer. His parents were poor, but he contrived to study at Berlin and Rome, and in 1847 was appointed Kapellmeister at Berlin, but soon resigned. He is best known by his operas, "Il Templario" (founded on "Ivanhoe"), and "Die Lustigen Weiven von Windsor" ("The Merry Wives of Windsor.")

Born at Königsberg, 1809; died at Berlin, 1848.

NICOLAIEV. (See NIKOLAIEF.)

NICOLAS, SIR HARRIS, an English antiquarian writer, whose early years were spent in the English navy. At the conclusion of the great war with France, he devoted himself to the study of the law, and was called to the bar in 1825. As a lawyer, he was almost entirely employed in peerage cases before the House of Lords. His works were both numerous and important; the principal of them being "The History of the Battle of Agincourt," a "Life of Chaucer," appended to Pickering's edition of the poet's writings; "The Dispatches and Letters of Lord Nelson," and two volumes of a "History of the British Navy," which were all that he completed before his death. In 1831 he was created a knight of the Hanoverian Guelphic Order.

Born in Cornwall, 1799; died near Boulogne, 1848.

NICOLAS, ST., nik'-o-las, one of the early bishops of Myra, or Lycia, a saint of the Roman Catholic and Prussian church. Scarcely anything is known of his personal history, but it is thought that he was martyred in the last persecution under Maximinian. He was regarded as the patron of the young, especially scholars, and in former times his feast was strictly observed in the public schools of England. In Germany, at the present day, rewards are given to good children on the 6th of November, the vigil of the feast of St. Nicholas.

Lived in the 4th century.

NICOLAS, ST. (DU PORT), nik'-o-la, a town of France, department Meurthe, 6 miles S.E. of Nancy, on the Meurthe. There is a very fine Gothic church. Manf. Linen, cotton, worsted, embroidery, and leather. Pop. 3,900.

NICOLAS, ST., a town of Belgium, province of East Flanders, 12 miles from Antwerp. It has three churches, a spacious market-place, and a fine town-house. Manf. Cotton, woollens, linen, silk, ribbons, thread, carpets, lace, hats, tobacco, chocolate, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 24,500.

NICOLE, PETER, nik'-ol, an eminent French writer, who, in 1639, became a member of the Society of Port Royal, where he taught youth with great reputation, and assisted Arnauld in many of his works. In 1677 he quitted France, on account of the persecution against the Jansenists; but, some time after, he obtained leave to return to Paris. In his latter years he espoused the cause of Bossuet against the Quietists, and was engaged in other controversies. He was the chief author of the celebrated work known as the "Port Royal Logic." He also translated several valuable works from the Latin; and his moral essays are esteemed; as also is his treatise on Preserving Peace in Society. His other works are chiefly polemical.

Born at Chartres, 1625; died 1695.

NICOLET, nik'-o-lai, a county of Quebec province, dominion of Canada. Area, 593 square miles. Pop. 27,000, nearly all of French descent. The capital is Béconcour.

NICOLL, ROBERT, nik'-ol, a Scotch poet, who was the son of parents in humble circumstances, and whose efforts at self-education were pursued under the most disadvantageous circumstances. At the age of 21 he produced a small volume of poems, which became exceedingly popular, and passed through several editions. He shortly afterwards obtained the post of editor to the Leeds Times, which, under his control, was more than tripled in its circulation. His prose writings consisted, for the most part, of political articles contributed to the before-mentioned print, and were marked by strongly liberal sentiments and a clear energetic style. His health, which had always been frail, and was probably shattered by his youthful studies, gave way after he had been engaged on his editorial duties about a year; and he removed to Edinburgh, where he died almost as soon as he reached manhood.

Born at Tullybelthane, Perthshire, 1814; died 1837.

NICOLLET, nik'-ol-let, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 12,333. The capital is St. Peter.

NICOMACHUS, nik-o-mak'-kus, a painter of Thebes, in Greece, who is ranked with Apelles. His first works were sent to Rome.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

NICOMACHUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, surnamed Gerasenus, from his birthplace, Gerasa, in Palestine. He was famous for his power of calculation, and there are extant treatises on arithmetic and music written by him.

Lived in the 1st century.

NICOMEDEIA. (See ISMID.)

NICOMEDES I., nik-o-me'-dees, king of Bithynia, succeeded his father Zipoetes, B.C. 278. In the following year he sought the assistance of the Gauls against his brother Zibœtes, who disputed the throne with him. His barbarian auxiliaries subsequently turned against him, and overran the whole of Asia Minor.

Died about 250 B.C.

NICOMEDES II. (Epiphanes), succeeded his father, Prusias II. (whom he dethroned and caused to be assassinated) 149 B.C. During his long reign, he remained the ally of the Romans, and assisted the latter against Aristonicus, king of Pergamus, 131 B.C. The last years of his reign were spent in contending against Mithridates VI., king of Pontus.

Died 91 B.C.

NICOMEDES III. (Philopator), son and successor of the preceding, was deposed in the first year of his reign, by Mithridates VI.; but was afterwards restored to it by the Romans. In 88 B.C. he engaged with the Romans in attacking Mithridates, whose general defeated him in Paphlagonia; whereupon he fled to Italy, where he remained till the conclusion of the war, B.C. 84. Having no issue, he left his crown to the Romans.

Died 74 B.C.

NICOPOLIS, ne-kop'-o-lis, a fortified town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, on the right bank of the Danube, 55 miles W. of Rustchuk. It is divided into two parts—the Turkish town strongly fortified, and the eastern quarter, where the Bulgarians and Jews reside. The place gives a title to a Greek archbishop and a Roman Catholic bishop. Pop. 16,000.—This place was founded by Trajan, and here the Hungarians, under Sigismund, were, in 1396, defeated by the Turks, under Bajazet.

NICOSIA, ne-ko'-se-a, a town of Sicily, province of Catania, near the Salato and Capizzi. In the vicinity are beds of alum and rock-salt, and sulphur and petroleum springs. Pop. 15,000.

NICOSIA, capital of the island of Cyprus. (See LEFKOSIA.)

NICOT, JOHN, ne'-ko, a French courtier and writer, who was sent by Francis II. as ambassador to Portugal, whence he brought the plant named tobacco, which, in France, has been called Nicotiana, out of compliment to the importer. He wrote a work upon navigation, and published "The Treasury of the French Language, which is stated to be the first French dictionary known.

Born at Nimes, 1530; died at Paris, 1600.

NICOTERA, ne-ko'-tair-a, a town of Italy, province of Catanzaro, near the Gulf of Gioja, 16 miles S.W. of Monteleone. There are an episcopal palace and college. Pop. 4,600.

NICOYA, nik'-o-ya, a town of Costa Rica, Central America, on a peninsula forming a gulf of the same name. There is a good trade in sugar, and shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 3,000.

NICUMAN, or NIMEN, nik'-u-men, a river of China, rising near lat. 52° N, and flowing in a south-westerly direction to the Amgor, which it joins after a course of 220 miles. It is joined on the right bank by the Tcholanki.

NIEBUHR, KARSTENS, ne'-boor, Danish geographer and traveller, whose parents died while he was very young. Until his 21st year he gained his subsistence as an agricultural labourer. In 1754, however he zealously devoted himself to the study of geometry, with the view of gaining the post of land-surveyor in his native district. He afterwards passed to the university of Göttingen; but, his pecuniary resources, becoming exhausted, he enlisted in the Hanoverian engineers, which he quitted on being appointed to a scientific expedition about to be dispatched by the king of Denmark to Arabia. Niebuhr requested to be allowed to increase his scientific qualifications by eighteen months' study; and, when the expedition set out in 1761 he joined it as mathematician and geographer. After travelling in Arabia, Bombay, Persia, and in Asia Minor, Niebuhr returned to Copenhagen in 1767, having been absent six years. His four companions had died in the East; but Niebuhr succeeded in bringing home a collection of notes and sketches, which were subsequently edited, engraved, and printed at the expense of the Danish government, and have been used by every historian of Arabia, from Gibbon until the present day. The most important of these classical works were, "Description of Arabia," "Travels in Arabia," and "Political and Military State of the Turkish Empire." His great services to science were recognised by his government, who appointed him to a civil post in Holstein, and created him counsellor of state. Further, when he became incapacitated from discharging the duties of his office through blindness, the Danish government would not accept his resignation, but appointed an assistant to carry on his labours until the end of his life.

Born at Holstein, 1733; died 1815.

NIEBUHR, BARTHOLD GEORG, historian, critic, and philologist, was son of the preceding. After concluding a brilliant academical career at Göttingen and Edinburgh, he became private secretary to the Danish minister of finance in 1796; but his studious and retiring disposition being little in accordance with administrative functions, he exchanged the post for that of assistant-secretary to the Royal Library at Copenhagen. After spending about two years in Edinburgh, London, and Holstein, he returned to Copenhagen in 1800. Niebuhr was next invited to Berlin, where he arrived shortly before the battle of Jena. Upon the establishment of the University of Berlin, in 1810, he was appointed lecturer on Roman history, and the discourses which he delivered while fulfilling this office formed the germs of that great work upon which his fame rests. The War of Liberation, as it was termed in Germany, called Niebuhr from his studious life; and, during the years 1813-14 he was employed at the head-quarters of the allied army. In 1816 he was sent from Berlin as ambassador to Rome, whence he requested to be recalled in 1823. After spending some time at Naples, he returned to Berlin, but shortly afterwards repaired to Bonn, where he gave lectures upon Roman antiquities and other subjects, in the newly-founded university. After superintending the publication of the works of the Byzantine historians, he occupied himself with the enlargement and completion of his "Roman History." The first volume of this new edition was given to the world in 1827; but a fire having destroyed all Niebuhr's manuscripts, the publication of the second was delayed until 1830. This great work has inaugurated a new and more rational mode of dealing with the misty legends of early tradition. The excitement attending the French revolution of 1830 induced mental and bodily depression, which resulted in his death. In addition to the before-mentioned works, Niebuhr produced "Lectures on the History of Rome," and numerous historical, archæological, and philological essays; he was a regular contributor to German periodical literature.

Born at Copenhagen, 1776; died at Bonn, 1831.

NIEDERBRONN, ne'-der-bron, a town of Germany, in Alsace, 12 miles N. of Strasburg. There are mineral springs in the neighbourhood. Manf. Steel and bar-iron. Pop. 3,400.

NIEDERMAYER, ABRAHAM LOUIS, need'-er-mai-er, musical composer, a native of Switzerland, who studied at Vienna, and in Italy. He went to Paris in 1828, produced his opera of "Stradella," in 1837, was decorated with the cross of the legion of honour in 1845, and, in 1853, organised a school for the training of composers, singers, and organists for religious music. He composed several operas, including "Mary Stuart," and "La Fronde," masses, vocal pieces, and other works, which obtained for him a great reputation.

Born in the Canton de Vaud, 1802; died at Paris, 1861.

NIEMCEWICZ, JULIAN URSIN, neem'-tse-vitch, Polish poet, historian, and patriot. In 1788, after having travelled in France, Italy, and England, he entered the Polish diet as deputy for Livonia. He subsequently drew up the Polish constitution, which was so warmly commended by Fox. In 1794 he served as aide-de-camp to Kosciuszko, during the Polish insurrection of that year, and was taken prisoner at the disastrous battle of Macieowice. He was kept in confinement at St. Petersburg until 1796, after which he emigrated to America, passing on his way through London, where he was cordially received. When Napoleon created the grand duchy of Warsaw, in 1806, Niemcewicz was appointed secretary of state; and this and other high offices he continued to hold until the outbreak of the Polish insurrection of 1830. Shortly afterwards he went to London to request the aid of the English government; but, Russia having taken the capital of Poland in his absence, he was precluded from returning to his native country. He subsequently repaired to Paris, where the last days of this illustrious patriot and author were spent. His chief works were a collection of spirit-stirring poems, a number of dramas, the "History of the Reign of Sigismund III. of Poland," translations from Pope, Dryden, Byron, and Wordsworth, and a narrative of his captivity in St. Petersburg.

Born at Skoki, Lithuania, 1757; died at Paris, 1841.

NIEMECZ, ne'-mech, a fortified town of Moldavia, near the river Niemecz, 280 miles from Belgrade.

NIEMEN, or MEMEL, ne'-men, a large river of Prussia, which rises a few miles S. of Minsk, and, after a course of 600 miles, enters the Kurische-Haff by the Russ and Ghilghe mouths, 30 miles from Tilsit. It is navigable for 400 miles, but there are rapids and shallows. The chief affluent is the Viha, on the right.

NIEMES, neems, a town of Bohemia, 18 miles from Jung-Bunzlau. Manf. Cotton and linen goods, and paper. Pop. 4,300.

NIENBURG, neen'-boorg, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, on the right bank of the Weser, 29 miles N.W. of Hanover. Manf. Linen, woollens and vinegar. Pop. 5,300.

NIENBURG (MONCH, or KLOSTER), a walled town of the duchy of Anhalt, Germany, at the confluence of the Bude with the Saale, 18 miles S.E. of Magdeburg. Pop. 3,700.

NIÉPCE DE SAINT VICTOR, CLAUDE FÉLIX ABEL, ne'-aips, French photographic chemist, and the discoverer of the process of obtaining images on glass. He was the nephew of Nicéphore Niépce who was the friend and fellow-worker of M. Daguerre; was educated for the military profession, and was acting as lieutenant of dragoons in 1842, when an accident turned his thoughts towards the science of chemistry. Having stained his uniform with some drops of lemon-juice, he undertook a series of chemical experiments for the purpose of restoring the lost colour, and at length succeeded by employing ammonia. Shortly afterwards, the minister of war ordered that the collars and cuffs of thirteen cavalry regiments should be changed in colour. This change had been estimated to cost six francs the suit: but Niépce suggested a plan which would cost only half a franc. His proposal was accepted, and the government was saved an expenditure of 100,000 francs. For this service he received a reward of 500 francs. Three years afterwards, he obtained an exchange into the municipal guard of Paris, which step gave him the means of prosecuting his scientific studies in the capital. During the revolution of 1848, the barrack in which he lodged was destroyed, and with it the whole of his scientific apparatus and collections. Notwithstanding he contrived to conclude his experiments, and to present to the academy his second memoir upon photography on glass, in the same year. Besides his first great discovery, he has made researches upon producing photographic images in colours, and photographically engraved steel plates. In 1855 he published a collection of his scattered memoirs, with the title "Photographic Researches," and another entitled "Treatise upon Engraving upon Steel and Glass." In 1850 Napoleon III. appointed him commandant of the Louvre, for the purpose of enabling him to prosecute more perfectly his photographic researches.

Born in France, 1805; died 1870.

NIEPOLOMICE, neep'-ol-o-meese, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia, on the Vistula. There is a castle, once a residence of the kings of Poland, now partly used as a hospital. Pop. 3,200.

NIEPPERG, ADAM ALBERT, Count von, nee'-pairg, a general and chamberlain of the Austrian empire. In 1812 he acted as minister-plenipotentiary at Stockholm; upon which occasion he succeeded in inducing Bernadotte to take part in the coalition against Napoleon. In 1814 he signed, at Naples, with Murat, a treaty of alliance with Austria. When the empress Maria Louisa quitted France, Count von Niepperg became her confidential adviser, and defended her interests at the congress of Vienna. He next contributed towards the overthrow of Murat, and passed some time in France as commandant of the department of Gard. He subsequently repaired to Parma, where he was secretly married to Maria Louisa. His administration of his wife's duchy was characterised by ability and energy; several important reforms, both political and military, likewise emanated from him.

Born at Salzburg, 1771; died at Parma, 1828.

NIESHIN, nee'-shin, a town of European Russia, government of Tchernigov, on the Ostri, 35 miles S.E. of Tchernigov. There are a cathedral, 21 other churches, a monastery, and several large educational establishments. The chief trade is in tobacco grown in the vicinity. Pop. 21,000, many being Greeks.

NIEUPORT, nu'-por, a fortified town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, on the Iser, near its mouth, in the North Sea. It is a well-built, busy place. Manf. Gunpowder, tobacco, soap, and rope; and there are shipbuilding-docks. Pop. 3,000.—This place has often been besieged and taken and retaken by the French and English.

NIEUWER AMSTEL, nu'-ver-am'-stel, a town of the Netherlands, province of North Holland, 5 miles S.W. of Amsterdam. Pop. 7,300.

NIEUWVELD MOUNTAINS. (See AFRICA and CAPE COLONY.)

NIÈVRE, ne'-aivr, a department in the central part of France, comprehending the most part of the province formerly called Nivernais, and bounded by the departments of Yonne, Côtes d'Or, Saône-et-Loire, Allier, and Cher. There are mountains near the eastern border, a branch extending over the department from the south-east to the north-west, forming a diagonal ridge. More than a third of the surface is covered with forests, the timber being of considerable value. The soil is generally sandy, but there are some elevated fertile tracts, and good pasturage in the valleys. On some of the hills are vineyards.

Rivers.—The chief are the Allier, Loire (with a small affluent, the Nièvre, which gives name to the department), and Yonne, all navigable, and the latter, which is an affluent of the Seine, is connected by canal with the Loire.

Minerals.—Iron (abundant), lead, copper, and some silver; coal, marble, and granite.

Area.—2,628 square miles.

Pop.—317,576.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 313 communes. The chief towns are NEVERS, the capital, CHÂTEAU-CHINON, CLAMECY, and COSNE.

NIGDEH, or NIDECH, nig'-de, a town of the Turkish empire, in Asia Minor, pashalic of Karamania, 70 miles S.W. of Kaisariah. It has a Turkish college, and several mosques, is the residence of a pasha, and has three fortresses. Pop. about 5,300.

NIGER, CAIUS PISCENNIUS, ni'-jer, a celebrated Roman general, who, when the empire was sold to Didius Julianus by the prætorian guards, in 193, refused to acknowledge the new emperor. Niger commanded in Syria, and was chosen emperor by all the provinces of the East; but Septimius Severus, who was at the head of the Roman legions in Pannonia, set up a rival claim, and, marching upon Rome, dethroned Didius. Severus next sent troops against Niger, whose army was defeated; and, in a second encounter, Niger was vanquished, and abandoned by his followers. He attempted to effect his escape; but was overtaken and slain.

Died 194.

NIGER, ni'-jer, a great river of Western Africa, rising in the Kong Mountains, in lat. 9° 25′ N., lon. 9° 45′ W., at an elevation of 1,600 feet above the sea. The course is at first north-easterly, and for the first 70 miles it is known as the Timbri, afterwards as the Joliba. At a distance of 350 miles from its source it reaches Sego, lat. 12° 30′, and then flows through a fertile country, dividing into two branches, the western being the Joliba, Mayo, or White River, and the eastern the Bara-Iso, or Black River. The streams re-unite 220 miles lower down, the enclosed island, Jemballa, varying from 2 to 20 miles in width. Before reaching Timbuctoo, the river again divides, re-uniting just below that town. From this point it takes the name of the Quorra, or Kwara, and flows to the east for about 250 miles, when it takes a south-eastern direction, and enters the Gulf of Guinea by several mouths, the chief being the Bonny, Mari, and Nun, between the Bights of Benin and Biafra. The total length of the course is about 2,500 miles. Ancient geographers had some imperfect knowledge of this great river, but the first accurate information respecting it was obtained by Mungo Park. (See PARK, Mungo.) The French traveller Caillié, the brothers Lander, and, later, Dr. Barth, have traced the course of various parts of the river. (See AFRICA.)

NIGHTINGALE, FLORENCE, nite'-in-gail, an English philanthropic lady, is the daughter of a Derbyshire gentleman, and received her education under her parents' direction. Early in life, her serious and earnest mind turned towards missions of charity with a natural instinct. After examining the schools and hospitals in the neighbourhood of her father's estate, at Lea Hurst, and, at a later period, extending her observations by visiting the schools, workhouses, and hospitals of the metropolis and the large provincial towns and Paris, in 1849 she entered the hospital of Kaiserswerth, on the Rhine, as voluntary nurse, and, after visiting similar establishments in other parts of Germany, she returned to London, and founded the Sanatorium for English invalid ladies, in Upper Harley-street. The sickness and distress of the British army in the Crimea induced Mr. Sidney Herbert, then minister of war, to request Miss Nightingale to go thither as superintendent of a staff of voluntary nurses. With a noble devotedness, she immediately complied, her estimable example being followed by forty-two other nurses, many of whom were ladies of rank and fortune. From November, 1854, until the re-embarkation of the army in 1856, did Miss Nightingale minister to the wounded and the sick at Scutari, on the Bosphorus, and in the Crimea, her zeal never abating except on one occasion, when she was herself laid upon a sick bed by an attack of hospital fever. Upon her return to England, in the latter year, the whole English nation, from the queen to the peasant, acknowledged her devoted assiduity, and a sum of money was raised, to be appropriated under her direction to the training of nurses. She has written several excellent works, among them "Notes on Nursing," and "Notes on Lying-in Institutions." An article, "Notes of Interrogation," published in Fraser's Magazine, dealing with problems of the religious life, attracted considerable attention. For several years past Miss Nightingale has been a confirmed invalid, but though physically prostrated, her mental activity and desire to forward the work to which she has devoted her life are unabated. She is the heroine of Longfellow's beautiful poem "Santa Filomena."

Born at Florence, 1823.

NIGRITIA, or SOUDAN, ni-grish'-e-a, a general name given to a vast undefined region of Central Africa, having on its N. the desert of Sahara, on its E. Kordofan, on its W. Senegambia. (See AFRICA.)

NIJKERK, neij'-kerk, a town of the Netherlands, province of Guelderland, 24 miles N.W. of Arnheim. There is a good harbour connected with the Zuyder Zee. A large trade is carried on. Pop. 7,700.

NIJMEGEN. (See NIMEGUEN.)

NIIGATA, ni'-i-ga-ta, a town and port on the west coast of the island of Niphon, Japan, at the mouth of the Shinanogawa. It was formerly a place of considerable trade, but a bar has formed at the mouth of the river impeding navigation. Pop. 60,000.

NIJNI-NOVGOROD, or NISHEGOROD, nish'-ne-nov-ge-rod', a province or government of European Russia, situate in the centre of the empire, to the E. of that of Vladimir. It is generally level, with extensive forests, and the soil is not generally fertile. The capital is NIJNI-NOVGOROD.

Rivers.—The Volga and its affluent the Oka, which flows through the centre of the province.
Manf.—Coarse linen, leather, and canvas; and there are distilleries, iron and soap-works.
Area.—19,390 square miles.
Pop.—1,427,893.

NIJNI-NOVGOROD, capital of the government of the same name, and one of the greatest commercial and manufacturing towns of Russia, at the confluence of the Oka with the Volga, 715 miles S.E. of St. Petersburg. The fortified part of the town, on an elevated site overlooking the Volga, contains the citadel, two cathedrals, and two palaces. The commercial town, between the two rivers, contains a Russian cathedral, an Armenian church, a mosque, several public offices, and about 2,500 trading establishments. Divided from the commercial town by a canal is a large area, on which is a town of wooden edifices, including several thousand shops, taverns, and other buildings used in the great annual fair, which is held every year, and resorted to by traders from Europe and almost every part of Asia. The chief articles of traffic are Russian raw and manufactured goods, European and colonial goods, and Asiatic goods, the latter including tea from China, and silks and cottons from Central Asia. The fair, opened in July, lasts for more than a month, and the annual value of articles disposed of is about £17,000,000. The town is connected by railway with St. Petersburg. Pop. 60,349, and during the fair more than 200,000 visitors arrive.—The town was founded in 1221 as a stronghold against the invasions of the Bulgarians. Lat. 56° 20′ N. Lon. 44° 1′ E.

NIJNI-TAGILSK, nish'-ne-ta-gilsk', a mining town of Russia, government of Perm, in the Ural mountains, 150 miles E. of Perm, on the river Tagil, in the centre of a mineral district of extraordinary richness, iron and copper abounding, and gold and platina being found. The magnetic mountain Blagodat, 1,422 feet high, is near the town. Pop. 30,000.

NIKOLAIEV, or NIKOLAEF, nik'-o-lair, a town of European Russia, government of Kherson, at the confluence of the Ingul and the Bug, 25 miles from the mouth of the latter river in the Black Sea, 40 miles N.W. of Kherson. It was founded in 1790, and is one of the stations of the Russian navy. It has a cathedral, town-hall, admiralty-house, with museums, a library, an observatory, and several schools. Pop. 66,335.

NIKOLAEVSK, nik-o-la-evsk', chief town of the Amoor territory, Eastern Siberia, Asiatic Russia, on the left bank of the Amoor, 22 miles from its mouth. It is an important commercial centre, and the seat of civil and naval administration. Pop. 5,400. Lat. 53° 15′ N. Lon. 140° 35′ E.

NIKOLAI, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, 51 miles S.E. of Oppeln. There is a trade in cattle. Pop. 4,700.

NIKOLAIEVSK, a town of Russia, on the Great Irgis, 100 miles S.E. of Samara. Pop. 6,400.

NIKOLSBURG, nik'-ols-beorg, a town of the Austrian empire, in the province of Moravia, 27 miles S. of Brunn. It has a magnificent castle, belonging to the princely family of Dietrichstein, with a public library, gymnasium, a high school, college, and philosophical institute. Manf. Woollens, cotton, and silk. Rich red wine is produced on the Pollaver Hills in the vicinity. Pop. 7,200, more than half being Jews.

NIKON, ni'-kon, patriarch of Russia, was the son of a peasant, but by his religious zeal and learning obtained the favour of the czar Alexis Michaelowitch. Nikon introduced into the Russian church the method of chanting, and called a council for restoring the sacred text according to the ancient versions. A new edition of the Bible was accordingly published at Moscow, under the direction of the patriarch. He composed a chronicle of Russian affairs to the year 1630. Through the intrigues of his enemies he was afterwards banished.

Born near Nijni-Novgorod, 1695; died at Jaroslav, 1681.

NIKOPOL, nik-o'-pol, a town of European Russia, government of Ekaterinoslav, on the right bank of the Dnieper, in the centre of a rich agricultural district, the produce of which is shipped to Odessa. Pop. 9,000.

NILE, nile, a great river of north-eastern Africa, the most historically famous and geographically remarkable river in the world. The main stream, the "river of Egypt," is formed by the union of two great branches, the Bahr-el-Azrek, or Blue Nile, and the Bahr-el-Abiad, or White Nile, at Khartoum, in Nubia, 1,188 feet above the sea level, lat. 15° 35′ N., lon. 32° 30′ E., and about 60 miles farther north, at El Damer (lat. 17° 45′ N., lon. 34° E.,) receives on the right bank the Bahr-el-Aswad, or Atbara, known also as the Black River. From this point the river flows, in a northerly direction for more than 1,500 miles, without a single affluent, to the Mediterranean, into which it discharges through numerous channels, the most important being those of Rosetta and Damietta. The district through which these channels flow, the most fertile part of Lower Egypt (see EGYPT) is known as the Delta, from the triangular shape (see DELTA), the base line on the Mediterranean being about 150 miles in length. Below the junction at Khartoum of the White and Blue Nile, about midway between that point and the junction with the Atbara, is the first cataract; in lat. 19° N. the river makes a curve to the south-west, two cataracts being in this part of the river, and having resumed its northward course, and entered Nubia, there are two other cataracts, a sixth being at Assowan, lat. 24° 10′. From this point to the sea, the fall of the river is not more than two inches in a mile, and the average velocity about three miles an hour. The annual overflow of the Nile is one of the remarkable phenomena of physical geography. In Egypt the waters begin to rise about the 25th of June, and for three months the increase is regular. For about twelve days the overflow is maintained at a constant level, and then the waters begin to subside. At Thebes the rise in the level of the river is about 36 feet, decreasing, as a wider range of low lying country is overflowed, to about four feet at the mouths of the great channels of the Delta. To this periodical inundation, which has never ceased to occur almost within a few hours of the same time from the remotest periods of which history is cognizant, is due the fertility of Egypt, rich deposits of alluvial matter being brought down, compensating for the absence of rain in the country

If north winds prevail, the rise of the waters is less, and a dearth is the result. The enormous regular increase of the volume of the river is due to the periodical rains which swell the mountain torrents of Abyssinia, affluents of the Blue Nile and the Atbara, and to the heavy rains in the equatorial regions, which greatly increase the volume of water of the great lakes, now known to be the chief of the head waters of the White Nile. The discovery of the ultimate sources of the Nile was for centuries the greatest problem of physical geography, and it was not until the latter part of the last century that the origin of the great eastern branch, the Blue Nile, was made known, chiefly by the labours of Bruce, the Abyssinian explorer. (See BRUCE.) It rises in Abyssinia, 50 miles S.W. of Lake Dembea, which it traverses, and thence follows a south-easterly, and, after making a rapid bend, a north-westerly direction for about 240 miles, when it receives the Blue River from the south, and from the east the Dender and the Rahad, and flows north-west to Khartoum. It is only recently that any authentic information as to the origin of the greater and previously mysterious stream, flowing with such a volume of water from the unknown south, has been gained. For a long period geographers believed in the existence of a lofty range of mountains, which they named the Mountains of the Moon, running from east to west, in the equatorial region, and they were so marked in most maps of Africa, and it was supposed the head streams of the Nile were hidden among the lofty peaks of this great chain. It is now known that these mountains of the moon have no existence, and that other sources of the Nile must be looked for. Old Portuguese explorers had brought home vague accounts of great lakes in the heart of Africa, and the statements gathered from natives also indicated the probability of the existence of such vast areas of water. The explorations of Burton and Speke in 1857 and 1858, of Speke and Grant in 1861, of Sir Samuel Baker in 1864, of Livingstone, Stanley, and others, have resulted in the discovery of the magnificent lake system of equatorial Africa, and, although there may be some remote contributory streams and lakes yet to be traced, it may be considered as an established fact that the great lakes, Victoria Nyanza and Albert Nyanza, are the main sources of the White Nile. (See AFRICA and VICTORIA NYANZA.) The river issues from the north side of Lake Victoria Nyanza, at a point named Ripon Falls, and at a level of 3,800 feet above the sea, and flows north-west and west with great rapidity, expanding into a small lake, Ibrahim Pacha, and again contracting before it reaches the Karuma Falls. Farther on are the Murchison Falls, 120 feet in height, and then a series of rapids, beyond which the river (to which has been given the name of the Victoria Nile, or the Somerset River) reaches the Albert Nyanza (230 miles from the Victoria Nyanza), about 30 miles from its northern extremity, whence it issues, flowing, with rapids and cataracts, to Gondoroko (Ismaila). The course is then winding for about 500 miles, and then, in lat. 9° 15′ N., lon. 30° E., it receives on the left bank the Bahr-el-Gazal. Beyond this, the course is first to the east and then to the south, and two large tributaries are received, the Giraffe River and the Sobat, both in the east. From the junction of the latter river, a broad navigable stream, the course of the Nile is nearly due north to Kartoum, with an average width of about a mile-and-a-half, and receiving several small streams from the east. The total length of the Nile from Lake Victoria Nyanza to the sea is nearly 3,300 miles; from its junction with the Atbara, beyond which it receives no affluent, 1,500 miles.

NILES, a town of Michigan, United States, on the right bank of the St. Joseph, 165 miles S.W. of Detroit. Manf. Machinery and paper. Pop. 4,800.

NILEUS, ni'-le-us, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Lebedos, &c.

NILSSON, SVEN, nils'-son, a modern Swedish naturalist, who was educated for the medical profession, and was, in 1832, appointed professor of natural history in the university of Lund. He has published several valuable works on the subject of Scandinavian zoology, and upon the origin and history of the Scandinavian races. Some small but important treatises have likewise emanated from him upon geology and palæontology. Born 1787.

NILUS, ni'-lus, in Egyptian mythology, a king of Thebes, who gave his name to the river Nile.

NIMBERA, nim-be-ra', a town in India, in Rajpootana, inclosed by walls and towers, and having a mosque and several temples. It is the chief place of a pergunnah. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 24° 36′ N. Lon. 74° 43′ E.—The DISTRICT has an area of 172 square miles, and is farmed and governed by the British.

NIMEGUEN, or NIJMEGEN, ne'-me-gen, an old town of the Netherlands, province of Guelderland, on the Betuwe, 9 miles S. of Arnheim. It is strongly fortified by an old castle said to have been built by the Romans, and an adjoining palace, the residence of Charlemagne, was demolished by the French in 1797, and the site is now a pleasant promenade, planted with trees, and overlooking the river. Though not ill built, it has an irregular appearance, the streets being narrow, and, on account of the abrupt elevation from the river, the windows of one range of houses overlooking the chimneys of another. The most interesting public buildings are, St. Stephen's church, a large Gothic edifice; the town-hall, built in the 16th century, ornamented with historical statues; a small chapel, or baptistery, supposed to have been a heathen temple; and a tower, the Belvedere, on an eminence, commanding an extensive view, on the site where once stood a chateau of the Duke of Alva. Manf. Linen, cotton, silk, and eau-de-cologne. Beer is largely brewed. Pop. 28,793, three-fourths being Roman Catholics.—This town was the Noviomagum of the Romans, and is famous in modern history as the place of meeting of the great peace congress of the European powers, in 1678 and 1679.

NIMES, or NISMES, neems, a town of France, department Gard, 30 miles S.E. of Montpellier. It is beautifully situated in a fertile valley, surrounded by vineyards. The old part of the town is irregular and ill-built, but there are three handsome suburbs. On the Boulevard de l'Esplanade is a hall of justice, in the Grecian style of architecture, and adorned with beautiful Tuscan columns. On another boulevard, is a handsome hospital, and a theatre on an extensive scale, an open square, the Grande Place, has a magnificent fountain. Nimes being an ancient city (Nemausus), comprises considerable Roman remains. The Maison Carrée is a fine old edifice, in the Corinthian style, with six columns in front and ten on each side. It was built in the age of Augustus, and now contains a museum. There are also the remains of Roman baths, statues, and other antiquities; a building, commonly called the Temple of Diana; a large ancient tower, the Tower Magne, above 200 feet in height, the noble aqueduct, known as the Pont du Gard, and lastly, the walls of the amphitheatre, an edifice almost as large as the Coliseum of Rome, and in a better state of preservation. There are various literary and scientific institutions, a bishop's palace, national college, seminary, normal school, and library. Manf. Silk stuffs (employing about 16,000 looms), stockings, ribbons, linen, and leather. The town is the centre of the silk trade of the south of France, and has dyeing and printing works, and an extensive trade in raw and wrought silk, corn, dried fruits, olive-oil, and wine. Pop. 63,500.

NIMROD, nim'-rod, grandson of Ham, who is supposed by some to have been the founder of Babylon, where he reigned while Asshur ruled in Assyria. He is also supposed to be the first king, and the first conqueror. In the Scriptures he is called "a mighty hunter before the Lord."

NINEVEH, nin'-e-vē, a famous city of antiquity, for nearly 2,000 years the chief city of the empire of Assyria, on the left bank of the Tigris, on a site opposite the present Turkish town of Mosul, in the pashalic of the same name. The earliest historical record respecting it is the book of Genesis, but the recent discoveries by Botta, Layard, and George Smith have afforded means for estimating its greatness and magnificence. It was founded about 2347 B.C., but attained its greatest magnificence under Sennacherib, so frequently mentioned in Scripture, and Assur-bani-pal, the Sardanaples of the Greek historians and the modern poets. These kings built splendid and extensive palaces, the remains of which, adorned with massive sculptures, and ornaments of precious metals, have been discovered. The city is said to have been enclosed by walls 100 feet high, wide enough at the top for three chariots to run abreast, and with 1,500 towers, each 200 feet high. The space enclosed was 60 miles in circumference, but no doubt that area included the adjacent Kouyunjik, built by Sargon, the father of Sennacherib. The vast collection of sculptures, painted tablets, and other interesting results of explorations, brought to England and France, attest the size and splendour of the edifice and the progress made in the arts. Assur-bani-pal collected the grandest library then in existence, the books being stamped on clay. Dynastic tables, historical fragments of great interest, legal records, notices of commercial transactions, astronomical calculations, grammars and dictionaries, were among the contents, many fragments of which have been recovered. The Assyrians possessed considerable knowledge of astronomy, numbered and named the principal planets and fixed stars, observed eclipses and comets, and the conjunctions of the planets, and one of the principal observatories was at Nineveh. They also knew the use of the sun-dial, and were acquainted with the chief mechanical adaptations of force. Metals were worked, gold rings and ornaments made, gem-cutting attained considerable perfection, and glass was manufactured, especially coloured glass, similar to Venetian glass. Traces of all these arts have been discovered in the mounds beneath which ancient Nineveh is hidden. A large overland trade was carried on, and it has been said that "commercial relations extended from India on one side to the tin mines of Cornwall on the other." After the death of Assur-bani-pal, the prosperity of the city waned, and a few years afterwards, (about 625 B.C.), it was taken and entirely destroyed by the Babylonians and Medes.

NINGPO, ning-po', a great seaport of China, in the province of Che-keang. It stands at the confluence of two small streams 12 miles from the sea, is inclosed by dilapidated walls, and is 5 miles in circumference. A moat nearly surrounds the city, which is traversed by many canals, which expand into sheets of water, one of which is an island, accessible by bridges, and containing temples. One of the rivers is crossed by a bridge of boats. Some of the largest and most beautiful temples in China are here, and in the centre of the city is an ancient and dilapidated pagoda of seven stories, and 160 feet high, with a spiral staircase. The streets are wide, the shops handsome and well supplied with costly goods, and the city generally is well paved. On the banks of the river are large ice houses, where fish are cured. There is a large coasting trade. Pop. 240,000.

NINIAN, ST., nin'-i-an, a Briton of noble birth, who preached Christianity to the Picts of Scotland. He was educated at Rome, where he was ordained as a bishop. His see was at Candé da Casa, now Whithorn, in Wigtonshire.
Died 432.

NINON DE L'ENCLOS. (See L'ENCLOS, NINON.)

NIO, anciently Ios, ne-o', a small island of European Turkey, in the Grecian archipelago, 16 miles from Naxos. Ext. 11 miles long, with a breadth of 5. Pro. Cotton, oil, wine, and honey. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 36° 46' N. Lon. 5° 24' E.

NIOBE, ni'-o-be, in Greek mythology, a daughter of Tantalus, king of Lydia, and wife of Amphion, by whom she had, according to some writers, seven sons and seven daughters. This number increased her pride, and she had the imprudence not only to prefer herself to Latonia, who had only two children, but even to ridicule the worship paid to her; observing that she had a better claim to sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This insolence provoked Latonia. She entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters, except Chloris, were equally destroyed by Diana; and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The bodies of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied for nine days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honoured with a funeral by the gods.

NIORT, nyor, a town of France, capital of the department Deux-Sèvres, on the Sèvre-Niortaise, occupying a valley on the slopes of two hills, 35 miles E. of La Rochelle. It has a castle, flanked with four round towers, a town-house (formerly the residence of Eleonora of Aquitaine, queen of Henry II. of England); the church of Notre Dame, a very beautiful fountain, college, library, and fine promenades. Manf. Woollen stuffs, gloves, chamois leather, and confectionery. Pop. 22,254.

NIPHON, ni'-fon, the principal island of Japan, forming by much the largest part of the empire. (See JAPAN.) It is separated from the island of YESSO by the Strait of Sangar; and by the inland sea of Suonada from the island of Kiushiu, and is bounded N. by the Sea of Japan and S. and E. by the Pacific Ocean. The general shape of the island is long and curved; about 900 miles in extreme length, and 240 miles wide in the widest part. The coast is indented with many bays, and is very difficult of access. A ridge of mountains, mostly volcanic, passes lengthways through the centre of the island, the principal peak being Fuso, 12,000 feet high. There are several large lakes, and many hot sulphureous springs. The tea plant is extensively cultivated, and fine crops of grain are raised. Sugar and rice are also cultivated. The variations in temperature are excessive, and terrific storms and earthquakes are frequent.

Area.—420,000 square miles.
Pop.—Probably 30,000,000.
Chief Towns.—YEDO, MIACO, and OSACA. The principal ports are HIOGO, KANAGAWA, and YOKOHAMA.
Lat. 33° 30′—41° 30′ N. Lon. 130° 50′—142° 20′ E.

NIPISSING, nip'-is-sing, a lake containing many islands, in Ontario province, dominion of Canada, British N. America. It lies nearly midway between Lake Huron and the Ottawa river. It is 50 miles long, with a breadth of 25 at its widest part.

NIRGUA, neer'-gwa, a town of the Caracas, in the province of Venezuela, S. America, 50 miles from Valencia. The city is unhealthy, and manifests every symptom of decline. Pop. 3,200. Lat. 10° N. Lon. 68° 45′ W.

NISCEMI, nis-chai'-me, a town of Sicily, province of Caltanisetta, on the right bank of the Terranova. Pop. 12,019. This town suffered greatly from an earthquake in 1790.

NISHAPOOR, NISHAPUR, or NÜSHAPUR, nish-a-poor', an ancient city of Persia, once the greatest and richest in the province of Korassan, 53 miles S.W. of Meshid. The ruins of the old town are said to cover a circuit of 25 miles. The new town is surrounded by a rampart and a trench. There is a trade in turquoises, which are obtained in the vicinity. Pop. 8,000.

NISIBIS, nis'-i-bis, capital of the ancient Mygdonia, in Mesopotamia. It is a place of considerable importance, and in the 2nd and 3rd centuries a great stronghold of the Romans against the Persians. Nothing is left of the ancient city but extensive ruins, near a little Turkish village of the same name, in the eyalet of Diarbekr.

NISMES. (See NIMES.)

NISSA, or NISCH, nis'-sa, a well-fortified town of the Turkish empire in Roumelia, on the left bank of the Nissava, 130 miles S.E. of Belgrade (of which it was once the capital). Pop. 4,000.

NITHEROHI. (See PRAIA GRANDE.)

NITOCRIS; ni-to'-kris, a celebrated queen of Babylon, who built a bridge across the Euphrates, in the middle of the city, and dug a number of reservoirs for the superfluous water of the river.
Lived early in the 7th century B.C.

NITZSCH, KARL IMMANUEL, neetsh, theological writer of Germany, studied for the Church at Wittemberg, where he became parish minister in 1813. He adopted liberal theological views, similar to those held by Neander, and in 1822 he was appointed professor of theology and university preacher at Bonn, and in 1847 removed to Berlin, where he held a similar appointment. He wrote several very important works, remarkable for earnestness and richness of thought, beside smaller lectures on theological subjects.
Born at Borna, 1787; died 1868.

NIVELLE, or NIVONNE, ne-vail'-yai, a river rising in Spain, in the Pyrenees, and, after a short course, falling into the Bay of Biscay at St. Jean de Luz.

NIVELLES, or NYVEL, ne-vel', a town of Belgium, province of Brabant, on the Thienne, 18 miles S. of Brussels. The church of St. Gertrude is a fine building in the Romanesque style, erected in the 12th century, and on the high altar are the relics of St. Gertrude, daughter of Pepin. Manf. Linen, cotton, and lace. Pop. 9,500.

NIVERNAIS, ne'-vair-nai, an old province of France, now comprehended in the department of Nièvre and part of Cher.

NIXDORF, nix-dorf', a town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, near the frontiers of Saxony. There is a chalybeate spring, with a bathing establishment. Manf. Cutlery, hardware, linen, and hosiery. Pop. 5,800.

NIZAM'S DOMINIONS, or HYDERABAD, an extensive territory of India, one of the protected native states, occupying a slightly elevated table-land in the centre of the Deccan, bounded W. by the presidency of Bombay, and S. and S.E. by the province of Madras. The soil is fertile but poorly cultivated, and there is good pasturage, but extensive districts are occupied with marshes and jungle. Rice, wheat, maize, sugar, cotton, indigo, and fruits, are among the chief products. The climate, except in the marshy districts, is healthy.

Rivers. — The Godavery, with its tributaries the Dudhna, Manjera, and Pranhita; and the Kistna, or Krishna, with its tributaries the Bimah and Tungabhadro.
Minerals.—Iron, coal, garnets, and diamonds.
Area.—95,000 square miles.
Pop. — 10,000,000, mostly Hindoos, although the Nizam and principal officials are Mahometans.
Chief Towns.—HYDERABAD (the capital), AURUNGABAD, BEEDER, KURNOOL, GALCONDA, and SECUNDERABAD.
History. — This was formerly a province of the Mogul empire, but in 1719 the governor, known as the viceroy of the Deccan, made himself independent, assuming the title of Nizam-ul-Mulk, equivalent to governor. Possession of the state was after his death disputed by his son and nephew, the former supported by the East India Company, and the latter by the French, but in 1761 Nizam Ali obtained undivided power, and seven years afterwards signed a treaty of alliance with the English.

NIZZA. (See NICE.)

NOAH, no'-a, the patriarch, son of Lamech. His history is contained in the book of Genesis. He lived for 350 years after the flood, dying at the age of 950 years.

NOAILLES, ADRIEN MAURICE, Duke of, no'-ail, a celebrated French general, came of a noble family, and evinced, early in life, eminent talents for the military profession. He served with his father in Catalonia, and afterwards under Vendôme, both in Spain and Flanders. In 1708 he commanded in Roussillon, and gained several advantages over the enemy. In 1710 he made himself master of Gironne, one of the most important places in Catalonia, for which Philip V. created him a grandee of Spain, and Louis XIV. made him a duke and peer of France. In the succeeding reign he was appointed president of the council of finances; but when Dubois obtained the ascendancy in the ministry, Noailles was exiled. On the death of that minister he was recalled, and restored to his posts. In the war of 1733 he commanded at the siege of Philipsburg, and obliged the Germans to abandon Worms. He afterwards served with great reputation in Italy.
Born 1678; died 1766.

NOAILLES, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, Cardinal, uncle of the preceding. He devoted himself to the ecclesiastical state, and, in 1676, was nominated bishop of Cahors; whence he was removed to Châlons, and, lastly, to the see of Paris, in 1695. He made excellent rules for the conduct of his clergy, but his peace was disturbed by the Jesuits, in consequence of the approbation which he gave to Quesnel's "Reflections on the New Testament." In 1700 he was honoured with the dignity of cardinal. He subsequently lost the favour of Louis XIV. through the influence of Father Tellier, the Jesuit. Pope Clement XI. was also set against the archbishop, and issued his famous bull of Unigenitus on occasion of Quesnel's book, which the latter had sanctioned. The cardinal was exiled: but, after the death of Louis, Tellier was banished in his turn, and the archbishop recalled.

Born 1651; died 1729.

NOBLE, no'-bel, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 430 square miles. Pop. 22,000. The capital is Albion.

NOBLE, a county of Ohio, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 20,000. The capital is Sarahsville.

NOBLES, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 4,435.

NOBUNGA, no-bun'-ga, Japanese warrior and legislator, who headed a popular movement and brought to an end the third line of hereditary military usurpers who had seized the prerogatives and authority of the Mikado. He was the enemy of the Buddhist priesthood, and favoured the Jesuit missionaries. The priests were very wealthy and powerful, but Nobunga attacked the fortified monasteries, burned the temples, and killed hundreds of the priests and their families. Since then Buddhism has never recovered its influence. He was desirous of cultivating the friendship of the western powers, and sent Japanese embassies to the emperor Philip II. and Pope Gregory XIII. He was at the height of his power and fame when one of his captains headed a conspiracy, and attacked the temple in which he was residing, and, Nobunga being wounded, set it on fire, and perished in the flames.

Died 1582.

NOCERA DEI PAGANI, no-chai'-ra, a town of Italy, province of Salerno, on the Sarno, 8 miles N.W. of Salerno. It is a place of some antiquity, and contains a number of churches and convents. Manf. Linen and woollen. Pop. 16,000.

NOCETO, no'-chai'-to, a town of Italy, province of Parma, on the right bank of the Recchio, 6 miles W. of Parma. There are a large church and a dilapidated castle. An active trade is carried on in wine and agricultural productions. Pop. 5,800.

NOCI, no'-che, a town of Italy, province of Bari, 28 miles S.E. of the town of Bari, with a trade in silk, wine, and oil. Pop. 9,943.

NODAWAY, nod'-a-wai, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 710 square miles. Pop. 29,544. The capital is Maryville.

NODIER, CHARLES, no'-de-ai, French author, who was the son of the mayor of Besançon, and under whose care he received a careful and complete education, and instruction in Republican principles, being enrolled as a member of the Amis de la Constitution when only 12 years of age; but he afterwards became a Royalist and then again a Republican. He early displayed a love for natural history, and, at the age of 18, published a treatise on Entomology. In 1800 he went to Paris, where he quickly became celebrated by his fine romances, and poems; but incurred the displeasure of the first consul, in consequence of producing a satirical poem entitled "Napoléone," in which he defended liberty. For this he was sent back to his native place, and there kept under police inspection. In this condition of forced exclusion from society, he occupied himself with the composition of his "Critical Examination of the Dictionaries of the French Language;" in which work he displayed the utmost acuteness and learning. He next commenced a series of journies over France, in order to escape the watchful annoyances of the police. In 1824 he received the important appointment of librarian to the Arsenal, and, in 1833, he became a member of the French Academy. He exercised his talents upon the most diverse subjects; fiction, history, poetry, criticism, biography, philology. In all his works he wrote in the chastest style, and the plots and sentiments of his works of fiction were of a similar purity.

Born at Besançon, 1783; died at Paris, 1844.

NOEL, BAPTIST WRIOTHESLEY, REV., no'-el, an English divine, brother of the earl of Gainsborough. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and having entered the Church, was appointed one of the Queen's chaplains, and was one of the most popular preachers in London. In 1849 he seceded from the Church and became a Baptist minister. His work on the "Union of Church and State," which explained his reasons for seceding, made a great sensation. He was a man of exemplary piety, and possessed of a persuasive eloquence which greatly influenced his hearers.

Born 1799; died 1873.

NOGENT-LE-ROTROU, no'-zha ro-trou', a town of France, department Eure-et-Loir, 32 miles S.W. of Chartres. It has a ruined Gothic castle, inhabited once by Sully. Pop. 5,800.

NOIRMOUTIERS, nwaw-moo'-te-ai, an island of the Atlantic, on the coast of La Vendée, France, from which it is separated by a narrow channel. It is 12 miles long, with a breadth of 3. The capital is of the same name. Pop. 7,000.

NOLA, no'-la, a city of Italy, province of Caserta, 16 miles N.E. of Naples. It has numerous churches, convents, a college, barracks, and hospitals. Pop. 12,000.—Anciently, this was one of the largest cities of Magna Græcia, and was besieged by Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ. Both Augustus and M. Agrippa died in it. Numerous coins and beautiful specimens of pottery are found here.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH, nol'-le-kens, sculptor, son of a painter of Antwerp, who resided in this country. He studied under Scheemaker, and, having obtained three prizes from the Society of Arts, went to study at Rome at the age of 23. There he met Garrick and Sterne, and executed busts of both. His reputation increased, and after an interval of ten years he returned to London, and was fully employed, George III., Dr. Johnson, Fox, and Pitt, being among those who sat to him. In 1771 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and an Academician the year afterwards. He received commissions for many statues, public monuments, and allegorical and mythological groups. His manner was abrupt, and somewhat eccentric. He had no children, and being of penurious habits, accumulated a large fortune.

Born in London, 1737; died 1823.

NOLLET, JEAN ANTOINE, nol'-lai, a French divine and philosophical writer, who studied at Beauvais and Paris. In 1734 he visited London, and was chosen a member of the Royal Society. On his return to Paris, he commenced a course of lectures in experimental philosophy, to which he added illustrations of chemistry, anatomy, and natural history. In 1738 he was appointed professor of experimental philosophy at Paris, and, the year following, admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences. About the same time he went to Turin on an 'avi-tation from the king of Sardinia, who appointed him professor of philosophy in that university; but he was recalled in 1744, to give lessons to the dauphin of France. In 1753 he was nominated first professor of experimental philosophy in the college of Navarre: he was also appointed philosophical tutor to the royal family. His "Lectures in Experimental Philosophy" was the best work which had till then appeared. Besides these, he wrote some excellent works on electricity, the "Art of making Experiments," and several papers in the Memoirs of the Academy.

Born 1700; died 1770.

NOMBRE DE DIOS, nomé'-brai, a town of Mexico, 45 miles S.E. of Durango. It has rich silver mines. Pop. 7,000.

NONA, no'-na, a town of the Austrian empire, in Dalmatia, situated in a swamp at the mouth of the Ricina. It was once a place of importance, but has fallen into decay. Pop. 5,400.

NONNUS, non'-nus, a Greek poet, a native of Panoplis, Egypt, wrote an account of his embassy to Æthiopia and among the Saracens; also a work entitled "Dionysiaca;" a paraphrase in Greek verse, on the gospel of St. John; and a collection of histories or fables.

Born 410.

NONTRON, non-trawn(g), a town of France, department Dordogne, on the Bandiat, 25 miles N.W. of Perigueux. Manf. Cutlery and leather. Manganese and iron are mined in the vicinity, and there are large iron works in the neighbourhood. Pop. 3,600.

NOODT, GERARD, noot, a Dutch writer on jurisprudence, who was chosen professor of law in 1671. He afterwards accepted the professorship at Franeker, whence he removed to Utrecht; but, in 1686, he settled at Leyden, of which university he became rector. He published a collection of his works in 1713, which were almost wholly upon subjects of jurisprudence, and are esteemed of high authority.

Born at Nimeguen, 1647; died at Leyden, 1725.

NOOTKA SOUND, noot'-ka, an inlet of the North Pacific Ocean, on the west coast of Vancouver Island, British North America. It has a breadth of 10 miles, with deep water, and numerous islets. The entrance is protected by an island of the same name. Lat. 49° 35′ N. Lon. 126° 34′ W.

NORCIA, nor'-cha, a town of Italy, on the Freddara, 70 miles from Rome. Pop. 4,000.

NORD, nor, a department of the north of France, corresponding with the former province of French Flanders, bounded N. and N.E. by Belgium and the Straits of Dover. It is nearly divided into two portions, being very narrow in the centre. The soil is fertile and well cultivated, and the harvests are very abundant. It is one of the most important departments of France, thickly inhabited by an industrious and intelligent population, with many large towns and fortresses, and traversed by important railways, roads, and canals.

Rivers.—The Scheldt and Sambre, with the affluents.
Minerals.—Coal and iron in large quantities.
Area.—2,218 square miles.
Pop.—1,603,259.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 7 arrondissements and 661 communes. The chief towns are LILLE, the capital, AVESNES, CAMBRAI, DOUAI, DUNKERQUE, and HAZEBROUCK.

NORDBERG, GEORGE, nord'-bairy, chaplain to Charles XII. of Sweden, whom he accompanied in all his campaigns. Subsequently to the death of that monarch, he was appointed by Queen Ulrica Eleanora to write his history, which was completed, and published at Stockholm in 1740. Nordberg spent his last years as a pastor at Stockholm.

Born at Stockholm, 1677; died 1744.

NORDEN, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, 16 miles of Embden, connected by a canal with the German Ocean. There are an ancient church, a Roman Catholic chapel, synagogue, and several educational institutes. Manf. Linen, yarn, tobacco, chicory, and soap. A considerable shipping trade is carried on. Pop. 5,700.

NORDHAUSEN, nord'-hou-sen, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the Zorge, at the southern base of the Harz mountains, near the fertile valley known as the "golden plain," 38 miles N.W. of Erfurt. It contains seven Protestant churches, a Roman Catholic cathedral, an orphan-house, hospitals, and a theatre. Manf. Woollens, linens, tobacco, leather, brandy, and chemicals. Cattle are fattened, and a large general trade, especially in corn, is carried on. Pop. 26,198.

NORDKÖPING. (See NORRKÖPING.)

NORDLAND, nord'-land, an ampt, or division of Norway, forming the north-western portion of the Scandinavian peninsula. The coast is much indented by deep bays and fiords (or inlets of the sea, similar to the lochs and friths of Scotland), and skirted by numerous islands, including the Lofoden group. The surface is very mountainous. (See NORWAY.) The climate and soil limit agriculture, but some butter and cheese are exported. The fisheries are very productive. Area, 12,000 square miles. Pop. 104,151.

NORDLINGEN, nort'-ling-en, an ancient town of Bavaria, on the Eger, 44 miles N.W. of Augsburg. It has a beautiful church, in the Gothic style. Manf. Woollens, linens, carpets, gloves, and stockings. There is a large trade in feathers. Pop. 7,100.—The vicinity of Nordlingen has been the scene of repeated conflicts. In 1634 the Swedes were here defeated by the Austrians and Bavarians with immense loss, and in 1796, the Austrians were here defeated by the French.

NORDSTRAND, nord'-strand, an island of Prussia, separated by a narrow channel from the south-west coast of the duchy of Schleswig. Area, 13 square miles. It was formerly of very much greater extent, but in October, 1634, a tremendous flood submerged the greater part of the island, destroying 15,000 persons, 50,000 head of cattle, and 1,300 horses. Some small portions of the former island now form separate islets. The island, which is now enclosed by dykes, chiefly consists of rich marsh lands. Pop. 2,000.

NORFOLK, nor'-fok, an extensive maritime county of England, on the E. coast, bounded N. and N.E. by the German Ocean, S. and S.E. by Suffolk, and W. by Cambridgeshire, part of Lincoln, and the Wash. It is almost entirely insulated by the sea and the rivers which divide it internally from the adjacent counties. The coast line is about 100 miles in length, generally low, with, in many parts, dangerous sandbanks, extending far out to sea. Between the Yarmouth sandbanks and the shore are the well-known Yarmouth Roads. Near the Wash considerable tracts of land have been reclaimed from the sea; but on the eastern side, the sea has greatly encroached, submerging large tracts of land, and several villages. In many parts, the county presents a perfect flat; in other places, the surface is broken into gentle undulations; and a ridge of high ground stretches northwards from Thetford to the coast. Agriculture forms the chief business of the inhabitants: at least two-thirds of the whole county are arable, and kept in a state of tillage. The fattening of cattle is carried on to a considerable extent, and, in some of the marsh and fen lands, the dairy is much attended to; and large quantities of butter are made and exported, under the name of Cambridge butter. The raising of grain for exportation, however, forms by far the principal object with the farmer. Wheat, barley, oats, rye, peas, beans, &c., are more or less cultivated, with mustard, saffron, flax, and hemp. Poultry of all kinds are very plentiful, and of superior quality. Turkeys are numerous; and immense quantities are sent to the most distant parts of the kingdom. Large supplies of geese are also furnished from the fenny parts of this county. Rabbits and pheasants abound; whilst in the marshes and meres, woodcocks, snipes, widgeon, teal, &c., are very abundant. The mackerel and herring fisheries are also carried on to a great extent along the coast.

Rivers.—The principal are the Ouse, the Nen, the Waveney, the Wensom, and the Bure. Flowing through a flat country, their course is very sluggish, in many cases the fall being scarcely sufficient to carry off the water; and a land-flood usually lays the adjacent grounds under water. Hence are formed numerous small shallow lakes or pools, provincially termed "broads" and "meres," which are plentifully stocked with fish, and abound with aquatic fowls. The principal of these are Brodon Broad, to the south of Yarmouth; Hickling Broad, and Rockland.

Area.—2,119 square miles.

Pop.—444,825.

Chief Towns.—NORWICH, the capital; YARMOUTH, LYNN, THETFORD, DEREHAM, and WELLS.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county is divided into North, South, and West Norfolk, each returning 2 members; Norwich and Lynn return 2 each.

NORFOLK, a city and port of entry in Norfolk county, Virginia, United States, on Elizabeth River, 32 miles from the sea. It contains a courthouse, city-hall, 26 churches, custom-house, and military. There is a large harbour, defended by Forts Calhoun and Monroe. The latter is the largest fortress in the United States. In the suburb of Gosport are a government navy yard, dry dock and marine hospital. Pop. 21,960, about 9,000 being coloured.—The town was founded in 1705, incorporated as a borough in 1736, and as a city in 1845.

NORFOLK, a county of Massachusetts, United States. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 96,507. The capital is Dedham.

NORFOLK, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 58,057, nearly half being coloured. The capital is PORTSMOUTH.

NORFOLK, a county of the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, on the northern shore of Lake Erie. Area, 635 square miles. Pop. 34,009. The capital is Simcoe.

NORFOLK, an ancient and illustrious English house, descended from the royal family of Plantagenet, through Thomas Plantagenet, of Brotherton, earl of Norfolk, second son of Edward I., and earl-marshal of England. The heiress of the Norfolk family, Margaret, eldest daughter of Thomas de Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, having espoused at the commencement of the 15th century Robert Howard, the title of duke of Norfolk, passed to the latter, and was transmitted by him to his descendants. The living head of this family takes precedence as premier duke and earl-marshal of England, and follows immediately after the princes of the blood royal. (See HOWARD.)

NORFOLK, NEW, a district of Tasmania. Area, 1,500 square miles.

NORFOLK ISLAND, an island in the South Pacific Ocean, 5 miles long and about 2 broad, the largest of a small cluster of islands. The coast is high and steep, and the surface rises to 1,000 feet, the highest point being Mount Pitt. The soil is fertile, and well-watered, and the climate healthy. This island was colonised by Governor Phillip, shortly after that of Port Jackson, and was used for many years as a penal colony, the violent class of convicts being sent there. The penal establishment was broken up in 1855, and in the following year the inhabitants of Pitcairn's Island were transferred hither. (See PITCAIRN'S ISLAND.) Pop. 500. Lat. 29° 10′ S. Lon. 168° E.

NORHAM, nor'-ham, a township of England, on the Tweed, in the county of Northumberland. Pop. 4,300.

NORIC ALPS. (See ALPS.)

NORIS, HENRY, no'-ris, Italian cardinal, who was educated at Verona, by his father, a native of Ireland. He afterwards entered the monastic order of St. Augustine, and acquired great reputation for learning and piety. In 1673 he published the "History of Pelagianism," which gave offence to several persons, who accused him to the pope as being heretically inclined; but Clement X. so little regarded the charge, that he made Noris under-librarian of the Vatican. In 1695 he was honoured with the purple.

Born at Verona, 1631; died at Rome, 1705

NORMANBY, a maritime county of Victoria, South Australia. Area, 3,125 square miles. Pop. 11,624.

NORMANDY, nor'-man-de, the name of an old province of France, one of the most extensive and fertile in the kingdom, formerly divided into Upper and Lower Normandy, and now into the five following departments:—Seine-Inférieure, Eure, Orne, Calvados, and Manche. The district formed a part of Neustria, under the Frankfort monarchy, was taken possession of by the Normans (or Northmen) in the 9th century, and was united to England after the conquest of the country by William of Normandy. The English monarchs retained it till the beginning of the 13th century, when it was united to France. After the battle of Agincourt, in 1415, it was again taken by the English, who retained it till 1449.

NORNÆ, nor'-ne, in Scandinavian mythology, the "Fates," representing the past, present, and future, determining the destinies both of gods and men.

NORRBOTTEN, nor'-bot-ten, the most northern province of Sweden, divided from Lapland by the Tornea and Muonio rivers. It is traversed by the Kiölen Mountains, and there are many lakes. Timber is the chief production. Area, 39,797 square miles. Pop. 95,340. The capital is Pitea.

NORRISTOWN, nor'-ris-ton, a borough of Pennsylvania, United States, on the north bank of the Schuylkill, 16 miles N.W. of Philadelphia. Two covered bridges lead to Bridport on the opposite bank. There are 13 churches, a courthouse, and several public schools. Manf. Iron, machinery, woollens, and cotton. Pop. 13,063.

NORRKÖPING, or NORDKOPING, nor'-ke(r)p-ing, a large manufacturing town of Sweden, in East Gottland, at the junction of the Motala, with the Gulf of Bravike. The former river flows through the town, and has several falls within the limits, forming two islands, reached by handsome bridges. It is handsomely built, with wide streets, and large open places, and there are numerous churches, and charitable institutions. Several bridges cross the Motala, which is a rapid stream, and supplies valuable water-power. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, tobacco, starch, and soap. At Finspäng, in the neighbourhood, are large iron-works, and cannon foundries. The port is a station of the salmon fishery. Pop. 28,114. Lat. 58° 30′ N. Lon. 16° 15′ E.

NORRSKA-FIELLEN. (See NORWAY.)

NORT, nor, a town of France, department Loire-Inférieure, on the right bank of the Erdre, 16 miles N.E. of Nantes. There is a small harbour, where wood, charcoal, iron, and coal are shipped. Manf. Leather. Pop. 5,400.

NORTE (PASO DEL), nort, a town of New Mexico, United States, on the right bank of the Rio Bravo-del-Norte, 275 miles S.E. of Santa-Fé, situated at the head of a valley, 3,800 feet above the sea level. The country around is very fertile, and there is a considerable trade in wool. This is the oldest settlement in New Mexico. Pop. of settlement, 5,000, chiefly Indians.

NORTH, FRANCIS, north, lord Guildford, keeper of the great seal in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., was the third son of Dudley, lord North, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, whence he removed to the Middle Temple. After being solicitor and attorney-general, he was made chief justice of the King's Bench, and in 1682 he was appointed lord keeper, with the title of lord Guildford. Of him, lord Campbell says: "He had as much law as he could contain; but he was incapable of taking an enlarged and commanding view of any subject." He wrote "An Index of Verbs Neuter," printed with Lilly's Grammar; "A Paper on the Gravitation of Fluids in the Bladders of Fishes," printed in the "Philosophical Transactions;" "A Philosophical Essay on Music;" several concertos, &c.

Born 1637; died 1685.

NORTH, SIR DUDLEY, brother of the preceding, who in his youth resided at Smyrna and Constantinople, and, after his return to England, published some interesting works upon the life, institutions, and languages of the East. He was subsequently knighted, became sheriff and alderman, and was appointed a commissioner of the Treasury towards the end of the reign of Charles II. At the Revolution he lost this post, and retired into private life.

Born 1641; died 1691.

NORTH, ROGER, an English biographer, who was the son of Dudley, lord North, and was educated for the profession of the law. He wrote a work against Kennet's "Complete History," in which he defended Charles II. He also left, incomplete, a "Memoir of Music;" but the work by which he is best known is a series of biographies of his brothers, including the lives of the two preceding. He is stated by some to have been attorney-general under James II.

Born about 1650; died about 1743.

NORTH, FREDERIC, earl of Guildford, English statesman. He was the son of lord, afterwards earl Guildford, and was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Oxford. He entered parliament at an early age, supported the high Tory party, was appointed lord of the Treasury in 1763, and in 1769 he succeeded Mr. Charles Townshend as chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1770 was made first lord of the Treasury, in which office he continued till the close of the American war. For his supposed deference to the wishes of George III., in prolonging that struggle, he became exceedingly unpopular, but it is now known that he wished to make peace long before the termination of the contest, and finding it impossible longer to carry on the war, he resigned in 1782. In the following year he held office for a few months in the Portland administration. He was a man of uniformly good temper, a fair orator, and in his private life was thoroughly amiable. Before his death he became wholly blind. He succeeded to the earldom of Guildford on the death of his father in 1790.

Born 1733; died 1792.

NORTH AMERICA. (See AMERICA.)

NORTH BERWICK. (See BERWICK, NORTH.)

NORTH CAPE, the most northern point of land in Europe, in the island of Magerœ, on the coast of Norway. Lat. 71° 10′ N. Lon. 25° 50′ E.

NORTH CAROLINA. (See CAROLINA, NORTH.)

NORTH RIVER. (See HUDSON, and NEW YORK.)

NORTH SEA. (See GERMAN OCEAN.)

NORTHALLERTON, nor-thal'-ler-ton, a market-town and parliamentary borough of the North Riding of Yorkshire, 30 miles N.W. of York, near the left bank of the Niske. It has a Gothic church, in the form of a cross, and an hospital founded in the 15th century. Manf. Linen, leather, and bricks. Pop. 3,692.—A station on the North-Eastern railway. In the neighbourhood is "Standard Hill," where, in 1138, the battle of the Standard was fought between the Scotch and English, in which the former were defeated.

NORTHAMPTON, nor-thamp'-ton, a market-town, parliamentary and municipal borough, capital of Northamptonshire, on the left bank of the Nen, 67 miles N.W. of London. It consists of four principal streets meeting at right angles. The principal streets are wide, commodious, and regular, meeting in a spacious market-square. All-Saints (built in 1680, on the site of an older building, of which the tower remains) has a dome supported on four large columns. St. Giles's, with a fine Norman porch, and a tower rising from the centre. St. Peter's and St. Sepulchre's are curious specimens of ecclesiastical architecture; the former was erected about the time of the Conquest, and the other (one of the few round churches in England) by the Knights Templars. Both of these churches have been recently restored. There are several other churches and other places of worship for various denominations. The other public buildings and institutions are, the new and handsome town-hall, the corn-exchange, the shire-hall, a barracks, theatre, and a fine Gothic structure called Queen's Cross, erected by Edward I. to the memory of his queen, Eleanor; besides various schools and a lunatic asylum. There are some remains of the old castle, once a building of great strength and importance, and near the town is the Victoria Promenade, planted with lime trees, and a mile long. Manf. Boots, shoes, lace, hosiery, saddlery, and leather; and there are brass- and iron-works. Of the boot and shoe manufacture it is the principal seat in England. Pop. 51,880.—A station on the London and North-Western and Midland railways. Northampton is a very ancient town, was burned by the Danes in 1010, and is noted in history for the number of councils and synods held here, for its formidable castle, its numerous monastic foundations, and various remarkable events. Among these we may notice the siege of the castle by the barons in 1215, a great victory gained by the earl of Warwick over the Lancastrians in 1460 In 1642 it was fortified for the Parliament by Lord Brooke; and, in 1675, it was nearly destroyed by fire. It was, for a short time, the seat of a university; and several parliaments have been held in it.

NORTHAMPTON, a town of Massachusetts, United States, near the Connecticut river, 70 miles W. of Boston, surrounded by beautiful scenery. It includes four villages, Northampton, Loudville, Florence, and Leeds, the latter two being manufacturing villages. Manf. Silk, cotton, paper, sewing-machines, cutlery, machinery, agricultural implements, and rubber goods. Pop. 12,172.

NORTHAMPTON, the name of three counties of the United States:—

NORTH CAROLINA.—Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 20,032, more than half being coloured. The capital is Jackson.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Area, 370 square miles. Pop. 70,312. The capital is Easton.

VIRGINIA.—Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 9,152, more than half being coloured. The capital is Eastville.

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE, an inland county of England, bounded N. by Leicestershire, Rutlandshire, and Lincolnshire; E. by Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire; S. by Buckinghamshire, and part of Oxfordshire; and W. by Oxfordshire and Warwickshire. The surface of the county is diversified with undulating hills and fertile valleys. There are extensive woodlands and pastures, and the soil is very productive. Grain and green crops are abundant. It is noted as a farming county, and more especially in the department of grazing, which constitutes the capital object of its husbandry, although the raising of grain for exportation is also carried on to a great extent. Horned cattle and other animals are fed in large numbers, and brought to an extraordinary size. Calves are also bred in considerable numbers, and sent out of the county young, to be fattened nearer the metropolis. The dairies are numerous and extensive; and large quantities of butter are regularly sent from them to London. The milk is used to fatten hogs for the same market. All the ordinary crops are raised.

Rivers.—The Nen, Welland, Charwell, Leam, Ouse, Tone, and Avon. Several canals traverse the county.

Minerals.—Except limestone, the mineral productions are few, and of no great value, including neither coal nor any of the metals.

Area.—984 square miles.

Pop.—272,524.

Chief Towns.—NORTHAMPTON, the county town; PETERBOROUGH, BLISWORTH, DAVENTRY, KETTERING, and MARKET HARBOROUGH.

Parliamentary Representation.—Two members are returned each for the North and South divisions of the county, 2 for Northampton, and 2 for Peterborough.

NORTHCOTE, JAMES, north'-kote, an English artist and writer on art, who left Plymouth for London in his 25th year to study painting under Sir Joshua Reynolds. He subsequently commenced as a painter of portraits, and was on the high road to fame and fortune, when his ambitious mind led him to abandon that line of art, and to visit Italy for the purpose of studying the ancient masters of historical painting. After spending five years in that artistic land, he returned to London, and soon became extensively employed by Boydell and others to make drawings for the "Shakspeare Gallery," a series of prints illustrative of the writings of the poet. During the subsequent half-century he lived almost solitarily in his studio in Argyle-street, London, where he produced many excellent works of art, and also occupied himself with literary composition. In 1813 he published "Memoirs of Sir Joshua Reynolds, with an Analysis of his Discourses." In his 82nd year he gave to the public his "One Hundred Fables, Original and Selected," which were embellished with a number of woodcuts, engraved after his designs. His "Life of Titian," subsequently followed; but this work is said to have been written by Hazlitt from his notes and conversations. Two of his best paintings were "The Murder of the Princes in the Tower," and "Hubert and Arthur." Northcote was never married, but had an affectionate companion in a maiden sister.

Born at Plymouth, 1746; died in London, 1831.

NORTHUMBERLAND, DUKES OF, including men of prominence in English history, are associated with two family names. (See DUDLEY, JOHN AND PERCY, THE FAMILY OF.)

NORTHUMBERLAND, north-um'-ber-land, the most northerly county of England, bounded E. by the German Ocean, N. and N.W. by Scotland, W. by Cumberland, and S. by Durham. The surface is diversified, and, along the seacoast, nearly level. Towards the middle the surface is thrown into large swelling ridges, formed by the principal rivers; here the land is well enclosed, and, in some places, enriched with wood, though the general appearance is destitute of these ornaments. The western part, except a few intervening valleys, is mountainous, branches of the Cheviots running along the border. About one-third of the area is occupied by moorlands. This county is distinguished for its agriculture, which, being conducted on a great scale, and by men of intelligence, enterprise, and capital, has reached a high degree of perfection. Its soil varies through many gradations, from great fertility to a state of irreclaimable barrenness. The rearing of stock is a capital object with the farmers, as well as the raising of crops for the market; and it is in preserving a due balance between the arable and grass lands, so as always to have a large breeding live stock, especially of sheep, that the excellence of their management is thought chiefly to consist. The short-horned cattle and the Cheviot sheep have high reputation. The principal crops comprise wheat, oats, beans, barley, and turnips. The woodlands are not very extensive.

Rivers.—The Tweed forms the northern and the Derwent part of the southern boundary. The chief streams within the county are the Tyne, North Tyne, Alne, and Coquet.

Minerals.—Important. Coal is found over the greater part of Northumberland, especially in the south-eastern part, which forms a part of the great Northumberland and Durham coalfield. More than 100 coalpits are worked in the county. Lead is abundant in the western part, among the hills on the Cumberland border, and the centre of the lead district is Alsenhead, 1,400 feet above the sea level, and the highest inhabited spot in England. The mineral strata that accompany and alternate with the coal in the coal district are chiefly sandstone, or granite, if it be very hard, and slate and clay. Besides coal and limestone, the lead district contains sandstones or freestones of various qualities; shell marl in some places, and also slate clay, in which iron-ore is found in such abundance as to have been sometimes worked for the metal.

Area.—2,016 square miles.

Pop.—434,624.

Chief Towns.—ALNWICK, the county town; NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE, NORTH SHIELDS, TYNEMOUTH, MORPETH, and HEXHAM.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county is divided into North and South Northumberland, each returning 2 members; Newcastle-on-Tyne returns 2, and Tynemouth 1.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a county of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 53,123. The capital is Sunbury.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 7,000, of whom nearly half are coloured. The capital is Heathsville.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a county of New Brunswick, dominion of Canada, bordering on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Area, 4,760 square miles. Pop. 25,000. The capital is Newcastle.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a county of the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, on the north side of Lake Ontario. Area, 734 square miles. Pop. 39,200. The capital is Cobourg.

NORTHUMBERLAND, a maritime county of New South Wales, E. Australia, with a mountainous surface. Area, 2,342 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—In this district coal is found in considerable quantities.

NORTHUMBERLAND ISLANDS, lie near the N.E. coast of Australia. Lat. 21° 32′—22° S. Lon. 149° 47′—150° 37′ E.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAITS, 100 miles long, with a breadth varying from 20 to 6 miles, between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, British North America.

NORTH-WEST PROVINCES, a province of British India, comprising the divisions of AGRA, ALLAHABAD, BENARES, JHANSI, KUMAON, MEERUT, OUDH and ROHILCUND. Area, 106,111 sq. m. Pop. 44,107,869.—The North West Provinces were formerly included in the Bengal presidency, but were constituted a separate administrative division in 1833, with the capital at Agra, but in 1862 the seat of government was removed to Allahabad.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES, a portion of the dominion of Canada, comprising the greater part of the former Hudson Bay Territory, bounded N. by the Arctic Ocean and Hudson Strait, S. the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and the United States; W. the Rocky Mountains and British Columbia. Area, 2,750,000 square miles, including the islands in the Arctic Ocean. The government is vested in a lieutenant-governor and council. Pop. About 2,500 whites, chiefly employed by the Hudson's Bay Company, and 65,000 Indians, half-breeds and Esquimaux. (See HUDSON'S BAY.)

NORTH-WEST PASSAGE, a water communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, to the north of the American continent. (See AMERICA.)

NORTHWICH, north'-wich, a market town of Cheshire, on the left bank of the Weaver, near the confluence of the Dare, 15 miles N.E. of Chester. There are a fine church, several other places of worship, and a grammar school. Near the town are mines of rock salt and lime springs, the latter furnishing annually about 400,000 tons of salt, in which there is an active export trade. Pop. 12,246.

NORTON, HON. CAROLINE ELIZABETH SARAH, a modern English poetess, one of the three daughters of Thomas Sheridan, son of the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Her father dying while she was still very young, her care devolved upon her mother, who gave her an excellent education. At the age of 19 she became the wife of the Hon. George Chappel Norton a barrister, and afterwards police-magistrate in the Metropolis. In 1829 she commenced her career of authorship by publishing anonymously the "Sorrows of Rosalie," a tale, and other poems. In the following year she achieved the greatest success as a poetess, with the production of her "Undying One," and other poems, which the "Quarterly Review" declared to be worthy of Lord Byron. In 1836, she separated from her husband, who brought an unsuccessful action against Lord Melbourne, in consequence of a scandalous imputation which had obtained currency. The "Child of the Islands," "Aunt Carry's Ballads for Children," and "Stuart of Dunleath," a novel, were her subsequent works. In 1854 her warm sympathies with the social wrongs of her sex found expression in a work entitled, "English Laws for Women in the 19th Century." This work was privately printed; but a very large circulation was obtained for a later effort of the same character, which was named, a "Letter to the Queen on Lord Chancellor Cranworth's Marriage and Divorce Bill." In 1877, Mr. Norton having died a few years previously, she married Sir W. Stirling Maxwell; but died in less than three months afterwards.

Born 1808; died 1877.

NORTON, a new county of Kansas, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Population, 6,998.

NORTON SOUND, a large bay of Alaska, in the north-west of America, on the south-eastern side of Behring's Straits, between Cape Rodney, on the north, and Cape Romanoff on the south. The width at the entrance is about 200 miles, and it penetrates inland, gradually narrowing for a like distance. It was discovered by Captain Cook.

NORWALK, nor'-wauk, a town of Fairfield county, Connecticut, United States, beautifully situated on Long Island Sound, 43 miles N.E. of New York. There is a large trade in oysters, and steamers make daily trips to New York. Manf. Felt, iron, paper, boots and shoes, and peltry. Pop. 14,000.—The town was founded in 1640; burnt by the British, 1779, and incorporated as a borough in 1836.

NORWALK, the capital of Huron county, Ohio, United States, 56 miles W. of Cleveland. Manf. Iron and machinery. Pop. 4,500.

NORWAY, nor'-wai, the western part of the Scandinavian peninsula, of northern Europe, and a portion of the kingdom of Sweden and Norway. It is bounded N.E. by Russian Lapland, E. by Sweden, N. and N.W. by the Atlantic and the North Sea, and S. by the Skager Rack, dividing it from Denmark. It is very irregular in shape; the length from north to south is about 1,080 miles, the breadth in some parts of the north not more than 20 miles, but about lat. 60°, further south, 275 miles. The coast is indented with innumerable bays and fiords, no country in the world probably having such an irregular outline. These inlets afford an almost uninterrupted series of harbours of refuge, and there are a vast number of islands, some very small, mere rocks with fantastic outlines, and others, equally singular in appearance, of large size. The chief are the LOFODEN ISLANDS, Langö, Karmö, Senjen, and the Andoy group. The coast line is mostly rocky and precipitous, and the scenery of many of the fiords, or narrow inlets of the sea, is peculiarly grand and impressive. The surface consists of mountain masses, or plateaux, with narrow intervening valleys. The northern mountains are generally known as the Kjöllen Fjelle, about 25 miles in width, and forming the boundary between Norway and Sweden. South of lat. 63° N., the ranges are known as the Dovre Fjelle, and still farther south as the Norrska Fjelle, spreading over about three-fourths of the south of Norway. The boundary of Sweden runs north and south along the crest of these ranges. Some physical geographers divide with greater exactness the Scandinavian mountain system into the following six groups or separate plateaux, beginning in the extreme north:—1. The plateaux of Finmark, the most elevated summits of which are near Lake Torneä, and the fiords of Lyngen and Ovenanger; 2. The plateaux of Noorland and Tronjdhem (or Drontheim), extending to the Fiord of Trondhjem. The loftiest summit is Sulilelma, 6,340 feet, and there is the remarkable jagged and sharp peak the Kilhorn, with a large perforation in the centre of the cone. 3. The Dorre Fjelle plateau, the highest peaks of which are Sneehaetten, 8,115 feet, and Skrimkolln, Stenkolln, and Nuusfield, each about 7,000 feet. 4. The Langfeld plateau, which include the loftiest peaks of Norway, Galdhöppigen, 8,785 feet, and Skagostölstind, 8,390 feet. The Hornclen (2,705 feet), is a remarkably isolated narrow peak, leaning from the perpendicular at the eastern extremity of the island of Bremanger, at the entrance of Vaags Fiord, in lat. 61° 45′ N. 5. The plateau of Fillefjeld, in the south-western part of the peninsula, between the Skager Rack and the German Ocean. This plateau is generally of less elevation than the others, the highest portion being in the north, subsiding gradually towards the south and south-west. Several peaks, including the Skogshorn, the Hogloftsteg, and Gousta, are about 6,000 feet in elevation, and several others are over 5,000 feet. 6. The Eastern plateau, of lower elevation, and continued into Sweden. It presents a series of rugged slopes, with gorges, through which rivers dash with many cascades, and precipices overhanging fiords. The scenery is very striking and beautiful, wild and alpine in character. There are noble forests of pine and fir on the mountain slopes, and, lower down, of oak, ash, and beech. Grass is scanty, but there is abundance of moss which is very valuable for pasture. Flax and hemp are raised in many parts of the country, and in others barley and oats. The pastures are pretty good, and cattle are reared and exported in numbers; but the main article of export is timber. The horses are small but hardy; goats are more plentiful than sheep; swine are not abundant. The fisheries are of very great value, the cod and herring fisheries, the former chiefly in the north and the latter in the south, produce, it is estimated, £1,500,000 annually. The rivers and lakes abound with salmon and salmon trout. The climate is not severe throughout, but in the mountains the cold of winter is intense. On the sea-coast the atmosphere is softened by the western breeze, and is often less cold, in the depth of winter than in the interior of Germany. The harbours are never blocked with ice. There is no spring, however, and the summer is both very hot and dry.

Rivers and Lakes.—There are few rivers of importance belonging exclusively to Norway, those rising on the eastern slopes of the plateaux flowing into Sweden, to which they may be said properly to belong. The more important of these are the Glommen (with its affluent the Lougen), the Beina, Lauven, Skien-Nid, and Torrisdal. The streams flowing westward are, in consequence of the proximity of the mountains to the sea, generally rapid torrents. The narrow and winding fiords afford water communication. In the extreme north the most important river is the Tana, which forms part of the boundary between Norway and Russia, and falls into the Arctic Ocean. There are a great number of lakes, many small, and nothing more than mountain tarns. The largest lake is Mjösen, near Christiania, about 100 miles long, and 1,400 feet deep.

Minerals.—Iron and copper of very superior quality, besides lead, cobalt, nickel, some silver, and marble. The richest mines are in the south. Stone for building, and slate, are in great abundance; and the loadstone, or natural magnet, is also frequently found and exported.

Zoology.—In Finmark, the reindeer forms the sole wealth, and almost the only source of the subsistence of the inhabitants, and about 75,000 are known to be domesticated, and there are many in a wild state. In the mountains and forests are numbers of beasts of prey, such as bears, wolves, lynxes, and foxes. Of the birds of prey, the eagle is the principal. Water-fowl, especially the eider-duck, is very plentiful.

Area.—122,280 square miles.

Pop.—1,807,000, including about 20,000 Lapps and Finns, living in the more remote northern regions. The genuine Norwegians are a strong, fair-haired race, of middle height. They are generally fairly educated, and intelligent.

Administrative Divisions.—The country is popularly divided into five "stifts" or dioceses—Aggershuus, or Christiania; Christiansand, Bergen, Trondhjem, and Tromsöe; but a more strictly administrative division is into 20 ampts, or districts:—Christiania (town), Aggershuus, Smaalenene, Hedemarken, Christians, Buskerud, Jarlsberg, Bratsberg, Nedenäs, Lister and Mandal, Stavanger, Söndre Bergenhuus, Bergen (town), Nordre Bergenhuus, Romsdal, Söndre Trondhjem, Nordre Trondhjem, Nordland, Tromsö, and Finmark.

Chief Towns.—CHRISTIANIA (the capital), ARENDAL, BERGEN, CHRISTIANSAND, DRAMMEN, STAVANGER, and TRONDHJEM, or DRONTHEIM.

Government.—Norway is united with Sweden under one sovereign, but has a separate administrative government. The constitution of Norway, called the Grundlov, bears date November 4, 1814, but was modified in 1869. It vests the whole legislative power of the realm in the Storthing, or great court, the representative of the sovereign people. The king has the command of the land and sea forces, and makes all appointments, but is not allowed to nominate any but Norwegians to public offices under the crown. The king possesses the right of veto over laws passed by the Storthing, but, except in constitutional matters, only for a limited period. The royal veto may be exercised twice; but if the same bill pass three successive times it becomes the law of the land without the assent of the sovereign. The mode of election is indirect, the people first nominating a number of deputies, to whom devolves the task of appointing the representatives in the Storthing. The Storthing is divided itself into two houses, the Lagthing and the Odelsthing. The former is composed of one-fourth of the members of the Storthing, and the other of the remaining three-fourths. Each nominates its own president. The executive is represented by the king, who exercises his authority through a council of state, composed of one minister of state and nine councillors. Two of the councillors, together with the minister, form a delegation of the council of state, residing at Stockholm, near the king. The inhabitants of the kingdom are homogeneous in race and religion. There exists no privilege of birth, that of hereditary nobility having been abolished by a law which passed the Storthing August 1, 1821.

Religion and Education.—With the exception of about 5,000 dissenters, the population adhere to the Lutheran church. All sects of Christians and Jews are tolerated, but only the members of the Lutheran church are admitted to public offices. Education is compulsory in the kingdom, parents being bound to let their children, between the ages of seven and fourteen, receive public instruction. There is a university at Christiania.

Railways and Telegraphs.—There are about 970 miles of railway, and 4,670 miles of telegraph line.

History.—The remote history is so mingled with myth that it is almost impossible to distinguish between the true and the false. More authentic records of events open the 10th century, when Christianity was introduced, and encouraged by Olaf II., or the Saint. In 1030 the country was conquered by Denmark, but recovered independence a few years afterwards, and for three centuries was governed by native kings. In 1397 Erick united the three Scandinavian kingdoms, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, under one crown, but after a short time Sweden was separated, and in course of years Norway became little more than a dependency of Denmark until 1814, when, by the treaty of Kiel, Norway was handed over to Sweden, with which it has ever since been united.

NORWICH, nor′-ij, an ancient city of England, the chief town of the county of Norfolk, on the river Wensum, which is navigable up to the town, and crossed by 9 bridges, near the confluence of the Yare, 20 miles W. of Yarmouth. It has a circumference of about 5 miles, skirted on the north and east sides by the river. The castle stands on an elevated site in the centre of the town. It was first erected in the 6th century, by the Saxons. The keep, a massive quadrangular structure, in the Norman style, is now used as a jail. The ditch is crossed by a bridge with a very fine Anglo-Norman arch. The cathedral is one of the most spacious and handsome buildings of the kind in the kingdom. The architecture is chiefly in the Norman style, of which the semicircular arch and large short column are the leading features. The whole length of the church, from east to west, is 411 feet, of the nave, from western door to transept, 140 feet; the width of transept is 191 feet, and of the nave, with isles, 72 feet. At the intersection of the transept with the nave and choir, rises a lofty tower, surmounted by a spire, the whole height of which is 315 feet. The bishop's palace stands on the same site with that which was built by the founder of the cathedral. In the vicinity are several ancient structures, more or less in ruins, among them St. Ethelbert's chapel, in the Decorated English style, and the Erpingham Gate, in Late Perpendicular, with buttresses, and 38 statues or niches. There are about 40 churches, including St. Peter's, a noble cruciform structure of the 15th century; St. Clement's, of great antiquity; St. Giles's, built in the 13th century, with a tower and cupola 120 feet high; St. Michael's Costany, with a lofty tower; St. Lawrence's, an ancient, large, and handsome building; and some fine modern churches. Some of the chapels for Dissenters are handsome buildings. The other public buildings are, the Guildhall, St. Andrew's Hall, formerly the conventual church of the Benedictine monastery of Blackfriars, now one of the finest public halls in the kingdom; the new corn-exchange, the assembly-room, the theatre, gaol, and bridewell, or house of correction. The charitable institutions are, the Norfolk and Norwich Hospital, the Dispensary, Doughty's Hospital, Bethlehem Hospital, or Bedlam, an excellent institution for lunatics. There are, besides, a great number of other charities and benefactions, numerous charity and Sunday schools, a free grammar-school, literary institution, mechanics' institute, art union, and also a public library, with various other institutions for the pursuit of knowledge. The market-place is 600 feet long and 340 wide.

Manf.—Norwich was early famed for its woollen manufactures, chiefly made by Flemish refugees. The staple articles are worsted damasks, flowered satins, fine camlets, gauzes, crapes, bandanas, mohair, silk fabrics, cottons, lace, shawls, and other fancy goods, both for furniture and dress; winseys, barèges, and such goods; boots and shoes, paper, machinery, iron, vinegar, mustard, and starch.
Pop.—87,843.

NORWICH, a city of Connecticut, United States, at the head of the navigation of the Thames, 35 miles S E. of Hartford. It consists of three parts, two chiefly occupied by manufacturing establishments, supplied with water power by the falls of the Yantic river, and the other by elegant residences, beautifully situated. There are 19 churches, good county buildings, and many educational establishments. Manf. Cotton, woollens, and paper. Pop. 15,000.—The site was purchased in 1659 of Uncas, an Indian chief (whose name was adopted by Cooper, the novelist, for the young hero of "The Last of the Mohicans"), and his grave is still shown.

NORWICH, the county seat of Chenango county, New York, on the Chenango river, 90 miles W. of Albany. Manf. Musical instruments and carriages. Pop. 4,500.

NOSAREE, no-sa-ré, a town of British India, presidency of Bombay, on the left bank of the Poona, 8 miles above its mouth in the Gulf of Cawbay. Pop. 15,000, including many Parsee weavers. There is a good foreign and coasting trade.

NOS-BEH, or NOSSI-BÉ, nos-bé, an island off the north-west coast of Madagascar, at the northern entrance of the Bay of Passandava. It is 16½ miles long, and 8 broad, of volcanic origin, and the surface is finely diversified. The highest point, towards the south, has an elevation of 1,700 feet, and is covered with fine timber. The island belongs to France. Pop. 15,800. Lat. 13° 20′ S. Lon. 48° 20′ E.

NOSTRADAMUS, MICHEL, nos-tra-daï'-mus, a notorious French astrologer and physician. He was of Jewish descent, and his proper name was Notre-Dame. He studied first at the Collége d'Avignon, and afterwards medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree. Having rendered some eminent service to the inhabitants of Aix when the city was visited by the plague, he received an annual pension from the town during many years. In 1544 he settled as a physician at Salon, near Aix, and in the following year he was invited to Lyons, where a dangerous epidemic was raging, and rendered great service. In 1555 he published his prophesies, which, though very obscure and absurd, gained the author a considerable reputation. These were followed by several others, the whole making one volume folio, in barbarous verse. He also compiled a weather almanack. Nostradamus was honoured with marks of distinction by persons of the highest rank, particularly Charles IX., king of France, Catharine de Medici, and the Duke and Duchess of Savoy.
Born at St. Remy, 1503; died at Salon, 1566.

NOTO, VAL DI, no'-to, one of the old provinces into which Sicily was divided, forming the S.E. portion of the island. It now comprises the districts of Catania, Syracuse, and Caltanisetta.

NOTO, a town of Sicily, province of Syracuse, delightfully situate on an eminence, 3 miles from the sea. Of its numerous churches and convents, some are elegantly built, and there are several fine palaces, an academy, and a valuable museum. There is a trade in corn, oil, and wine. Pop. 18,500.—About 3 miles from this town are the remains of the ancient Netum, destroyed by an earthquake in 1693.

NOTTERÖE, not-ter-ö'-e, an island off the south east coast of Norway, at the entrance of the Bay of Christiania. It is about 7 miles long and 3 wide. Pop. 3,300.

NOTTINGHAM, HENEAGE FINCH, Earl of, not'-ting-ham, English lawyer and statesman, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, was entered of the Middle Temple, and was subsequently called to the bar. He became solicitor-general under Charles II., at the Restoration, and took a prominent part in the prosecutions of the regicides, an account of which he published in 1660, in a curious work entitled "An Exact and Impartial Account of the Indictment, Arraignment, Trial, and Judgment (according to law) of Twenty-nine Regicides." In the following year he was chosen to represent the university of Oxford in parliament, and was created a baronet. In 1667 he had a principal share in impeaching the earl of Clarendon, and was, three years later, appointed attorney-general. In 1673 he received the great seal of England as lord keeper; in 1675 he became lord chancellor of England. At the trial of Viscount Stafford, in 1680, he presided as lord high steward, and delivered judgment against that nobleman in a speech of great eloquence. In the following year he was created earl of Nottingham. Besides the work above mentioned, he published several others, the chief of which were "An Argument on the Claim of the Crown to Pardon on Impeachment," "Speech at the Sentence of William Viscount Stafford," and "Reports of Cases in the High Court of Chancery." Dryden, in his "Absalom and Achitophel," alludes to the earl of Nottingham under the name of Amri.

Born 1621; died 1682.

NOTTINGHAM, DANIEL FINCH, Earl of, was eldest son of the preceding, and finished his education at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1680 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, and, in 1682, succeeded his father as earl of Nottingham. He opposed the arbitrary measures of James II.; but though he was an adherent of the party of the prince of Orange, he was against his taking possession of the throne, and strenuously supported the convention in favour of the regency. However, William offered him the post of lord chancellor, which he declined: but he was, for a short time, secretary of state. On the death of Queen Anne, he was one of the lords justices for the administration of affairs, and, soon after, was made president of the council; but, in 1716, he was dismissed, on account of a speech which he made in behalf of the Scottish lords condemned for high treason. In 1729 he became earl of Winchelsea, on the death of John, fifth earl, in virtue of his descent from Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir Thomas Heneage, and wife of Sir Moyle Finch, his great-grandfather. He was an able speaker and a man of learning, as appears from his reply to Whiston on the Trinity, for which he received the thanks of the university of Oxford and of the bishop and clergy of London.

Born 1647; died 1730.

NOTTINGHAM, CHARLES HOWARD, Earl of. (See HOWARD, Lord.)

NOTTINGHAM, a municipal and Parliamentary capital of Nottinghamshire, about half-a-mile from the north bank of the Trent. The little river Lean runs into the Trent close to the town, the older part of which stands on a hill so steep, that the ground floors of the houses towards the top of it are considerably elevated above the roofs of those at the bottom. The town was formerly enclosed and limited in extent by a belt of pasture land, owned by the freemen and known as "the meadows," and the "Lammas fields," but in 1845 an Act was passed by which the greater portion of the land was made available for building, and since then the progress of the town has been rapid; large warehouses, manufactories, and other commercial establishments, occupying the extensive area at the base of the cliff. In the older part of the town the streets are narrow, and there are many crooked alleys. Many of the houses have several stories of cellars beneath excavated out of the soft sandstone on which this part of the town stands. On the most elevated portion of the rock, at the edge of a steep precipice 130 feet high, stand the ruins of Nottingham Castle, a huge square mansion, with very little architectural pretensions, built on the site of the famous old castle, in the 17th century, and burned by the mob in the Reform riots of 1831 and now the property of the corporation of the town, and intended to be converted into a public museum and gallery of art. Some portion of the outer towers of the ancient castle remain near the foot of the hill. There is a subterranean communication formerly leading to the castle, and locally known as Mortimer's Hole, traditions affirming that it is the way by which the murderers of Mortimer, the paramour of the widow of Edward II., reached their victim. In the public park adjoining the castle, is the entrance to this passage, and until a few years since there were a remarkable series of caves, popularly known as the Druids' Caves, but the hill in which they were formed has been levelled and villas now occupy the site. In the neighbouring village of Sneinton, several caves have been converted into dwelling-houses, brick fronts and chimneys having been added. St. Mary's Church is a venerable structure, supposed to date from the 7th century, and has been several times partially rebuilt and restored. St. Peter's and St. Nicholas's, are other old churches, and several new churches, especially All Saints', are architecturally interesting. There are a large Roman Catholic church, and a convent, and many chapels for dissenters. The chief public buildings are the exchange, rebuilt after a fire in 1836, the guildhall, county-hall, corn exchange, post office, mechanics' hall, and school of art. There are a free grammar school, a blue-coat school, a people's college, and many other educational establishments. There is a handsome Gothic memorial consisting of a cross and fountain, of the late Mr. Walter, M.P. An arboretum and cemetery are near the town. The market-place is the largest and finest which almost any provincial town of England can boast. Four annual fairs are held.—A station on the London and North-Western, Great Northern, and Midland railways.

Manf.—Hosiery and lace are the staples; woollens, cotton, silk, iron, and machinery. The breweries are famous for ale, and the trade in corn, malt, and cattle is large.

Pop.—186,656.

History.—Under the Heptarchy, the town was a portion of the kingdom of Mercia; Edward the Elder built walls, and William the Conqueror erected (on the site of a Saxon fortress) the castle, which figured considerably in the Parliamentary War. Charles I. erected there his standard (the spot is still named Standard Hill), and afterwards unsuccessfully besieged it. The great Luddite riots of 1811 broke out here, and there were other riots of a similar character in 1812, 1814, and 1816, the destruction of machinery being the object aimed at. The Reform riot of 1831 has been already referred to.

NOTTINGHAMSHIRE, not'-ting-ham-sheer, an inland county of England, bounded on the N. by Yorkshire, E. by Lincolnshire, S. by Leicestershire, and W. by Derbyshire. Except in the Vale of Trent, on the eastern part, its surface is undulating, and sufficiently irregular and broken to avoid the sameness of a general flat. In the northern part are the remains of Sherwood Forest. Turnips, clover, wheat, barley, and oats, the latter of a remarkably fine quality, are produced. Hops form an article of considerable cultivation in the central parts of the county, and there are extensive market gardens.

Rivers.—The principal is the Trent, with its tributaries, the Idle, Mann, and Erewash. By the Nottingham and Grantham Canal, and the Fosse Dyke Canal, the Trent is connected with the Witham, of Lincolnshire.

Minerals.—Coal is abundant, and is supposed to be part of the same deposit which is found in Derbyshire, Yorkshire, Durham, and Northumberland. Besides coal, limestone and gypsum are found. Building- and paving-stone are quarried in different parts, and marl is also found in various places.

Area.—848 square miles.

Pop.—391,984.

Chief Towns.—NOTTINGHAM, the capital; EAST RETFORD, MANSFIELD, NEWARK, SOUTHWELL, and WORKSOP.

NOTTOWAY, not'-to-wai, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 11,156 more than 7,000 being coloured. The capital is Nottoway Courthouse.

NOUE, FRANCIS DE LA, noo, surnamed the Arm of Iron, a celebrated French soldier, who distinguished himself in the wars of Italy, and, upon his return to France, espoused the cause of the Huguenots, then in arms against the Catholics. He took Orleans in 1567, and, two years afterwards, signalised himself at the battle of Jarnac; subsequently to which he made himself master of Fontenoy; on which occasion he lost his left arm. He had another made of iron; whence his surname. He was at the siege of Rochelle, and, in 1578, entered the service of the States-general in the Low Countries, where he took Count Egmont prisoner; but was himself taken in 1580, and did not gain his liberty till five years afterwards. In the time of the League he served on the royal side, and was killed by a musket-shot at the siege of Lamballe. He was the author of a "Discourse, Political and Military," which was first printed in 1587.

Born in Brittany, 1531; died 1591.

NOUR-EDDIN, MAHMOUD MALEK-AL-ADEL, noor-ed-deen', sultan of Egypt, was the son of Zengui, or Omad-ed-din, ruler of Northern Syria. When his father was slain by his own eunuchs at the siege of Jabbar, in 1145, Nour-eddin obtained the sovereignty of Aleppo, and, by his prudence, became one of the most powerful princes of the East. He distinguished himself against the Christians in the time of the crusades; he defeated Jocelyn de Courtenay, count of Edessa, and Raymond, prince of Antioch, whose head was sent as a trophy to the caliph at Bagdad; after which he made himself master of Damascus. In 1159, the Christians recovered some of the lost territories, and Nour-eddin suffered a severe defeat from Baldwin III., king of Jerusalem. He afterwards obtained some victories, and then prepared to carry out a great scheme he had long meditated for the conquest of Egypt, which was successfully invaded by the famous Salah-eddin (Saladin), of whose success Nour-eddin became jealous, and prepared to march into Egypt in person, but was attacked by a fatal illness on the way. To the qualities of a great warrior (which have placed him in the very front rank of Moslem heroes) he added the virtues of a liberal prince: he patronised the arts and sciences, founded cities and establishments of learning, hospitals, caravanserais, and mosques. To him has been ascribed the first employment of pigeons to carry messages.

Born at Damascus, 1117; died at Damascus, 1173.

NOUR-EDDIN, ALI, was the eldest of the seventeen sons of the celebrated Salah-eddin. At his father's death, Damascus, Southern Syria, and Palestine, fell to his share; but he was soon afterwards deprived of his kingdom by his brother and uncle. After vainly attempting to recover Damascus from his uncle, he retired to Samosata, where he died.

Born 1170; died 1224.

NOUR-EDDIN, ARSLAN SHAH, prince of Mosul and Mesopotamia, succeeded his father in 1193. He was a just and liberal monarch, and, in a great degree, restored the declining power of his dynasty.

Died 1210.

NOUR-EDDIN, ALI, second sultan of the Tartar Mamelukes in Egypt, ascended the throne upon the assassination of his father Ibeh, in 1257. He reigned only two years; being deposed by the emir Kotuz, in 1259.

NOUR-DJIHAN, noor-ji-han', wife of Jehanghir, the Mogul emperor. She was the daughter of a Tartar general, and became sultana in 1611. After the death of her husband, she retired to the palace at Agra. Her tomb is accounted one of the most beautiful edifices in that city. To Nour-Djihan has been attributed the discovery of the essence of roses.

Born 1585; died 1645.

NOVALIS. (See HARDENBURG.)

NOVARA, no-va'-ra, a town of northern Italy, capital of the province of the same name, on the Mora, 27 miles W. of Milan. It has a cathedral, with fine frescoes and sculptures, other churches, two colleges, convents, a hall of commerce, hospital, and a theatre: it also contains a number of handsome private buildings. There are ancient, but now dismantled, fortifications. Manf. Silks, linens, hats, leather, earthenware, and a peculiar kind of sweet biscuit. Pop. 30,000.—In 1849 the Sardinians were here disastrously defeated by the Austrians (see CHARLES ALBERT); and in 1859 a French corps occupied the town.

NOVARA, a province of Italy, bounded N. by Switzerland, S. by the Po, N. by the province of Torino, and E. by Lago Maggiore and the Ticino. It is nearly covered by the main ridge of the Alps. The soil is very fertile. There are five districts, Biella, Novara, Ossola, Pallanza, Valtesia, and Vercelli. Area, 2,526 square miles. Pop. 694,000.

NOVA SCOTIA, no'-va sko'-she-a, a province of the dominion of Canada, British America, bounded N.W. by New Brunswick, and the Bay of Fundy, N.E. by the Gulf of St. Lawrence, S.E. by the Atlantic, and S. by the Atlantic Ocean and the United States of America. It is a peninsula, 280 miles long, and varying in breadth from 50 to 100 miles, joined to the continent by an isthmus, 14 miles across, at the N.E. extremity of the Bay of Fundy, and of the islands of Cape Breton, separated from Nova Scotia by a narrow strait called the Gut of Canso, and of Sable Island, 25 miles long, and less than 2 miles wide, and surrounded by a dangerous sandbank. The coast line is about 1,000 miles in length, and there are several bays and good harbours, the chief being Halifax Harbour, Chedabucto, St. Margaret's, Mahon and St. Mary's Bays, Annapolis Mines and Chignecto basins, and Picton harbour. There is a range of highlands stretching inland for about 20 miles from the Atlantic coast, and the Cobequid Mountains, with an average elevation of 1,100 feet, traverse the peninsula from the Bay of Fundy on the north-west to the Strait of Canso. The valleys are rich and fertile, and the climate healthy, and not on the average so cold as other American places within the same parallels of latitude, but the winters are severe. The usual grain and vegetable crops yield well, and the fisheries are extremely productive, giving employment to about 21,000 fishermen.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers are generally short streams, the most important being the Annapolis, Avon, Shubenacadie, and Tangier. There are a vast number of lakes, of which the Bras d'Or, in Cape Breton, occupying 500 square miles, is by far the largest.

Minerals.—Gold, discovered on Tangier river, 40 miles E. of Halifax, in 1861; coal, and iron.

Area.—21,731 square miles.

Pop.—440,572.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 18 counties. HALIFAX, the capital; ANNAPOLIS, Dartmouth, LIVERPOOL, and PICTON are the chief towns.

Government.—Like the other provinces of the dominion of Canada, Nova Scotia has its own local legislature consisting of a council and a house of assembly elected by the counties and cities. There is a lieutenant-governor appointed by the crown. The province sends 12 senators and 20 members of the lower house to the Canadian parliament.

History.—This country was discovered by the Cabots in 1497, and in 1604 a French settlement was formed and named Acadia, but the colonists were expelled by settlers from Virginia. In 1621 James I. made a grant of the peninsula to Sir William Alexander, and the name was changed to Nova Scotia. The English colonists, however, abandoned the attempt to establish a settlement, and in 1667 the country was ceded to the French by the treaty of Breda, but restored to England in 1713, and colonists were sent out at the expense of the British government. The French were expelled, the treatment they endured forming the subject of Longfellow's exquisite poem, "Evangeline."

NOVATIAN, no-vai'-shi-an, a stoic philosopher, who embraced Christianity, was admitted to holy orders, and, being of an ambitious character, he contrived to get himself ordained bishop, which was done in an irregular manner in Italy. He then endeavoured to get possession of the see of Rome, after the death of Pope Fabian, but was opposed by Cornelius. Novatian promulgated the doctrine, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once lapsed into idolatry to communion; a practice then universal in the Church. This produced a schism, in which Novatian had many partisans, who called themselves Catharites or pure. By others, however, they were named Novatians. To the above doctrine they added many others, particularly those of the Montanists. There are several works by Novatian extant.

Lived in the 3rd century.

NOVA ZEMBLA, zem'-bla, a chain of islands in the Arctic Ocean, belonging to the Russian government of Archangel, from which it is separated by the Straits of Waigatz. The chain is estimated at 470 miles long, with an average breadth of 56. The most southern island is especially named Nova Zembla (from the Russian Novaja Zemlja, "new land"), and the two next in size are Matthew's Land and Lütke's Land. The highest point is about 3,500 feet above the sea level. The cold is intense. No part of this dreary and inhospitable region has any permanent inhabitants; but particular tracts of the south and west coasts are visited by fishermen and hunters sent out by the merchants of Archangel and Mezen. Subterranean stone labyrinths of great antiquity have been discovered. Lat. 70° 30'—76° 30' N Lon. 52° 66' E.

NOVELDA, no-vell'-da, a town of Spain, province of Alicante, 16 miles W. of the town of Alicante. Manf. Lace; there are oil mills and distilleries. Pop. 8,100.

NOVELLARA, no-vel-la'-ra, a town of Italy, province of Reggio, 11 miles N.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Silk and leather. Pop. 4,200.

NOVELLO, VINCENT, organist and composer, of Italian descent. He was one of the founders of the Philharmonic Society. His compositions were principally of an ecclesiastical character, and he edited many valuable compositions.

Born in London, 1781; died at Nice, 1861.

NOVELLO, CLARA ANASTASIA, vocalist, daughter of the preceding. She studied in Italy, and at an early age appeared with great success as a concert singer, and afterwards in opera at Padua. In 1840 she married Count Gigliucci, and for a time retired into private life; but political troubles affecting her husband's property, she again appeared, finally retiring in 1860.

Born 1818.

NOVGOROD, nov-go-rod', a large government or province in the N.W. of European Russia, to the S.E. of the government of St. Petersburg. The surface is undulatory, rising in the south to the moderate elevation of 300 feet, and forming the watershed between the Caspian, Baltic, and White Seas. The soil is only partially fertile, and the climate is severe. There are extensive forests and pasture lands, and agriculture and cattle rearing are carried on. Rye, oats, and barley, hemp, and flax are raised.

Rivers and Lakes.—The most important rivers are the Volkhof, Lovat, Msta, Szeksna, and Mologa; and the largest lakes are Ilmen, Vosje, and Bieloe.

Minerals.—Paving stone, and there are mineral and saline springs.

Area.—48,780 square miles.

Pop.—1,127,881.

NOVGOROD, or NOVGOROD-VELIKI. "the Great Novgorod," capital of the above government, on the Volkhof, near its point of issue from the Lake Ilmen, 122 miles S.E. of St. Petersburg. It is divided into two parts by the Volkhof; one called the Tergaraia, or the Market-town; the other the Sophiskaia, or quarter of St. Sophia. The latter contains the Kremlin, or citadel, and the cathedral of St. Sophia, a large building with brazen gates, and containing some interesting tombs and a good library. In 1862 a monument was erected to commemorate Rurick, who, in 862, was here chosen the first sovereign of Russia. The other part of the town has the building occupied by the governor; but the rest of the habitations are an irregular collection of wooden structures. Manf. Sailcloth, vinegar, and leather. Pop. 20,559.—Novgorod-Veliki is one of the most ancient cities of the empire, having been founded in the 5th century. In the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries it was a place of great commercial importance, with, at one time, 400,000 inhabitants, but in 1471 Ivan III. nearly destroyed the town and exiled many of its principal inhabitants. The opening of Archangel as a port and the foundation of St. Petersburg took away the foreign trade.

NOVGOROD-SIEVERSKOI, a town of European Russia, in the government of Tchernigov, 108 miles N.E. of the town of that name. Pop. 6,500.

NOVGRAD-VOLYNSKI, nov-grad' vo-lin'-ski, a town of European Russia, province of Tchernigov, on the right bank of the Desna, a branch of the Dnieper, 89 miles E. of Tchernigov. Pop. 6,500.

NOVI, no'-ve, a town of Italy, province of Alessandria, at the foot of the Apennines, 33 miles N.W. of Genoa. It has a castle, situate in an elevated position, a college, hospital, and many picturesque old houses. Manf. Silk; a considerable transit trade is carried on. Pop. 13,006.—It is noted for a sanguinary battle, in August, 1799, between the French, under Joubert, and the Austro-Russian forces: the latter were victorious.

NOVI-BAZAR, or JENIBAZAR, no'-ve ba'-zar, a town of Bosnia in a sanjak of the same name, on the Raczka, on the Southern frontier of Servia. It has a castle, several mosques, and shops, and being situated at the meeting of several principal roads, considerable trade is carried on. Several large fairs are held. Pop. 15,000.

NOVIKOFF, NICOLAS IVANOVICH, nov'-i-kof, a Russian gentleman, who devoted his life to the production of standard editions of the authors of his country. He has been called the "Franklin of Russia." The first circulating library in Moscow was establi-hed by him; and, among other important works, he produced a "Library of Old Russian Authors," in 30 vols.

Born 1744; died 1818.

NOVOI-USEN, no'-voi-oo'-sen, a town of European Russia, government of Samara, on the Great Usen. There is an annual fair very largely attended. Pop. 6,000.

NOVOKHOPERSK, no-vok'-ho-persk', a town of European Russia, on the Vorona, 108 miles S.E. of Voronej. It is strongly fortified, with shipbuilding docks. Pop. 6,300.

NOVOMIRGOROD, no'-vom-ir-go-rod', a town of European Russia, government of Kherson, on the left bank of the Vissa, 103 miles N.W. of Kherson. It is the see of a bishop, and has three churches. Pop. 5,900.

NOVOMOSKOVSK, no'-vo-mos-kofsk', a market-town of European Russia, government of Iekaterinoslav, on the Samara, an affluent of the Dnieper, 20 miles N.E. of Iekaterinoslav. Three great cattle and horse fairs are held annually, and many of the horses for the army are purchased here. Pop. 10,000.

NOVO-SUTKOF, soot'-kof, a town of European Russia, government of Tchernigov, on an affluent of the Soj, 75 miles N.E. of Tchernigov. Pop. 6,800.

NOVO-TCHERKASK, cher-gask', a town of Russia, capital of the country of the Cossacks of the Don, near the Aksai, a tributary of the Don, 70 miles N.E. of Taganrog. It has a cathedral, with numerous other churches. There is a statue to the memory of Count Platoff, the famous hetman of the Cossacks, who distinguished himself as an opponent of the French. Agriculture, cattle-breeding, fishing, and wine-growing are the chief employments of the inhabitants. Pop. 37,091.

NOWANUGGUR, no'-wa-nug-gur', a town of Goojerat, British India, on the south shore of the Gulf of Cutch. It is a large and busy town. Manf. Fine cloth, noted for excellence of fabric and beauty of dye.

NOXUBEE, nox'-u-be, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 29,874, more than two-thirds being coloured. Capital, MACON.

NOY, WILLIAM, noi, an eminent English lawyer, who, at the beginning of the reign of Charles I., sat in parliament, and opposed the court; but, being made attorney-general in 1631, he gave his adherence to the most unpopular measures, particularly that of ship-money, which was of his proposing. He wrote a "Treatise on the Grounds and Maxims of the Laws of England," the "Complete Lawyer," and other works.
Born in Cornwall about 1577; died 1634.

NOYON, nwoi-yawng', a town of France, department Oise, on the Vorse, 55 miles N.E. of Paris. There are a fine cathedral in the Romanesque style, built in the 13th and 14th centuries, and a bishop's palace. Manf. Linen, cotton, leather, hats, and stockings. Pop. 6,500.—Charlemagne had a palace here, and in 987 Hugo Capet was here crowned king of France. The town is the birthplace of John Calvin.

NUBIA, nu'-be-a, a country of East Africa, and a province of the vice-royalty of Egypt, inclosed between Egypt, the Nile, Abyssinia, and the Red Sea. It rises gradually from the plain of Egypt to the elevated plateau of Abyssinia, near the borders of which, on branches of the Abyssinian mountains, a height of 3,000 feet above the sea level is attained. Along the base of these mountains is the Kolla, a swampy region of great extent. In the northern part of the country the soil is poor, but of great fertility in the south, where the climate is very moist and insalubrious. In the north it is similar to that of Egypt. The productions are chiefly the grain called "dhourra;" also barley, French beans, lentils, sometimes watermelons, tobacco, indigo, dates, tamarinds, senna, and coffee. No fruit-trees are cultivated except palms, though the climate seems very well adapted to them. Ivory, ebony, gold-dust, tobacco, cotton, and salt are exported. Cattle, sheep, and goats are reared by the Arabs in the deserts; and the lion, buffalo, hippopotamus, rhinoceros, occasionally the elephant, the giraffe, and antelope are amongst its wild animals. Ferocious crocodiles abound in the streams; ostriches are numerous, and there are large serpents of the python species. One of the most remarkable features of this region consists in the magnificent remains of antiquity with which it is covered. Among the most remarkable are the rock temple of Abou-Simbel, the temple of Kelabshi, with sculptures representing the expeditions of Sesostris, and the temple of Semne.

Rivers.—The two branches of the Nile, and the Atbara.
Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, and salt.
Area.—431,210 square miles.
Pop.—1,000,000. There are two principal races, both Mahometans—the Berberines, inhabiting the northern part, and the Bisharis, or genuine Nubians, in the desert region. The latter are a fine race, and the women are remarkable for their modesty and simple manners. In the extreme south the inhabitants are of the negro type. Three different languages are spoken.
Chief Towns.—KHARTOUM the capital; DONGOLA, and SHENDY.
History.—Under the Pharaohs, the country was known as the kingdom of Cush, and afterwards was vaguely known to Roman geographers as Æthiopia above Egypt, and received its present name from the Nobatæ, or Nubats, a tribe from the western deserts who settled here in the 2nd and 3rd centuries, and established a Christian kingdom, conquered by the Mahometans, and broken up into various districts under semi-independent chiefs, in the 14th century. It was annexed to Egypt by Ibrahim Pacha in 1822.

NUBLE, nu'-bel, a province of Chili, South America, to the north of the province of Conception, of which it was formerly a portion. The soil is very productive, and the climate healthy. The principal products are grain, wine, and cattle. CHILLAN (named after the great volcano in the province), is the capital.

Rivers.—There are numerous streams descending from the Andes, the most important being the Itata (called also the Chillan), and the Nuble. The latter receives the Itata, and pursues a rapid course, through deep, wooded ravines, to the Pacific.
Area.—4,247 square miles.
Pop.—144,104.

NUCHA, or NUKHA, nook'-ha, a town of Asiatic Russia, in Transcaucasia, 120 miles S.E. of Tiflis, in the valley of the Kish-Tshai. It is surrounded by extensive mulberry groves and fruit gardens, and great numbers of silkworms are reared. Manf. Silk. Pop. 24,922.

NUCKOLLS, nuk'-ols, an almost uninhabited county of Nebraska, United States. Area, 576 square miles.

NUDDEA, nood-de-a', a town of British India, division of Burdwan, province of Lower Bengal, on the right bank of the Bhagnuttee, 60 miles N.W. of Calcutta. It was once the residence of a Hindoo sovereign. This town is the capital of the district of the same name. Area, 3,404 sq. m. Pop. 2,017,847.

NUECES, noo-ā'-ses, a river of Texas, United States, rising in lat. 30°, lon. 101° W., and after a course of 300 miles flowing by way of Corpus Christi Bay into the Gulf of Mexico.

NUECES, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 3,450 square miles. Pop. 7,673. The capital is Corpus Christi.

NUEVA SPARTA. (See MARGARITA.)

NUGGINA, nogg-gin'-na, a busy manufacturing town of the North West Provinces, British India, in the division of Rohilcund, 48 miles N.W. of Moradabad. Manf. Gun barrels, percussion locks, and ironware generally. Pop. about 20,000.

NUJEEBABAD, noo-jeeb-a-bad', a town of British India, in the North Western Provinces, division of Rohilcund, 31 miles S.E. of Hurdwar. A considerable transit trade is carried on.

NUMA-POMPILIUS, nū'-ma pom-pil'-i-us, according to tradition, second king of Rome, and successor of Romulus. He is said to have introduced among his subjects religious festivals and a code of laws, and to have reigned for 39 years a time of peace and happiness.

NUMENIUS, nu-mē'-ni-us, a Greek Christian philosopher of the 2nd century, was a native of Apamea, in Syria, and followed the opinions of Pythagoras and Plato; but he charged the latter philosopher with having stolen, without acknowledgment, from the works of the Jewish legislator, and therefore called him "the Greek Moses." Fragments of Numenius are extant.

Lived in the 2nd century.

NUMERIANUS, MARCUS AURELIUS, nu-me-ri-ai'-nus, son of the emperor Carus, by whom he was honoured with the title of Cæsar, and succeeded him, with his brother Carinus, in 283. He was murdered shortly after by his father-in-law, Arrius Aper, prefect of the Prætorians, who himself subsequently fell a sacrifice to the irritated soldiers.

Died 284.

NUMIDIA, nu-mid'-e-a, the name given by the Romans to a part of the north coast of Africa, nearly corresponding to the modern Algiers.

NUNEATON, nun-ē'-ton, a market-town of Warwickshire, on the Anker, 8 miles from Coventry. The church has a square tower, and there is a good free grammar school. Manf. Ribbons and cotton goods. Pop. 8,465.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

NUNEZ, ALVAR, noon'-naik, Spanish explorer, chief officer under Narvaez in the expedition to Florida, in 1527, after the shipwreck and death of whom he escaped to the coast, somewhere to the west of the mouth of the Mississippi, and made his way, suffering great hardships, to the Spanish settlements on the Pacific coast, occupying eight years in the journey. Having returned to Spain, he was appointed administrator of La Plata, and sailed in 1540, but was shipwrecked, and then explored Paraguay, and became engaged in conflict with the hostile tribes. After eight years he was recalled to Spain, when he was appointed a judge at Seville. He published a narrative of his voyages and adventures.

Born 1490; died at Seville, 1564.

NUORO, nu-ō'-ro, a town of the island of Sardinia, province of Sassari, 41 miles N.E. of Cagliari. There are a cathedral, monastery, and several educational establishments. Manf. Woollens and linen. There is a trade in oil, silk, cattle, wool, hides, and dairy produce. Pop. 4,800.

NUOVO LEON. (See LEON, NUOVO.)

NUREMBERG, or NÜRNBERG, nu'-rem-burg, an ancient town of Bavaria, province of Middle Franconia, on the Pegnitz, which divides it into two parts nearly equal, 96 miles from Munich. The river is crossed by many bridges, and the town is surrounded by two lines of fortified walls, with 70 round towers at intervals, and separated from each other by public walks and gardens. Of the public edifices, the chief are the castle or fort called Reichsfeste, the occasional residence of emperors in the middle ages. It is beautifully situated on elevated ground, commanding a noble prospect, and contains a gallery of paintings, mostly of the early German school. The public buildings are remarkably beautiful and interesting. In the courtyard is an old linden tree (now supported by iron bands) planted by Queen Cunegunde in the 11th century. The town-hall is one of the finest in Germany, and is adorned with works by Albert Dürer. The church of St. Lawrence, built between 1270 and 1478, has fine painted glass windows, wood-carvings, towers, and doorway, and contains a stone pix, to hold the vessels of the sacrament, which is of white stone, 64 feet high, and which cost the artist, Adam Kraft, five years' work, and was finished in 1500. Other fine churches are the cathedral, built in 1631, and St. Sebald's, both highly decorated and adorned with paintings and frescoes. In the latter is the tomb of St. Sebald, of bronze, adorned with nearly one hundred figures, and cast by Peter Vircher and his sons, who laboured on it for thirteen years. Among the literary-educational establishments for which the town is distinguished are a large public library, a polytechnic institution, training colleges, and gymnasium. In front of the cathedral is a beautiful gothic fountain, with groups of figures, and there are several other handsome fountains. There are numerous benevolent institutions. Nuremberg is especially associated with the triumphs of early German art and literature. Albrecht Dürer and Hans Sachs, the poet, were born and lived here. One of Longfellow's best known poems is descriptive of the associations of the town—"Quaint old town of toil and traffic, quaint old town of art and song." He says:—

"Here, when Art was still religion, with a simple, reverent heart, Lived and laboured Albrecht Dürer, the Evangelist of Art. . . .
Through these streets so broad and stately, these obscure and dismal lanes,
Walked of yore the Master-singers, chanting rude poetic strains. . . .
Here Hans Sachs, the cobbler-poet, laureate of the gentle craft, Wisest of the twelve wise masters, in huge folios sang and laughed."

The houses of Dürer and Sachs still remain, the latter now used as a tavern. Manf. Carvings in metal, bone, and wood, toys, musical, mathematical, and optical instruments. A considerable transit trade is carried on, favoured by the central position in connection with a network of railways. Pop. 116,193.—This town was, in 938, the seat of the first German diet; in 1219, the emperor, Henry V., raised it to the rank of a free imperial city, and in the 15th century it was one of the most important commercial cities in central Europe. It suffered greatly in the Thirty Years' War, but at the reorganisation of the states of the old German empire in 1803, it retained its independence, with a territory of 483 square miles; but three years afterwards Napoleon annexed it to the kingdom of Bavaria.

NURPUR, noor-poor', a town of the Punjab, British India, on the slopes of the Himalaya. There is a large and well-stocked bazaar, and an important trade is carried on. Manf. Shawls. Pop. 8,000.

NÜRTINGEN, ner'-ting-en, a town of Würtemberg, in the Black Forest, on the Neckar, 14 miles S.E. of Stuttgart. There are an old church and a castle. Manf. Woollens and cotton, and there are dyeworks. Pop. 4,500.

NUSCO, noos'-ko, a town of Italy, province of Avellino, with several convents and a cathedral, 46 miles S.E. of Naples. Pop. 3,000.

NYANZA, VICTORIA. (See VICTORIA NYANZA.)

NYASSI LAKE, nyas'-se. (See AFRICA.)

NYBORG, ni'-borg, ("new castle") a seaport of Denmark, on the island of Funen, on a bay of the Great Belt, 17 miles S.E. of Odensee. It is strongly fortified and has a good harbour and ship-building docks. All vessels passing through the Great Belt pay the dues here.

NYE, PHILIP, ni, a nonconformist divine. In 1620 he became curate of St. Michael's, Cornhill. Becoming a Puritan, he went to Holland and did not return till the civil wars, when he was chosen a member of the assembly of divines. He was a zealous champion of the Solemn League and Covenant: he wrote several sermons and tracts. Butler whimsically alludes in his "Hudibras," to "Philip Nye's thanksgiving beard."

Born in Sussex, about 1596; died 1672.

NYE, a county of Nevada, United States. Area, 24,200 square miles. Pop. 1,100. The chief place is Belmont.

NYIREGYHAZA, nyir'-e-dya'-zar, a town of Hungary, county of Szabolcs, 30 miles N. of Debreczin. It has churches for Greeks, Protestants, and Catholics. There are mineral springs, soda and salt-works. Important annual fairs are held. Pop. 22,000.

NYKERK, or NIEUWKERK, ne'-kirk, a town of the Netherlands, province of Guelderland, on the Veluwe, near the Zuider Zee, 25 miles N. W. of Arnheim. There is a good harbour connected by a wide canal with the sea. The principal buildings include a Reformed church, Roman Catholic chapels, synagogue and orphan house. There is a good trade in cattle, dairy produce, and tobacco, grown in the neighbourhood. Pop. 8,000.

NYKÖPING, ni-che(r)'-ping, a seaport of Sweden, on a bay of the Baltic, 60 miles S.W. of Stockholm. The old castle, some ruins of which remain, has a remarkable history. King Valdemar of Sweden, was imprisoned here, after his dethronement in 1288, for 14 years; and in 1317, King Birger, left his brothers Eric and Valdemar to starve to death in a dungeon, the key of which he threw into the sea. The people of the town, horror-stricken at such an atrocity, seized the castle, and demolished the greater part of it. Manf. Cotton goods, hosiery, machinery, paper, and tobacco. Ship-building is carried on. Pop. 4,900. —The town was taken by the Russians, and the fortifications destroyed, in 1719.

NYMPHÆ, nim'-fe, 'Nymphs,' in Greek mythology, female divinities of inferior rank, generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land, and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades and Hamadryades; others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades; some presided over hills and dales, and were called Napææ, &c. Of the sea nymphs, some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also rivers, fountains, streams and lakes. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle, and sometimes holding a vase, from which they seemed to pour water.

NYON, or NEUS, ne'-one, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Vaud, on the north-west bank of the Lake of Geneva, 13 miles N.E. of Geneva. It is old and irregularly built, and there is an old Gothic castle on a height. Manf. Leather and pottery. Pop. 3,000.

NYONS, ne'-awng, a town of France, department Drôme, on the Aigues, 33 miles from Avignon. The town is walled, and the bridge across the river is of Roman construction, with a single arch 100 feet in span and 65 high. Manf. Woollens, leather, soap, and pottery. Pop. 3,600.

NYSTADT, ne(r)'-stad, a seaport of European Russia, in Finland, on the Gulf of Bothnia, 36 miles N.W. of Abo. Manf. Coarse woollens, linen and hosiery. There is a large trade in provisions and timber. Pop. 3,300.

O.

OAKHAM, oke'-ham, the county town of Rutlandshire, in the vale of Catmos, 12 miles W. of Stamford. Its church, a fine building, in the Perpendicular style, with a lofty spire, was restored in 1858. A portion of the old castle, now mostly in ruins, is used as the county-hall. There is a free grammar school, founded in 1581. Pop. 10,978.—A station on the Midland Railway.

OAKLAND, oke'-land, a town of California, United States, on the eastern shore of San Francisco Bay, opposite San Francisco. There are six churches and a college. Pop. 34,555.

OAKLAND, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 41,000. The capital is Pontiac.

OAKO, or HAKO, a territory of south-western Africa, in Kimbunda country. The surface is generally mountainous, but there are some extensive plains. The climate is moderate and healthy. One of the chiefs is nominally the ruler, but others are virtually independent. An active trade in wax is carried on. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 9°—10° 25′ S. Lon. 15°—16° 20′ E.

OAMARU, o'-a-ma-roo', a town and port of shipment of Otago province, Middle Island, New Zealand, on the south-eastern coast. Pop. 6,500.

OANNES, o-an'-nes, in Babylonian mythology, a divinity, combining the forms of a man and a fish, possibly identical with the Phœnician Dagon.

OASTLER, RICHARD, ost'-ler, a politician of humble origin, who, from his untiring efforts in behalf of workers in factories to procure limited hours of labour and security for life and limb, obtained the name of the "Factory King." He was an earnest advocate of negro emancipation, the chief promoter of the ten hours' movement, commenced in 1829, and spent seventeen years of his life, from 1830 to 1847, in agitating for the enactment of the Factory bill, which was passed in the last named year, to limit the hours spent in work by female and young persons.

Born 1789; died 1861.

OATES, TITUS, otes, an infamous character of the 17th century. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and Trinity College, Cambridge, and was for some time an Anabaptist preacher, but afterwards obtained orders in the church of England, and was appointed chaplain of a ship of war. Being dismissed the service for his immoral conduct, he turned Roman Catholic and entered the Jesuits' College, Valladolid, from which he was soon expelled for misconduct; but professing great penitence, was permitted to enter the college at St. Omer, where he again disgraced himself, and the Jesuits cast him off entirely. He then became a lecturer in London, and, in conjunction with Dr. Tongue, invented a pretended Popish plot, of which several persons were accused, on the testimony of Oates (who invented a series of improbable lies and supported them by the most atrocious perjury), and executed. For this discovery Oates received a pension of £900 per annum. In the succeeding reign, however, he was convicted of perjury, pilloried, whipped with appalling severity through the streets of London, and sentenced to be imprisoned for life; but obtained his release at the Revolution, was actually considered to be a Protestant martyr, and granted a pension of £300. He lived for 17 years after in obscurity.

Born about 1620; died 1705.

OAXACA, or GUAXACA, wa-ha'-ka, a state of the republic of Mexico, bounded N. by Vera Cruz, E. by Guatemala, W. by La Puebla, and S. by the Pacific Ocean. Mountainous in the N., and otherwise highly fertile. Rivers. The Rio Verde and Tehuantepec. Pro. Wheat, maize, cotton, sugar, cocoa, silk, and cochineal. Minerals. Gold and silver. Area, 33,591 square miles. Pop. 761,274.

OAXACA, the capital of the above state, 210 miles S.E. of the city of Mexico, in the delightful valley of Guaxaca, watered by the Rio Verde. The town is laid out in the form of an oblong square, and the streets are wide and well paved, interspersed with plantations on which the cochineal insect feeds. It has a bishop's palace, cathedral, and a town-house, built with stone of a sea-green colour. Manf. Silk, cotton, sugar, and chocolate. Pop. 28,000.

OBADIAH, o-ba-di'-a, the fourth of the minor prophets. Nothing is known of his personal history.

Lived in the 6th century B.C.

OBAN, o'-ban, a parliamentary borough, (one of the Ayr burghs), and seaport of Scotland, in Argyleshire, situate on a fine bay of a semicircular form, in the Sound of Mull, 20 miles N.W. of Inverary. It has risen rapidly, and is well adapted for trade, having an excellent harbour. Manf. Silk and straw hats. It has a trade in wool, whiskey, slates, and fish. Pop. 2,426.—There is communication with Liverpool, Glasgow, Tobermory, and the Western Islands, by steam-packets.

OBBO, ob'-bo, a territory of Central Africa, north of the Atabbi, an affluent of the Nile. The country is undulating and has an average elevation of 3,000 feet above the sea level, rising towards the south. The soil is rich, producing abundance of yams, wild fruit, tobacco and flax. Extensive tracts are in jungle, abounding in elephants, rhinoceroses, and buffaloes. The rainfall extends over nine months of the year. Lat. 4° N. Lon. 32° 30' E.

OBDORSK, ob-dorsk', a town of Asiatic Russia, government of Tobolsk, on the Polui, near its confluence with the Obe. A large annual fair is held, and an important trade is carried on.

OBER-AMMERGAU, o'-bair-am'-mair-gou, a village of Bavaria, province of Upper Bavaria, in the valley of the Ammer, 46 miles S.W. of Munich. The place is famous for the performance every ten years, on 12 consecutive Sundays, of a play representing the passion and death of Christ, in which 350 actors and 80 members of orchestra and chorus are engaged. They are all inhabitants of the village, and the dramatic power exhibited, and the manner in which the sacred drama is produced in a large open-air theatre, attract thousands of visitors. The celebration originated in a vow taken in 1634 to perform the drama every ten years if the village escaped the plague then prevalent. The chief industry of the place, besides agriculture, is carving on wood. Pop. 1,109.

OBERLAND, o'-bair-land, Switzerland, comprises the canton of Berne, south of the Lake of Thun, with the adjacent parts of Uri and Unterwalden. More restricted, it applies to the valleys of Grindelwald, Hasli, and Lauterbrunnen.

OBERLIN, JÉRÉMIE JACQUES, o'-bair-lin, a learned writer in German and French, who, in 1763, was appointed librarian at Strasburg, and afterwards became professor of logic and metaphysics in the university of that city. He wrote a number of curious and learned works; such as "Dissertations upon the Troubadours of Alsace," "Essays on the Dialects of Lorraine," also several valuable elementary manuals in German, and produced good editions of Horace, Tacitus, and other classic authors.

Born at Strasburg, 1735; died at the same city, 1806.

OBERLIN, JEAN FRÉDÉRIC, brother of the preceding, Protestant divine, and philanthropist, who, after completing his studies at the university of Strasburg, entered into orders as a Lutheran divine. In 1766 he became pastor of Waldbach, in the Ban-de-la-Roche, then a wild and sterile district, lying on the western slope of a range of mountains to the east of the Vosges. He found the inhabitants of that district in a condition bordering upon barbarism; but he succeeded in causing them to make roads to Strasburg, to build a bridge across the river Bruche, at Rothau; to plant fruit trees, and to convert large tracts of pasturage into arable land. He also built schoolhouses, where reading, writing, arithmetic, and the principles of agriculture were taught; and, at his own expense, printed books and an almanac for the use of the people. Straw-plaiting, knitting, dyeing, and other employments were organised by him. During fifty-nine years, he laboured at these noble schemes, creating industry and happiness where he had found ignorance and barbarism. He received the decoration of the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and, in 1818, was voted the gold medal of the Royal and Central Agricultural Society of Paris. After his death, the inhabitants followed the remains of their "dear father" to the grave; and all the Protestant, and several of the Roman Catholic clergy of the district joined in the funeral procession.

Born at Strasburg, 1740; died 1826.

OBERNAI, or OBEREHORHEIM, o-bair-nai', a town of Lower Alsace, Germany, 14 miles N. of Schelestadt. There are a large town-hall and college, and the remains of an imperial palace in the vicinity. Manf. Cotton goods, leather, soap, glue, nails, and pottery. Pop. 4,900.

OBERON, o'-ber-on, in fairy mythology, king of the fairies. He is first mentioned in the old French romance, "Huon de Bordeaux," on which the modern German poem by Wieland "Oberon," and Planché's libretto for Weber's opera "Oberon," were founded. In English literature the name is most familiar to us from the introduction of Oberon as a character in Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

OBERSTEIN, o-bair-stine', a market town of the duchy of Oldenburg, Germany, on the Nahe. There are a castle, two churches, and a court-house. Agates and other valuable stones are found in the vicinity. Pop. 3,700.

OBERTYN, o'-ber-tin, a town of the Austrian empire, in Galicia. Very large cattle markets are held. Pop. 4,300.—The Turks and Moldavians were signally defeated here in 1529 and 1532.

OBI, or OB, o'-be, a great river of Asiatic Russia, in Western Siberia, rising in the Attai mountains in two branches, the Bia and the Katunga, which unite to form the Obi at the town of Biisk. Lat. 52° 30' N. Lon. 85° E. After a north-western, western, and then northern and eastern course of 2,000 miles (having received on the right bank, the Tom, Tchulim, and Ket, and on the left, the great river Irtish, it flows into the Gulf of Obi.

OBI, GULF OF, an inlet of the Arctic Ocean, 450 miles long and 100 miles wide.

OBIDOS, o'-be-dose, a town of Portugal, 44 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 3,000.—Here, in 1808, an engagement took place between the French and English.

OBION, o'-be-on, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 22,912. of whom about 2,500 are coloured. The capital is Troy.

OBRENOVITCH, MILOSCH, o-bren'-o-vitch, a Servian leader against the Turks. He was originally a pig-driver, but rose by force of character to head the resistance of the cruelly-treated Servians. In 1814, the Turks were compelled to recognise him as prince of Servia. His reign was marked by atrocious brutalities and extortions; but he continued to maintain his position, and to make friends of his old opponents, the Turks, so that, in 1830, the Sultan decreed that the title of prince should be hereditary in his family. His continued cruelties and infamous morals, however, became at length unbearable, and in 1839, he was driven into exile, having, it is said, accumulated about £800,000 by extortion from his unhappy subjects; but was recalled to the throne in 1858.

Born 1780; died 1860.

O'BRIEN, WILLIAM SMITH, o-bri'-en, an Irish politician, second son of Sir Edward O'Brien, and descended from an ancient Irish family. He was educated at Harrow, and Trinity College, Cambridge, entered parliament for Ennis in 1826. In July, 1848, as head of the "Young Ireland" party, he endeavoured, with Meagher, and other self-styled patriots, to excite an insurrection, but the effort collapsed, and he was arrested for treason, tried, and condemned to death, a sentence which was commuted into transportation for life. In 1856 he received the royal pardon, and returned to Ireland, abstaining from any further interference with politics.

Born Oct. 17, 1803; died at Bangor, 1864.

O'BRIEN, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 4,155. The capital is O'Brien.

OBSEQUENS, JULIUS, ob'-se-quens, a Latin author, who wrote a work entitled "De Prodigiis," which contained a record of marvellous events, great and small, true and apocryphal, which took place from the foundation of Rome to the time of Augustus. A portion of the book was lost, but was supplied, in an imitation of the author's manner, by Lycostenes, in the 6th century.

Lived early in the 4th century.

OCANA, o-kan'-ya, a town of Spain, province of Toledo, 35 miles S. of Madrid. It is a very old place, fortified in former ages, and still preserving part of its ancient walls. Manf. Soap, earthenware, worsted stockings, tiles, and oil. Pop. 3,100.—A battle was fought here in 1809, between the French and Spaniards, who suffered a complete defeat, and the town was sacked by the French.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, WILLIAM OF, ok'-am, an English scholastic divine of the 14th century. He is supposed to have been educated at Oxford, and then to have gone to Paris, where he was the disciple of Duns Scotus, and obtained the name of the invincible doctor. Philip II. of France being involved in a quarrel with Pope Boniface VII., who wanted to levy contributions in France without the permission of the king, Occam vigorously supported the latter, and boldly declared that it was heresy to assert that Popes had any authority in temporal affairs. Occam was a member of the order of Franciscans, the general of which, Michael de Cezena, appointed him to write in defence of the priests who asserted that ecclesiastics should not accumulate wealth, against Pope John XXII., who excommunicated both; but Occam was protected by the king of Bavaria. Occam was an independent thinker of great ability, and certainly the most rational of all the famous schoolmen of his time.

Born at Ockham, Surrey, 1270; died at Munich, 1347.

OCEAN, o'-she-an, a county of New Jersey, United States. Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 13,800. The capital is Toms River.

OCEANA, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 780 square miles. Pop. 11,699. The capital is Hart.

OCEANIA, o'-she-ai'-ne-a, a name applied by some modern geographers to the Asiatic Archipelago, Australasia, and Polynesia.

OCEANUS, o-se-ai'-nus, in Greek mythology a powerful deity of the sea, who, according to Homer, was father of all the gods. He is generally represented as an old man, with long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea.

OCELLUS, o-sel'-lus, a Greek philosopher, of the school of Pythagoras, called, on account of his birth-place, Lucanus. He wrote a work on kings and kingdoms, of which only some fragments remain; but his work, "On the Nature of the Universe," is extant, and was translated into English by Thomas Taylor, in 1831.

Lived in the 5th century B.C.

OCHIL HILLS, ok'-il. (See SCOTLAND.)

OCHRIDA, ok'-ri-da, a town of Turkey in Europe, in Roumelia, on the north shore of Lake Ochrida, 65 miles S.E. of Durazzo. It is fortified, and the residence of a Turkish governor and a Greek archbishop. A large trade is carried on in dried fish, caught in the lake. Pop. 8,000.

OCKLEY, SIMON, ok'-ley, a learned English divine, was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.D., and where, in 1711, he was chosen professor of Arabic. His most important works were, "The History of the present Jews throughout the World," "Introduction to the Study of the Oriental Languages," and "The History of the Saracens."

Born at Exeter, 1678; died 1720.

OCKMULGEE, ok-mul'-jee, a river of Georgia, United States, rising in three branches near the centre of the State. It joins the Oconee, the united streams forming the Altamaha, after a south-eastern course of 200 miles.

OCONEE, o-ko'-nee, a river of Georgia, rising in the north-eastern corner of the state, and joining the Ockmulgee after a course of 250 miles.

O'CONNELL, DANIEL, o-kon'-uel, called in his day the "Liberator of Ireland," and the "Great Agitator," was descended from an ancient but impoverished family, the son of a small landed proprietor in Ireland, by whom he was sent to France to be educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood. After residing at both St. Omer's and Douai, he, at the outburst of the French Revolution, fled from St. Omer's, and reached the shores of England in safety. In 1794 he commenced the study of the law in Lincoln's Inn, and four years afterwards was called to the bar. His first public speech was against the proposed union of the Irish and English legislatures, and was delivered at Dublin, in which city he obtained a fair amount of legal practice. But, about the year 1803, he began to take a leading part in urging the claims of the Catholics upon the attention of the English legislature. He originated the famous Catholic Association, and so effectually organised the agitation for Catholic emancipation, that the object was ultimately attained. In 1828 he was elected to represent the county of Clare in parliament, but was not allowed to take his seat, in consequence of the civil disabilities under which he, as a Roman Catholic, laboured. The passing of the Emancipation Bill, however, enabled him to enter the House of Commons in the following year. He afterwards represented the county of Kerry, the city of Dublin (twice), town of Kilkenny, and the county of Cork. From this period till the year 1843 he laboured incessantly at the great movement he had inaugurated, and which was called by himself the "Repeal of the Union." In the last-named year, however, he was convicted of sedition, sentenced to pay a fine of £2,000, and to be imprisoned for a year. An appeal to the House of Lords subsequently led to the reversal of this judgment; but, from that time, his power to excite the political sympathies of his countrymen appeared greatly to decline. In 1846 he supported the Whig government, by which he offended many of his followers, who separated from him, forming the "Young Ireland" party. Exhausted by his long labours, he went to Italy, in 1847, to recruit his shattered health, but expired at Genoa, on his way to Rome. As a popular orator he exhibited almost unrivalled powers. His tall and commanding figure, rich and powerful voice, and his mingled eloquence, humour, and command of invective, made him the most popular speaker of his time. He was the author of "A Memoir of Ireland, Native and Saxon," and of some pamphlets.

Born in Kerry, Ireland, 1775; died 1847.

O'CONNOR, o-kon'-nor, the name of a dynasty of Irish kings who reigned in Connaught, before the conquest of Ireland by the English. The most remarkable of the name was Torlogh O'Conner, who sought to gain power over the whole island, but found a formidable rival in Murtogh O'Brien. Roderick O'Connor reigned about 1171, when Henry II. of England invaded the country. He protested against that act; but Pope Adrian IV. conceded to the English king the possession of his territory.

O'CONNOR, ARTHUR, a leader in the Irish rebellion of 1798. He was admitted to the bar in 1788, and became a member of the Irish parliament. A speech he delivered in favour of Catholic emancipation so offended his uncle, lord Longueville, that he disinherited him. He then became one of the directory of the United Irishmen. He was twice arrested, and once tried for high treason, but acquitted. He then went to France, where he entered the army, and was appointed general of division by Napoleon. In 1807 he married the daughter of the philosopher Condorcet, whose works he edited. He published several works on the condition of Ireland, and a volume against the Bourbons and monarchy in general.

Born 1763; died at Nemours, 1852.

O'CONNOR, FEARGUS EDWARD, Chartist. He was returned to parliament for the county of Cork in 1832, and again in 1835, but then unseated on petition. He then joined the Chartist agitation, and became famous as the originator of a land scheme, and the editor of a newspaper, The Northern Star. In 1847 he was returned to parliament for Nottingham; and in 1848 headed the abortive movement connected with the meeting at Kennington Common, and the presentation of the Chartist petition to the House; but in 1852 he exhibited, in the House of Commons, symptoms of insanity, and the remainder of his life was passed under restraint.

Born in Meath, 1796; died in London, 1855.

OCONTO, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 2,268 square miles. Pop. 9,848. The capital is Oconto.

OCOSINGO, o-ko-sin'-go, a town of Mexico, state of Chiapas, 65 miles S.E. of Ciudad Real. In the neighbourhood are some remarkable aboriginal monuments. Pop. 4,000.

OCTAVIA, ok-tai'-vi-a, a Roman lady, daughter of Caius Octavius, and sister to the Emperor Augustus. She was first married to Claudius Marcellus, by whom she had two children, before his death, which happened a little after the war of Persia. She then married Antony, to whom she behaved with the greatest respect. He deserted her, however, for the sake of Cleopatra, and his conduct was so base as greatly to inflame the people against him. But the loss of her son, Marcellus, an accomplished youth, gave her the deepest concern. Although so deeply injured, she exhibited the most forgiving spirit, and after the death of Cleopatra, actually took care of her illegitimate children by Antony.

Died 11 B.C.

OCTAVIA, daughter of Claudius and Messalina. She was betrothed to Lucius Silanus, but that marriage was broken off by the intrigues of Agrippina, and Octavia married Nero, who afterwards divorced her, and, at the instigation of Poppæa, sent her to a small island, where she was put to death, at the age of 20 years.
Died 62.

OCTAVIANUS, or OCTAVIUS CÆSAR. (See AUGUSTUS.)

ODEMIRA, o-de-mē'-ra, a town of Portugal, province of Alagarve, on the left bank of the Mira, 16 miles S.W. of Ourique. There is a large trade in grain. Pop. 3,100.

ODENATUS, od'-e-nai'-tus, king of Palmyra, who made war against Sapor, king of Persia, with great success. The emperor Gallienus associated Odenatus with him in the empire, and conferred the title of Augusta on his wife, Zenobia. Odenatus was assassinated, with his son Herodian, by Meonius, a relation, on whom they had conferred many favours. Zenobia then assumed the government, under the title of queen of the East.
Died 267.

ODENKIRCHEN, o-den-keersh'-en, a town of Prussia, province of Dusseldorf, on the left bank of the Niers, 15 miles S.W. of Dusseldorf. Manf. Cotton, linen and silk goods, and leather. Pop. 7,300.

ODENSE, o'-den-se, ("Odin's Island"), a town of Denmark, capital of the island of Funen, and the oldest city of the kingdom, on a river which runs into a large bay, about a mile from the town. The cathedral, in the Early Gothic style, was founded in 1086, by St. Knud, who, with several of the early Danish kings, is buried here. There are a college for ladies, with a good library, and several excellent educational institutions. Pop. 20,804. Lat. 55° 25′ N. Lon. 10° 20′ E.—This is supposed to have been the first city established by Odin. A bishopric was founded in the 10th century, and at a diet held here in 1527, the Lutheran church was declared to be the established church of Denmark.

ODENWALD, o'-den-vald, a mountain region traversing Hesse Darmstadt, Germany, and extending between the Neckar and Main rivers. It is 45 miles long, culminating in the summit of Katzanbuckil, 2,300 feet above the sea.

ODER, o'-der, a great river of Germany, the course of which is chiefly in the Prussian states. It rises in Moravia, about 1,000 feet above the sea-level, and 18 miles from Olmutz; enters Silesia, flows through that province, Brandenburg, and Pomerania; forms the large maritime lake called the Haff, and runs into the Baltic by three mouths, called the Peene, the Swine, and the Dievenow. The river is more than 500 miles in length, and is connected with several canals, which greatly facilitate the commerce of the countries through which it flows. The most important tributaries are the Oppa, Neisse, Ohlau, Klodnitz, and Ihna.

ODERAN, o'-de-ran, a town of Saxony, 32 miles from Zwickau. Manf. Woollens and cottons. Pop. 5,000.

ODERBERG, o-der-bairg', a town of Prussia, 54 miles N.E. of Potsdam. A trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 3,200.

ODERZO, o-derts'-o, a town of northern Italy, province of Treviso, on the Merticano, 25 miles N.E. of Venice. Pop. 5,700.

ODESCALCHI, MARC ANTONIO, o-des-kal'-ke, a member of a noble Italian family, famous for works of philanthropy. He entered the priesthood, but refused all preferments, and established an hospital in his own house at Rome, receiving the poor and destitute of all nations. He added other houses, until it contained 1,000 beds, and at his death bequeathed all his property to support the institution (now known as the hospital of St. Gall), and his cousin, Pope Innocent XI. afterwards enlarged it to receive 3,000 patients.
Born at Como, 1620; died 1670.

ODESCALCHI, TOMMASO, another member of the same family, almoner to Innocent XI., and founder of San Michele, an institution in which poor boys are educated and taught a trade.
Died 1692.

ODESCALCHI, CARLO, cardinal vicar under Gregory XVI. He resigned his rank, and became a Jesuit. In 1816 he founded an industrial school for poor girls.
Died 1848.

ODESSA, o-des'-sa, a fortified seaport and commercial city of European Russia, in the government of Kherson, on a small bay of the north-west coast of the Black Sea, between the mouths of the Dniester and the Dnieper, 52 miles E. of the mouth of the former river. It is fortified in the modern style, four large batteries protecting the harbour, which is formed by two large moles. There is an inner harbour capable of accommodating 300 vessels. The roadstead is very extensive, and the anchorage safe in summer. Vessels of the largest size can approach close to the shore. The town is neatly built of stone, the streets being wide, straight, and crossing each other at right angles. The principal buildings are a large number of churches, among them the cathedral of St. Nicholas, the Admiralty court, the custom-house, and the hospital, all adjoining the harbour; the exchange and the theatre. The establishments for education are a high school of law, lyceum, on the plan of similar institutions in France, and schools for trade and navigation; also schools for the instruction of girls. There is a fine promenade along the face of the cliff, a broad flight of 204 stairs giving access to the shore. On the promenade is a statue of the Duc de Richelieu, who greatly improved the town, and who was killed in the bombardment by the Allies in 1854. Odessa being occasionally resorted to for sea-bathing, public baths have been constructed. The town is lighted with gas, and in 1873, a much-needed ample supply of water from the Dniester was brought to the town. A railway, opened in 1872, connects it with the most important towns of southern Russia. The great article of export is corn from the Ukraine, and neighbouring provinces; and wool, hides, tallow, and other articles are shipped; the value of the exports being more than £7,000,000 annually. Pop. About 217,000.—Odessa was the Odessus of the Greeks, and the site of a Hellenic colony before the Turks took possession of it. At the beginning of the 15th century the Turks had a fortress here, which was taken from them by the Russians in 1790, though it was not until 1793 that the nucleus of the present town and port began to take shape. To the Duc de Richelieu, a French emigré in the Russian service, and long governor of the town, Odessa owes its first start on the road to prosperity. It is now the chief commercial town in the Black Sea, and, after

St. Petersburg and Riga, the third city of the Russian Empire.

ODEYPOOR, o-de-poor', a small state of British India, on the south-west frontier of Bengal. The chief town is of the same name. Area, 2,506 square miles. Pop. 133,000.

ODIN, o'-din, the greatest of the Scandinavian mythic heroes, and according to the Sagas, or poetic chronicles, the chief divinity of Scandinavian mythology. Some modern writers, especially Sturleson and Siehm, discover the origin of the myth in the adventures of Odin, a Scythian chief, who having been defeated by the Romans, went northward to Scandinavia, and by his talents and valour established a supremacy, announcing himself as the founder of a new religion, and receiving divine honours. The subject is enveloped in mystery.

ODO, o'-do, archbishop of Canterbury. He was the son of a Dane, who took part in the invasion of England in 870. Being converted to Christianity, he entered the church, but continued to display the warlike disposition he had inherited. He was made bishop of Ramsbury in 926, and was appointed archbishop of Canterbury by king Edmund in 942. He carried out many ecclesiastical changes, separated the clergy from their wives, and introduced the Benedictine rule into the monasteries, but employed military force so freely that he became odious. His most atrocious exercise of authority was the forcible separation of the young king Edwy from his wife, Elgiva, whom he branded in the face with hot irons.

Died 958.

ODO, half brother of William the Conqueror, who appointed him bishop of Bayeux, 1049. He accompanied William to England, and took part in the battle of Hastings, for which he was rewarded by a grant of the town of Dover, and the earldom of Kent. In 1080 he wasted the county of Durham with fire and sword, and having obtained immense wealth, employed it in unscrupulous bribery to obtain election as pope. He started on a journey to Rome with a great retinue, but was arrested by order of William, and kept a prisoner at Rouen till the king's death, after which he was restored to liberty, and reinstated as earl of Kent. He joined in a conspiracy against William Rufus, but was besieged in Rochester Castle, and compelled to surrender. He then went to Normandy, where he acquired great influence over duke Robert, and in 1091 advised the capture of prince Henry of England, with whose custody he was charged. This turbulent prelate died on his way to the Holy Land.

Born in Normandy, 1032; died at Palermo, 1096.

ODOACER, o-do'-a-ser, a celebrated Gothic chieftain, son of the ambassador of Attila, at Constantinople, and who originally served among the barbarian auxiliaries which the emperors of the West had employed to protect Italy. He revolted against the emperor Augustulus, whom he seized at Ravenna and put into prison. Odoacer then proclaimed himself king of Italy, but rejected the imperial titles of Cæsar and Augustus. He allotted to his Gothic followers a third of the conquered territories; but nevertheless governed Italy with the greatest moderation. In 489, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, marched from the Danube, and defeated Odoacer in several battles. Odoacer was compelled to shut himself up in Ravenna, where he held out for more than three years. In 493 he surrendered to Theodoric, who promised to spare his life, but caused him to be assassinated at a banquet shortly afterwards.

Died 493.

O'DONNELL, LEOPOLD, o-don'-nel, duke of Tetuan and marshal of Spain, a modern Spanish general and statesman. He was descended from an ancient Irish family, early entered the military service, and reached the grade of colonel in his 25th year. Upon the death of Ferdinand VII., in 1832, he espoused the cause of Maria-Christina, and was a faithful adherent to her fortunes until her forced abdication of the regency in 1836, when he took refuge in France. In the meanwhile, he had been created general and count of Lucena. After the fall of Espartero, in 1843, General O'Donnell was enabled to return to Spain, and was soon afterwards sent to Cuba, as captain-general; in which capacity he acquired a very large fortune, and was, it is said, far from hostile to the slave-trade. After his return to Spain, he was appointed director-general of infantry. Being implicated in a conspiracy at the beginning of the year 1854, he was compelled to secrete himself; but soon afterwards left his retreat, and put himself at the head of the insurrection, which resulted in a change of ministry, Espartero being commanded to compose a new one, in which O'Donnell held the department of war. After being eclipsed during some time by Narvaez, he at length succeeded in effecting his rival's overthrow, and returned to power in 1858. In the following year, while holding the office of prime minister, he took the command of the Spanish forces sent against Morocco. In that command he was successful; he caused the enemy to capitulate, and to cede to Spain some territory, as well as to pay a large sum. Upon his return to Spain, he was created duke of Tetuan, and remained prime minister till 1866, when he was superseded by Narvaez, and retired to Paris.

Born 1809; died at Biarritz, 1867.

ODRAU, od'-rou, a town of the Austrian empire, in Silesia, on the Oder, near the Moravian frontier. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton goods. Four yearly markets are held. Pop. 3,700.

ŒCOLAMPADIUS, JOANNES, e-ko-lam-pad'-di-us, the Latinised name of Johann Hausschein, German divine, who studied at Heidelberg and Bologna in 1522, became professor of divinity and principal preacher at Basel, where he met with Erasmus, and assisted him in editing the New Testament. He subsequently exposed the abuses of the Romish church, and exhorted the Swiss to embrace the principles of the Reformation; but, in 1525, he joined with Zuinglius against Luther in the dispute relative to the sacrament, and wrote a learned treatise on the subject. Mosheim calls him one of the most learned men of his century, and it was owing to his exertions that the Reformation took root in Switzerland.

Born at Weinsberg, Suabia, 1482; died at Basel, 1531.

ŒDENBURG, e'-den-boorg, a town of Hungary, on the Ikva, 36 miles S.E. of Vienna. There are two Roman Catholic and a Protestant church and two convents. The tower steeple is very lofty, and lined with copper. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods, glass, cutlery, earthenware, potash, nitre, tobacco, and refined sugar. Several important annual fairs are held. Pop. 22,600, chiefly Germans.

ŒDERAN, e-der-an', a town of Saxony, circle Zwickau, on the Hölzelbach, 30 miles S.W. of Dresden. Manf. Woollens and cotton, leather, tobacco, and pottery. Pop. 6,000.

ŒDIPUS, e'-di-pus, in Greek legend, a son of Laius, king of Thebes, and Jocasta. He killed his father, not knowing him, as the oracle had predicted he would, and to avoid which he had been deserted as an infant. He afterwards went to Thebes, where the cruelty of the Sphinx had become an object of public concern; and, as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the monster, Creon, who, at the death of Laius, had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: "What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three?" This was left for Œdipus to explain: he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and, in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed its head against a rock, and perished. As the death of Laius had never been examined, Œdipus wished to discover the murderer, and, at length, found that himself had killed his father. In the excess of his grief, he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his own sons. The manner of his death is singular: it is said that the earth opened, and Œdipus disappeared into its depths.

ŒHLENSCHLÄGER, ADAM GOTTLOB, e(r)'-len-shlai'-ger, the greatest Scandinavian poet, whose father was German and his mother Danish. His father was at first the organist, and afterwards the steward of the king of Denmark's palace at Fredericksburg, where the early youth of the future poet was spent. He was educated for a mercantile career, and at the age of 16 was placed in a counting-house; but being seized with a desire to appear on the stage, he obtained an engagement in the theatre of Copenhagen. He soon quitted this pursuit, however, entered as a student at the university of Copenhagen, and devoted himself to the law, which was in turn deserted for literature. In 1801 he witnessed the attack made by Lord Nelson upon the Danish fleet. "That contest," he afterwards wrote, "inspired the Danes with a taste for poetry, as the battles of Marathon and Salamis did the Greeks, and the destruction of the Spanish armada the English, in the time of Elizabeth." In the following year he produced a small volume of poems, which instantly brought him fame. His next work was a play, entitled "Aladdin," which was founded upon the celebrated story in the "Arabian Nights," and which placed him at the head of the poets of his country. In 1805 he was granted a travelling stipend by the government; whereupon he went to Germany, and while in that country composed some of his best works, in the native language of his father. He witnessed the battles of Auerstadt and Jena before leaving Germany, immediately after which he repaired to Paris, where he wrote his finest work, the tragedy of "Palnatoke." He next visited Rome, where he wrote his "Correggio," and became the friend of Thorwaldsen. In 1810 he returned to his native country, and received a cordial reception at the hands of the king and queen of Denmark. Shortly afterwards he married, and during the succeeding five years he continued to produce plays, but inferior to those he had already composed. In 1816 he again went to Germany and France, but returned after an absence of twelve months. In 1829 he went to Sweden, where he was received with enthusiasm and was crowned with a laurel wreath. He paid a third visit to Paris in 1844, was invited to court by Louis Philippe, and there met king Leopold, who requested him to come to Brussels. When he had attained his 70th birthday, a grand fête was held in his honour, but in the beginning of the following year, the greatest poet Denmark had produced, breathed his last. He was honoured with a public funeral, at which the nobility and all the most distinguished persons in Copenhagen attended. Besides poems, operas, and comedies, he wrote twenty-four tragedies, nineteen of which are founded upon Scandinavian subjects. He also translated one play of Shakspeare's,—the "Midsummer Night's Dream," and one of Otway's,—"The Orphan," into Danish. The poet left behind his Autobiography, in the pages of which he evinces a high admiration for his own talents; but those best acquainted with his works state that this was grounded upon sterling merit. Some of his poetical works have been translated into English by Theodore Martin.

Born near Copenhagen, 1779; died at Copenhagen, 1850.

OEHRINGEN, e-ring'-en, a town of Würtemberg, circle Jaxt, on the Ohr, 34 miles N.E. of Stuttgart. There are a palace of the princes of Hohenlohe-Oehringen, a church, and lyceum. Manf. Woollen, linen, and jewellery. Pop. 3,208.

OEIRAS, wai-ras, capital of the province of Piauhi, Brazil, on the Mocha, 320 miles S.E. of Maranhao. It is poorly built, with unpaved streets. Pop. 4,000.

ŒLAND, or OLAND, o'-land, a narrow island in the Baltic, off the south-east coast of Sweden. It is 85 miles long, with an average breadth of 7. Low on the western side and hilly on the eastern, with a large portion of the soil appropriated to pasturage. Its forests are extensive, and it has the most important alum-mine in Scandinavia. Borghalm, a small place, is the only town on the island. The fisheries are valuable. Area, 588 square miles. Pop. 35,000.

OELGUM. See DULCIGNO.

OELS, e(r)ls, a town of Prussia, province of Breslau, on the Pels, 17 miles N.E. of Breslau. It has several churches, a ducal castle, a library, museum, and gymnasium. Manf. Paper, woollen, linen and silk goods, and oil. Pop. 10,157.

OELSNITZ, e(r)ls'-nits, a town of Saxony, in the circle of Zwickau, on the right bank of the Ulster, 25 miles S.W. of Zwickau. Manf. Silk and leather. There is a trade in cattle, and pearls of some value are found in the river. Pop. 4,300.

OEREBRO, e-re'-bro, a town of Sweden, capital of a government, or län of the same name, on the Hellmar Lake, 100 miles W. of Stockholm. It was formerly the residence of the Swedish monarchs, and the national diets were held in the old castle, built in the 13th century. There are mines of iron, silver, and copper in the neighbourhood. Manf. Woollen goods, carpets, stockings, mirrors, and guns. Pop. 10,000.

OERSTED, ANDERS SANDÖE, er'-sted, a modern Danish statesman, who received his education at the university of Copenhagen, and afterwards applied himself to the study of jurisprudence, which he subsequently adopted as his profession. Passing through various distinguished positions, he at length attained the office of prime minister of Denmark; but in that capacity displayed a strong tendency towards reactionary measures, which excited so much ill-feeling in the kingdom, that he was driven from power in 1855. The members of the Oersted ministry were next impeached, and brought to trial before the supreme tribunal, but were, in the end, acquitted. In his retirement, the former minister occupied himself with composing a history of his own career, which was published in 1856, and contained important matter towards the history of modern Denmark.

Born in the island of Langeland, 1778; died at Copenhagen, 1860.

OERSTED, HANS CHRISTIAN, Danish philosopher, who originated the science of electro-magnetism, which paved the way for the invention of the electric telegraph. He was brother of the preceding, with whom he studied at the university of Copenhagen. In 1806 he became professor of natural philosophy in that institution. He then spent two years in Holland, Germany, and France. While at Berlin he composed a treatise upon the identity of the forces of magnetism, electricity, and galvanism, which relationship had until then been only surmised. He proved that "there is always a magnetic circulation round the electric conductor, and that the electric current, in accordance with a certain law, always exercises determined and similar impressions on the direction of the magnetic needle, even when it does not pass through, but near the needle." This discovery he announced in a Latin essay published in 1819. The Royal Society of London presented him with its Copley medal, and the French Institute granted him 3,000 francs for this demonstration. This great discovery was followed by experiments in the compression of water, the discovery of the metal aluminium, and other important contributions to science. The years 1822-23 were passed by him in France and England. In 1846 he was present at a meeting of the British Association at Southampton. He was particularly happy in his delivery of occasional lectures to non-scientific people; and a collection of his discourses was translated into English, and published under the title of "The Soul in Nature." He was likewise a regular contributor to newspapers and magazines, and sought, on every occasion, to popularise the facts of natural science in his country. He was the recipient of many honours, was secretary of the Royal Society of Sciences of Copenhagen, member of the Academy of Sciences in the French Institute, knight of the Legion of Honour, and of the Prussian order which rewards the distinguished in arts and sciences.

Born at Rudkjöbing, 1777; died near Copenhagen, 1851.

OESEL, or ESEL, é'-sel, an island in the Baltic, at the mouth of the Gulf of Riga, belonging to Russia. It is 50 miles long, and 30 broad. There is a high and bold coast, and the interior is undulating, with low hills, and well watered. There are large forests. Pro. Wheat, oats, rye, barley, pease, and hemp are cultivated. Cattle, horses, and sheep are bred in large numbers, and fishing forms one of the principal occupations of the inhabitants. Area, 1,500 square miles. Pop. 47,000, nearly all Lutherans.

OETINGER, FRIEDRICH CHRISTOPHE, é'-ting-er, German theologian, educated at Tübingen, Jena, and Leipsic. He adopted the doctrines of Jacob Boehm, wrote several works of a mystical character, and translated several of the works of Swedenborg. One of his works "Heavenly and Earthly Philosophy," was condemned by his ecclesiastical superiors; but the duke of Würtemberg took him under his protection, and made him prelate and ecclesiastical councillor at Murrhardt. He gave much time to experiments in the transmutation of metals. His writings greatly influenced thought in Germany.

Born at Göppingen, Würtemburg, 1702; died at Murrhardt, 1782.

OFANTO, o-fan'-to, a river of Italy, rising in the Apennines, in the province of Avellino, 6 miles E. of Monte Marano, and, after a course of 90 miles, entering the Adriatic, 4 miles from Barletta. Near its mouth was fought the famous battle of Cannæ, in which the Romans were defeated by Hannibal.

OFEN. (See BUDA.)

OFFA, of'-fa, a king of Mercia, succeeded Ethelbald in 755. He made the famous dyke, on the Welsh borders still known as Offa's dyke. Subsequently he murdered Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and took possession of his kingdom. To make atonement for his guilt he gave the tenth of his goods to the Church, made a journey to Rome, instituted the tax called Peter-pence and built the monastery at St. Alban's.

Died 794.

OFFENBACH, JOACHIM, of'-fen-bak, a modern French musical composer. He is of German birth, but a naturalised Frenchman. In 1847 he was appointed chief of the orchestra at the Théâtre Français, Paris, and afterwards manager at the Théâtre des Bouffes Parisiens. He has produced a large number of comic operas. The best of these charming little trifles are,—"Les Deux Aveugles," "Une Nuit Blanche," "La Rose de Saint-Fleur," "Le Financier et le Savetier," "Orphée aux Enfers," "La Grande Duchesse," "La Belle Hélène," and "Geneviève de Brabant."

Born at Cologne, 1819; died at Paris, 1880.

OFFENBACH, a manufacturing town of the Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, on the south bank of the Main, 4 miles S.E. of Frankfort. There are a palace belonging to the prince of Isenberg-Birstein, a ruined old castle, several churches, and a synagogue. The river is crossed by a pontoon bridge. Manf. Carriages, jewellery, silk fabrics, carpets, papier-maché, snuff-boxes, leather umbrellas, tobacco, and sugar. Pop. 31,907.

OFFENBURG, of'-fen-boorg, a walled town of the grand duchy of Baden-Baden, Germany, on the Kinzig, 11 miles S.E. of Strasburg. It has a gymnasium, convent, hospital, theatre, and transit trade. Manf. Glass and leather. Pop. 5,400.

OGAHDEN, o-gah'-den, a fertile province of the Somauli country, East Africa. Large flocks and herds are reared, and gums, ostrich feathers, and ivory are exported. Lat. 7°—8° 30′ N. Lon. 45°—49° E.

OGDENSBURG, og'-dens-berg, a city and port of entry of the state of New York, United States, on the south bank of the St. Lawrence, at the mouth of the Oswegatchie, 210 miles N.W. of Albany. It is regularly laid out, and the chief streets are lined with maple trees, from which it is named the "maple city." A large lake and river trade is carried on, and there is a steam ferry to Prescott, in Canada. Pop. 10,500, nearly half foreigners.

OGEMAW, og'-e-maw, an almost uninhabited county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles.

OGGERSHEIM, og'-gers-shime, a town of Bavaria, in the Palatinate, 13 miles N.W. of Spires. Pop. 3,200.

OGILBY, or OGILVY, JOHN, o'-gil-be, a voluminous writer, was originally a dancing-master, and employed in the family of the earl of Strafford, as teacher to his children and secretary. That nobleman appointed him deputy-master of the revels at Dublin, where Ogilby erected a theatre. Upon the outbreak of the Irish rebellion, he returned to England, and settled at Cambridge, where he applied himself to the study of the learned languages. He was appointed, in 1661, to conduct the ceremonies at the king's coronation, and of which he published a pompous account in folio, with plates. Ogilby translated Virgil and Homer into English verse, and published a magnificent bible with prints, for which he was remunerated by the House of Lords. He was appointed geographical printer to the king. The other works of this industrious writer were an account of Japan, an Atlas, the Fables of Æsop, in verse, and a "Book of Roads." This last went through numerous editions; but was afterwards superseded by Patterson.

Born near Edinburgh, 1600; died 1676.

OGLE, o'-gel, a county of Illinois, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 30,000. The capital is Oregon.

OGLETHORPE, JAMES EDWARD, o'-gel-thorp, an English general, who entered into the army as ensign, in 1710. He afterwards served under Prince Eugene, to whom he became secretary and aide-de-camp. In 1732 he went to America, where he helped to found the colony of Georgia, and erected the town of Savannah. He again visited that country, and made an unsuccessful attempt upon Augustine, in Florida, belonging to the Spaniards. For this he was tried, on his return to England, and acquitted. In 1745 he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was sent to the north against the rebels, but did not overtake them; for which he was again brought to a court-martial, and honourably acquitted.

Born in London, 1698: died 1785.

OGLETHORPE, a county of Georgia, United States. Area, 480 square miles. Pop. 15,400, more than half being coloured. The capital is Lexington.

OGLIO, or OLLIO, olé'-yo, a river of Italy, rising in the Lake of Nero, Rhætian Alps, and, after a course of 150 miles, joins the Po on the left bank, 12 miles S.W. of Mantua. The chief affluents are the Mella and Chiese, both on the left bank.

OGOBANDO, or BENDE, o'-go-ben'-do, a town of Western Africa, at the Delta of the Kwara, 30 miles N. of Bonny. It is a centre of the home slave trading, and a great mart for palm oil and provisions.

OGOWAI, or OGOBAI, o'-go-wee, a large river of Western Africa, supposed to drain the county wall of the Congo. It is only known for about 200 miles from its mouth. It enters the Atlantic by two branches.

OGYGES, oj'-i-jees, said to have been the first king of Attica and Bœotia, in the 18th century B.C. In his reign is stated to have occurred the great deluge that covered the whole of Greece. That event has been placed as occurring 260 years before that of Deucalion; viz., about 1760 B.C. Ogyges belongs rather to mythology than to history; and the name, according to some, belongs not to a king, but to the ancient deluge above mentioned.

OHASAKA, o-hā-sa'-ka, a seaport of Niphon, Japan. It is the port of Miako. Lat. 34° 41′ N. Lon. 135° 22′ E.

OHIO, o-hī'-o, one of the United States, bounded N. by Michigan, and Lake Erie, E. by Pennsylvania and Virginia, S. by the river Ohio, which separates it from Virginia and Kentucky, and W. by Indiana. The interior and northern parts bordering on Lake Erie are generally level, and in some places marshy; whilst the eastern and south-eastern parts are both hilly and broken. Along the rivers the soil is remarkably fertile, consisting of rich and luxuriant meadows; but forests of oak, black walnut, maple, and other valuable woods are extensive, and there are some wide prairies. There is a lake shore of 230 miles, and the Ohio river forms the boundary for 436 miles. The climate is generally healthy, though in winter the mercury sometimes falls below zero, while the greatest heat of summer is 98°, and in the low-lying districts there is a tendency to fever and ague. Indian corn, wheat, and other grain, various kinds of fruit, grass, hemp, and flax, are extensively cultivated, with hay, Indian corn, potatoes, and tobacco. Cattle, sheep, and pigs are extensively reared, the latter being largely exported. The woods abound with deer, wild turkeys, geese, ducks, pheasants, and partridges. The bear still inhabits the forests, and the rivers are stocked with fish. Oil wells are worked, and are very productive.

Rivers.—Besides the Ohio, which forms a considerable portion of the eastern and southern borders of the state, the most important streams are the Great and Little Miami, Sciota, and Muskingum, affluents of the Ohio; the Maumee, Sandusky, Huron, Vermilion, Cuyahoga, and Ashtabula, flowing into Lake Erie.

Minerals.—Coal, very abundant in the eastern part of the state; iron, millstones, limestone, marl, gypsum, and salt.

Area.—39,964 square miles.

Pop.—3,198,000, about 63,500 being coloured. In respect of population, this ranks as the third state in the Union.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 88 counties. The chief towns are COLUMBUS, the capital; CINCINNATTI, Cleveland, Sandusky, and Lanesville.

History.—The district was organised and admitted as a state in 1803.

OHIO, a river of the United States, which is formed by the junction of the Alleghany and the Monongahela, at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; and which, after a W.S.W. course of 950 miles, joins the Mississippi, of which it is the second largest affluent, 193 miles below the Missouri, in lat. 37° N., lon. 88° 58′ W. The Ohio is a beautiful river, with a gentle current. Its waters are clear, and nowhere broken by any considerable falls except at Louisville. It varies in breadth from 400 to 1,400 yards, and at the mouth is more than half a mile wide. Steamboats are employed on it with great advantage, but in winter it is frozen over in the upper part of its course. Its basin is estimated to comprise 202,000 square miles. On its banks are several important towns.

OHIO, the name of three counties of the United States:

INDIANA.—Area, 90 square miles. Pop. 6,000. The capital is Rising Sun.

KENTUCKY.—Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 19,669. The capital is Hartford.

WEST VIRGINIA.—Area, 140 square miles. Pop. 37,457. The capital is Wheeling.

OHLAU, a small town in Silesia.

OHM, GEORG SIMON, ome, German physical philosopher, son of a locksmith, who brought him up to the trade. He afterwards studied at Erlangen, and in 1817 was appointed professor of mathematics in the Jesuit College at Cologne. He investigated the laws of magnetic currents, and established the basis of the mathematical theory of electricity, known as "Ohm's law." He was director of the polytechnic school at Nuremberg from 1833 to 1849, when he was appointed professor of physics at Munich. In 1841 he received the Copley medal of the Royal Society of London.

Born at Erlangen, 1787; died at Munich, 1854.

OHOMURA, o-ho-mod'-ra, a town of the island of Kiusiu, Japan, on the east side of a bay of the same name. There is a trade in rice, tea, wax, and pearls. Pop. 20,000.

OHO-SIMA, or HARBOUR ISLAND, o-ho'-si-ma, the largest of the chain of islands lying between the Great Loo-choo and Japan. It is about 30 miles long. The coast is rugged and deeply indented, and the interior lofty and well wooded. Near the southern end are two peaks, 1,674 and 1,420 feet high. There are many small villages. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 28° 6′—28° 32′ N. Lon. 129° 22′—129° 40′ E.

OHO-SIMA, or VRIE'S ISLAND, at the entrance of the Gulf of Yedo, Japan. There is an active volcano 2,530 feet high.

OHRDRUF, or'-droof, a walled town of the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, Germany, on the left bank of the Ohr, 8 miles S. of Gotha. It contains the castle of Ehrenstein, two churches, and a town-house. Manf. Woollens, porcelain, with iron-forges and copper-mines in the vicinity. Pop. 5,500.

OIL CITY, a town of Pennsylvania, United States, on the Alleghany river, 8 miles N.E. of Franklin. It is the centre of the Verango county oil region, and the oil-wells are numerous, and the supply unintermittent. It is a rapidly rising town. Pop. 7,315.

OIRSCHOT, oir'-shote, a market-town of the Netherlands, province of North Brabant, 13 miles S. of Hertogensbosch. There are a town-house and a fine church, other churches, and two castles. Pop. 4,200.

OISE, woise, a department of the north of France, and bounded by the departments Somme, Aisne, and Seine Inférieure. It is flat, but fertile, with agriculture far advanced as a science. A large quantity of vegetables is grown for the Parisian market. There are extensive forests, and great numbers of cattle and sheep are reared.

Rivers.—The principal are the Oise, the Ource, the Aisne, the Epte, the Therain, and the Brèche.
Area.—2,360 square miles.
Pop.—404,553.
Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements and 701 communes. The chief towns are BEAUVAIS, the capital; CLERMONT, COMPIÈGNE, and SENLIS.

OISE, a river of France, rising by two streams; the one near Rocroy, in Ardennes, and the other near Chimay, in Belgium, and, after a course of 150 miles, falling into the Seine above Conflans. It has canal communication with the Scheldt, the Sambre, and the Somme.

OISSEL-SUR-SEINE, wois'-sel-soor-saine', a town of France, department Seine-Inférieure, on the right bank of the Seine, 7 miles S. of Rouen. Manf. Cotton prints, and there is a trade in cattle. Pop. 4,200.

OKA, o'-ka, a river of European Russia, rising 40 miles from Orel, and, after a course of 840 miles, joining the Volga at Nijni-Novgorod. Its basin comprises the richest portion of the Russian dominions, and is estimated to comprise 127,000 square miles. The chief affluents are, on the right bank, the Pronia, Para, Mokcha, and Tzna; and on the left, the Ongra, Nara, Moskwa, Pra, and Kliasma.

OKA, a river of Asiatic Russia, in Siberia, rising in the mountains on the northern frontier of China. It flows circuitously, and, after a course of 400 miles, joins the Angara, at Balsk. The chief affluents are the Tatchna, Tes, and Ija.

OKAMANDAL, o'-ka-man'-dal, a district of India, in the province of Guzerat. Area, 335 square miles. Pop. 13,000. Lat. between 22° 5′ and 22° 30′ N. Lon. between 69° and 69° 18′ E.

O'KEEFE, JOHN, o-keef', a dramatist, who was destined for the profession of painting, but who, having written a play which was placed upon the stage at Dublin when he was only 18, abandoned the studio for the theatre. He remained in Ireland as an actor and occasional writer for the stage until his 34th year; after which he repaired to London, where he remained for the rest of his life, entirely devoting himself to the composition of plays. Among the best of these productions, may be mentioned "Wild Oats," "The Highland Reel," and "The Agreeable Surprise." Towards the close of his life he published "Recollections of the Life of John O'Keefe," but had ceased to write for the stage, being almost blind.

Born at Dublin, 1747; died at Southampton, 1833.

OKEN, LORENZ, o'-ken, an eminent Swiss naturalist, originally named Ockerfuss, who studied medicine and natural history at Würzburg and Göttingen, and was afterwards professor of medicine and natural history in the universities of Jena, Munich, and Zurich. The aim of all his writings might be summarily said to be an attempt at applying the principles of transcendental philosophy to the facts of natural history. He produced his first work in 1802, with the title "Elements of Natural Philosophy, the Theory of the Senses, and the Classification of Animals founded thereon." Oken was the first to suggest that all animals are built up of vesicles or cells, in his work on generation, published in 1805. His remarkable essay "On the Signification of the Bones of the Skull," showing that they are modified vertebræ, attracted little attention at the time of its publication, but was, nevertheless, the forerunner of the investigations of Carus, Geoffrey St. Hilaire, and Professor Owen, upon the laws of homology in the vertebrate skeleton. It was believed for a long period that Goethe, the German poet, was the discoverer of the relation between the skull and the vertebræ, but it is now established that the suggestion is due to Oken. In 1847 his work called "Elements of Physio-Philosophy" was translated into English; and although, like the other efforts of this writer, it is beyond the grasp of the general reader, it would seem to be of the deepest importance to the man of science.

Born at Bohlsbach, Würtemberg, 1779; died at Zurich, 1851.

OKHOTA, o-ko'-ta, a river of Asiatic Russia, in Siberia, which has a south-eastern course, and falls into the sea at the town of Okhotsk, after a course of 220 miles.

OKHOTSK, o'-kotsk, or o-hotsk', a government of Asiatic Russia, in eastern Siberia, forming a maritime territory, extending along the gulfs of the Eastern Ocean called the seas of Okhotzk, of Kamtchatka, and of Anadir. It has a length of 1,100 miles, and an average breadth of 150. The coast line is greatly indented. The climate is severe, and the dog and the reindeer are its only domestic animals. Its inhabitants deal in furs and timber. The fisheries are productive, and whales often visit the coasts.

OKHOTSK, SEA OF, a large gulf of the North Pacific Ocean, inclosed between Kamtchatka, the Kurile Islands, and Saghalien. It is 1,000 miles long, and 500 in breadth, and receives the river Ud, which enters it on the north; the Okhota, from which the small town at the mouth derives its name; and at the southern extremity, the Amoor.

OKTAI, ok'-tai, grand khan of the Mongol Tartars, was third son and successor of Genghis Khan. He overran the north of China, Armenia; made himself master of Moscow, of Poland, and of Hungary; and for a time, threatened the whole of the Christian world. His chief minister was the sage Ye-lin-tchou-tsaï, who ruled with justice, but vainly attempted to subdue the ferocity of the Mongols.
Died 1241.

OKTIBBEHA, ok-tib-be'-ha, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom 9,500 are coloured. The capital is Starkville.

OLAF I. or OLAUS, o'-laf, king of Denmark, perished in combat with the Franks.
Died 814.

OLAF II., king of Denmark, succeeded his brother, Canute IV., in 1086. A terrible famine desolated his kingdom during his reign.
Died 1095.

OLAF III. (THE INFANT), king of Upsal, or Sweden, son of Eric the victorious, succeeded to the throne in 994. He established Christianity and made war with Olaf II. of Norway.
Born 980; died 1026.

OLAF I., or OLAUS, king of Norway, ascended the throne in 994. He introduced Christianity in Norway, Iceland, and Greenland. Having been defeated by the kings of Sweden and Denmark, he threw himself into the sea.
Born 956; died 1000.

OLAF II. (THE SAINT), king of Norway, obtained possession of the throne, by defeating Eric. He was a distinguished warrior, and endeavoured to propagate Christianity, by fire and sword, destroying his pagan subjects with indomitable zeal and unrelenting cruelty. Many fled from Norway to Denmark, where Knut, or Canute, the great, gave them protection, and after a time those who remained in their own country invited Knut to invade it, which he did in 1028. Olaf fled to his brother-in-law, Jaroslav of Russia, who aided him with 4,000 men, with whom he returned to Norway, but was defeated and killed at the battle of Stiklestad. It being rumoured, however, that miracles were worked at the humble grave where his remains had been interred by a peasant, they were exhumed and removed to the cathedral of Trondhjem, where they continued to be attended with miraculous exhibitions, and attracted pilgrims from all parts of Scandinavia. A year after his death he was proclaimed patron saint of Norway; and so recently as 1847, the knightly order of Olaf was established in honour of the saint by King Oscar I.
Born 995; died 1030.

OLAF III. (THE PACIFIC) reigned, in conjunction with his brother Magnus II., from 1066 until 1069, and was afterwards sole king.
Died 1093.

OLAF IV., son of Magnus III., reigned, in conjunction with his two brothers, between the years 1103—1116.
Died 1116.

OLAF V., son of HAKO VII., succeeded to the throne of Denmark in 1376, and to that of Norway in 1380. After his death, in 1387, his mother, Margaret de Waldemar, united the three kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway under one crown.
Died 1387.

OLAND. (See ŒLAND.)

OLAUS MAGNUS, a Swedish author of the 16th century. He held the office of archdeacon of the Swedish church until the principles of the Reformation began to spread in his country; upon which he retired to Rome, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was the author of a work upon the antiquities of the North of Europe, which was published at Rome in 1555.
Born in Sweden, about 1500; died at Rome, about 1570.

OLAVIDES, PABLO ANTONIO JOSÉ, Count de, o-la-ve'-dais, a celebrated Spanish statesman, a native of South America, who became secretary to the Count de Aranda, whom he accompanied in his embassy to France. On his return to Spain, Charles III. created him count, and appointed him superintendent-general of Seville. He afterwards undertook the great work of fertilizing the Sierra Morena, or Black Mountains, a desert region barren to the very summit; but, by his perseverance, aided by the exertions of a colony of Germans, which he encouraged to settle in the place, he succeeded in his task. He assisted in the expulsion of the Jesuits, and, notwithstanding the benefits he had rendered his country, he was accused of heresy by the Inquisition, was disgraced, and thrown into prison in 1776. In 1778 he was declared a heretic, and degraded. Two years afterwards he contrived to effect his escape, and to reach Venice in safety; but in 1798 recanted and retired to Spain.
Born at Lima, 1740; died 1803.

OLBERS, HEINRICH WILHELM MATHIAS, ol'-bairs, German astronomer, who was educated at Göttingen for the profession of medicine, in the exercise of which, combined with astronomical pursuits, his whole life was passed. He discovered two planets,—Pallas in 1802, and Vesta in 1807. In 1815 he discovered a comet, and subsequently wrote a treatise on the probability that a comet may come into collision with the earth. Among other useful works of his were an improved method of calculating comets, a proposal to revise the nomenclature of the stars, and investigations into the lunar origin of meteoric stones. Dr. Olbers was fellow of the Royal Society of London, corresponding member of several learned societies of Europe, and knight of the Prussian orders of the Red Eagle and Dannebrog; and a marble statue was erected to his memory, at Bremen, in 1850.
Born near Bremen, 1758; died at Bremen, 1840.

OLDBURY, old'-ber-re, a manufacturing town of Worcestershire, on the Tame, 29 miles N.E. of Worcester. There are coal and iron mines in the neighbourhood. Manf. Iron, steel, locomotive engines, tools, and cast-iron pipes. Pop. 18,821.—A station on the London and North-Western railway.

OLDCASTLE, SIR JOHN, Lord Cobham, old'-kas-el, the first martyr and first author among the English nobility. In the reign of Henry IV. he commanded the English army in France, where he compelled the duke of Orleans to raise the siege of Paris. He was an adherent of Wickliffe's doctrines, which he propagated with such zeal (employing preachers to teach Reformed doctrines through the country), announcing, too, the firm conviction that the Pope was Antichrist, that, in the reign of Henry V., he was sent to the Tower, whence he made his escape, but was taken in Wales. Being conveyed to London, he was condemned to be hanged and burnt; which sentence was executed with circumstances of peculiar barbarity, in St. Giles's Fields, London. He wrote "Twelve Conclusions, addressed to the Parliament of England," a number of religious tracts and discourses, and edited the works of Wickliffe.

Born 1360; died 1417.

OLDENBURG, ol'-den-boorg, a grand duchy of Germany, consisting of three detached portions: Oldenburg proper, the principality of Lübeck, and the principality of Birkenfeld (on the left bank of the Rhine, near the French frontier). Oldenburg proper comprises about seven-eighths of the whole area, is bounded N. by the German Ocean, and on the other sides by the Prussian province of Hanover. It is mostly level, and, in some places on the coast, is so low that it requires large dykes, as in Holland, to prevent inundations. There are large sandy tracts and marshes, and extensive turf-beds. It is, however, generally fertile. Horses, cattle and sheep are extensively reared. The principality of Lübeck is surrounded by the duchy of Holstein. The physical features are generally similar to those of Holstein.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Weser and Jahde, and the Haase, Vehne, and other tributaries of the Ems, in Oldenburg proper; the Schwartau and Trave, in Lübeck, in which also are several large lakes, especially Plön, Keller, Uklei, and Gross-Euten.

Minerals.—In Birkenfeld, iron, copper, lead, coal, and building stone are abundant.

Area.—2,417 square miles; about 190 being included in Lübeck and the same in Birkenfeld.

Pop.—Total, 337,478.; Lübeck, 36,000; Birkenfeld, 37,000. About 200,000 are Lutherans, and 70,000 Roman Catholics.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—Oldenburg proper is divided into 8 circles, or administrative districts, Lübeck into 4, and Birkenfeld into 3. The chief towns are OLDENBURG, the capital of the grand duchy; EUTIN, the chief town of Lübeck.

Government.—A constitution was given to the grand-duchy Feb. 18, 1849. The legislative power is exercised by a Landtag, or diet, elected for three years, by the vote of all citizens paying taxes. The first electors choose a delegate, and the delegates of several districts appoint one deputy, the whole number being 33, or one for every 10,000 inhabitants. The executive is vested, under the grand-duke, in a responsible ministry of three departments.

History.—The ancient house of Oldenburg, which has given sovereigns to Denmark, Scandinavia, and Russia, is said to be descended from Wittekind, the celebrated leader of the heathen Saxons against Charlemagne. In the 15th century, a scion of the house of Oldenburg, Count Christian VIII., was elected king of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. The main line became extinguished with Count Günther, in 1667, whereupon the territory of the family fell to the king of Denmark, who made it over to grand-duke Paul of Russia, in exchange for pretended claims upon Schleswig-Holstein. The grand-duke then gave Oldenburg to his cousin, Prince Friedrich August of Holstein-Gottorp, with whose descendants it remained till December 1810, when Napoleon incorporated it with the kingdom of Westphalia. But the congress of Vienna gave the country back to its former sovereign.

OLDENBURG, the capital of the above grand duchy, on the Hunte, 25 miles N.W. of Bremen. It has churches (St. Lambert's containing the tombs of the grand ducal family), a gymnasium, large public library, museum, grand ducal palace, with fine art collections and gardens. Large cattle and horse fairs are held annually, and an active river trade is carried on. Pop. 20,575.

OLDENBURG, a town of Prussia, in Holstein, on the Little Brökaue, 30 miles N.E. of Lübeck. Pop. 2,800.

OLDENZAAL, ol'-den-zahl, a town of the Netherlands, province of Overyssel, 33 miles N.E. of Deventer. There are two churches, a town-house, and synagogue. Manf. Calico and sacking. Wool-combing, spinning, and dyeing are carried on. Pop. 3,600.

OLDESLOE, or ODESLO, oldes'-lo, a town of Prussia, in Holstein, at the confluence of the Beste with the Trave, 16 miles S.W. of Lübeck. Manf. Paper and salt. There is a large transit trade. Pop. 4,500.

OLDFIELD, ANN, old'-feeld, a celebrated English actress. Sir John Vanbrugh recommended her to Mr. Rich, patentee of the King's theatre, by whom she was engaged. Her abilities were of the highest order, and her person extremely pleasing. Her remains were interred in Westminster Abbey.

Born in London, 1683; died 1730.

OLDHAM, old'-ham, a Parliamentary borough and manufacturing town of Lancashire, on the Medlock, near its source, 6 miles N.E. of Manchester. It has a large and ancient church, several churches and chapels for dissenters, a town-hall, school of science, mechanics' institute, and blue-coat school. Alexandra Park of 60 acres was opened in 1865. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and silk goods, hats, fustians, velveteens. There are extensive coal mines near the town. Pop. 111,343.

OLDHAM, a county of Kentucky, North America. Area, 200 square miles. Pop. 9,200, of whom nearly one-third are coloured. The capital is La Grange.

OLDHAM, JOHN, an English poet. Shortly after taking a B.A. degree at Oxford, he became usher to the free school at Croydon. Some of his poems being read by the earls of Rochester and Dorset, they procured him the appointment of tutor to the grandsons of Sir Edmund Thurland, and afterwards to a son of Sir William Hicks. He next resided with the earl of Kingston. His works were printed in Bell's annotated edition of the English Poets.

Born at Shipton, Gloucestershire, 1653; died 1683.

OLDMIXON, JOHN, old'-mix-on, an English political writer and historian. He was a violent opponent of the Stuart family, in the reign of Queen Anne, and attacked the best writers of that period with so much violence, that Pope gave him a conspicuous place in the "Dunciad." He became collector of the customs at Bridgewater. He wrote "A History of the Stuarts," a volume of Poems, "The Life of Queen Anne," and other works.

Born 1673; died in London, 1742.

OLD-TOWN, a town of the state of Maine, United States, on the west bank of the Penobscot river, 70 miles N.E. of Augusta. The chief business is in connexion with the lumber trade. Pop. 5,000.

OLDYS, WILLIAM, ol'-dis, historical and bibliographical writer, was the natural son of Dr. Oldys, chancellor of Lincoln and advocate of the court of Admiralty. Of the early life and education of the son little is known; but he is said to have squandered a small legacy which his father had left him. He afterwards became keeper of Lord Oxford's library, of which he formed the catalogue when that collection was sold by Osborne, the bookseller. He was also employed to superintend the publication of the Harleian Miscellany. The only public post he ever had was that of Norroy king-at-arms, but he lived principally by working as a hack for booksellers, was of drunken and irregular habits, and fond of low company. His principal works are, "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh," some articles in the "General Historical Dictionary," those in the "Biographia Britannica" signed G, "The British Librarian," "Life of Richard Carew the Antiquary," a translation of Camden's "Britannia," and a number of treatises upon medical and bibliographical subjects.

Born 1687; died 1761.

OLEARIUS, ADAM, (real name, OELSCHLAGER), e(r)l'-shlai-ger, minister to the duke of Holstein, who appointed him secretary to the embassy which he sent to Muscovy and Persia in 1633. Olearius was absent six years in this employment, and on his return wrote an account of his travels, published in 1647. He also wrote an Abridgment of the Chronicles of Holstein from 1448 to 1663.

Born about 1600; died 1671.

OLEGGIO, o-ledg'-o, a town of Italy, province of Novara, 10 miles from Novara. Manf. Cotton and silk. There is a trade in wine and timber. Pop. 3,500.

OLEKMA, o-lek'-ma, a river of Asiatic Russia, which rises near the Chinese frontier, joins the right bank of the Lena, after a course of 400 miles. The chief affluents are the Tunguarka, Ikimda, Oioun, Tugur, Miakho, and Tochara.

OLERON, o'-lai-rawng, an island on the S.W. coast of France, in the department Charente-Inférieure, opposite to the mouth of the Charente, and separated from the continent by a narrow channel called the Passe de Maumusson. It is 20 miles long, with a breadth of 5. There are ship-building yards, rope-walks, and distilleries. The town of St. Pierre d'Oleron is near the centre of the island. Pop. 10,000. Lat. 43° 11′ N. Lon. 1° 20′ W.

OLETZKO, or MARGGRABOWA, o-letz'-ko, a town of Prussia, province of East Prussia, 40 miles S.E. of Gumbinnen. There are a castle, church, town-house, and a large market-place. Pop. 4,300.

OLEVANO, o-lai'-va-no, an old town of Italy, 28 miles E. of Rome. There are an old castle of the Colonnas, built on a massive limestone rock, a handsome church, dedicated to St. Margaret, and other churches. Pop. 3,000.

OLGA, ST., ol'-ga, wife of the Russian duke Igor, of Kiev, and after his death for many years a prudent and successful ruler. In 952 she was baptized at Constantinople, and endeavoured zealously to propagate Christianity in Russia. She is held in great veneration by the Russian Church.

Died 969.

OLHAO, ol-ha-o', a town of Portugal, on the sea-coast near Cape de St. Maria, 5 miles E. of Faro. Pop. 7,000.

OLIFANT'S RIVER, ol-i-fant, a considerable river of the territory of the Cape of Good Hope, falling into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 31° 38′ S., and lon. 18° 12′ W. Length, about 170 miles.

OLINDA, o-lin'-da, a city of Brazil, in the province of Pernambuco, 3 miles N. of Recife. There are a cathedral, several other churches, episcopal palace, and monasteries, a public library, and a botanical garden. Pop. 8,000.

OLIVA (DE JEREZ), province of Badajoz, 37 miles S. of the town of that name. Manf. Linen and woollens. Pop. 4,200.

OLIVAREZ, GASPARO DE GUZMAN, Count de, o-li-va'-rais, Spanish statesman, member of an aristocratic but poor family, and son of the Spanish ambassador at Rome, who, during twenty-two years, administered the affairs of the kingdom under the feeble Philip IV. He first became prime minister in the room of the duke de Uceda, and began his political career by several useful measures; but his haughty conduct and oppressive modes of raising money to carry on wars at length occasioned a revolt in Catalonia, and the separation of Portugal from Spain. Olivares was disgraced, and died of chagrin at Toro.

Born at Rome, 1587; died 1645.

OLIVENZA, o-le-vain'-tha, a fortified town of Spain, province of Badajoz, on the left bank of the Guadiana, 15 miles S. of Badajoz. The town is well laid out. One of the churches, St. Mary Magdalene, is a splendid building, with a portico of white marble, and there are two barracks. Manf. Oil and earthenware. Pop. 7,759.

OLIVER, ISAAC, ol'-i-ver, an English painter in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He painted historical pieces, but chiefly miniatures in a style of exquisite beauty.

Born 1556; died 1617.

OLIVER, PETER, eldest son of the preceding, was an historical and miniature painter, and even surpassed his father. Nineteen of his historical paintings were in the collections of Charles I. and James II. Some of these are still kept in Kensington Palace.

Born 1601; died about 1654.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF. (See JERUSALEM.)

OLIVET, JOSEPH THOULIER DE, ol'-e-vai, a learned French critic, who studied under his uncle, a Jesuit, and acquired a great knowledge of the learned languages. In 1740 he published an excellent edition of the works of Cicero, with notes. Besides the above, he produced a French translation of Cicero's treatise on the "Nature of the Gods," a translation of some of the orations of Demosthenes and Cicero, a "History of the French Academy," of which he was a member, and some other works.

Born near Salins, 1682; died at Paris, 1768.

OLIVETO, o-le-vai'-to, a town of Italy, province of Salerno, 6 miles N.E. of Campagna. There is an annual fair. Pop. 3,800.

OLIVIER, CLAUDE MATTHEW, o'-le-ve-ai, advocate of the parliament of Aix. He was one of the founders of the academy of Marseilles, and distinguished himself by his eloquence. His works are,—"History of Philip of Macedon, Father of Alexander the Great," "Memoir on the Succour given to the Romans by the People of Marseilles, in the Second Punic War and in that of the Gauls," and several historical dissertations of less importance.

Born at Marseilles, 1701; died at the same city, 1736.

OLIVIER, GUILLAUME ANTOINE, a French entomologist, who was, in 1792, sent upon a mission to Persia, and returned at the end of six years, with a rich collection of specimens of natural history. He became a member of the French Institute in 1800, and published, among other works, "Dictionary of the Natural History of Insects," in which he was assisted by Latreille and Godard.

Born at Aves, near Frejus, 1756; died at Lyons, 1814.

OLIVIER, OLIVIER-EMILE, eminent French advocate and statesman, studied at St. Barbe and Paris, and became a member of the Paris bar in 1847. In February of the following year he was nominated commissary-general of the republic at Marseilles. Confirmed in this post by Cavaignac, with the title of préfet, he continued for some time at Marseilles, after which he was sent to the prefecture of Chaumont (Haute Marne). In 1849 he returned to the bar, and pleaded several political causes. In 1857 he was elected as opposition candidate for the third circonscription of the Seine, and took an active part in several important discussions. In 1860 he was one of the most distinguished members of that small opposition group known by the name of "The Five." Meanwhile he pleaded the cause of M. Vacherot, who was indicted for the publication of his work entitled "La Démocratie," and the manner in which the liberal advocate defended his client led to his own suspension for three months. In 1863 Emile Olivier was again returned to the legislative assembly, but exhibited a change of opinion, which estranged him from his former political associates. In this year he was elected a member of the council-general of Var, and judicial counsel and commissary-general to the viceroy of Egypt in Paris. M. Emile Olivier now retired from the Paris bar. He was received into imperial favour, and chosen by the emperor as arbitrator of the difficulties which arose relative to the Isthmus of Suez. In 1867 his separation from his former colleagues was complete. On the approach of the elections in 1868, the rumours that had for some time prevailed respecting M. Olivier and his relations with the emperor were renewed, and he lost his election for the department of the Seine, but was returned in the Var, and on the 27th December following he was charged by the emperor with the formation of the first parliamentary cabinet, and he held the office of first minister till the stormy debate in the corps législatif of August 9, 1870, when the emperor was called upon to abdicate, led to his resignation.

Born at Marseilles, 1825.

OLIVOPOL, o-liv-o-pol', a town of European Russia, 122 miles N.W. of Kherson, near the confluence of the Sinuaka and Bug. It is defended by a fortress. Pop. 3,500.

OLLERIA, ol-lair'-re-a, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, 39 miles S. of the town of that name. There is a trade in horses and mules. Pop. 3,700.

OLMSTED, olm'-sted, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 720 square miles. Pop. 20,000. The capital is Rochester.

OLMÜTZ, ol-me(r)tz, a strong fortress and well-built town of the Austrian empire, in Moravia, on an island in the river Morava. The houses are high and gloomy, and its university, replaced by a lyceum or high school, was restored in 1827. It is an archbishop's see, and one of the richest ecclesiastical benefices of the empire. The most interesting public buildings are the cathedral, the church of St. Mauritius, built early in the 15th century, and famous for its noble organ; the old town-hall, with a remarkable clock; the archiepiscopal palace and chapter-house. There are several fine fountains and a lofty column. A portion of the fortifications has recently been converted into public pleasure grounds. Manf. Woollen, linen, and porcelain. A very large trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 15,500.—The town suffered severely in the Thirty Years' and the Seven Years' Wars, and from 1794 Lafayette was confined in it for many years. When the late emperor of Austria took his second flight from Vienna, he came here, and abdicated in December, 1848.

OLNEY, ol'-ne, a market town of Buckinghamshire, on the left bank of the Ouse, 50 miles N.W. of Bedford. The river is crossed by a fine stone bridge, and there is a large ancient church. Manf. Lace. Pop. 9,672.—A station on the London and North-Western Railway.

OLONETZ, o-lo-nets', a government in the north of European Russia, lying W. and S.W. of that of Archangel, and E. of Finland. The surface is generally elevated, with numerous lakes and extensive forests. The soil is generally sterile, and the agricultural products limited. A few cattle and horses are reared.

Rivers and Lakes.—The Onega, Suma, Svir, and Olouka. The most important lakes, after Lake Onega, are Wygo and Sego.

Minerals.—There are extensive iron mines and marble quarries.

Area.—57,427 square miles.

Pop.—307,323, Russians and Finns, belonging to the Greek church.

Chief Towns.—PETRASCWADSK and Olonetz.

OLORON, or OLORON-SAINTE-MARIE, o-lo-rawng', a town of France, department Basses Pyrénées, on the Gave d'Oloron, 15 miles S.W. of Pau. The church of S. Marie is in the Romanesque Gothic style. Manf. Handkerchiefs for head-dresses, and caps. It has a trade in horses, wool, and timber. Pop. 7,200.

OLOT, o'-lote, a town of Spain, province of Gerona, on the left bank of the Fluvia, 55 miles N. of Barcelona. It has a large, handsome parish church, other churches and chapels, monasteries, a large hospital, and cavalry barracks. Manf. Woollens, soap, and paper. Pop. 6,867. In the neighbourhood there are numerous craters of extinct volcanoes, and here, in 1421, a destructive earthquake occurred.

OLOZAGA, SALUSTIANO, o-lo-za'-go, Spanish lawyer and statesman. Shortly after beginning to practise as an advocate, the liberality of his opinions made him obnoxious to the government, and he was charged with conspiring against the life of Ferdinand VII. He escaped to France, returning in 1833, after the death of Ferdinand, and the relaxation of the laws against political offenders. He was then elected deputy to the Cortes, and supported the liberal administration of Mendizabel. In 1840 he was appointed ambassador to Paris, where he stayed three years, and was then recalled to form an administration, in which he was president of the council, and minister of foreign affairs, but only held office for ten days. He then retired to Portugal, and afterwards to England. In 1846, having been elected to the Cortes by two provinces, he returned to Spain, but was illegally arrested and sent to the citadel of Pampeluna. Having addressed an energetic protest to the Cortes, he was released, and took his seat, and afterwards assisted in 1848 to bring about the return of Espartero, under whose administration he was, in 1854, sent a second time as ambassador to France, remaining there till the return of Narvaez to favour in 1856. In 1868, he took part in the revolution which drove Queen Isabella from Spain, and returned to Paris as ambassador from the provisional government. In 1870 he was recalled, and after the accession of King Amadeo I., in 1871, became a member of the administration formed by Marshal Serrano.

OLTENITZA, ol-te-nitz'-a, a fortified town of European Turkey, on the left, or Turkish, bank of the Danube, 25 miles S.E. of Bucharest. It is memorable for the victory gained by the Turks over the Russians in 1854. Pop. 1,500.

OLYMPIA, or OLYMPIUS, o-lim'-pi-a, daughter of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus, was the wife of Philip, king of Macedon, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was repudiated by Philip 337 B.C. Olympia, in revenge, is presumed to have instigated the murder of Philip. After the death of Alexander, she seized the government of Macedonia, and put to death a number of the leading personages of the kingdom; but Cassander at length besieged her in Pydna, and obliged her to surrender. Cassander promised to spare her life, but she was soon afterwards killed by the relatives of those whom she had put to death.

Died 316 B.C.

OLYMPIA, a splendid town of ancient Greece, in the Peloponessus, on the river Alphæus. The Olympian games were celebrated here, and it contained the Olympium, or temple of Zeus, the Heræum, or temple of Hera, ten treasuries, a stadium and hippodrome, and some of the choicest treasures of Grecian art. Pliny states that in his time there were 3,000 statues. In 1875 explorations were undertaken, and have been rewarded by the discovery of numerous sculptures and other works of art of extraordinary beauty.

OLYMPIA, capital of Washington Territory, United States, on the Pacific Coast, 95 miles S.E. of Victoria, Vancouver Island. The town is well laid out. Pop. 1,600.

OLYMPIODORUS, o-lim-pi-o-dor'-us, a heathen philosopher of Egypt, who wrote in Greek a continuation of the History of Eunapius, up to A.D. 425. Flourished in the 5th century.

OLYMPIODORUS, a Platonic philosopher of Alexandria, who wrote several commentaries upon the works, and a life of Plato.

Lived in the 6th century.

OLYMPUS, o-lim'-pus. (See GREECE.)

OMAGH, o'-ma, ("Oigh magh," seat of the chiefs), capital of the county Tyrone, Ireland, on the Strule, 34 miles S. of Londonderry. It is the seat of the courts of assize, and there are a handsome court-house, several churches for Roman Catholics and Protestants, a convent, and district lunatic asylum. There is a trade in brown linens, and agricultural produce. Pop. 3,720.—A station on the Great Northern of Ireland railway. This town originated in an abbey, founded in the 8th century.

OMAHA, o-ma-ha', capital of Nebraska, United States, on the west bank of the Mississippi, 125 miles S.W. of Des Moin. There are a capitol, court-house, and 10 churches. It is a great mart for the supply of emigrants going to the west. There are extensive smelting works. It is connected by a branch with the Pacific railroad, and there are good limestone quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 30,518.

OMAN. (See ARABIA.)

OMAR I. ABU-HAFSA-IBN-AL-KHETTAB, o'-mar, second caliph of the Mussulmans after Mahomet. He was at first a fierce persecutor of Mahomet and his followers, but afterwards adopted the faith, and became an enthusiastic follower and warrior in behalf of the prophet, after whose death he acted as minister to Abu-bekr, who was proclaimed caliph, and whom he succeeded. He made himself master of Syria, and, in 637, besieged and took Jerusalem, after a defence of several months. In the following year he invaded Persia, which was subdued in 642, and then led a powerful army into Egypt, the conquest of which country was completed by the taking of Alexandria in 640. This inflexible Mussulman conqueror is said to have taken 36,000 cities or castles, destroyed 4,000 temples or churches, and founded or endowed 1,400 mosques, and he may be considered as the founder of the political power of the Mahometans. He instituted the era of the Hegira, or Flight of Mahomet, from which the Mussulmans compute their years. It commenced with the 16 July, 622 A.D. His memory is held in the highest veneration by the Sunnites, or orthodox Mahometans; but the Shiites, or partisans of Ali, regard him as a usurper. Omar was assassinated in a mosque, at Medina, by a Persian slave.

Born about 581; died 644.

OMAR II., the eighth caliph of the Ommiades, was great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded Solyman in 717. He laid siege to Constantinople, but was forced to raise it on account of a violent storm, which destroyed a great part of his fleet. He died from the effects of poison.

Died 720.

OMAR, BEN ALFTTAS, Mahomedan monarch of Estremadura and Portugal, succeeded his brother in 1082. He assisted the Mussulman king of Toledo against Alfonzo VI., but was defeated by the latter. In 1086, he, with other Moorish monarchs, sought the aid of the Sultan of Morocco, who joined his troops with the Mahomedans, and fought a sanguinary battle with Alfonzo near Badajoz. The Africans subsequently turned against Omar, who was assassinated by them.

Died 1090.

OMAR, BEN HAFFSSOUN, a famous Moorish rebel, who was at first a tailor, but quitted that calling for the profession of arms. In 859 he put himself at the head of a powerful army, and overran the kingdom of Cordova. The Moorish sovereign of that country, Mahomet I., sent his troops against Omar, whose bands were routed after an obstinate struggle. Omar subsequently became the ally of the Navarrese, for whom he took several fortresses, and was by them created king. In 882 he was completely defeated by Mahomet, and received a wound in the conflict which afterwards proved mortal.

Died 883.

OMAR, a famous Arabian philosopher, who settled at Seville, and acquired a great reputation for his attainments in medicine, astronomy, and geometry.

Died at Seville, 1071.

OMAR, a celebrated Moorish pirate, who, in the 9th century, committed great ravages in the Mediterranean, took the island of Crete, and there erected a fort called El-Khandah, from which Candia, the modern name of the island, has been derived.

OMAR, or OMER PASHA o'-mer, a modern Turkish commander, whose former name was Mikail Lattas, he being a native of Austrian Croatia, and a son of an Austrian officer. He was educated at the military school of Thurn, near Carlstadt. He served at first as cadet in an Austrian regiment, from which he became assistant surveyor of roads and bridges in his native district. About his 28th year, he suddenly left the Austrian service, and went into the Turkish province of Bosnia, where he embraced the Mahometan faith, adopted the name of Omar, and obtained employment as tutor in the family of a Turkish merchant. Subsequently visiting Constantinople with his pupils, he became master in the new military school. In a short time he attracted the notice of Khosroo Pasha, the minister of war, who attached him to his staff, and afterwards bestowed upon him the hand of his ward, a rich heiress. After serving in the Danubian principalities, and as aide-de-camp to General Chrzanowski, Khosroo Pasha obtained for him the appointment of writing-master to Abd-ul-Medjid, afterwards sultan. In 1839 he served with the Turkish army sent against Ibrahim Pasha, and, three years later, was appointed military commandant of a district in Syria. When the Russians passed into Wallachia, in 1848, to act against the insurgent Hungarians, Omar Pasha went to the same place as commander of a Turkish army of observation. His next services were against the disaffected beys in Bosnia, whom he reduced to submission to the authority of the sultan. At the commencement of the year 1853, he marched at the head of 20,000 men against the mountaineers of Montenegro, who were almost completely subjugated by him; when, at the instance of the Austrian government, his force was recalled by the sultan. In 1853 he was chosen to the command-in-chief of the Turkish army in Bulgaria. Prince Gortschakoff, in command of a powerful Russian army, was upon the opposite bank of the Danube; and against him Omar Pasha executed a series of strategic manœuvres, which completely baffled the skill of the former general. At Kalafat, Oltenitza, and Citate, the pasha repulsed the Russians; and finally at Silistria, he inflicted on them so heavy a defeat, that they were compelled to evacuate the Danubian principalities. In 1855 he went to the Crimea, having a Turkish and Egyptian army under his command, and inflicted a severe defeat on the Russians at Eupatoria. He was then sent to relieve Kars, which surrendered before he arrived. He was afterwards appointed governor of Bagdad, but fell into disfavour and was banished, but was recalled the following year, and in 1861 employed to pacify Bosnia and Herzegowina, which were in revolt. He then attacked the Montenegrins, and captured Cettinje, the chief town. After 1869 he retired from active work in public affairs, occupying the position of a minister without portfolio. He was a Knight of the Russian order of St. Anne, and a recipient of the grand cross of the legion of honour.

Born at Plaski, on the Military Frontier, 1806; died 1871.

OMBAY, or MALUWA, om-bai', an island of the Asiatic archipelago, belonging to the Netherlands, between the north-west coast of Australia and Celebes, separated from Timor, on the south by the strait of Ombay. The coasts are rocky, and the island generally is of volcanic formation. Maize, cotton, and pepper, are cultivated; wax, edible nests, amber, and other products are exported; and oxen, goats, and pigs are bred. Area, 961 square miles. Pop. 194,000, of mixed Malay and Negro origin. The Dutch resideney is at a village named Alor. Lat. 8° 8′—8° 28′ S. Lon. 124° 17′—125° 7′ E.

O'MEARA, BARRY EDWARD, o-mai'-ra, at an early age entered the British army as assistant surgeon, but was dismissed for misconduct. He afterwards was appointed surgeon in the navy, and discharged his duties with credit. He accompanied Napoleon to St. Helena, as private physician to the ex-Emperor, and took an active part in the continued quarrels between Napoleon (whom he warmly supported) and Sir Hudson Lowe, (see LOWE), who ordered him to be arrested. On his return to England, he made atrocious accusations against Sir Hudson, and was in consequence dismissed the service. In 1822 he published a book, with the title "Napoleon in Exile," containing reminiscences of daily life in the island and of many conversations.

Born in Ireland, 1786; died in London, 1836.

OMER, ST., o-mair', a fortified town of France, department Pas-de-Calais, on the Aa, 23 miles S.E. of Calais. It is well fortified and built with tolerable regularity, the principal streets being broad and spacious; but they are in general bordered with low mean-looking houses. The only square is the Place d'Armes. On one of its sides is the town-hall. Of the public walks, the most frequented are the ramparts, the borders of the canal Neuf-Fossée, and the avenue of the gate leading towards Calais. The public buildings worth notice are the cathedral, in the Transition style, the ancient church of the Jesuits, and the noble Gothic church of St. Bertin, now fallen into ruins. There is a famous college here for the education of English and Irish Roman Catholics. Manf. Woollens, leather, paper, earthen pipes, and starch. Pop. 21,500.

OMPHALE, om'-fa-le, in Greek legend, a queen of Lydia. She married Tmolus, who, at his death, left her mistress of his kingdom. She purchased Hercules, who had been sold as a slave for the recovery of his senses, after the murder of Eurytus. Omphale soon restored her slave to liberty, and the hero became enamoured of his mistress. The queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen, that, to conciliate her esteem, he spun by her side among her women, while she covered herself with the lion's skin, and armed herself with the club of the hero, often striking him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he held the distaff.

OMSK, omsk, a town of Asiatic Russia, in the government of Tobolsk, on both banks of the Om, at the confluence of that river with the Irtish. It has a military school, in which the Mongol languages are taught, a Cossack school, and an hospital. It is the centre of government for western Sibera, and the residence of the governor-general. There are mining works in the vicinity, and it is well situated for carrying on a great transit trade Pop. 30,890. Lat. 54° 59′ N. Lon. 73° 62′ E.

OMUN, o-mun', a town of Western Africa, on an island of the same name, in the old Calabar river. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 6° 11′ N. Lon. 8 15′ E.

ONATE, o-na'-tai, a town of Spain, province of Biscay, 19 miles S.W. of Tolosa. It has a uni-

O'NEILL, ELIZA, o-neel', actress, daughter of an Irish comedian. She appeared in London with great success, competing in attraction with Mrs. Siddons. Her greatest character was Juliet. She married, in 1819, Sir William Beecher, M.P., and retired from the stage.
Born in Ireland, 1795; died 1872.

ONEKOTAN, o-ne-ko-tan', one of the Kurile islands, in the North Pacific, off the south-western extremity of Kamschatka. It is 30 miles long, with a breadth of 15. There is an active volcano. Lat. 49° 32′ N. Lon. 155° E.

ONESIMUS, o-nes'-i-mus, a Phrygian, was the slave of Philemon, the friend of St. Paul. Having fled from his master, he met with the apostle at Rome, by whom he was converted to Christianity, and sent back to Philemon with an affectionate epistle. He is said to have been made bishop of Berea, in Macedonia, where he suffered martyrdom.
Died 95.

ONGKOR-WAT, or NOKORVAT, ong-kor-vat', a town and anciently the capital of Cambodia. The town is now little more than a collection of bamboo huts (commanded by a rude fort), but the remains of its ancient Buddhist temples are of great size and beauty, and very interesting to Oriental archæologists. Pop. 1,000.

ONITSHA, o-nit'-sha, a town of Western Africa, on the left bank of the Quorra, or Niger, about 145 miles above its mouth. It is a large town, and carries on a trade in nuts, palm-oil, ivory, timber, earthenware, sheep, poultry, and fish. Pop. 13,000.

ONKELOS, or AKILAS, on-ke'-los, surnamed the Proselyte, a Jewish rabbi. He was the author of one of the Chaldee Targums, or paraphrases of the Old Testament, which is highly esteemed by the Jews, and was chanted alternately with the Hebrew in their synagogues as late as the 16th century. The Targum of Onkelos is printed in Buxtorf's Hebrew and Walton's Polyglot Bible. The Babylonian Talmud declares that he lived about the time of our Saviour.

ONOMACRITUS, on-om-a'-kritus, a religious poet of ancient Greece, who is said by Herodotus to have collected and expounded the prophecies of Musæus. He was banished from Athens and went to Persia, where he took refuge at the court of Xerxes. He is credited with having established the orgies in honour of Dionysus, or Bacchus.
Lived in the 6th century B.C.

ONSLOW, ons'-lo, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 9,829, about one-third being coloured. The capital is Onslow Court-house.

ONTANAGON, on'-ta-nai'-gon, a river of N. America, disemboguing itself into Lake Superior on its S. side. A mass of copper, weighing upwards of 6,000 lbs. was discovered in its bed.

ONTARIO, LAKE, the easternmost and smallest of the five great lakes of North America. (See AMERICA, NORTH.)

ONTARIO, on-ta'-re-o, formerly Upper Canada, or Canada West, a province of the dominion of Canada, bounded N. by the North-western Territory; N.E. and E. by the province of Quebec, from which it is for the most part separated by the Ottawa river; S.E. by St. Lawrence river, Lake Ontario, the Niagara river, and Lake Erie; W. by Lake Huron and part of Lake Superior; and S. by Lake Superior and the state of Minnesota. The surface is generally undulating, the highest part being the Lamentian Hills, near Lake Superior, which attain an elevation of more than 2,000 feet. The shores of Lake Superior are bold and rugged, the cliffs ranging from 300 to 1,300 feet in height. There is a water-front along the lakes of nearly 3,000 miles, with many good harbours. The chief bays are Quinté, near the east end of Lake Ontario; Pigeon, at the west end of Lake Erie; Georgian, in Lake Huron; Goulais and Batchewauming, near the outlet of Lake Superior; and Michipicoten, Nipigon, Black, and Thunder bays, in the north and north-western parts of the same lake. The most important islands belonging to the province are the Thousand Islands, in the St. Lawrence; Wolfe and Amherst, in Lake Ontario; Long Point and Point Pelee, in Lake Erie; Walpole, in Lake St. Clair; Grand Manitoulin and Cockburn, in Lake Huron; and Caribou, Michipicoten, and others in Lake Superior. The soil is generally of excellent quality, and the south-western part has been termed "the garden of Canada." Grain and fruits are cultivated abundantly. Between the Ottawa river and Georgian Bay, are extensive timber districts, producing red and white pine and hard woods. In the western part of the province, between Lakes Huron and Superior, is abundance of timber, including spruce, fir, birch, poplar, and cedar. There are many fertile plains and valleys, and small prairies, with a luxuriant growth of grass. The climate is healthy, but the winters are extremely cold, and in summer the heat is occasionally very great.

Rivers and Lakes.—The OTTAWA, forming the boundary for about 400 miles, with its tributaries the Montreal, Matawan, Petawawa, Bonnechère, Madagascar, Mississippi (not the great river of that name), Rideau, and South Petite Nation. The principal river discharging into Lake Ontario is the Trent (known in the upper part as the Otonabee). Other rivers are Grand river, discharging into Lake Erie; the Thames, into Lake St. Clair; the Maitland and Saugeen, into Lake Huron; the Nottawasaga, Severn, Muskoka, and Manganetawan; French river, the outlet of Lake Nipissing, with many rapids; the Wahnapitae, White Fish, and Spanish; and the Michipicoten, Pic, Nipigon, Black, Sturgeon, and Kaministiquia, discharging into Lake Superior. There are numerous lakes, the largest being Nipigon, 70 miles long and 50 broad; Nipissing, 50 miles by 15; Simcoe, 30 by 18, and Muskoka, 15 by 8.

Minerals.—Iron, gold, silver, copper, lead, plumbago, antimony, manganese, gypsum, marble, and building stone.

OPHIR, MOUNT, or GUNONG PASAMAN. (See SUMATRA.)

OPIE, JOHN, o'-pe, an eminent English painter, who was the son of a poor carpenter in Cornwall. His talents for design were evinced at the earliest age, but were discouraged by his father, who intended him for his own trade. Dr. John Wolcot, or Peter Pindar, as he is known in literature, hearing of young Opie's skill, took him into his service, and afterwards provided him with the means of repairing to London. In 1781, Wolcot obtained an introduction for his protégé to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who tendered the self-taught artist some valuable advice. Through Wolcot's management, the Cornish lad became a favourite with the fashionable world of the metropolis, and crowds of wealthy sitters came to his studio, but in time his popularity as a fashionable portrait-painter declined. Although he did not abandon portrait-painting, Opie next devoted much of his time to historical subjects. Late in life Opie had qualified himself sufficiently, in a literary sense, to aspire to the appointment of professor of painting to the Royal Academy. That post, after a first failure, he ultimately obtained; but his death occurring soon afterwards, he only found time to deliver four lectures, which were published, and are still considered valuable to the student of art. His remains were honoured by being placed near the tomb of Sir Joshua Reynolds in St. Paul's cathedral.

Born at Truro, Cornwall, 1761; died 1807.

OPIE, MRS. AMELIA, an English novelist, and second wife of the preceding. Her maiden name was Alderson, and she was the daughter of a physician in easy circumstances. After her marriage with the artist, in 1788, she made her first appearance as an author, by producing a moral tale, entitled "Father and Daughter." In 1802 she published a graceful volume of poems, and two years later gave to the public her novel of "Adelaide Mowbray." Her "Simple Tales" were her next production, and after her husband's death she published a memoir, and wrote "The Warrior's Return and other Poems," "Tales of the Heart," and "Valentine's Eve." In 1825 she became a member of the Society of Friends, and subsequently visited France, Belgium, and Switzerland, giving her travelling impressions in "Tait's Magazine" and elsewhere.

Born at Norwich, 1769; died at the same city, 1853.

OPITZ, MARTIN, o'-pitz, German poet. He passed his earlier years chiefly at the court of the duke of Liegnitz. In 1624 he published his first poem, and in the following year went to Vienna, where, having written an elegy on the death of an archduke, he received a laurel crown from the emperor Ferdinand II. Having been for some time engaged in diplomacy, he was raised to the rank of nobility. In 1638 he was appointed secretary and historiographer to Ladislaus IV. of Poland. He died of the plague the following year. He wrote various poems and an opera, and translated the Psalms, and the "Antigone" of Sophocles. He was the most popular writer of his time, and may be said to have founded modern German poetry. Although a Protestant, he enjoyed the favour and protection of Catholic princes.

Born at Bunzlau, Silesia, 1597; died at Dantzic, 1639.

OPORTO, o-por'-to, ("the port,") a city and seaport of Portugal, in the province of Minho, picturesquely situated, on a declivity of the right bank of the Douro, 2 miles from its mouth. There are remains of the old wall which once enclosed the town. The quay extends the whole length of the town. The roadstead is spacious, and is, at times, the rendezvous of fleets of merchantmen for Brazil. On the opposite bank of the Douro (crossed by a suspension bridge) there are two suburbs; the smaller and more westerly of these is Villa Nova de Gaya. To the east and also on the south bank of the Douro, is another populous suburb, Villa Nova do Porto, chiefly inhabited by mechanics. Between these suburbs are immense depôts or warehouses, for storing the wine from the interior, previous to its being embarked. The harbour is difficult of access, partly from rocks at the mouth of the Douro, partly from the accumulation of sand, and, the river being subject to floods, is occasionally insecure. Many of the streets are narrow and steep, but there are several spacious, handsome thoroughfares, especially the Rua Nova Inglezes, a modern street in which is the British Factory House, a very fine building of white granite, with a beautiful façade, and containing club-house, library, and refreshment rooms. Another fine street is the Rua Nova de S. Joao, in which are many handsome houses, with gilt balconies. There are 11 open places, or squares, of which the finest is Praça de S. Ovidio, occupying an elevated situation, with fine buildings, and a terrace commanding an extensive sea-view. The cathedral, once a noble edifice, but spoiled by modern alterations, is near the river and the bridge, and adjoining it is the bishop's palace. There are 90 other churches and chapels, and attached to the church dos Clerigos (the clergy) is a tower, said to be the loftiest in Portugal. There are now 15 convents, but more than 60 were destroyed in 1832 by the troops of Dom Pedro, and one of the finest, S. Bento, is now used as a barrack. The once wealthy convent of Da Serra is on a high rock on the southern bank of the river. There are 10 hospitals and several educational establishments. There is a large market, the Cordoaria. Oporto being the principal manufacturing city of Portugal, it has many large mercantile English houses, by whom the greatest part of the foreign trade is conducted.

Manf.—Silk, woollen, and cotton fabrics, hosiery, cloth of gold, lace, buttons, cutlery, hardware, glass, leather, paper, tobacco, soap, sugar, and iron.

Exp.—Port wine, of which about 32,000 pipes are annually exported, and the half goes to Britain. The other articles are bullion, fruit, corn, wool, oils, provisions, salt, leather, and cork. Near the city are mines of coal, copper, and antimony.

Pop.—105,838.

Lat. 41° 9′ N. Lon. 8° 37′ W.

History.—Oporto occupies the site of the ancient Porto-Cale, from which the name of the kingdom was derived. It was an important city, famous for the strength of the fortifications during the supremacy of the Moors, and was the capital of Portugal until 1174, when the seat of government was transferred to Lisbon. In 1808, it was taken and sacked by the French, but retaken by Wellington in the following year. In 1832 the forces of Dom Pedro occupied the town, which was unsuccessfully besieged for a year by Dom Miguel, and suffered greatly. A Portuguese international exhibition was held here in 1865.

OPOTSHKA, o-potsh'-ka, a town of European Russia, government of Pskov, on an island formed by the Velikaja, 78 miles S. of Pskov. Pop. 4,200.

OPPELN, op'-peln, a town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the Oder, 50 miles S.E. of Breslau. It has several churches (one, Adelbert's, founded at the end of the 10th century), a synagogue, a gymnasium, and numerous schools. There is an old castle on an island in the channel of the river, and there are several public parks and gardens. Manf. Linen, leather, ribbons, and earthenware. There is a considerable transit trade. Pop. 14,447.

OPPENHEIM, op'-pen-hime, a town of the grand duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, on the left bank of the Rhine, 15 miles S.W. of Darmstadt. There are three churches, one of them a beautiful Gothic structure, but dilapidated; a synagogue, an hospital, and a ruined castle. Pop. 3,000.

OPPIAN, op'-pi-an, a Greek poet and grammarian, who wrote three poems on hawking, hunting, and fishing, entitled "Ixeutica," "Cynegetica," and "Halieutica," which are extant. A portion of Oppian was translated into English by Mawser, 1736.

Lived in the 2nd century.

OPPIDO, op'-pe-do, a town of Italy, province of Reggio, situate among the mountains, 4 miles S.E. of Palmi. It has a cathedral, several churches, and monasteries. Pop. 3,600.

ORAGAWA, o-ra-ga'-wa, a town of Japan, on the east side of the island of Niphon, 25 miles S.E. of Yeddo. There is a large harbour, and a custom house, and is a place of considerable importance. Pop. 20,000.

ORAN, or WARAN, o-ran', a town and seaport of Algeria, north Africa, at the inner extremity of the Gulf of Oran, 220 miles S.W. of Algiers.

It is situate at the foot of a hill called the Peak of St. Croix, is surrounded by walls and commanded by strong forts. The town is divided into two portions by a wide avenue, lined with poplars. The principal buildings are the Roman Catholic church, a Protestant church, large mosques, the hôtel de la préfecture, and the residence of the military commander, three barracks, a very large military hospital, and government offices. The streets and promenades are wide, and the town generally well-built. There are three suburbs, Mers-el-Kebir, La Senia, and Ain-el-Turk. The harbour is incommodious, but a large trade is carried on. Pop. 58,530. only about one-fifth being Europeans.—The town was built by the Moors, and was taken by the Spaniards in 1509, by the Turks in 1708, and again by the Spaniards in 1732. It suffered greatly by an earthquake in 1791. In 1831 it was taken by the French, and a bishopric was established in 1867.

ORAN, the most westerly province of Algeria, is bounded E. by the province of Algiers, W. by Morocco, N. by the Mediterranean, and W. by the desert. A considerable portion belongs to the district known as the Tell, and another large portion is included in the Sahara. Area, 111,826 square miles. Pop. 674,830. Chief towns, ORAN, MASCARA, MOSTAGANEM, SIDI-BEL-ABBÈS, and TLEMCEN.

ORANGE, WILLIAM I., of, or'-anj, surnamed William the Silent, succeeded at the age of 11 years, to the family possessions and titles in Luxembourg, Brabant, Flanders, Holland, and to the French principality of Orange, in Provence; whence the most celebrated title of the family was derived. His father had embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and he was at first educated in the same principles; but, at an early age, the emperor Charles V. summoned him to his court, and had him brought up in the Roman Catholic faith. The emperor appointed his favourite to the highest posts, as he advanced in years: the command-in-chief of the army upon the French frontier, a post eagerly sought after by many distinguished generals was given to William of Orange when he had attained his 21st year. When Charles V. abdicated his throne to his son Philip II., he leaned upon William's shoulder; and to him also the retiring monarch intrusted the mission of delivering the imperial crown to his brother Ferdinand at Augsburg. With the gloomy Philip, however, William was soon to become an object of suspicion and hatred. At the peace of Cateau-Cambresis, in 1559, William was one of the Spanish hostages sent to the court of France; and, while hunting with Henry II. in the forest of Vincennes, the French monarch revealed to him the scheme which had been recently formed by Philip and himself, "to extirpate Protestantism by a general extirpation of Protestants." The prince although horror-struck and indignant at the royal revelations, held his peace and kept his countenance, but resolved to thwart the designs of Philip, by means of secret intrigues with the leaders of the protestant party in the Netherlands. During the feeble administration of Margaret of Parma, William, as stadtholder of Holland, Zealand, and Utrecht, and as member of the Flemish council of state, was secretly but indefatigably employed in undermining the tyrannical schemes of the Spanish bigot; but, upon the nomination of the sanguinary Alva to the government of the Netherlands, the prince, to avoid the tragical fate of his fellow nobles, Egmont and Horn, retired from the Netherlands to his estate of Nassau. In 1568 the wrongs of the people whom he loved, awoke the prince into fierce action. He left his retreat, and became the champion of the cause of liberty and Protestanism in the Netherlands. In the ensuing struggles, notwithstanding that his raw and ill-disciplined levies of French and German Protestants were often beaten in the field by the veteran Spanish infantry, then the best soldiers in the world, the statesmanship of the prince counterbalanced every disaster, and enabled him to achieve a victory over his foes, and finally led to the famous Union of Utrecht, in 1576, by which seven protestant provinces—Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Friesland, Gröningen, Overyssel, and Guelderland—became the nucleus and the lasting basis of the Dutch republic. The Spanish monarch thereupon set a price upon the head of William of Orange. This temptation combined with fanatical zeal, produced several attempts upon his life, from the first of which (that of John Jaureguy, in 1582) he escaped with a wound: the fatal shot was, however, dealt to him two years afterwards, at Delft, by one Balthazar Gerard, a Burgundian. William left three sons, two of whom, Maurice and Frederick Henry, became, in succession, stadtholders of the United Provinces. (See MAURICE OF NASSAU.)

Born at Dillenburg, in Nassau, 1533; died 1584.

ORANGE, a town of France, department Vaucluse, on the left bank of the Aigue, 16 miles N. of Avignon. Its streets are narrow, dark, dirty, and ill-paved, with houses devoid of elegance and even of neatness. It has no public buildings worth notice, and the only objects which recommend it to attention, are its remains of antiquity. The principal of these is a triumphal arch, profusely ornamented with sculptures and the remains of a theatre, with a colossal wall. Manf. Linen, silk, muslin, leather, oil, serge, and paper. Pop. 10,500. This place was long the capital of a principality which gave title to the family now on the throne of the Netherlands, but at the peace of Utrecht, the town and territory were ceded to Louis XIV.

ORANGE, the name of seven counties in the United States:

FLORIDA.—Area, 2,450 square miles. Pop. 6,618. The capital is Orlando.

INDIANA.—Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 14 363. The capital is Paoli.

NEW YORK.—Area, 838 square miles. Pop. 88,220. The capitals are Newburgh and Goshen.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 23,698, more than one-third being coloured. The capital is Hillsborough.

TEXAS.—Area, 330 square miles. Pop. 2,938. The capital is Orange.

VERMONT.—Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 23,525. The capital is Chelsea.

VIRGINIA.—Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 13,052, about half being coloured. The capital is Orange Court-house.

ORANGE, a township of New Jersey, United States, 3 miles N.W. of Newark. It is beautifully situated on the side of a mountain, and the vicinity is laid out with villas and parks. There is a Roman Catholic college. Pop. 13,207.

ORANGE, a municipal town of New South Wales, Australia, 154 miles W. of Sidney, at an elevation of 3,000 feet above the sea level, is the centre of a district very rich in minerals, especially gold and copper. Silver, lead and coal are also found. The Ophir and Wentworth are the principal gold diggings, and the Carrengera, Great Western, and Ophir, the most important of the copper mines. The town is well laid out, and there are banks and other good public buildings. Pop. 2,000.

ORANGE, or GARIEP, a river of South Africa, rising near lat. 29° 6′ S., lon. 27° 20′ E., by the junction of the Vaal and Nu Gariep, and, after a course of about 1,000 miles, falling into the Atlantic, in lat. 28° 37′ S., lon. 16° 18′ E.

ORANGE RIVER FREE STATE, a republic of South-eastern Africa, occupying a large tract between the two main head branches of the Orange river—the Vaal, on the north, and the Nu Gariep on the south, bounded N. by the Transvaal, S. and S.E. by Cape Colony, and E. by Natal. The eastern limit is 150 miles from the Indian Ocean, and its western 500 miles from the Atlantic. The territory, oval in shape, about 300 miles long from the north-east to the south-west, and 250 miles wide, forms a portion of the table-land of South Africa, the highest part being 6,000 feet above the sea level, on the Drakenberg and Maluti ranges, on the eastern side, and descending in slopes interspersed with vast plains to the Vaal and Orange rivers. The lowest part is about 3,000 feet above the sea level. The plains, or "flats," covered with grass, are characteristic features, and abound with herds of antelopes and deer. There is some undulating ground, and conical hills or "kopjes," the sides covered with large rounded stones. There is very little timber, or bush, except near the rivers. The climate is remarkably dry, and drought is prevalent, owing partly to the elevated situation and partly to the proximity on the north-west, to the great Kalahari desert. In winter the cold is severe; but, on the average, the climate is one of the healthiest in the world. Peaches, grapes, melons, oranges, and figs, are grown; sheep farming is the leading occupation, and wool and agricultural produce, the chief articles of trade.

Rivers.—The streams within the state are small and unnavigable, but in the rainy season are much swollen. The Caledon flows in a south-western direction into the Nu Gariep; but the Wilge, Valsh, Sand, Vet, Modder, and Reit, rising in the Drakenberg and Maluti ranges, are affluents of the Vaal.

Minerals.—Diamonds, garnets, and other precious stones, and there are indications of coal.

Area.—70,000 square miles.

Pop.—133,318, including 61,000 whites of English, Dutch, or German descent. The blacks are mostly Bechuanas, Hottentots, Basutos, Kuranos, and Bushmen.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 12 districts, each with a resident magistrate. The capital is BLOEMFONTEIN; Bethulie, Philipolis, Smithfield, Famesmith (near the diamond fields), Harrismith, Wynberg, Boshof, Lady Brand, Wepener, Ficksburg, and Bethlehem.

Constitution and Government.—The Free State is a republic, with a president elected for four years, and a legislature, or Volksraad, consisting of members returned by the districts. The prevailing religious denomination is the Dutch Reformed Church; the Church of England has a bishop, and the Wesleyans and other religious bodies have mission stations. The official language of the state is Dutch.

History.—The first settlements were made by Dutch boers, or farmers, who, being dissatisfied with the British government, emigrated in a body from Cape Colony, and announced their independence. In 1848, the governor of the Cape formally annexed the district as the Orange River Sovereignty, and that led to conflicts with the settlers, who were defeated at Boomplatz, many of them crossing the Vaal, and establishing the Transvaal Republic (annexed to Cape Colony in 1877). In 1854, the British government abandoned the territory, and the present form of government was established.

ORANGEBURG, a county of South Carolina, United States. Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 17,000, about two-thirds being coloured. The capital is Orangeburg Court-house.

ORANIENBAUM, o-ra-neen'-boum, a town of European Russia, on the south shore of the Gulf of Finland, 18 miles W. of St. Petersburg. There are an imperial palace, built for Peter the Great by Prince Menschikoff, a Greek church, Lutheran chapel, and a marine hospital. Pop. 3,700.

ORANIENBURG, o-ra-neen'-boory, a town of Prussia, province of Brandenburg, on the right bank of the Havel, 19 miles N.W. of Berlin. Manf. Calico, chintz, earthenware, and chemicals. Pop. 3,900.

ORATAVA, o-ra-ta'-va, a town of the Canary Islands, on the North coast of Teneriffe, below the Peak. It has a mole, governor's residence, and a citadel. Pop. 8,500.

ORAVICZA, or NEMET-ORAVICZA, o-ra-vitz'-a, a town of Hungary, 53 miles S.E. of Temesvar. In its neighbourhood are silver-, copper-, and iron-mines. Pop. 4,400.

ORB, orb, a town of Bavaria, in Lower Franconia, 41 miles N.W. of Wurzburg. Manf. Paper; and there are some salt-mines and mineral springs. Pop. 4,600.

ORBETELLO, or-bai-tel'-lo, a walled town of Northern Italy, on a tongue of land, projecting into a lake of the same name, 24 miles S.E. of Grosseto. There is a small harbour, protected by batteries. Pop. 3,000

ORBEY, or'-bai, a town of Germany, in Upper Alsace, 14 miles N.W. of Colmar, at the foot of a granite mountain, on two lakes, Blanc and Noir, respectively 3,425 feet and 3,090 feet above the sea-level. Manf. Cotton, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 5,500.

ORCADES, or-ka'-dees, the ancient name for the Orkney Islands.

ORCAGNA, ANDREA DI CIONE, or KANIYA, Italian painter, sculptor, and architect, son of a Florentine sculptor. He painted some noble frescoes in the Campo Santo, at Pisa, which were profoundly studied by Michael Angelo and Raffaele, and was also distinguished as a sculptor and architect, his master-pieces in the latter art being the Loggia de' Lanzo, in Florence.
Born 1329; died 1389.

ORCHIES, or-shee', a walled town of France, department Nord, 14 miles S.E. of Lille. Manf. Linen, soap, oil, and pottery. There is an active trade in grain and cattle. Pop. 3,300.

ORDERICUS VITALIS, or-der'-i-cus vita'-lis, an old Norman-English chronicler. He was the son of a Frenchman, who came to England with William the Conqueror, and was born in England, but sent, at the age of 10 years, to be educated in Normandy, and became a priest in the abbey of Ouche, at Lisieux. He wrote a work entitled "The Ecclesiastical History of England and Normandy," commencing with the birth of Christ, and is brought down to the year 1141. The first two books are of little value; but of the third, in which he treats of the lives of the first Norman kings of England, M. Guizot says, "No work contains so much and such valuable information on the history of the 11th and 12th centuries; on the political state, both civil and religious, of society in the west of Europe; and on the manners of the times, whether feudal, monastic, or popular."
Born near Shrewsbury, 1075; died about 1143.

OREBRO. (See ŒREBRO.)

OREGON, or'-e-gon, a western state of the United States, bounded N. and E. by Washington

Territory, from which it is separated by the Columbia river; E. by Idaho Territory; S. by Nevada and California, and W. by the Pacific. It is divided into two unequal portions by the Cascade Mountains, running north and south, with extinct volcanic peaks from 4,000 to 10,000 feet in elevation. Near the Pacific coast (which is 300 miles in extent, and rugged, with few inlets) are fertile valleys, with pine trees nearly 300 feet high, and other timber of immense size. In the vast forests are grisly and black bears, panthers, elks, and deer. The climate in this portion of the state is mild and equable, with abundant moisture, but east of the mountain ranges it is dry and variable and the soil is less fertile. Wheat, oats, potatoes, and apples are cultivated. The rivers abound with salmon.

Rivers.—The principal are the COLUMBIA, and its branches, the Willamette, Fall, Snake, and Owhyee.
Minerals.—Gold, silver, copper, platinum, and coal.
Area.—95,274 square miles.
Pop.—175,000, including about 10,000 Indians and 2,000 Chinese. In respect of population, this ranks as one of the latest to obtain record.
Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 25 counties. The chief towns are SALEM, the capital, and PORTLAND.
History.—The coast was discovered and Columbia river entered in 1792, by the American Captain Gray; and the country was explored by Captains Lewis and Clarke, of the United States army, in 1804 and 1805. The United States gave the name of Oregon to the whole territory west of the Rocky Mountains, as far north as lat. 54° 40′, and a counter claim by the British government led to a treaty in 1818, giving joint occupation; but, in 1846, the United States abrogated the treaty, and that act nearly resulted in hostilities, only averted by a settlement which fixed the boundary at the 49th parallel of latitude. Oregon was organised as a territory in 1848, and admitted as a state in 1859.

OREGON, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 1650 square miles. Pop. 3,300. The capital is Alton.

OREL, o'-rel, a government of European Russia, to the south of the governments of Tula and Kaluga. It is undulating and fertile, with extensive forests, and agriculture is attentively pursued. Corn, hemp, flax, honey, timber, and cattle are the chief products. Minerals. Iron, copper, nitre, mill-stones, and turf. Area, 18,041 square miles. Pop. 1,892,932.

OREL, capital of the above government, on the Oka, at its confluence with the Orlik, 226 miles S.W. of Moscow. It is the seat of a bishop, and there are many churches, but the houses are mostly constructed of wood. Manf. Rope and yarn. Grain and hemp are exported, and a considerable trade is carried on, facilitated by the position of the town on a navigable river, and the connection by railway with Moscow and Odessa. Pop. 76,601. The town was founded in 1566 as a defence against the Tartars.

ORELLANA, FRANCIS D', o-rail-ya'-na, a Spaniard, who was the first to traverse the continent of South America. In 1531 he accompanied Pizarro to Peru; but, learning that gold, silver, and spices were to be found beyond the mountains east of Quito, he joined an expedition formed by Gonzales, brother of Pizarro, and set forth in the direction indicated. After experiencing great fatigue, the Spaniards reached Zumaco, and then explored the Napo for 200 leagues. Orellana, with a few followers, was next sent forward with provisions in a boat; upon which, instead of returning to Gonzales, he pursued his course down the river; and, after entering the main stream, continued his navigation of it for upwards of 1,000 leagues, until he reached the sea. After his return to Spain, he gave such marvellous accounts of the countries he had passed through, and of the women dwelling upon the banks of the river (whence the name Amazon was given to it), that he obtained numerous followers, and set forth upon a second expedition, but died at the mouth of the Amazon.
Died 1550.

ORELLANA. (See AMAZON.)

ORELLI, JOHANN KASPAR, o-rel'-le, German philologist, was educated at Zürich, where he became professor of eloquence and hermeneutics in 1819. He was ordained as a clergyman when only 19 years old. He edited Horace, Cicero, and other classical authors; and was distinguished not only for his great learning and success as a tutor, but as a sympathiser with liberal political movements in Greece and Germany.
Born at Zürich, 1787; died 1849.

ORENBURG, o-ren-boorg, an eastern frontier government of European Russia, bounded by the government of Tobolsk on the N.E. and Samara on the S.W., and by the river Ural on the S.E. It is mountainous, covered by ranges of the Ural and extensive steppes, with low-lying plains, and there are extensive forests. The climate is generally healthy. Cattle-breeding and fishing are carried on, and there is a considerable export trade, principally with Bokhara, Khiva, and other parts of central Asia, chiefly of corn, skins, and precious metals.

Rivers.—The Kama (a branch of the Volga), with its affluents, the Bielaia and Tchussovaia; and the Tobol, which is a branch of the Obi.
Minerals.—Iron, copper, and gold.
Area.—73,886 square miles.
Pop.—1,196,133, consisting of Russians, Tartar and Khirgiz tribes, Calmucks, and some Finns.
Chief Towns.—UFA, ORENBURG, and Menselinsk.

ORENBURG, the seat of government of the preceding, on the eastern frontier of European Russia on the Ural. It carries on a large trade with the tribes of Central Asia. Corn, skins, and metals are exported. Pop. 42,123. Lat. 51° 45′ N. Lon. 88° 6′ E.

ORENSE, o-ren'-se, a province of Spain, bounded N. by Lugo, S. and W. by Portugal, and E. by Leon and Zamora. Agriculture is in an advanced state, and wheat, rye, maize, and vegetables are cultivated, and cattle and pigs are reared. The capital is ORENSE.

Rivers.—The Minho, Sil, Avia, and Arnoya.
Area.—4,058 square miles.
Pop.—388,811.

ORENSE, a city of Spain, capital of the above province, on the left bank of the Minho, 73 miles S.E. of Corunna. The river is crossed by a bridge, 135 feet high, built in the 13th century. There are a Gothic cathedral, built in 1220, on the site of an older structure, several other churches, convents, and a town-house in the principal square, which is surrounded by colonnades. There are boiling springs in the vicinity. Manf. Linen fabrics, leather, and chocolate. Pop. 12,586.

ORESTES, o-res'-tes, in Greek legend, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, he was saved by his sister Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, king of Phocis, by whom he was carefully educated with his son Pylades. From the familiarity between the two young princes soon arose the most inviolable friendship. When Orestes reached manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra and her adulterer Ægisthus. In consequence of the matricide, Orestes is represented as having been tormented by the Furies. After many remarkable adventures, which form the subject of tragedies by Euripides and others, Orestes ascended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect security. His old age was crowned with peace and security, and he died in Arcadia, in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his son Tisamenes, by Hermione. The friendship of Orestes and of Pylades became proverbial.

ORFAH, or ROHA, or'-fa, a fortified town of Asiatic Turkey, pashalic of Diarbekir, 86 miles S.W. of the town of that name. It is surrounded by walls, and has 15 mosques, with Greek and Armenian churches. Manf. Coarse woollen and cotton cloths. Pop. 50,000.

ORFFYREUS, or ORPHYREUS, or-fi-re'-us, Ernest Bessler, surnamed, was in turn soldier in the service of Austria, quack doctor, mechanician, seeker of treasures, and counsellor of commerce at Cassel. In 1719 he proclaimed that he had discovered perpetual motion, and exhibited at different places in Saxony a machine which he declared successfully solved the problem. But upon the unfavourable report of the philosopher Gravesande, he destroyed his piece of mechanism. He next turned his attention to religion, and endeavoured to found an establishment to be called Gottesburg, "city of God," where Christians, Turks, and Jews were to live in peace and amity. He wrote a treatise, entitled "Perpetual Motion Solved," and another upon the union of all religious sects.

Born in Alsace, 1680; died at Furstenburg, 1745.

ORFILA, MATEO JOSÉ BONAVENTURA, or'-fe-la, a distinguished physician and toxicologist. He was the son of an opulent merchant of Minorca, and was himself destined for a commercial career; but having been shipwrecked in his 15th year, he resolved to devote himself to the study of medicine, and he attended the medical schools of Valencia and Barcelona. In 1807, so highly had he distinguished himself in the science of chemistry, that he was sent, at the expense of the Spanish government, to complete his studies at Paris. The war which ensued between France and Spain, prevented his return to the latter country, and he settled at Paris, where in 1811, he received the doctor's degree, and soon attained a great reputation as physician and lecturer. In 1813 he published his "Treatise on Poisons," which placed him among the best French chemists, and led to his election as member of the Academy of Medicine," and correspondent of the Institute. In 1819 he became a naturalised French citizen, and a professor of medical jurisprudence, and, in 1823, of chemistry; in 1831 he was elected dean of the faculty of medicine. In 1834 he was appointed a member of the council of public instruction, and assisted greatly to establish medical schools and a clinical hospital and botanical garden. His most important works were "Elements of Chemistry, applied to Medicine and the Arts," "Treatise on Legal Medicine," in four volumes, which is the greatest work on medical jurisprudence extant, and "Lectures upon Legal Medicine." He likewise wrote, in conjunction with M. Leseur, a work "On the Appearances presented by Dead Bodies after Exhumation, Drowning, Suffocation in Cesspools, or by Gases." Orfila may be said to have founded the science of toxicology: in medical jurisprudence he was the most eminent professor in Europe.

Born in Minorca, 1787; died at Paris, 1853.

ORFORD, EARL OF. (See WALPOLE, HORACE.)

ORGEJEV, or-ge-jef', a town of European Russia, government of Bessarabia, on the Reub, an affluent of the Dniester. Pop. 4,700.

ORGIVA, or-je'-va, a town of Spain, province of Granada, 33 miles S.E. of the town of that name. There is a church, formerly a mosque, with a fine portico. There are smelting works for antimony. Pop. 3,300.

ORGON, or-gaiong', a town of France, department Bouches-du-Rhône, 15 miles S.E. of Avignon. The inhabitants are mostly engaged in weaving. Pop. 3,000.

ORIA, o'-re-a, a town of Spain, province of Almeira, 32 miles N. of the town of that name. Manf. Linen. Pop. 5,600.

ORIA, or URITANA, a town of Italy, province of Lecce, 22 miles S.E. of Brindisi, situated on three hills, between two lakes. It has a cathedral, an hospital, and several convents. Pop. 5,800.

ORIBASUS, o-ri-bai'-sus, of Pergamus, physician to Julian the Apostate, who wrote "Medical Collections," compiled from the works of Galen, and two other works on anatomy.

Lived in the 4th century.

ORIENT, L', a town of France. (See L'ORIENT.)

ORIGEN, or'-i-jen, a father of the Church. From his earliest youth he not only studied Greek science and art, but devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, and, by his exhortations, his father, who held some office in the Christian church, was encouraged to endure martyrdom. Origen taught grammar for his own support and that of his mother and brethfen. In his 18th year, Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, appointed him catechist of his church. His austerities were very great, and taking the words of Matthew xix. 12, in their most literal and rigid sense, he castrated himself, to become qualified for the kingdom of heaven, an act for which he afterwards greatly blamed himself. From Alexandria he went, in 211, to Rome, where he began his famous Hexapla, or the bible in different languages, on which he was engaged for 28 years. At the command of his bishop, Demetrius, he returned to Alexandria, and was ordained. Soon after this he began his commentaries on the scriptures; but Demetrius, who was envious of his reputation, persecuted him with violence, and in a council, assembled in 231, it was decreed that Origen should desist from preaching and quit the city. Upon this, he went to Cæsarea, where he was well received by the bishop, and permitted to preach, which gave additional offence to his persecuters, who excommunicated him. Though he was thus treated at home, he met with the greatest respect wherever he went. He was consulted in several episcopal synods; but in the persecution under Decius, in 250, he was thrown into prison, and put to the torture. On his release, he applied himself to his ministerial labours and to writing, producing an enormous number of works, most of which are lost. His most valuable works were editions of the Hebrew text and Greek version of the Old Testament, and Stromata and Principia, wherein he commented upon the doctrines of Christianity, and illustrated them by a reference to the opinions of the philosophers. Jerome styles Origen "a man of immortal genius, who understood logic, geometry, arithmetic, music, grammar, rhetoric, and all the sects of the philosophers; so that he was resorted to by many students of secular literature, whom he received chiefly that he might embrace the opportunity of instructing them in the faith of Christ." The allegorical mode employed by Origen in interpreting the Holy Scriptures, led, however, to violent controversies in the 4th century; but many of his errors are said to be owing to heretical interpolations of his writings. His tomb, near the high altar of the cathedral of Tyre, was destroyed during the Crusades.

Born at Alexandria, 185 A.D.; died at Tyre, 254.

ORIGEN, a Platonic philosopher, who was the disciple and friend of Porphyry. He made a panegyric on the emperor Gallienus.

Lived in the 3rd century.

ORIHUA, or'-e-wa, one of the Sandwich group of islands.

ORIHUELA, o'-re-wai'-la, a well-built town of Spain, privance of Alicante, on the Segura, over which there are two bridges, 36 miles S.W. of Alicante. It is situated in a tract termed, on account of its fertility, the "Garden of Spain," and has a small Gothic cathedral, churches (one of them, Santiago, very beautiful), monasteries, convents, a very fine modern episcopal palace, several hospitals, a large college, and other educational institutions. Manf. Silk, brandy, olive oil, soap, and leather; and there are saltpetre-works. Pop. 24,000. Orihuela was the Gothic Orcelis, and was in the possession of the Moors during 550 years; they lost it 1264.

ORINOCO, o-ri-no'-ko, a river of South America, and one of the greatest in the world. It rises in the Sierra Parime, Venezuelan Guiana, and afterwards turning round with a circular sweep, it holds a northerly course, when, being joined by numerous large rivers from the eastern ridge of the Andes, it is swelled to an immense size, and runs eastward to the Atlantic Ocean, which it enters by several mouths, in lat. 8° 40′ N., lon. 61° W. During the rainy season it inundates the immense plains through which it flows, during the highest flood to an extent of from 80 to 90 miles. Its delta commences about 130 miles from the coast. It is computed that the river has 50 outlets into the ocean, only seven of which are navigable, but not for vessels of any great burden. The grand mouth of the Orinoco is formed by Cape Barima to the S.S.E., which is in lat. 8° 54′ N., and the island of Cangrejos, lying W.N.W. of the cape. They are 25 miles from each other, but the breadth of the navigable part of the passage is not quite three. The depth of water on the bar, which lies a little farther out to sea than the cape, is, at ebb, 17 feet. Near the Andes are the falls of Maypures and Atures, which are a remarkable series of cataracts. The annual swell of the Orinoco commences in April and ends in August, and its basin has an area estimated at 400,000 square miles. The total length of the course is about 1,800 miles, and it has 436 large, and more than 2,000 small affluents. Its banks are clothed with dense forests, which, like the waters, abound with animal life.

ORION, o-ri'-on, in Greek mythology, a giant of enormous size, who having insulted the daughter of the king of Chios, was blinded, but received his sight, and was afterwards a hunting companion of Artemis (Diana). After death Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the constellations still bears his name. The constellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the Bull, was composed of seventeen stars, in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion to the poets often to speak of Orion's sword.

ORISSA, o-ris'-sa, a maritime province and commissionership of British India, in the Bengal presidency, bounded S. by the Godaveri, and E. by the Bay of Bengal. It is traversed by a branch of the Eastern Ghauts, running parallel with the coast, and about 3,000 feet in greatest elevation. There are extensive forests. Wild beasts and reptiles abound, and the rivers swarm with fish. It comprises Cuttack, a portion of the British district Midnapoor, and the unsettled region lying on the W. of these.

Rivers.—The Godaveri, the Mahanuddee, and the Brahminy.

Area.—23,900 square miles.

Pop.—3 730,735, including many Khonds, Sourahs, and other savage tribes in the hill districts.

History.—Orissa was a large and powerful native kingdom; but in 1558, the royal line having become extinct, it became a province of the Mogul empire, on the breaking up of which by the Mahrattas, the French, and the English, it ultimately came into the possession of the latter. Within the last 40 years great and successful efforts have been made to suppress the practice of human sacrifices and infanticide previously so prevalent. The province has suffered much from famines.

ORISTANO, o-ris-ta'-no, a town and riverport on the west coast of the island of Sardinia, on a bay of the same name, 56 miles N.W. of Cagliari. It is enclosed by lofty walls, and has a cathedral, with a conspicuous clock-tower, several convents, hospital, college, and an archbishop's palace. Manf. Ironware, cutlery, and agricultural implements. It has a trade in corn, wine, and salt. Pop. 6,500.

ORIZABA, o-re-sa'-ba, a town of Mexico, in the state of Vera Cruz, 70 miles S.W. of the town of that name. It has wide, neat, and well-paved streets. Manf. Coarse cloth and tobacco. Pop. 15,000. Lat. 18° 48′ N. Lon. 97° 7′ W.

ORKNEY ISLANDS, ork'-ne, the Orcades of the ancients, a cluster of islands in the North Sea, separated from the north coast of Scotland by the Pentland Firth, are 73 in number, but only 29 are inhabited, the others being small, and producing only sheep-pasture. Those principally inhabited are Pomona or Mainland, Hoy, North Ronaldshay, South Ronaldshay, Sanday, Stronsay, Eday, Westray, Shapinshay, Eagleshay, Graemsay, Rousay, Weir, Enhallow, Papa Westray, Papa Stronsay, Burray, &c. The Orkneys are disjoined from one another by sounds or firths, from one to five miles broad, and their surface presents great variety. The east and north coasts in general are low, the western coasts more elevated, terminating in bold and steep cliffs, and exhibiting a thousand different shapes, forming a scene highly picturesque and interesting. The climate is mild, considering the high latitude. Barley, potatoes, and turnips are cultivated. The land animals are small horses, black cattle, sheep, swine, and rabbits. Of these, the sheep are most numerous. The heaths abound with red grouse, plovers, and snipes. The other wild fowl are eagles of various kinds, wild geese and ducks in great variety, herons, hawks, gulls, solan geese or gannets, and swans. Seals and sea otters are very common; the firths are occasionally visited by whales, and by great herds of grampuses. Cod, ling, haddock, and flat fish, are exceedingly abundant in the surrounding seas. On the shores are found a variety of sponges, corals, and coralines, large oysters, mussels, and cockles.

Area.—610 square miles.

Pop.—32,037, of mixed Scandinavian and Scotch descent.

Chief Towns.—KIRKWALL, the capital; and STROMNESS.

History.—These islands were captured by Harald Haarfager, the Norseman, in 876, and in 1098 they were formally annexed to Norway. In 1468 they were given to James III. of Scotland as security for the dowry of his wife, Margaret of Denmark; and in 1590 Denmark resigned all claims to the sovereignty on the marriage of Princess Anne of Denmark with James VI. (James I. of England).

ORKNEY AND SHETLAND, the most N. county of Scotland, comprising the islands of the same names. Area, 1,325 square miles. Pop. 61,746.—One member is returned to parliament.

ORLEANS, or'-le-ans, (Fr. or'-lai-awng), a commercial town of France, capital of the department Loiret, and formerly capital of the old province of Orleannais, is on the right bank of the Loire, over which are a magnificent bridge of nine arches, and a railway bridge of 15 arches, 58 miles S.W. of Paris. The town is surrounded on the land side by a wall and dry ditches, well planted boulevards, and there are eight suburbs. The old town is built with tolerable regularity, the streets being, in general, straight; but they are narrow and incommodious. The houses are mostly in an antiquated style. Among the principal edifices, the most interesting are the cathedral, one of the finest Gothic buildings in France, with two towers; the episcopal palace, and the house of Joan of Arc, Agnes Sorel, Diane de Poitiers, and Francis I. There are three statues of Joan, one equestrian, which was inaugurated in 1855. There are public walks along the ramparts and the quays; but the most agreeable are along the banks of the river. Near the city is the extensive forest of Orleans, 146 square miles in extent. Manf. Stockings, woollens, linen, sugar, hats, and leather. Pop. 57,264.—Orleans is a place of great antiquity, having been besieged by Attila in the year 451, In 1428 it was for six months besieged by the English, and was saved by the heroism of "Joan of Arc." Eleven councils have been held in it. It suffered greatly during the religious wars of the 16th century, and in the Franco-German war of 1870.

ORLEANS, the name of three counties of the United States:—

LOUISIANA.—Area, 150 square miles. Pop. 216,090, of whom more than 50,000 are coloured. The capital is NEW ORLEANS.

NEW YORK.—Area, 405 square miles. Pop. 30,128. The capital is Albion.

VERMONT.—Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 22,683. The capital is Irasburg.

ORLEANS, ISLAND OF, an island of Lower Canada, in the St. Lawrence, below Quebec. Ext. 26 miles long and 5 broad. It has a fertile soil, with numerous country houses. Pop. about 8,000.

ORLEANS, NEW. (See NEW ORLEANS.)

ORLEANS HOUSE OF, a branch of the royal family of France. It has three times originated in the younger son of the king, and has given two monarchs to France.

ORLEANS, LOUIS DE VALOIS, first duke of, was the second son of Charles V., and was assassinated at Paris by his cousin John, duke of Burgundy.

Born 1372; died 1407.

ORLEANS, CHARLES, second duke of, was eldest son of the preceding, during whose lifetime he bore the title of duke of Angoulême. In 1415 he was made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, and remained in England during 25 years. Upon his return to France, he undertook the conquest of the duchy of Milan, to which he conceived himself entitled in right of his mother, Valentine Visconti. He was, however, unsuccessful in this enterprise. During his captivity in England, he wrote some poetical pieces.

Born 1391; died 1465.

ORLEANS, LOUIS, third duke of. (See LOUIS XII. of France.)

ORLEANS, JEAN BAPTISTE GASTON, first and only duke of the second branch of the house, was the younger son of Henry IV. and brother of Louis XIII. He passed his life in intrigues and conspiracies, and formed several plots for the assassination of cardinal Richelieu, but basely saved himself by denouncing, at different times, his accomplices, the duke of Montmorency, the marquis of Cinq-Mars, and Francis de Thou, son of the celebrated historian. After the deaths of Louis XIII. and Richelieu, he was restored to favour at Court, but became involved in the Fronde commotions, wherein he played a despicable and vacillating part, until he was banished to Blois, where he spent the remainder of his life. He left no male issue; but his daughter, Mademoiselle de Montpensier, signalised herself during the Fronde insurrection against Mazarin. (See MONTPENSIER, Mademoiselle.)

Born 1608; died 1660.

ORLEANS, PHILIPPE, first duke of the third and existing branch of the house of, was second son of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria. Upon the death of his uncle Gaston, he inherited the title of duke of Orleans, and obtained the duchy of Montpensier at the death of Mademoiselle Montpensier in 1693. His first wife, Henrietta of England, was married to him in 1661; and by that princess he had two daughters, one of whom became wife of Charles II. of Spain, and the other, queen of Victor Amadeus II. of Savoy. He is stated to have cultivated letters with some success, while in the field he displayed great courage during several of the campaigns of his brother Louis XIV.

Born 1640; died 1701.

ORLEANS, PHILIPPE, second duke of, was son of the preceding, by his second marriage. He is known in French history as "Regent Orleans," and is declared by Voltaire "to be famed for his courage, his wit, and his pleasures. He was born for society even more than for public affairs, and was one of the most amiable men that ever existed." The general verdict of history is, notwithstanding, that regent Orleans was an unbounded personal and political profligate. He was certainly endowed with brilliant talents, but his mind was early tainted by the debasing lessons of his preceptor, the infamous cardinal Dubois. (See DUBOIS.) He distinguished himself in command of the French armies in Spain and Italy, but was regarded with jealousy, as it was supposed he entertained a design of taking the Spanish crown for himself, and he was accused by Madame de Maintenon of poisoning the dauphin, and others of the royal family, but the king refused to adopt the accusations In 1715 he was nominated regent, and during his administration France became bankrupt and miserable. The wild schemes of Law brought ruin upon thousands of families (see LAW), and the country was reduced to the most abject condition. The regent pursued a course of the most disgraceful debauchery, in which he was associated with his eldest daughter, the duchess de Berry, who killed herself by excesses. The immorality of the regent's court was one of the causes of the terrible outbreak of the French revolution.

Born 1674; died 1723.

ORLEANS, LOUIS, third duke of, was son of the preceding. In his youth he led a dissipated life; but upon his marriage with a princess of Baden to whom he was devotedly attached, he renounced his former course. At the death of this princess, which occurred prematurely, in 1726, he retired from the world, and devoted himself to works of piety, and to the study of religion and science. In 1730 he entered the abbey of St. Geneviève, where he practised extreme austerity, and performed numerous acts of humility and charity. He understood the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages, and was versed in ecclesiastical and civil history, botany, geography, and the fine arts. He translated the Psalms from the original, and wrote paraphrases upon several books of the Old Testament, a literal translation of St. Paul's epistles, and other works.

Born 1703; died 1752.

ORLEANS, LOUIS PHILIPPE, fourth duke of, was son of the preceding. He took part in the campaigns of 1742-4, and fought at the battles of Dettingen and Fontenoy. Like his father, he was a learned and benevolent prince. In 1756 he contributed to the introduction of inoculation into France, and is stated to have distributed as much as £1,000 per annum in charity.

Born 1725; died 1785.

ORLEANS, LOUIS PHILIPPE JOSEPH, fifth duke of, surnamed Philippe Egalité, was only son of the preceding. During the lifetime of his father he was known by the title of duke of Chartres. In 1778 he served on board the fleet commanded by count d'Orvilliers; but in the action with admiral Keppel, off Cape Ushant, he went down into the hold and would not come up till the engagement was over. For his cowardice, he became an object of contempt with the French court. His conduct afterwards was extremely dissipated; and he joined the revolutionary party against the court, for which he was exiled. On the death of his father he took the title of duke of Orleans. In the beginning of the Revolution he displayed the greatest hatred to his royal relations, and became a member of the National Assembly. He also assumed the title of Citizen Egalité, and voted for the death of Louis XVI.; but, some time afterwards, he was abandoned by his partizans, seized at Marseilles, whence he was removed to Paris, where he was condemned to suffer death by the revolutionary tribunal; which sentence was executed in 1793.

Born at Paris, 1747.

ORLEANS, LOUIS PHILIPPE, sixth duke of. (See LOUIS PHILIPPE.)

ORLEANS, FERDINANDE PHILIPPE, seventh duke of, eldest son of Louis Philippe, king of the French. He was sent, in his fifth year, to the College of Henry IV., where he was distinguished by his intelligence and his amiability of disposition. In 1825 he was appointed colonel of Hussars, and was serving with the French army when the revolution of 1830 burst forth. He immediately repaired to the capital with his regiment, and was received with enthusiasm. When his father received the crown, he was sent into the provinces to obtain the recognition of the new order of government. In 1835 he went to Algiers, where he signalised himself by his bravery and skill. The organisation of the celebrated chasseurs de Vincennes was due to him. He unhappily met his death by a fall from his horse. Affable, generous, brave, a friend of liberal ideas, protector of the arts,—the death of this prince was regarded throughout France as a great calamity. He left two sons (by the princess Helen of Mecklenburg-Schwerin), the count de Paris and the duc de Chartres.

Born at Palermo, 1810; died 1842.

ORLEANS, the Bastard of. (See DUNOIS.)

ORLOFF, or ORLOR, or-lof, a celebrated Russian family, founded in the 17th century by Ivan Orel, one of the archers, or Strelitzes. When this body, which was analogous to the Turkish janissaries, was destroyed, Ivan saved his life by his cool courage. Peter the Great was himself engaged in decapitating the archers, who in turn, came forward, knelt down, and placed their heads upon a beam. When Ivan came up a head was still remaining upon the beam. "If this is my place," said he, "it ought to be clear;" and thereupon he kicked away the head. Peter, struck with this coolness, spared his life, and appointed him to an infantry regiment; after which he became an officer and a noble. The most celebrated of his descendants were:—

ORLOFF, GREGORI, Count. He served at first in the army; but attracting the attention of the grand-duchess Catherine, he became her favourite. In 1762 he was engaged in the conspiracy which brought about the assassination of Peter III., and the accession of his wife to the throne, as the empress Catherine II. From that time honours were showered upon him by the empress, the father of whose child he was. Orloff, however, desired to become the husband, and to share the throne of Catherine. At length, growing tired of his tyrannical sway, the empress banished him to his seat at Gatchina, but created him prince. After living in oriental splendour for several years, he died at St. Petersburg a lunatic.

Born 1734; died 1783.

ORLOFF, ALEXEI, Count, brother of the preceding, was a soldier in the Russian guard when his brother became the favourite of Catherine. In 1762 he was one of the murderers of Paul III.; after which Catherine created him an admiral, and showered honours upon him. In 1770 he held the command in chief at the battle of Chesme, having under his orders the English officers, Elphinstone, Greig, and Dugdale, and upon that occasion destroyed the Turkish fleet. At a later period, while travelling in Italy, he met the princess Tarakanova, daughter of the empress Elizabeth, at Leghorn. The princess, a girl of 16, was enticed on board Orloff's frigate by means of a pretended marriage, after which she was sent a prisoner to Russia. Catherine, fearing that she might, at a future period, set up a claim to the Russian throne, kept her ever afterwards in confinement. When his brother had been supplanted by Potemkin, Alexei Orloff retired to his palace at Moscow, whence he was summoned in 1796, by the emperor Paul, to act as pall-bearer to the remains of Peter III., whose body had been exhumed, in order that it might be honoured with a magnificent public funeral. Orloff is stated to have betrayed great emotion upon that occasion, perhaps expecting to be sent to execution by the son of his victim. He escaped, however, and immediately left St. Petersburg for a tour in Germany; nor did he return till Paul had himself met a violent death.

Born 1736; died at Moscow, 1808.

ORLOFF, ALEXEI, a Russian diplomatist and statesman, an illegitimate son of a brother of Gregori, entered the military service, and shared in the campaigns against Napoleon; but his great power and popularity dates from the year 1825, when Nicholas had been proclaimed emperor, and when the troops revolted against the new ruler. On that occasion, Orloff led his regiment against the mutineers, and was the chief instrument in deciding the events of that critical period in favour of Nicholas, who, throughout his life, retained the deepest sense of the services Orloff had rendered him. Nicholas created him a count, adjutant-general, and gave him the command of a division of cavalry. After signalising himself in the Turkish campaign of 1828, he signed the treaty of Adrianople, and was sent as ambassador extraordinary to Constantinople. In 1833 he signed the treaty of Unkiar-Skelessi with Turkey, and in 1832 he represented Russia at the London conference on the affairs of Belgium and Holland. In 1844 he was placed at the head of the secret police, which he directed with great energy, and in the same year he accompanied Nicholas to London. On the outbreak of the war between Russia and the Western powers, he was sent to Vienna to demand the assistance of Austria, but without success. Nicholas, before his death, recommended him to his successor, as his personal and tried friend. In 1856 he represented Russia at the Congress of Paris, and was afterwards made president of the grand council of the empire.

Born 1787; died 1861.

ORME, ROBERT, orm, an English historian, who was the son of a surgeon of the Bombay army. He received his education at Harrow school, after which he went to India as a writer in the service of the East India Company. He returned to England in 1752, with captain, afterwards lord Clive, with whom he lived many years on terms of intimacy. In 1755 he went to Madras as fourth member of the council. He also held the office of commissary-general; but in 1759 he returned to England with a small fortune. Soon afterwards he commenced writing the "History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in India," the first volume of which appeared in 1763, the second in 1775. The Court of Directors appointed him historiographer to the Company, at a salary of £300 per annum. He completed his history in 3 vols.; and also published "Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire during the Reign of Aurungzebe."

Born in Bombay, 1728; died 1801.

ORMOND, JAMES BUTLER, Duke of, or'-mond, was descended from an ancient family of Tipperary, which had retained the hereditary dignity of cupbearer to the English sovereigns from the beginning of the 13th century. Upon the outbreak of the Irish rebellion in 1640, he was appointed to command the royal troops, at the head of which he defeated the rebels at Dublin, Drogheda, Kilrush, and Ross. During the struggle between Charles I. and the parliamentarians, Ormond, who had been previously nominated lord-lieutenant of Ireland, held that country for the king; but after Charles had been taken prisoner, he resigned the command, and repaired to London, when he had an interview with the captive monarch at Hampton Court. He next went to France; but at the invitation of the Roman Catholics, he returned to Ireland, and for some time endeavoured to overcome the parliamentary forces in that country. In 1650, however, he was compelled by Cromwell to evacuate the island; upon which he again retired to France. After rendering a number of important services to Charles II. while in exile, he accompanied that monarch to England at the Restoration. During the reigns of Charles II. and James II., he was twice nominated viceroy of Ireland, and twice lost the post through court intrigue. In 1670, the notorious colonel Blood, instigated, it is said, by Ormond's bitter enemy, the duke of Buckingham, waylaid and dragged him from his coach, with the intention of conveying him to Tyburn, and there hanging him. This infamous project was, nevertheless, frustrated by the rescue of the duke. (See BLOOD, Colonel.)

Born 1610; died 1688.

ORMSBY, orms'-be, a county of Nevada, United States. Area, 172 square miles. Pop. 3,800. The capital is CARSON CITY.

ORMSKIRK, orms'-kirk, a market town of Lancashire, 13 miles N. of Liverpool. Manf. Silks, ropes, and baskets. There are large collieries in the vicinity. Pop, 6,651.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

ORMUZ, or HORMUZ, or'-muz, an island in the strait of the same name at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It is about 12 miles in circumference, and was formerly the site of a town, which was taken by the Portuguese in the 16th century, and rose to be a splendid and very populous commercial emporium, but was demolished in 1622 by Shah Abbas. The island now belongs to the Imaum of Muscat, who derives an income from the export of salt.

ORMUZD, or-muzd, the modernised form of the name of the supreme deity of the ancient Persians.

ORNANO, ALPHONSE D', or-na'-no, a Corsican leader, who was brought up at the court of Henry II. of France, but returned to his native country when he had attained his 18th year, and maintained a struggle with his compatriots against the Genoese, until the signature of peace in 1568. Thereupon he retired to France with 800 followers, and was appointed colonel-general of the Corsican troops in the service of Charles IX. For his subsequent services to the French monarch he became marshal of France and lieutenant-general of Guienne.

Born 1548; died 1610.

ORNANO, JEAN BAPTISTE D', son of the preceding, was, at first, appointed superintendent-general of the household of Gaston, duke of Orleans, brother to Louis XIII., and was afterwards created marshal of France; but, for his share in the intrigues against Richelieu, he was, in 1626, imprisoned at Vincennes, where he was, subsequently, either strangled or poisoned.

Died 1581.

ORNANS, or'-nawng, a town of France, department Doubs, on both sides of the Loue, 11 miles S.E. of Besançon. There are a large and handsome church, a fine townhall, library, ecclesiastical school, and large hospital. The ruins of a magnificent castle of the counts of Burgundy, are on an eminence to the north-west of the town. It has a considerable trade in gruyère cheese. Pop. 3,500.

ORNE, orn, an inland department in the N. of France, comprising a portion of the old provinces of Normandy and Perche, and bordered by the departments of Calvados, Eure-and-Loire, Mayenne, and Sarthe. The surface is diversified. A range of wooded hills, about 1,570 feet in extreme height, extending across the south of the department, the surface sloping on the north to the British Channel, and on the south to the Atlantic, with rich pastures on the banks of the rivers. Apples and pears are abundant, and cider is extensively made. Cattle are fattened, and the horses are the best in France. Fowls and eggs also form important articles of trade.

Rivers.—The Orne, Relte, Sarthe, and Huisne.

Minerals.—Iron, copper, marble, granite, and building stone.

Area.—2,666 square miles.

Pop.—376,126.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 arrondissements, and 513 communes. The chief towns are ALENÇON, the capital, ARGENTAN, Domfront, and Mortagne.

ORONTES, o-ron'-tes, "the rebellious," the ancient name of a river of Syria (now the Nahr-el-Asi), which, near Antioch, makes a circuit, and, after a course of 240 miles, falls into the Mediterranean.

OROSHAZA, o-ro-sha'-za, a town of Hungary, 31 miles N.E. of Szegedin. It stands in a fertile country, and a trade in cattle is carried on. Pop. 14,500.

OROSIUS, PAULUS, o-ro'-si-us, a Spanish divine, the disciple of St. Augustine, who sent him to Jerusalem to consult Jerome concerning the nature and origin of the soul, and he finally settled in Africa. By the advice of the same father, he undertook a history of the world to A.D. 417, intended to oppose the reasoning and conclusions of pagan authors. He also wrote a treatise on free will, and other works. His "History of the World" was translated into the Anglo-Saxon language by king Alfred; and of this an English version was made in 1773.

Lived in the 5th century.

OROTAVA, o-ro-ta'-va, a town on the north coast of Teneriffe, in a fertile and beautiful district. There are several churches, one of them a particularly fine edifice; the residence of the governor, and the citadel. There is a trade in wine, and fishing is carried on. Pop. 9,000.

ORPHEUS, or'-fe-us, in Greek legend, a mythological poet and hero, who, by the music of the lyre, given him by Apollo, subdued men, beasts, and birds, and the monsters of the deep, and who fetched back his wife Eurydice, from Hades. (See EURYDICE.) His name is given to mythological songs sang at public games in Greece.

ORRERY, CHARLES BOYLE, Earl of, or'-re-re, a British statesman and writer, the son of Roger, the second earl, received his education at Christ Church, Oxford, under Dr. Atterbury, and while there, engaged in a famous dispute with Dr. Bentley, on the Epistles of Phalaris, a new edition of which was published by Mr. Boyle in 1695. On the death of his brother, he succeeded to the earldom. During the treaty of Utrecht, he was envoy-extraordinary to the states of Flanders and Brabant, and, on his return, was created a British peer, by the title of lord Boyle. At the accession of George I. he retired from court, and, in 1722, was sent to the Tower on suspicion of treason. After six months' confinement, he was discharged. The astronomical instrument called an "orrery" was named after him by the inventor, Graham, in gratitude for favours received from his lordship.

Born 1676; died 1731.

ORRERY, ROGER BOYLE, Earl of, father of the preceding, a British statesman, who, after concluding his education at Trinity College, Dublin, went abroad, and, on his return, married the daughter of the earl of Suffolk. After the execution of Charles I. he repaired to England; when being suspected of acting as an agent of Charles II., the committee of safety were about to send him to the Tower, but were prevented by Cromwell, who prevailed upon him to accept a commission under him in his Irish campaigns. His conduct gave Cromwell such satisfaction that, when he became protector, he made him one of his privy council. After the death of Cromwell, he withdrew to Ireland, where he took measures for the restoration of monarchy. Charles II., on his accession, created him earl of Orrery, and appointed him one of his privy council. He was shortly afterwards constituted one of the lords justices of Ireland, and commissioned to call a parliament, before the meeting of which he drew up the celebrated Act of Settlement. On the fall of lord Clarendon, he was offered the place of chancellor, but refused it. The earl wrote several poems and plays, and his correspondence was printed in 1742.

Born in Ireland, 1621; died 1679.

ORSAY, ALFRED GUILLAUME GABRIEL, Count d', dor'-sai, son of a French general, and for a time served in the French army. In 1827 he married the daughter of the Earl of Blessington, but soon afterwards separated from her, and took up his residence with the second wife and widow of the earl, the well-known Countess of Blessington, at Gore House, Kensington, famous for the meeting of literary, artistic, and fashionable notabilities. For many years Count d'Orsay was the oracle of London fashionable life. With a handsome person he combined considerable artistic abilities. Becoming pecuniarily involved, he went to Paris on the accession to power of his old friend Louis Napoleon.

Born in Paris, 1801; died there, 1852.

ORSHA, or'-sha, a town of European Russia, government of Mohilev, at the confluence of the Orshiza with the Dneiper. There are three Greek churches and a nunnery, founded by Sophia, sister of Peter the Great; and three Roman Catholic monasteries. Pop. 6,200.

ORSINI, or-se'-ne, a celebrated Roman family during the middle ages, the rival of the Colonna. The first Orsini known became cardinal in 1145. Matthew Orsini, his nephew, was prefect of Rome in 1153. Gaetano Orsini was made pope in 1277, under the name of Nicholas III. Another of the family was elected pope in 1724, with the name of Benedict XIII. The family has had many cardinals and other distinguished personages among its members.

ORSINI, FELICE, a modern Italian politician, who, in his 20th year, was sent to prison for taking part in the proceedings of a secret society. The amnesty granted by Pius IX., in 1846, gave him his liberty. He afterwards took part in the defence of Rome and of Venice, but was banished by Sardinia, in 1853, for attempting to excite a revolt at Genoa. Upon this he repaired to London, where he became the intimate friend of Mazzini. In 1854 he went as agent of the revolutionary committee to Parma, and proceeded thence to Milan, Trieste, Vienna, and Hermanstadt; in which last town he was arrested, and, after undergoing an examination at Vienna, was sent to the fortress of Mantua. In 1856 he effected his escape from that stronghold, under the most extraordinary circumstances, and contrived to reach England, where he commenced the delivery of public speeches, which became exceedingly popular. In the same year he produced a narrative of his life in captivity, under the title of "The Austrian Dungeons in Italy." At the commencement of the year 1858, he with Pierri and other accomplices, made an attempt upon the life of the emperor Napoleon III. by the explosion of shells, on the occasion of a visit to the opera. Two persons were killed but the emperor escaped. That attempt failed, although the plot which had produced it was carefully concocted during some length of time. Orsini and Pierri were executed; and it having been asserted that the plot was organised in England, the emperor of the French made a demand upon the English nation that its laws respecting the right of asylum to foreigners should be altered. This demand was indignantly refused.

Born at Meldola, 1819; died 1858.

ORSOVA, NEW, or-so'-va, a town of Servia, in the Turkish empire, on an island in the Danube, near the difficult passage know as the Iron Gate, 95 miles E. of Belgrade. As it is the point of communication between Turkey and Hungary, it is strongly fortified.

ORTELLIUS, ABRAHAM, or-tel'-li-us, a Dutch geographer, who travelled in England, France, Germany, and Italy, and was generally accounted the first geographer of his time. In 1570 he produced "Theatrum Orbis Terræ," or universal geography, the success of which led to his obtaining the appointment of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. He composed other works of the same nature, and corresponded with most of the learned men of his time.

Born at Antwerp, 1527; died 1598.

ORTELSBURG, or'-tels-boorg, a town of East Prussia, 80 miles from Konigsberg. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1807, several engagements took place between the French and Russians.

ORTHÈZ, HENRI D'APREMONT, Viscount of, or'-tai, was governor of Bayonne, under Charles IX. of France. Having received an order to destroy all the Huguenots in the city on St. Bartholomew's day (25th August, 1572), he replied to the king, "Sire, I communicated the letter of your majesty to the garrison; but, although I could find everywhere good soldiers and loyal citizens, I could not obtain a single executioner."

Lived in the 16th century.

ORTHEZ, a town of France, department of Basses Pyrénées, on the right bank of the Gave de Pau, 37 miles E. of Bayonne. There are some remains of the castle of Moncada, built by Gaston de Foix in 1240. Manf. Flannel, leather, and iron and copper wire. It carries on a brisk trade in cattle, bayonne hams, and goose-feathers. Pop. 4,700.—This place was the scene of a defeat of the French under Soult, by the British under Wellington, in 1814.

ORTONA, or-to'-na, a town and seaport of Southern Italy, province of Chieti, on the Adriatic, 14 miles E. of Chieti. It has a cathedral, and there is a considerable trade in wine. Pop. 12,000.

ORUBA, or ARUBA, o-ru'-ba, an island of the West Indies, belonging to the Netherlands, off the north coast of Venezuela. It is about 20 miles long, by 5 broad. There is some good pasture ground, but generally the soil is stony and unfertile. Iron ore and a little gold are found. Pop. 3,000.

ORURO, o-ro'-ro, a province of the republic of Bolivia, South America, on the frontier of Peru. In it is the lake of Pansa, 70 miles long and 15 wide. Minerals. Gold, silver, copper, tin, iron, lead, and antimony. The district is one of the most populous portions of the old empire of the Incas. Area, 21,600 square miles. Pop. 111,000.

ORURO, capital of the above province, situated at an elevation of 13,000 feet above the sea. It was formerly of much greater importance than at present, and there are extensive ruins of the older town. Pop. 8,000.

ORUST, o'-roost, an island of Sweden, in the Skager Rack, near the coast of Gottenburg, 14 miles long, with a breadth of 10. It is level, and fishing and rearing cattle are the principal occupations of the inhabitants.

ORVIETO or-ve-ai'-to, a city of Italy, province of Perugia, 60 miles from Rome, on the right bank of the Paglia, 60 miles N.W. of Rome. It is situated on a hill, and is surrounded by walls. The cathedral, in the Italian Gothic style, richly decorated, was built in the 13th and 14th centuries. There are several palaces. A trade is carried on in corn, cattle, and silk, and a delicate white ware. Pop. 16,000.—This town is the Urbs Vetus of the Longobardes, and has often been a place of residence and retreat of the popes.

OSACA, o-sa'-ka, an imperial city of Japan, in the south-east of the island of Niphon, on a large river, 14 miles above the seaport of Hiago. It is described as the Venice of Japan; the various branches of the river and small streams being crossed by more than 100 bridges, some very massive structures. The banks of the river are lined with residences of the Japanese nobility, with steps down to the water. The town is the centre of a rich tea district, and is a place of great importance. Pop. 353,970.

OSAGE, o-saj', a river of the United States, rising in Lat. 38° 30′ N., Lon. 96° E., flowing eastward into the state of Missouri, near Jefferson. The total length of the course is 230 miles.

OSAGE, a county of Kansas, United States. Area, 792 square miles. Pop. 19,642. The capital is Burlingame.

OSAGE, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 850 square miles. Pop. 11,000. The capital is Lina.

OSCAR I., OSCAR JOSEPH FRANCIS, os'-kar, king of Sweden and Norway, was the only son of the celebrated French general Bernadotte, who became king of Sweden under the title of Charles XIV. When his father was elected heir presumptive to the Swedish crown, in 1810, he accompanied him to that country, where he received an education in conformity with the high position he was destined to fulfil. He abjured Catholicism for the Lutheran faith, was created duke of Sudermania, and began to display considerable aptitude for the military sciences, and political economy. He was also a musical composer of considerable ability. In 1811 he entered the army as lieutenant-colonel, and soon afterwards rose to the high grades of grand admiral of Sweden and Norway, and general commandant of the fourth corps of artillery. In 1824 he was nominated viceroy of Norway, and became regent during the illness of his father in 1828. Meanwhile he had married Josephine, daughter of Eugéne de Beauharnais, duke of Leuchtenberg. In 1844 he succeeded to the throne. During the war with Russia, although Sweden took no part in the struggle, he manifested the strongest sympathy with the cause of the allied Western powers. In 1855 a treaty between Sweden and France was signed, by which the former power engaged not to cede any portion of her territory to Russia. The health of the king having become frail, he, in 1857, made a tour in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, his son acting as regent.

Born at Paris, 1799; died 1859.

OSBORN, SHERARD, os'-born, British admiral and author. He was the son of lieutenant-colonel Osborn, of the Madras army. He entered the navy in 1837, and served in the East Indies and in China until 1843, passing his examination in December, 1848. Having obtained his commission as lieutenant in 1846, he was, three years later, selected as a volunteer for sir Leopold M'Clintock's arctic expedition sent in search of sir John Franklin, and was appointed to the command of the Pioneer. He served with distinction in the Black Sea during the Russian war, for which he received a companionship of the bath and the orders of the legion of honour and the medjidie. In 1857, as commander of the Furious, he took part in the capture of the Taku forts, afterwards proceeding to Japan. He returned to China in 1858, and two years afterwards, his health having suffered, he returned home on half-pay. In the spring of 1861 the gallant officer was appointed to the command of H.M.S. Donegal, which formed part of the expeditionary force to Mexico. His name will long be associated with the turret system of ship-building, for in the controversy respecting its merits he took a prominent part, and in 1864 was appointed to the command of the Royal Sovereign, a vessel which had been adapted to it by the Admiralty, under the superintendence of the late captain Cowper Coles. After the paying off of the Royal Sovereign, captain Osborn was for many years managing agent of the Great Indian Peninsular Railway at Bombay. He was well known as an author, and was also an ardent politician, having unsuccessfully contested Birkenhead in the Liberal interest at the general election of 1868. His best known works are "Quedah; or, Stray Leaves from a Journal in Malayan Waters," and "Career, Last Voyage and Fate of Sir John Franklin," and "A Fight in the Peiho," and he edited M'Clure's "Discovery of the North-West Passage."

Born 1822; died 1875.

OSCEOLA, os-se-o'-la, a chief of the tribe of Seminole Indians in Florida, whose father was an English trader. In 1835 his wife was claimed as a slave, and Osceola, having threatened revenge, was imprisoned. He shortly afterwards killed general Thompson, who had put him in irons, and afterwards at the head of a small band of followers maintained an irregular war against the United States troops. He was treacherously taken prisoner by means of a flag of truce, and confined in fort Moultrie until his death.

Born 1803; died 1838.

OSCEOLA, an almost uninhabited county of Iowa, United States. Area, 432 square miles.

OSCEOLA, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 10,777. The capital is Hersey.

OSCHATZ, o'-shatz, a walled town of Saxony, 31 miles E. of Leipsic. Manf. Woollen cloth, worsted, and linen. Pop. 6,200.

OSCHERSLEBEN, o'-shers-lai'-ben, a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the left bank of the Bode, 21 miles S.W. of Magdeburg. It is walled, with three gates. Pop. 8,200.

OSCODA, os-ko'-da, a county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 467.

O'SHAUGHNESSY, Sir William Brooke, o-shaw'-nes-se, physician and engineer, to whom is due the great merit of introducing the electric telegraphic system into India. The descendant of an ancient Irish family, he was sent, at an early age, to the university of Edinburgh, where he graduated M.D. In his 21st year he entered the service of the East-India Company, with the grade of assistant-surgeon. After being transferred to civil employment by the governor-general, in 1833, he acted as physician to lord Metcalfe while the latter commanded at Agra. It was whilst holding the professorship of chemistry in the Medical College at Calcutta, that he first began to investigate the capabilities of the electric telegraph. Under the government of lord Dalhousie he was entrusted with the construction of telegraphic lines, and, by 1856, 4,000 miles were in operation. The difficulties of the work, in consequence of the nature of the country, were immense. In 1856 he went to England, where he was nominated a knight commander of the bath, in acknowledgment of his great services.

Born at Limerick, Ireland, 1809.

OSHAWA, osh-a-wa, a town of the province of Ontario, dominion of Canada, 30 miles N.E. of Toronto. Manf. Agricultural implements, steam engines, machinery, and tools. There is a large trade in flour. Pop. 4,000.

OSHKOSH, osh'-kosh, a town of Wisconsin, United States, on both sides of the Fox river, at its entrance to lake Winnebago, 90 miles N.E. of Madison. There is a large lumber trade. Pop. 16,000.

OSIANDER, Andreas, o-se-an'-der, a German divine, son of a blacksmith named Hosomann, studied at Ingoldstadt and Wittenburg, was preacher at Nuremberg, and one of the first disciples of Luther, and being deprived of his office, through his advocacy of the Reformation, accepted an invitation of duke Albrecht of Prussia, to become professor of theology at Königsberg, where he distinguished himself by a peculiar doctrine on justification, which he asserted to be effected in man by the union of God with our souls. This doctrine he zealously defended, and opposed Luther with great fury. He was the author of several Latin works, the most important of which were, "On the Harmony of the Gospels," and "Epistle to Zwinglius on the Sacrament of the Eucharist."

Born near Nuremberg, 1498; died 1552.

OSIMO, o-se'-mo, a town of Italy, province of Ancona, 8 miles S.W. of the city of that name. It has a cathedral and other churches, a town-hall, a museum of antiquities, and an episcopal palace. There is a trade in silk and corn. Pop. 17,106.

OSIRIS, ASIRIS, or HYSIRIS, o-si'-ris, in Egyptian mythology, a great deity. The ancients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god; but they all agree that, as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilise his subjects, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accomplished a reform at home, Osiris resolved to spread civilisation in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Isis, and in his expedition visited the greatest part of the kingdoms of Asia and of Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worship of the gods, and a reverence for the wisdom of a supreme being. According to the legends his brother Typhon persuaded him, on his return, to enter a chest, which he then threw into the sea. Isis recovered the body, which Typhon then cut up into many pieces, all of which, but one important part, Isis once more regained. Osiris appears to have been considered as the judge of Hades, presiding at the final judgment of souls.

OSIUS, o'-si-us, bishop of Cordova, in Spain. He became the confidant of Constantine, who, by his persuasions, convened in 323 the council of Nice, where Osius presided. The emperor Constantius persecuted him with so much cruelty to make him turn Arian, that Osius, at the age of 100, was induced to sign a confession of faith prescribed to him. He was then permitted to return to his diocese, where he died soon after, extremely penitent for his weakness, and renouncing the Arian heresy with great fervour.

Born 257.

OSKALOOSA, os-ka-loo'-sa, capital of Mahaska county, Iowa, United States, between the Des Moines and Skunk rivers, 60 miles S.W. of Iowa city. Pop. 5,500.

OSKOL (NOVOI, NEW), os'-kol, a town of European Russia, government of Koursk, on the left bank of the Oskol, 92 miles S.E. of Koursk. Pop. 5,000.

OSKOL (STAROI, OLD), a town of European Russia, at the junction of the Oskol and Oskolka, 70 miles S.E. of Koursk. There are eight churches and a convent, and the town is surrounded by orchards famous for fruit. Pop. 6,000.

OSMA, os'-ma, a river of European Turkey, which, after a course of 100 miles, joins the Danube near Nictapolis.

OSMAN, or OTHMAN I., os'-man, surnamed Al-ghazi, 'the victorious,' the founder of the Ottoman or Turkish power, was at first the chieftain of a small territory in Bithynia; but, in 1299, he invaded the whole country of Nicæa, defeated the Byzantine emperor Andronicus in 1301, in 1307 incorporated the province of Marmora, and subsequently extended his conquests as far as the Black Sea.

Born at Sukut, Bithynia, 1259; died 1326.

OSMAN, or OTHMAN, II., sultan of the Turks, was the son of Achmet I., and succeeded his uncle Mustapha, in 1618. He declared war against Poland in 1621; but, after several defeats, was obliged to conclude a disadvantageous peace. Attributing his failure to the janissaries, he resolved to substitute a militia of Arabs in their room, which so provoked them that they deposed him and placed Mustapha on the throne; Osman was strangled.

Born 1604; died 1622.

OSMAN, or OTHMAN III., became sultan in 1754, but reigned only three years, during which time he behaved with the utmost cruelty towards his subjects.

Died 1757.

OSMANBAZAR, os'-man-ba-zar', a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, 76 miles S.E. of Silistria. It occupies an elevated situation, and has two mosques and a Greek church. Pop. 4,000.

OSMOND, ST., os'-mond, a Norman prelate, who, in 1066, followed William the Conqueror to England, and was made chancellor of the kingdom and bishop of Salisbury. For this diocese he reformed the liturgy, which became general throughout the kingdom, under the name of the liturgy of Salisbury, and was commonly used throughout England until the Reformation. At his death he was canonised by pope Calixtus III.

Died in England, 1099.

OSNABRÜCK, or OSNABURG, os'-nabre(i)k, a district of the Prussian province of Hanover, in the western part. Area, 2,408 square miles. Pop. 290,135.

OSNABRÜCK, chief town of the above district, and the third commercial city of Hanover, in the valley of the Hase, 80 miles S.W. of Hanover. The cathedral, in the Byzantine style, was built in the 12th century, and the Gothic church of St. Mary, in the 14th. Manf. Tobacco, woollen and cotton goods, paper hangings, carriages, machinery, and cement. Pop. 23,500.—By the peace of Westphalia, signed here in 1648, it was arranged that the ancient bishopric (established by Charlemagne) should be held alternately by a Roman catholic prelate and a protestant secular prince of the house of Brunswick. Under that settlement, the Duke of York, second son of George III., of Great Britain, was bishop. The district was ceded to Hanover in 1803, and the episcopal chapter dissolved.

OSORIO, JEROME, o-so'-re-o, a Portuguese bishop, who became professor of divinity at Coimbra, and afterwards bishop of Sylves. His works were published at Rome in 1592. On account of the elegance of his Latin style, he was called the Cicero of Portugal.

Born at Lisbon, 1506; died 1580.

OSS, or OSCH, os, a market town of the Netherlands, province of North Brabant, 13 miles N.E. of Hertogenbosch. It is well built, and has a spacious market-place and a large town-hall. Pop. 4,600.

OSSA, os'-sa, the ancient name of a celebrated mountain of Greece, in Thessaly, immediately north of Mount Pelion, and bounding with the opposite chain of Olympus, the vale of Tempe.

OSSAT, ARNAUD D', os'-sa, an eminent French cardinal. By the kindness of a gentleman, he received a good education, and was appointed tutor to some young nobleman. He afterwards practised the law, but forsook that profession, and became secretary first to cardinal d'Este, and next to cardinal de Joyeuse. He was ambassador of France at Rome, and obtained the papal absolution for Henry IV., for which he was made bishop of Rennes, in 1596. In 1598 he was made cardinal.

Born at Armagnac, 1536; died 1604.

OSSIAN, os'-sian, an ancient Celtic bard, supposed to have been the son of Fingal, or Finn, Mac Cumhaill. (See MACPHERSON.)

OSSOLI, SARAH MARGARET FULLER, Marchesa d', os'-so-le, a modern American authoress, whose father gave her so high an education, that, even as a child, "she knew more Greek and Latin than half the professors." In 1835 this parent died suddenly, and, her means becoming straitened, Miss Fuller sought employment as teacher of Latin, German, Italian, and French, in a school at Rhode Island. Subsequently, she joined the "Brook Farm" community, and began to exercise her pen by contributing to the periodicals. In 1839 she produced a translation of Eckerman's "Conversations with Göethe." About the same time, her great conversational powers induced some ladies of Boston to request her to form "conversational classes" under her direction. This singular scheme became highly successful, and five-and-twenty ladies met to discuss such topics as "the genealogy of heaven and earth," "the celestial inspiration of genius and transmission of divine law." In 1840 Ralph Waldo Emerson commenced his "Dial," to which Miss Fuller contributed some philosophical articles on the "Fine Arts." At a later period, she went to reside at New York, on being appointed to the direction of the literary department of the "Tribune." In 1846 she set out upon a tour of Europe, a project which had long been cherished in her mind. London and Paris were visited, the literary circles in both cities being her resort. At Rome, while attending divine service in St. Peter's, she met a young Italian nobleman, and, after a short acquaintance, became his wife, in 1847. The marriage was, however, kept secret until the siege of Rome, which took place in the following year. During that struggle she acted as nurse in one of the hospitals. When the French succeeded in entering the city, she, with her husband and infant child, retired to Leghorn, and, after remaining in that place several months, embarked for America; but, after a stormy passage, the vessel was wrecked upon the coast at Long Island, and herself, husband, and child, were drowned. A narrative of the Roman revolution, in manuscript, was lost with her. Her essays were collected and published in a work entitled "Papers on Literature and Art."

Born in Massachusetts, 1810; died 1850.

OSSORY, THOMAS BUTLER, os'-so-re, Earl of, son of the duke of Ormond. Cromwell sent him to the Tower; whence he was released, after eight months confinement, and then went to Flanders. At the Restoration he was appointed lieutenant-general of the army in Ireland, and in 1666 created an English peer, by the title of Lord Butler. He was a volunteer under Lord Albemarle in the great fight with the Dutch; for which, in 1673, he was made sole admiral of the fleet, in the absence of Prince Rupert. In 1677 he commanded the English forces at the battle of Mons.

Born in Ireland, 1634; died 1680.

OSSUN os'-su(r), a town of France, in the Upper Pyrenees, 10 miles from Tarbes. Pop. 3,000. In its neighbourhood a great battle was, in the 8th century, fought with the Saracens.

OSSUNA, PEDRO TELLEZ Y GIRON, Duke of, os-soo'-na, a celebrated Spanish statesman, who attracted notice at Court by his sarcastic wit, and thereby incurred the displeasure of Philip II. Banished from his native country, he went into Flanders, where he assumed the command of a regiment, which he had equipped at his own expense, and fought with so much success on the Spanish side, that he thereby obtained his recall. He became the favourite of the duke of Lerma, and was appointed viceroy of Sicily in 1610, which post he retained during five years. In 1618 he was appointed viceroy at Naples, and in that capacity defeated the Venetians; but refused to establish the Inquisition in Naples. He conceived a plan of obtaining Venice for the Spanish crown, or, as some assert, as an independent monarchy for himself. He succeeded in deceiving the court of Madrid for some time, but was superseded as viceroy of Naples by Cardinal Borgia; upon which he was imprisoned in the castle of Almeida, where he died of poison, supposed to have been administered by his wife.

Born at Valladolid, 1579; died 1624.

OSTADE, ADRIAN VAN, os'-tad, one of the most celebrated painters of the Dutch school. He studied under Frank Hals and Rembrandt, and practised at Haarlem and afterwards at Amsterdam. He drew his subjects from low life, and in his pictures we generally find people smoking and drinking in alehouses and kitchens, or indulging in rural sports. His pictures, painted with great vigour and brightness, were very numerous, and are highly valued.

Born at Lübeck, 1610; died at Amsterdam, 1685.

OSTADE, ISAAC VAN, was brother of the preceding, and was, like him, an excellent painter. Of him, Dr. Waagen says: "Great injustice is done to Isaac van Ostade by the poor pictures of country life which are frequently ascribed to him in the galleries of Germany. In Holland, in Paris, and above all, in England, we may be convinced that in his village scenes, and in his winter pieces, he is a wholly original master, and by no means inferior to his brother."

Born at Lübeck, 1617; died 1671.

OSTASKOV, os'-tash-kof, a town of European Russia, in the government of Tver, on the south-east shore of Lake Seliguer. Manf. Leather, which is in great demand; boots and shoes, hatchets and scythes. Pop. 9,300. Lat. 57° 10′ N. Lon. 33° 6′ E.

OSTEND, os'-tend, a fortified town and seaport of Belgium, province of West Flanders, on the North Sea, at the opening of the Ostend and Bruges canal, 36 miles from Ghent. The streets of Ostend are straight, and the houses in general well built. It ranks as the second seaport of the kingdom, but the harbour is shallow, and ships of burden can only enter at high water. It is a station for steamers plying between London, Dover, and the continent, and is a terminus of several important lines of French and German railways, and communicates by canals with Bruges, Ghent, and Nieuport. The town is much resorted to as a healthy place, frequently having more than 10,000 visitors in the season. There is a fine esplanade, the Digue. Ostend is an important station for oyster, herring, and cod fisheries, and there is a naval school. Pop. 21,095. Lat. 51° 14′ N. Lon. 2° 55′ E.—Ostend is remarkable for a very long and obstinate siege (from 1601 to 1604), against the Spaniards.

OSTERODE, os'-ter-od, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, on the Soese, at the western foot of the Harz, 20 miles N.E. of Göttingen. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, table linen, hosiery, tobacco, soap, white lead, and metallic and wooden wares. Pop. 5,400.

OSTERODE, a walled town of Prussia, province of Königsberg, on the Drewenz, 74 miles S.W. of Königsberg. There are a castle erected by the Teutonic Knights in 1270, and a Protestant church and chapel. Manf. Woollen cloth and hats. A trade is carried on in wood and cattle. Pop. 4,300.

OSTIGLIA, os-te'-le-a, a town of Italy, province of Mantua, on the left bank of the Po, 18 miles S.E. of Mantua. It is an old, but well built town. Manf. Silk, and articles in straw, reeds, and basket-work. There is a good trade in corn, wine, oil, and provisions, wood, and silk. Pop. 5,500.

OSTRAU, os'-trow, a town of the Austrian empire, in Moldavia, on the March, 5 miles S.E. of Hradisch, with a castle on an island in the river. Pop. 4,200.

OSTROG, os'-trog, a town of European Russia, in the government of Volhynia, at the junction of the Vallia with the Gorin. There are an old castle, and several Greek and Roman Catholic churches. Pop. 8,500.—The first Slavonic Bible was printed here in 1558.

OSTROGOJSK, os'-tro-gosk, a town of European Russia, government of Voronej, on the left bank of the Sosna, where it is joined by the Ostragojska. There are 10 churches, and a German colony holding to the confession of Augsburg has existed here since 1679. A considerable trade is carried on in horses, cattle, and tallow. Pop. 6,800.

OSTROLENKA, os-tro-len'-ka, a town of European Russia, in Poland, on the left bank of the Narew, 20 miles S.W. of Lomza.—This place was, in 1806, the scene of a severe conflict between the Russians and French; and, in 1831, the Russians and Poles had an engagement here.

OSTROV, a town of European Russia, government of Pskov, partly on the right bank of the Velikaia, and partly on an island formed by its channel. There is a cathedral said to have been founded in the 14th century. Pop. 3,600.

OSTROWO, os-tro'-vo, a town of Prussia, province of Posen, on the Olabock, 67 miles S.E. of Posen. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 7,500.

OSTUNI, a town of Italy, province of Lecce, situated on a lofty eminence, 21 miles N.W. of Brindisi. There are many churches and convents, and the town is a bishop's see. Pop. 17,446.

OSUNA, o-soo'-na, a town of Spain, province of Seville, 48 miles S.E. of the city of that name, situated on a hill in the midst of a very fertile district. There are a castle and a very fine collegiate church, built in the 16th century, and temporarily converted into a citadel and magazine by the French Marshal Soult, after he had pillaged it of the old church plate. Manf. Linen goods, iron, and earthenware. Pop. 17,203. Its trade is considerable in wine, corn, fruit, oil, capers, and rush-wares.

OSWALD, os'-wald, king of Northumbria, was obliged, after the death of Ethelfrid, his father, to take refuge in Ireland, his uncle, Edwin, having possessed himself of the throne. He became a Christian in his retreat, and, returning to his own country, defeated Cerdowalla, king of the Britons, who lost his life. Oswald reunited the two kingdoms of Northumberland; but was slain in a battle with Penda, king of Mercia. The monkish historians relate that many miracles were performed by his relics, for which he was canonized.
Died 642.

OSWALDTWHISTLE, os'-wald-wis'-el, a township of Lancashire, 4 miles S.E. of Blackburn. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 12,206.

OSWEGO, os-we'-go, a river of the state of New York, United States, which issues from Oneida Lake, and, after a course of 24 miles falls into Lake Ontario. At the mouth of the river is a safe and good harbour, with two fathoms water. The channel is commanded by a well-built fort, on an eminence E. of the river.

OSWEGO, a county of New York, United States. Area, 1,038 square miles Pop. 78,000. The capitals are OSWEGO and PULASKI.

OSWEGO, a city and port of the United States, standing on both sides of the Oswego, at its mouth, and united by a bridge 700 feet in length. The city is handsomely built, with wide streets and excellent public buildings, including a city hall, custom house, post-office, 16 churches, an orphan asylum, and hospital. There are a good harbour protected by a fort, and a navy yard. Manf. The chief is the well-known Oswego flour, made from Indian corn. A large trade with the lake country and Canada, especially in lumber. A fine mineral spring was discovered in 1865. Pop. 21,000.

OSWESTRY, os'-wes-tre, a municipal borough and market-town of Shropshire, 18 miles N.W. of Shrewsbury. It was formerly inclosed by walls, and there are still some remains of its once magnificent castle, the residence of Walter Fitzallen, who in the reign of Stephen fled to Scotland, and became steward to David I., and founded the family of Stewards, or Stuarts, afterwards the royal line of Scotland. (See STUART.) There is a new market-place, and the agricultural market is well attended. Manf. Flannel and paper; there are coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 7,851.—A station on the Great Western and London and North Western railways. The name of this town is taken from Oswald, the king of Northumbria.

OSYMANDYAS, o-si-man'-di-as, an Egyptian king, the 27th successor of Sesostris. He is said to have invaded Asia and conquered the Bactrians, in honour of which event he erected near Thebes a monument, at once a palace and a tomb, of almost unequalled splendour. There is much of mythical legend connected with his history.
Lived probably 2,100 B.C.

OTAGO, o-ta'-go, a province of New Zealand, on the southern part of Middle Island, including the former province of Southland. It is bounded N. by the province of Canterbury, and on all other sides by the South Pacific Ocean. Its length is 160 miles, breadth 195 miles, with a sea-line of 400 miles. About 1,500,000 acres are under forest, which, when cleared, will be, to a large extent, of especial value, and the rest consists of broken and barren ranges teeming with auriferous quartz in many parts, and of lofty downs suitable for sheep and cattle grazing. The provinces may be said to possess every description of scenery, both along the coast-line and in the interior, the features being eminently of a Scottish type, while the names given to places have strongly stamped this character. Along the eastern and southern coast-line the principal harbour is Port Chalmers, whose channel is somewhat winding on account of sand-banks, but reaching the port, a large fleet can lie safely at anchor. Bluff Harbour, the port of arrival and departure for the mail steamers, is a safe one, although tortuous. The west coast is a succession of sounds and inlets, somewhat resembling the fiords on the coast of Norway. The most remarkable of them are Preservation Inlet and Milford Sound, the scenery of which is magnificent in the extreme. The west coast portion of the province consists of heavily-timbered, rugged, mountainous country, little available for either agricultural or pastoral purposes. The central portion, as well as that most easterly, contains tracts of land well suited either for the farmers or sheep graziers. Much of it is well watered, fairly wooded, and the soil of a fertile character. A large portion of the surface is covered by mountains, the principal peaks being Mount Aspiring, 9,049 feet, Earnslaw, 9,200, Tutoko, 8,000, Ben Nevis, 7,650, Titarou, 5,643, and Hamilton, 4,674. Southland has a sea-frontage of about 80 miles, by an extreme length of 100, and a breadth of about 60.

Rivers.—The principal discharge on the east and south coasts, several of them being navigable for coasting vessels for miles. They are the Clutha or Molyneux, Taieri, Mataura, Oreti, Waian, Mararon, and Waitaka, and the Hollyford or Kakapo on the west coast. The lakes are numerous, and are the Wakatipu, Te Anau, Wanaka, Hawea, Waihola, Waipori, Quakitoto, Kaitaugata, Manipori, and McKerrow.

Minerals.—The province is chiefly remarkable for its gold-fields, and to them is due the rapid progress in material prosperity shown during the last few years. From the first discovery of gold in the province by Mr. Gabriel Reid, at Tuapeka, in 1861, mining operations have been steadily conducted. Since then diggings, auriferous and quartz, have sprung up at the Dunstan, Nokomai, Shotover, Arrow, Bendigo Gully, Alexandra, Mount Ida, Switzer's, Black's, and numerous other places. The area of the proclaimed gold-fields has been calculated at 2½ millions of acres, a considerable portion of which is actually auriferous. Besides and beyond the proclaimed gold-fields, there are numerous others which are more or less remunerative. Immense quantities of coal have been discovered in Otago, although, except in one case, only valuable for local purposes. Oamaru and Kukauni stone ranks of the highest importance, being very easily worked, of a light, almost white colour, and becoming harder the longer it is exposed to the atmosphere. It is largely used in Victoria, and its use is general in Dunedin and Oamaru.

Area.—25,060 square miles.

Pop.—153,901, males exceeding females in number nearly 17,000.

Chief Towns.—Dunedin is the capital and the principal town in the province. Other towns are—Port Chalmers, Oamaru, Hampden, Waikouaiti, Milton, Balclutha, Queenstown, Clyde, Mount Ida, Palmerston, Alexandra, Cromwell, Lawrence, Kingston, and Arrow Town. Several of the more important places are connected by railways recently constructed.

History.—In 1848, an association in connection with the Free Church of Scotland established a settlement here, and notwithstanding hardships necessarily endured at first, the colonists succeeded in founding a thriving community.

OTAVOLO, ot-a-vo'-lo, a town of the republic of Ecuador, South America, 40 miles N.E. of Quito. It is picturesquely situated in the midst of beautiful gardens. Pop. 8,000.

OTHMAN. (See OSMAN.)

OTHO, MARCUS SALVIUS, o'-tho, Roman emperor, was of a family which descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. Nero, whose intimate companion he was, made him governor of Lusitania. After Nero's death he attached himself to Galba; but that emperor having adopted Piso as his heir, Otho excited an insurrection, murdered Galba and Piso, and ascended the throne in 69. He was opposed by Vitellius, who was supported by the German army; and in a battle between the two rivals near Cremona, Otho was defeated; on which he slew himself, after reigning three months.

Born at Rome, 32; died 69.

OTHO I., emperor of Germany, called the Great, was the eldest son of Henry the Fowler, and was crowned in 936, at the age of 14. He subdued Duke Boleslas of Bohemia, and forced him to profess Christianity. He then defeated the Dukes of Bavaria and Franconia, subdued the Slav tribes of the Oder and the Spree, and drove back the Danes, insisting on the vanquished accepting Christianity, and founding bishoprics for their benefit. Having married the widow of king Lothair, he assumed supreme power over the north of Italy in 951. Berenger having usurped the title of emperor in Italy, Otho entered Rome, where he was crowned Emperor of the West by John XII. That pontiff afterwards entered into a league with Berenger; on which Otho caused him to be deposed, and put Leo XIII. in his place, in 963. On the emperor's return to Germany, the Romans revolted, and imprisoned Leo; for which Otho again visited Rome, where he exercised severe vengeance on the senate. He next turned his arms against Nicephorus Phocas, emperor of the East, whose army he defeated, and after cutting off the noses of his prisoners, sent them to Constantinople; but John Zemisces, the successor of Nicephorus, made peace with Otho. His last years were disturbed by a rebellion led by his son Ludolph, but Otho maintained his power and retained the position of the most powerful ruler in Europe since Charlemagne.

Born 923; died 973.

OTHO II., surnamed the Red, succeeded his father, the preceding emperor, in 973. His mother Adelheid opposed his accession; on which he expelled her from court. Her party proclaimed Henry, duke of Bavaria, emperor; but he was defeated by Otho, who also subdued the Danes and Bohemians, following the example of his father, and compelling them to accept Christianity. He afterwards marched into Italy, in order to expel the Saracens from Sicily, to which they had been invited by the Greek emperor for the purpose of attacking Otho, but fell ill at Rome, where he died.

Born 955; died 983.

OTHO III., the son of the preceding, was only three years old at the death of his father; but his empire was administered by his grandmother Adelheid, his mother Theophania, and his aunt Matilda, abbess of Quedlingburg. Henry of Bavaria captured him, and endeavoured to seize the supreme power, but was compelled by the princes of the empire to restore him to his guardians. He was a warlike youth, and before he was 15 years old led an army against Crescentius, who styled himself consul of Rome, and defeated him. At the age of 16 he assumed the reins of government, was crowned emperor, and went to Italy, which was in a state of confusion, owing to the opposition of different popes. Otho having re-established order, returned into Germany, and made Boleslas king of Poland. He was obliged again to pass into Italy to quell a revolt, but died soon afterwards, it is suspected, of poison.

Born 980; died 1002.

OTHO IV., called the Superb, was the son of Henry, duke of Saxony, and of Matilda, sister of Richard Cœur de Lion of England, and chosen emperor in 1208. He was excommunicated by the pope for seizing the lands which the Countess Matilda bequeathed to the Holy See. In 1212 the princes of the empire elected Frederic, king of Sicily, in the room of Otho, who, after struggling against his rival until 1215, resigned his crown to him, and retired to Brunswick.

Born 1174; died 1218.

OTHO I., king of Greece, was the second son of Louis I., of Bavaria, and was in his 17th year, offered the throne of the new Greek kingdom in 1832. After being assisted in his government by a regency, he, in 1835, became the unassisted monarch of Greece. In 1836 he married Amelia, daughter of the grand-duke of Oldenburg. He reigned weakly until 1862, when a serious rebellion broke out, and he quitted Greece, a provisional government being established. (See GREECE.)

OTHRYS, MOUNT, o'-thris, a chain forming the N. frontier of Greece. Its height varies between 4,000 and 6,000 feet above the level of the sea.

OTISCO, o-tis'-ko, a township of the United States, on a lake of the same name, in New York 14 miles from Syracuse. Pop. 2,000.

OTLEY, ot'-le, a market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the right bank of the Wharfe, 10 miles S.E. of Leeds. The church was built in the early part of the 16th century. Large markets for cattle and grain are held. Manf. Worsted and paper. Pop. 6,803. A station on the Midland Railway.

OTOE, ot'-o-e, a county of Nebraska, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 15,727. The capital is NEBRASKA CITY.

OTRANTO, TERRA DI, or LECCE, o-tran'-to, a peninsular province, forming the S.E. extremity of Italy, having W. the Gulf of Taranto, and E. the Adriatic. It is the "heel of the Italian boot." It is mostly hilly, being traversed by offsets of the Apennines, and there are dense forests and good pasture lands. The chief products are corn, wine, olive-oil, tobacco, cotton and fruit. The chief town is LECCE. Area, 3,293 square miles. Pop. 574,612.

OTRANTO, a town of Italy, on the south-east coast of the same province, 24 miles S.E. of Lecce. The harbour is unsafe. There are a castle and cathedral. Pop. 2,000.—This town, the ancient Hydruntum, was in the middle ages, the chief port of Italy on the Adriatic; and in the 15th century, when taken by the Turks, had 80,000 inhabitants. One of the causes of its decay has been the increasing malaria.

OTSEGO, ot-sē'-go, an uninhabited county of Michigan, United States. Area, 576 square miles.

OTSEGO, a county of New York, United States. Area, 1,050 square miles. Pop. 50,000. The capital is Cooperstown.

OTSEGO LAKE. (See SUSQUEHANNA.)

OTTAJANO, ot-ta-zha'-no, a town of Italy, province of Napoli, 12 miles E. of Naples, at the north-eastern base of Vesuvius. There are a castle and three churches. Pop. 3,900, mostly employed in agriculture.

OTTAKRING, or OTTOKRIN, ot-ta'-kring, a village in the vicinity of Vienna. There are many elegant mansions, and the place is a great holiday resort. Considerable quantities of fruit and milk are supplied to Vienna. Pop. 12,500.

OTTAWA, ot'-ta-wa, a large river of British North America, rising in Lat. 48° 30′ N. Lon. 76° W., and after a course of 600 miles falling into the St. Lawrence by two mouths which form the island of Montreal. During its course it widens into many lakes of considerable size, and drains an area of about 80,000 square miles. It has many large tributaries, and affords the means of transit for the largest lumber (or rough timber) trade in the world. It is connected by the Rideau canal with Lake Ontario, and other canal systems are projected, giving easy access to the great lake system of North America.

OTTAWA, capital of the dominion of Canada, on the Ottawa, 87 miles above its confluence with the St. Lawrence. It is divided by the Ridcau canal (crossed by a massive stone bridge) into two parts, the Upper and Lower Towns. Near the west end of the city the river forms the magnificent cataract, the Chaudière Falls, and at the north-eastern end the Rideau forms two other cataracts before joining the Ottawa. These falls afford most valuable water power for machinery. There is a suspension bridge over the Chaudière Falls, connecting the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The Parliamentary offices, the first stone of which was laid in 1860, by the Prince of Wales form a splendid building, in the Gothic style, with a lofty terrace above the river bank. The trade in sawn-timber is the most important industrial occupation of the town, which is in direct communication by steamboats or railways with the principal places in the dominion. Pop. 27,412.—The town was founded in 1827 by Colonel By, after whom it was at first named Bytown. The name was changed to Ottawa City, in 1855, and in 1858 it was selected as the capital of the dominion.

OTTAWA, a county of Quebec province, Canada. Area, 5,706 square miles. Pop. 50,000, nearly one-third being of French descent.

OTTAWA, the name of three counties of the United States.

MICHIGAN.—Area, 550 square miles. Pop. 23,126. The capital is Grand Haven.

OHIO.—Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 19,762. The capital is Port Clinton.

OTTAWA, the capital o La Salle county, Illinois, United States, on the Illinois river, near the junction with the Fox. The surrounding country is fertile and abounds with coal. Manf. Agricultural implements, carriages, starch, and glass. Pop. 7,834.

OTTER TAIL, a county of Minnesota, United States. Area, 2,016 square miles. Pop. 18,675. The capital is Otter Tail City.

OTTERY, ST. MARY, ot'-te-re, a market town of Devonshire, on the left bank of the Otter, 12 miles N.E. of Exeter. The principal building is the church, a spacious edifice, possessing many singularities in its construction. The monuments are numerous, and many of them curious. There are two chapels, and an endowed grammar school. Manf. Silk, ribbons, and lace. Pop. 2,430.—A station on the London and South-Western Railway.

OTTOMAN EMPIRE. (See TURKEY.)

OTTMACHAU, ot-ma-shou', a walled town of Prussia, province of Silesia, on the left bank of the Neisse, 41 miles S.W. of Oppeln. Manf. Tobacco, and tiles. Pop. 3,400.

OTTONE, ot-to'-nai, a town of Italy, province of Genova, is a mountainous district, near the Trebbia, 25 miles N.E. of Genoa. There are two churches, and the remains of two old castles. Manf. Necklaces, and other ornaments of rock crystal. There is a trade in ware. Pop. 4,300.

OTTUMWA, ot'-tum-wa, the capital of Wapello county, Iowa, United States, on the Des Moines river, 85 miles S.E. of Des Moines. Manf. Carriages, agricultural implements, sewing-machines, and furniture. Pop. 9,004.

OTWAY, THOMAS, ot'-wai, an English dramatic writer, the son of a clergyman, was educated at Winchester school; whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford, which he left without taking a degree, and went to London, where he became a performer (failing lamentably, and retiring after his first appearance), and writer for the stage, producing his first tragedy, "Alcibiades," in 1675, followed by "Don Carlos," which was very successful, and a licentious comedy, "Friendship and Fashion." The earl of Plymouth procured him a cornetcy in a regiment in Flanders; but, the regiment being disbanded, Otway returned to London, where, in great poverty, he recommenced writing plays. Having been compelled by his necessities to contract debts, and haunted by the emissaries of the law, he retired to a public house on Tower Hill, where, according to one account, he was choked when swallowing, after a long fast, a piece of bread which charity had supplied; but it is more authentic that he died from fever brought on by excitement and a hurried journey to Dover, in pursuit of a man who had murdered one of the dramatist's intimate friends. Otway excels in depicting the tender passions in tragedy; of which his "Orphan" and "Venice Preserved" are proofs. Some writers of high authority, indeed, have ranked him, in respect of tenderness, with Shakspeare.

Born at Trotten, Sussex, 1651; died 1685.

OTWAY, PORT, a good harbour on the western coast of Patagonia, South America. Lat. 46° 49′ S., Lon. 75° 18′ W.

OTTOCAR II., ot'-to-kar, surnamed the Conqueror, succeeded Wenceslaus III., and united the kingdoms of Bohemia, Austria, and Styria, in 1253, and in the following year made some conquests in Prussia. He founded cities, encouraged trades and manufactures, and protested against the election of Rudolph of Hapsburg. Placed under the ban of the empire in 1275, he was abandoned by his allies, and in the succeeding years deprived of Austria. He recommenced the war in 1277, but perished at the battle of Marchfeld.

Died in 1278.

OUACHITA, oo-a-tchĭ'-ta, a county of Arkansas, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 11,758, nearly half being coloured. The capital is Camden.

OUACHITA, a county of Louisiana, United States. Area, 650 square miles. Pop. 14,685, about 8,000 being coloured. The capital is Monroe.

OUDE, or OUDH, ood, an extensive province of British India, bounded N. by Nepaul, from which it is separated by the lower ranges of the Himalaya, and S. and S.W. by the Ganges. The whole surface is nearly level, sloping towards the Ganges, extremely fertile and well watered by large rivers, or by the copious streams which intersect the country. The climate is generally salubrious, but subject to the extremes of heat and cold. The botany is also extremely rich and varied. Wheat, barley, rice, millet, maize, and a variety of other grains; cotton, sugar-cane, indigo, hemp, mustard, tobacco, and poppies are cultivated. It is also celebrated for its grapes, mangoes, and other fruits. Oxen are exclusively used for agricultural purposes, and the domestic animals generally consist of cattle, sheep, and goats.

Rivers.—The Goomtee, Ghogra, and Raptee.

Minerals.—In some of the districts, quantities of saltpetre and lapis lazuli.

Manf.—A variety of cotton cloths and a coarse kind of flannel, paper, glass-wares, and bows, arrows, shields, matchlocks, and swords; but it is not celebrated for any peculiar manufacture, unless it be cotton carpets.

Area.—23,992 square miles.

Pop.—12,500,000, the great majority being Hindoos, and most of the remainder Mahometans.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 4 divisions or commissionerships—Lucknow, Fyzabad, Rai Bareli, and Seetapore. The chief towns are LUCKNOW, FYZABAD, OUDE, RAI BARELI, and SHAHABAD.

History.—The country was conquered and made a province of the Mogul empire in 1195. In 1760, Sujah-ud-Dowlah, vizier, made himself an independent prince, and notwithstanding frequent interferences by the East India Company, the country was so atrociously governed by his descendants, that Oude was annexed to British territory in 1856. In the great mutiny of the following year, it was one of the great centres of disaffection and outrage. The government is now administered by a chief commissioner. Oude was formerly governed by a native prince, under the superintendence of the British, who had a resident at his court, and a regiment of infantry to protect him. In 1849, an armed force, of the strength of about 6,000 men, was maintained by the British in the province. After the rebellion of 1857, it was taken possession of by the British.

OUDE, or AWADH, the ancient capital of the above province, on the Ghogra river, and said to have been of great extent, and one of the seven sacred cities. Pop. 8,000.

OUDENARDE, oo'-den-ar'-de, a town of Belgium, province of East Flanders, divided into two parts by the Scheldt, 16 miles S.E. of Ghent. There is a fine Gothic council-house. Manf. Woollen, linen, and leather. Pop. 8,000.—It is noted for the memorable victory gained over the French in 1708, by prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough.

OUDINOT, NICOLAS CHARLES, oo'-de-no, marshal of France and duke of Reggio. At the age of 17 he entered upon his military career, and, in 1793, obtained the command of a battalion. In the same year he performed his first great feat of arms,—the repulse of the Prussians from the fort of Bitche, with the loss of 700 prisoners. In 1794, while in command of a distant outpost, he, with a single regiment, kept in check a corps of the Austrians numbering 10,000 men. After being severely wounded in a subsequent attack, he was taken prisoner by the Austrians. On obtaining his exchange, he performed signal feats of bravery at Trèves, Nordlingen, and Donauwerth, and was created general of division in 1799. At Zurich, the siege of Genoa, the battle of Pozzola, and the passage of the Mincio, he maintained his great reputation for skill and bravery. Napoleon presented him with a sword of honour, and when, in 1805, he established an élite corps of grenadiers, he entrusted the command to Oudinot. At the head of this corps, he was the first to enter Vienna, and likewise contributed to the victories of Austerlitz and Jena. In 1807 he gained the battle of Ostrolinka, in Poland, for which he was given the title of count, and at Friedland, soon afterwards, performed his greatest deed. With one corps, he kept the whole Russian army in check until Napoleon came up. In 1809, the emperor created Oudinot a marshal, and duke of Reggio; and, upon the flight of Louis Bonaparte from Holland, he was sent to occupy that country, where he remained for two years, to the complete satisfaction of the Dutch people. Throughout the battles of 1812, 1813, and 1814, Oudinot's name shone with all its old lustre; but, after the emperor's abdication, he gave his adherence to the Bourbons, to whom he afterwards steadfastly adhered. In 1823 he commanded the first division of the army of Spain, and was for some time governor of Madrid. In 1839, Louis Philippe nominated him grand chancellor of the legion of honour, and in 1842, governor of the Invalides. Discreet, loyal, and brave, he merited the title bestowed upon him by Napoleon himself, "the Bayard of the French army." A statue was erected to his memory at Bar-le-Duc, his native town, in 1850.

Born 1767; died at Paris, 1847.

OUDINOT, NICOLAS VICTOR, a modern French general, and eldest son of the preceding. At first a page to the emperor Napoleon I., he was created lieutenant of hussars for the bravery exhibited by him at the passage of the Danube in 1809. His next employment was as aide-de-camp, to marshal Massena, in Portugal. Throughout the final campaigns of Napoleon, he signalised himself as the worthy son of a brave parent; and, at the abdication of the emperor, he took service under the restored Bourbon dynasty, and remained faithful to it during the Hundred Days. For this fidelity he was, after the fall of Napoleon, created commandant of the grenadiers of the Royal Guard. At the revolution of 1830, he tendered his resignation of his various appointments, and kept aloof from the government of Louis Philippe until the year 1835, when he was appointed to the command of an African brigade. After the revolution of 1848, he was nominated to the command of the army of observation at the foot of the Alps. In that command he was succeeded by marshal Bugeaud, in 1849; but was soon afterwards sent, at the head of a French expeditionary corps, to compel the Romans to accept the authority of the pope. The city was stoutly defended by Garibaldi, and only submitted after an obstinate struggle. Created a grand cross of the legion of honour after the fall of Rome, he returned to France, and took his seat in the Legislative Assembly. At the coup d'état, he was arrested, and remained for some time a prisoner in the fortress of Vincennes. After his liberation, he retired into private life. He wrote several valuable works on military tactics.

Born 1791; died 1863.

OUEN, St., oo'-a, a village of France, department Seine, 5 miles N.W. of Paris. There is a castle in which Louis XVIII. signed the declaration of 1814. Manf. Glass, earthenware, crucibles, bricks, soap, and flax. Pop. 3,200.

OUFA, or UFA, oo'-fa, a city of European Russia, capital of the government of the same name, on the Bielaya, at its junction with the Oufa, 200 miles from Orenburg. It has seven churches, two monasteries, and three mosques, and a theological and a topographical school. The town is generally well built. There is a trade in corn and cattle, and several annual fairs are held. Pop. 20,000.

OUFA or UFA, a river of European Russia, rising on the western slope of the Ural mountains, and after a winding course of 380 miles joining the right bank of the Bielaya, at the town of Oufa. The chief affluents are, on the right, the Biserta, and on the left the Ai and Jourzen.

OUGHTRED, WILLIAM, ou'-tred, an English divine and mathematician, was educated at Eton, whence he was elected to King's College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship. About 1603 he was presented to the living of Aldbury, Surrey; after which he devoted himself to mathematical pursuits, and wrote several treatises, particularly his "Clavis," the plan of which was adopted by Sir Isaac Newton. In the Rebellion he suffered considerably for his adherence to the royal cause; indeed, according to Fuller, he died of joy at hearing of the restoration of Charles II. Oughtred enjoyed the very highest reputation in his day, and was called "the prince of mathematicians."

Born at Eton, Buckinghamshire, 1573; died in Sussex, 1660.

OUGLITCH, or UGLITCH, oog'-litch, a town of European Russia, government of Jaroslav, on both banks of the Volga, 63 miles W. of Jaroslav. It is partially fortified. It was once a place of far greater importance, with a very large population, but was sacked and burned by the Poles. There are 25 churches, two convents, a seminary, and three hospitals. Manf. Leather, paper, and candles. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 9,000.

OUGREE, oo-grai', a village of Belgium, province of Liége, on the Meuse, 3 miles S.W. of Liége. Manf. Iron, a cannon foundry and several mills, and coal is worked in the vicinity. Pop. 5,800.

OUKIANG, oo-ke'-ang, a large river of China, rising in the mountains in the south-western part of the province of Kivei Choo, and after a northerly course of 250 miles falling into the Yang-tse-Kiang.

OULEAÏ, or OULLEAY ISLANDS, oo-le-ai', a group of 22 small islands in the North Pacific, named after the largest. Bread fruit trees abound. There are a few inhabitants. Lat. 7° 20' N. Lon. 143° 53' E.

OULLINS, ool-lan(g)', a village of France, department Rhone, beautifully situated, 3 miles S. of Lyons. In the church is a monument to Jacquard, the inventor of the power loom, who died here. Manf. Glue. Pop. 7,000.

OULOUBEG, oo'-loo-beg, grandson of Tamerlane, to whose empire he succeeded in 1446. He resided at Samarcand, where he erected a fine observatory. Passionately fond of astronomical pursuits, he compiled a series of tables in Persian, and likewise produced some other writings upon astronomical science.

Born 1394; died 1449.

OUNDLE, oun'-del, a market-town of Northamptonshire, on the left bank of the Nen, 13 miles S.W. of Peterborough. It has a spacious church, a market-house in the Early English style, with a fine hexagonal spire, 210 feet high, and three public schools. Fotheringay Castle, where Mary Queen of Scots was imprisoned, is about 2 miles north of the town. Pop. 2,830.—A station on the London and North-Western Railway.

OURAL MOUNTAINS. (See URAL.)

OURGA, oor'-ga, a city of Mongolia, on the grand route from Kiachta to Peking, 165 miles E. of Kiachta. It is the seat of the deified lama of the Mongols. Pop. about 6,000.

OURIQUE, oo'-re-kai, a town of Portugal, province of Algarve, 42 miles S.W. of Beja. Pop. 3,400.—Here, in 1139, Alphonso I. defeated the Moors.

OURO-PRETO, or VILLARICA, oo'-ro-prai'-to ("black gold"), a city of Brazil, capital of Minaes Geraes, in a mountainous situation 200 miles N.W. of Rio de Janeiro. In its neighbourhood are gold mines, once highly productive, but now worked in a very unprofitable manner. A good trade in coffee is carried on. Pop. 20,000.

OUSE, ooz, a river of England, which forms the principal branch of the Humber, and the main drain for all the waters in the north-eastern district of Yorkshire. It flows through Yorkshire, and, after a course of 60 miles, unites 8 miles below Goole with the Trent from Lincolnshire, to form the Humber.

OUSE, GREAT, a river of Northamptonshire, which, after a course of 160 miles, falls into the Wash, near Lynn Regis, in Norfolk.

OUSE, a river of Upper Canada, which, after a course of 130 miles, falls into Lake Erie at Sherbrooke.

OUTAGAMIE, oot-a-ga'-me, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 684 square miles. Pop. 28,716. The capital is Appleton.

OUTRAM, SIR JAMES, oo'-tram, British general and Indian statesman, the son of a civil engineer, after passing through his collegiate career at Marischal College, Aberdeen, with considerable distinction, obtained an appointment as military cadet in India, whither he proceeded in 1819. He was soon appointed lieutenant and adjutant of the Bombay native infantry, which he subsequently quitted, in order to assume the command of the Bheel Corps at Candeish, for organising and disciplining which he obtained great commendation. Afterwards, he accompanied Lord Keane into Afghanistan, and then became political agent in Guzerat, British resident at Hyderabad, Sattara, and Baroda, and, on the annexation of Oude, was appointed commissioner at Lucknow. In 1856 he was sent to Persia, armed with diplomatic powers as commissioner, with the forces sent thither, enjoying, at the same time, the local rank of lieutenant-general. He was present at the capture of Bushire, and gained the victory at Kooshab in 1857. Returning to India shortly before the outbreak of the mutiny, he was appointed resident at Rajpootana, and a provisional member of the council of India. Lord Canning gave him the charge of the forces intended to relieve Lucknow, but he waived the command in favour of Havelock, and acted as a volunteer in the expedition. After the relief of Lucknow, Outram took the command, and was himself besieged, until relieved by Lord Clyde. In 1856 he was nominated a civil knight-commander of the bath, and in the following year a military grand cross of the same order. He later honours were a baronetcy and the appointment of lieutenant-general of her Majesty's Indian forces and a member of the council of the governor-general of India. Broken down in health, he returned to England in 1860, and made a tour to Egypt and the south of France. Even among the brave soldiers and famous statesmen of British India Outram was conspicuous for heroic courage and high principle. A statue was erected to his honour at Calcutta, and there is another on the Thames Embankment, London.

Born in Derbyshire, about 1802; died in Paris, 1863.

OVADO, o-va'-do, a town of Italy, province of Alessandria, on the Orba, 9 miles S.W. of Acqui. There are several very fine churches, and three convents. Manf. Woollens and linens, vermicelli, silk, iron, and brass wares. Pop. 7,000.

OVALAU, a small but importantly situated island near the centre of the Fiji group.

OVALLE, o-val', a town of Chili, South America, province of Coquimbo, on the north bank of the Rio de Barrasa. There are copper mines in the vicinity. Pop. 12,000.

OVAMPOLAND, o-vam'-po-land, an extensive district of South Africa, north of Great Namaqualand, between the Cuanene river on the north and lat. 23° S. It is fertile, and rises, 51 miles from the coast, 6,000 feet. Elephants, rhinoceroses and other large animals abound. There are several stations for trading in ivory and ostrich feathers. The inhabitants are Ovampos, a tribe which appears to be a link between the negroes and Kaffirs.

OVAR, o'-var, a town of Portugal, prov. of Douro, on the northern shore of the Bay of Aviero, 22 miles S. of Oporto. Pop. 10,500, many employed in fishing.

OVEN'S RIVER, uv'-ens, a river of south-eastern Australia, which rises in a hilly district, about lat. 37° S., lon. 147° E., flows in a north-west course, and falls into the Murray. Rich gold deposits have been found on the banks.

OVERBECK, FRIEDRICH, o'-ver-bek, an eminent German artist, who, with Cornelius, J. Von Schnorr, and other painters, created a great revolution in German art. He studied at Vienna, but was with other students expelled for holding views of art different from those entertained by the authorities. With Cornelius, he took up his residence at Rome, in 1811, and devoted himself to Christian art. Three years after his journey to Rome, he embraced the doctrines of the Roman Catholic church. His best works are illustrative of scriptural subjects; the most important of them being —"The Raising of Lazarus," "Moses and the Daughter of Jethro at the Well," "The Ascent of Elijah," "The Child Christ in the Temple," and St. John Preaching in the Wilderness." As a colourist he is pale and cold; but his powers of design and invention are of the highest order. Although he has worked chiefly in fresco, he has produced numerous fine works in oil, and has, likewise, made numerous drawings for engraving. In this latter walk he has given to the world, among fine collections of drawings, the "Passion of Our Lord," published at Paris in 1843; and "Forty Illustrations from the Gospels."

Born at Lübeck, 1789; died at Rome, 1869.

OVERBURY, SIR THOMAS, o'-ver-ber-e, an English writer, was the son of a gentleman of Gloucestershire, and who received his education at Queen's College, Oxford, whence he removed to the Temple; but, after a short time, he went abroad, and on his return proceeded to Scotland, where he met with Robert Carr, (or Ker), then a page to the earl of Dunbar. Carr accompanied Overbury to London, and shortly afterwards attracted the favourable notice of king James I., who is said to have made him his favourite, in order to teach him the Latin language. The handsome but uneducated Carr rose rapidly, and became viscount Rochester. Overbury at first shared in Carr's good fortune, and was in 1608 knighted. He subsequently assisted the unprincipled favourite in his intrigue with the countess of Essex, who had been married while still a child, and who afterwards conducted herself in an infamously licentious manner; but, at a later period, he opposed the proposal of Carr to obtain a divorce of the count and countess, and then marry the latter, with such acrimony, that he incurred the hatred of both. The countess, it is said, offered a thousand pounds to procure his assassination. On a frivolous charge he was sent to the Tower, where, by the contrivance of Somerset and his wife, as is almost positively ascertained, he was poisoned. Two years afterwards, the circumstances of Overbury's death were discovered, and Carr, now earl of Somerset, with his wife, the former countess of Essex, were, with the king's consent, arrested. The hypocritical monarch is said to have kissed his favourite affectionately at parting; but when he had left the apartment, exclaimed, "Now the deil go with thee, for I will never see thy face more." Somerset and his wife were found guilty; but, though the minor accomplices were executed, the noble delinquents received the royal pardon. The reason generally assigned for the extraordinary stretch of prerogative is that James feared that Carr would reveal some discreditable secret concerning the king. Sir Thomas was the author of several pieces in verse and prose.

Born in Warwickshire, 1581; died 1613.

OVER DARWEN. (See DARWEN, OVER.)

OVERFLAKKEE, o'-ver-flak-e, an island of the Netherlands, in the province of South Holland, situate between the Maas and the Waal, at their entrance into the North Sea. It is 25 miles long, with a breadth of 7. The soil is very fertile. Pop. 17,000.

OVERSKOU, THOMAS, o'-ver-skoo, a modern Danish dramatic writer, who was intended for his father's trade, of an upholsterer; but having been overtaken by severe illness, he occupied his leisure during convalescence, in reading the works of Oehlenschläger and Holberg. Subsequently, under considerable difficulties, he taught himself several languages, and supported himself by playing small parts upon the stage at Copenhagen. In 1826 he produced a drama, which met with great popularity, and gave its author a position in his country. In 1846 he established at Copenhagen a theatre, and was, ten years afterwards, appointed director of the Theatre Royal. He has written, translated, or adapted, more than a hundred dramatic pieces, and in 1856 he produced a "History of the Danish Stage."

Born at Copenhagen, 1798.

OVERSTONE, SAMUEL JONES LOYD, 1st Lord, o'-ver-stone, banker and political economist, whose father, a Welsh dissenting minister, married the daughter of John Jones, a rich merchant of Manchester, and afterwards established with him the banking firm of Jones, Loyd, and Co., in Lothbury, London. The future lord Overstone was educated at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1819 became the parliamentary representative of Hythe. In 1826 he left the House of Commons, but was afterwards frequently consulted by the government on fiscal questions. In 1850 he became a peer, with the title of baron Overstone and Fotheringay. He was a member of the commission of inquiry relative to the practicability of a system of decimal coinage; was an opponent of the Limited Liability Act, and was one of the warmest advocates of the principle of the Bank Charter Act, passed in 1844.

Born 1796. Died 1883.

OVERTON, o'-ver-ton, a county of Tennessee, United States. Area, 530 square miles. Pop. 12,153. The capital is Livingston.

OVERWEG, DR. ADOLF, o'-ver-veg, a modern German traveller, who was in 1849 selected as the naturalist of the expedition sent to Lake Tchad, in Central Africa, by the English and Prussian governments. In company with Mr. Richardson and Dr. Barth, he set out from Tripoli in March, 1850, and after encountering great dangers, reached Lake Tchad in April, 1851. The three travellers carried with them, over the burning sands of Africa, a light boat, which had been built at Malta expressly for the purpose of navigating the great lake. The English geographer had died when the party were within a few miles of Lake Tchad; but Dr. Overweg and his companion were well received by the sultan of Bornou. In June of the same year, the boat was launched, and in it he visited many of the islands upon the lake. The country east of the lake was subsequently explored, as well as the kingdom of Baghirmi, to the south-eastward, and in the direction of the sources of the White Nile. The chief object of the expedition was to traverse in a south-westerly direction the country between Lake Tchad and the shores of the Indian Ocean; but whilst awaiting the arrival of Dr. Vogel, who, with two volunteers from the corps of sappers and miners, was to be sent out to him, he was attacked with fever at Maduari, upon the western shore of Lake Tchad, and died.

Born at Hamburg, 1822; died 1852.

OVERYSSEL, o-ver-is'-sel, a province of the Netherlands, bounded N. by Friesland and Drenthe; S. and S.W. by Guelderland; E. by Prussia, and W. by the Zuyder Zee. It is generally low, with ranges of sand-hills, and there are extensive marshes. The island of Schokland, in the Zuyder Zee, belongs to the province.

Rivers.—The Yssel, and its contributary the Schipbeck, and the Overysselsche Vecht. There are important canals.

Area.—2,076 square miles.

Pop.—285,230.

Chief Towns.—The capital, ALMELO, ZWOLLE, DEVENTER, and KAMPEN.

OVID, PUBLIUS OVIDIUS NASO, ov'-id, Latin poet, descendant of an old family of the equestrian order. Being intended for the law, he was sent at an early age, to Rome, to receive his education under the best teachers. He made considerable progress in eloquence; but poetry had more charms for him than the art of pleading. On inheriting his patrimony, he went to Athens to study the Greek language. On settling at Rome, his accomplishments procured him many friends, particularly Augustus, who, however, ordered him to be banished to the banks of the Euxine Sea, in the year 8 A.D. The occasion of his disgrace is variously related: some assert that it was for writing his "Art of Love;" others say that it was for an intrigue with Julia, the emperor's daughter. Despite the most earnest entreaties of the poet and his friends, Augustus would never consent to his recall. The works of Ovid extant are his "Metamorphoses," "The Art of Love," elegies, epistles, and fragments. They are characterised by sweetness of style, glowing expression, and elegance of description, mixed, however, with much licentiousness. The best translation of the "Metamorphoses" is that of Dryden, Addison, Congreve, and others, which was published in 1717. Both Dryden and Congreve have translated "The Art of Love," and there are many translations, both in prose and verse, of his other works.

Born at Sulmo, 43 B.C.; died at Tomi, on the Euxine, 18 A.D.

OVIEDO, o-ve-ai'-do, a province of Spain, bounded N. by the Bay of Biscay; S. by Leon; E. by Santander, and W. by Lugo. It is very mountainous, but there are extensive pastures, on which cattle, goats, and swine are reared. The coast is rugged and dangerous, and there are few places accessible to vessels. Grain, potatoes, pease, beans, nuts, oranges, lemons, and other fruit are cultivated. The capital is OVIEDO.

Rivers.—The Nalon, Eo, Sella, Navia, Pilona, and Narcea.

Minerals.—Coal, considerable quantities of which are exported.

Area.—3,686 square miles.

Pop.—579,794.

OVIEDO, an inland city of Spain, capital of the above province, at the confluence of the Nalon and the Nora, 60 miles N.W. of Leon. It is of great antiquity, and has an elegant cathedral, built in the Gothic style, and containing the remains of many of the early kings and princes of Asturias. The church of San Miguel is also of considerable antiquity, and there are several other old churches. There are, besides, a university, an ancient aqueduct (supplying 11 public fountains), an episcopal palace, a collegiate chapter, monasteries, convents, hospitals, a theatre, and schools. In the centre of the city is a fine public square, from which four principal streets branch off. Manf. Linen, woollens, hats, and arms. Pop. 25,500.—During the early dominion of the Moors in Spain, this place was the principal refuge of the Christians. It was twice plundered by the French in the war at the beginning of the century.

OVIEDO Y VALDEZ, GONZALO FERNANDEZ DE, o-ve-ai'-do e val'-daith, Spanish historian, who, in his 12th year, became page to prince John of Castile, son of Ferdinand, king of Aragon, and Isabella, queen of Castile. He accompanied Columbus on his first voyage to Hispaniola. In the war of Naples he rendered great services to Spain, for which Ferdinand appointed him inspector-general of the commerce of the New World; in which capacity he went to Hispaniola, where he made a vast collection of materials for the work which he subsequently produced, with the title "General and Natural History of the West Indies." It is a book of immense learning, although it has been denounced by Las Casas "as full of lies, almost, as pages." There is also another important work by him, relating to the genealogy, revenues, &c., of the grandees of Spain; but it remains in MS., and is preserved in the National Library of Madrid.

Born at Madrid, 1478; died at Valladolid, 1557.

OVOCA. (See AVOCA.)

OWAIN, o-wain', son of Cadwgan ap Bleddyn, a Welsh prince of Powys. Having carried off Ness, the wife of Gerald, constable of Pembroke, he and his father were obliged to fly to Ireland; but they afterwards returned to their own country. Owain succeeded his father in 1110, and, the year following, was in Normandy with Henry I., who knighted him. He was killed by Gerald, the husband of Ness.

Died 1114.

OWAIN, the son of Maxen Wledig, an eminent character in the Welsh annals. He broke off the connection between Britain and the Romans, and was, in consequence, chosen sovereign of the country. He was also accounted a saint in the British church. The date at which he lived is uncertain.

OWAIN CIVEILOG, kiv'-e-log, a prince, warrior, and poet, who made war against Hywel ap Cadwgan and Rhys ab Grufydd. Some poetical pieces by him are preserved in the Welsh Archæology.

Died 1197.

OWEGO, o'-e-go, capital of Tioga county, New York, on the Susquehanna, 140 miles S.W. of Albany. It is the centre of a fine agricultural district. Manf. Iron, boats, soap, leather, carriages, and pianofortes. Pop. 9,500.

OWEN, JOHN o'-en, a Latin epigrammatist, who was educated at Oxford; whence he is sometimes styled Oxoniensis; after which he became schoolmaster, first at Trylegh, in Monmouthshire, and next at Warwick. His Latin epigrams possess great point, and are inferior only to those of Martial.

Born in Wales about 1560; died 1622.

OWEN, JOHN, DR., a learned Independent divine, son of the vicar of Stadham, Oxfordshire, educated at Queen's College, Oxford, which he was compelled to leave, after highly distinguishing himself, in consequence of his adoption of puritanical opinions, and his opposition to archbishop Laud. For the same reasons he was deprived of an estate which his uncle had intended to settle on him. After the publication in 1642 of the "Display of Arminianism," he was presented to the living of Fordham, Essex, where he married. He afterwards went to Coggeshall, where he adopted congregational views, having previously been a presbyterian. Having published some other works, his fame increased, and in 1646 he was sent for to preach before parliament. During the civil war he was a zealous advocate for the parliament against the king. Cromwell made him his chaplain, and took him with him on his expedition to Ireland. He afterwards appointed him to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, where he served the office of vice-chancellor in 1652, and the year following took his doctor's degree. He was one of the "tryers," appointed to "purge the church of scandalous ministers," that is, of clergymen of royalist opinions, and was able in that capacity to befriend some good men of that party. He was opposed to the ambitious designs of Cromwell, and in consequence lost favour, and was deprived of his vice-chancellorship in 1657. At the Restoration he was deprived of his deanery; on which he retired to his estate in Essex. Dr. Owen was a very voluminous writer. His greatest works are, "An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews," "Discourse on the Holy Spirit," and "Treatise on Original Sin." Clarendon, in his "History of the Rebellion," extols Dr. Owen's mild disposition, and declares him to have been one of the most learned and rational men of his time. He secured the respect of political opponents, and even Charles II., and James duke of York, are said to have enjoyed his conversation.

Born at Stadham, Oxfordshire, 1616; died at Ealing, Middlesex, 1683.

OWEN, RICHARD, an English comparative anatomist, who was educated first at the grammar school of Lancaster, and was afterwards sent to the university of Edinburgh, in order to take a degree in medicine. In 1825 he came to London, and became a student of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. In the following year he received his diploma as member of the Royal College of Surgeons. Abernethy obtained for him an appointment at the College of Surgeons, as assistant to Mr. Clift, the curator of the museum. His first labours in the Royal College of Surgeons, was the preparation of a complete and accurate catalogue of the great museum of John Hunter, which had been obtained by the institution. That work cost Owen thirty years of incessant toil, but it enabled him to become the greatest anatomist of the age. During more than twenty years he held the Hunterian professorship at the College of Surgeons; in 1834 he was appointed lecturer on comparative anatomy at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and 1836 professor of anatomy and physiology in the College of Surgeons; in 1856 was appointed superintendent of the natural history department of the British Museum, and in 1858 Fullerian professor of physiology in the Royal Institute; he received the Royal and Copley medals of the Royal Society, a pension and residence from her majesty, and became a member of almost every learned body in Europe and America. In 1873 he was made a companion of the bath. The limits of this notice will not permit of even the bare enumeration of the titles of his many invaluable works, including lectures and short papers, more than 300 in number.

Born at Lancaster, 1804.

OWEN, ROBERT, founder of the system called "Owenism," or "Socialism." He was the son of parents in a humble condition of life, but who, nevertheless, gave him a fair education. After filling the situation of draper's assistant, at Newton, Montgomeryshire, and at Stamford, he repaired to the metropolis, and there so distinguished himself by his business talents, that, at 18, he was enabled to become a partner in a small cotton-mill. His success increasing, he removed to the Charlton Mills, near Manchester, which, under his management became a very prosperous establishment. In 1799 he married Miss Dale, the daughter of David Dale, a wealthy and influential cotton manufacturer, of New Lanark. He soon afterwards became part proprietor and sole manager of his father-in-law's works, the "New Lanark Twist Company," and the management of the mills upon his own peculiar principles soon spread his name far and wide. In this factory, where not only cotton-spinning, but other branches of manufacture were carried on, as many as 4,000 persons were at one time employed. Over that large number of individuals he presided with a highly benevolent care; built schools and improved dwellings; taught the children various practical arts; provided both parents and offspring with the means of healthful recreation, and promoted by every possible means the welfare of his great charge. From 1810 to 1815 he published "New View of Society; or Essays on the Formation of the Human Character," which, with his practical exemplification of his theories, introduced him to such men as Mr. Wilberforce, Mr. Zachary Macaulay, the first Sir Robert Peel, Mr. James Mill, Sir James Mackintosh, Mr. Malthus, and Lord Brougham. In 1817 he addressed memorials to the sovereigns assembled at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, confiding their presentation to lord Castlereagh, and became a celebrity. Among other notable persons who visited his infant-school at

New Lanark, was the late emperor Nicholas, of Russia, then the grand-duke. At that time there was great commotion about the doctrines of Malthus, and Mr. Owen relates that, "in two hours' conversation with the grand duke, before he left me, he said, 'As your country is overpeopled, I will take you and two millions of population with you, all in similar manufacturing communities.'" This was in reference to the establishment at New Lanark, and was certainly a most extraordinary offer on the part of the most arbitrary despotic monarch in the world; for Mr. Owen's community was based upon "liberty, equality, fraternity." Mr. Owen, however, declined, as he thought his hands were full enough at the time. In 1823 he quitted the factory at New Lanark and went to North America, where in the state of Indiana, he purchased a large tract of land, and founded a community called by him "New Harmony." It proved a failure, however, and in 1827 he returned to his native country. His later experiments at carrying out his new view of society were an establishment at Orbiston, in Lanarkshire; another at Tytherley, in Hampshire; and a labour-exchange in London; but all were complete failures. In his later years, as his mind began to fail, he accepted the doctrine of spirit-rapping, and lectured and published works on that delusion. The last appearance of the philanthropist was at the Social Science Congress of Liverpool, in 1858. He was a gentleman of ample means, and disposed of a large fortune in promulgating his principles. Whatever opinion may be held as to his theories, there can be but one, and that the very highest, with respect to his energy, moral integrity, business talents and disinterested philanthropy.

Born at Newton, Montgomeryshire, 1771; died there, 1858.

OWEN, ROBERT DALE, eldest son of the preceding, educated in Switzerland, and in 1823 accompanied his father to the United States, and began his career as a journalist. He was three times elected to the Indiana legislature, and in 1843 and 1845 was elected for Congress. In 1853 he was appointed chargé d'affaires at Naples, and in 1855 minister, remaining there till 1858. On his return to America he was busily employed in political writing. He has been for many years a prominent believer in spiritualism, and has published several works on the subject, especially "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World," and the "Debatable Land between this World and the Next."

Born in Glasgow, 1801.

OWEN, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 400 square miles. Pop. 16,500. The capital is Spencer.

OWEN, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 17,401. The capital is Owenton.

OWRAM, o'-ram, two contiguous townships of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Halifax.

OWSLEY, ous'-le, a county of Kentucky, United States. Area, 460 square miles. Pop. 4,000. The capital is Booneville.

OWYHEE. (See HAWAII.)

OWYHEE, o-wy-ee', a county of Idaho territory, United States. Area, 13,600 square miles. Pop. 2,000. The capital is Silver City.

OXENFORD, JOHN, ox'-en-ford, an English translator and dramatist, who was at first articled to a solicitor, but quitted law for literature and the drama. He was a member of the Philological Society, for many years the dramatic critic of the Times newspaper, and wrote a number of plays, several of them of a superior order. He was an excellent German scholar, and produced a translation of Goethe's "Conversation with Eckermann," the "Hellas" of Jacob's and a portion of the "Autobiography of Goethe." He is also understood to have been the author of a fine article in the "Westminster Review," entitled "Iconoclasm in German Philosophy."

Born at Camberwell, near London, 1812; died 1877.

OXENSTIERNA, AXEL, Count, ox'-en-stiar'-na, a celebrated Swedish minister, who studied theology and jurisprudence at Rostock, Jena, and Würtemburg, in Germany. On his return to Sweden, in 1603, he entered upon a career of diplomacy, and was employed by Charles IX. When Gustavus Adolphus ascended the throne, in 1611, he nominated him his chancellor or prime minister; and to that monarch Oxenstierna rendered the greatest services by his statesmanship. When Gustavus was killed at the battle of Lutzen, in 1632, he put himself at the head of the Protestant coalition, and, by his sagacious measures, brought success to the league during two years. After the battle of Nordlingen, in 1634, he went to Paris to hold an interview with Richelieu; and, in 1648, he directed from Stockholm the preliminary negotiations which, by producing the peace of Westphalia, put an end to the Thirty Years' War. His son was one of the envoys who signed that treaty; and it was to him that the count wrote, in answer to a letter wherein the young man betrayed diffidence because of his inexperience in diplomatic affairs, this answer, since become proverbial:—"Nescis, mi fili, quantilla prudentia homines regantur." ("You do not yet know, my son, how little wisdom is exhibited in ruling men.") While Queen Christina was in her minority, he was at the head of the council of regency; and, after she assumed the government, he resumed his old office of prime minister; but, not succeeding in dissuading the queen from abdicating her crown, he retired into private life.

Born at Fanö, Upland, 1583; died at Stockholm, 1654.

OXFORD, ox'-ford, Earl of. (See HARLEY.)

OXFORD, a city and municipal and parliamentary borough of Oxfordshire, the chief town of Oxfordshire, and greatly celebrated as a seat of learning, 55 miles N.W. of London. It is delightfully situated on a gentle eminence, near the confluence of the rivers Isis and Cherwell, which nearly encompass the city, and which are crossed by numerous bridges. From Magdalen Bridge, which crosses the Cherwell, the High Street extends westward with a graceful curve for nearly three-quarters of a mile, and from the striking architectural character of the college buildings and churches which adorn it, is generally considered one of the finest streets in Europe. The continuation of High Street is Queen Street, running west, and there is another principal street, the southern part of which is St. Aldate's Street, and the northern, Corn-Market and St. Giles's Streets. The point at which these lines of streets cross is now known as Carfax, a corruption of the old French quatre voies ("four roads.") Broad Street is another good street, nearly parallel with, and to the north of High Street. The university, which is the most important feature of the town, consists of 20 colleges and four halls, each of which forms an establishment within itself, having its own students and teachers, and its own revenues and regulations; while they are all united under the government of the university, of which they form the members. The university acts as a corporate body, under a charter which received the royal assent in the reign of Charles I. The officers by whom the university is immediately governed are the chancellor, the high steward, the vice-chancellor, and two proctors, each of whom has several duties relative to the interests of the university. The colleges, taken in the order of the dates of foundation, are:—1. University (1232), on the southern side of High Street. The present buildings are modern. 2. Balliol, in Broad Street (1263), founded by John Balliol, father of John Balliol, king of Scotland; with a fine gate, and new chapel and additional buildings. 3. Merton (1264), near the south side of High Street, consisting of two quadrangles, with an old embattled tower, and the original chapel and part of the buildings erected by the founder. 4. Exeter (1314), to the north of High Street, with a splendid western front, and a new Gothic chapel, the finest building in the city, library and hall. 5. Oriel (1326), near St. Aldate's Street, with a very fine library; in the Ionic style. 6. Queen's, on the northern side of High Street, so named in honour of Philippa, queen of Edward IV., in the Grecian style of architecture, and consisting of two spacious quadrangles, and a central gateway, crowned with an open cupola, enclosing a statue of Queen Caroline, wife of George II. 7. New College (1386), near to Queen's, built by William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester, and one of the finest buildings in the university, in the Perpendicular style, with a splendid chapel, tower, and cloisters, and beautiful gardens, with venerable trees. 8. Lincoln (1427), nearly all rebuilt. 9. All Soul's (1437), near the centre of High Street, on the north side, with an old and a new quadrangle of the latter century, a noble library, and a chapel remarkable for effective simplicity of decoration. 10. Magdalen (1456), founded by Waynflete, bishop of Winchester, in High Street, retaining the original and famous tower, cloister, and chapel, and garden, meadows, and promenades. 11. Brasenose (1509), to the north of High Street, with a good gateway and tower of the 15th century. 12. Corpus Christi (1516), near St. Aldate's Street, founded by Bishop Fox, of Winchester, and entered under a square tower, with rich canopied niches, and contains, in the chapel, a fine altar-piece by Rubens, the Adoration of the Magi. 13. Christ Church (1525), in St. Aldate's Street, founded by Cardinal Wolsey, and refounded by Henry VIII., is the most magnificent of all the colleges. The street front is 400 feet in length, with a gateway, begun by Wolsey and completed by Sir Christopher Wren, with a circular tower, crowned by a dome, and containing the famous bell, the "Great Tom of Oxford," weighing about 8 tons. The chapel of this college, in the Norman style, is the cathedral of Oxford, and there are a noble hall, picture-gallery, and library. There are three quadraugles, with additional modern buildings, and gardens communicating with the famous Christ Church meadows, and the Broad Walk, overshadowed with venerable elms, which is the favourite promenade of the city. 14. Trinity (1554), in Broad Street, consisting of two courts, entered under a square tower, the buildings being modern. 15. St. John's (1555), founded by Sir Thomas Whyte, Lord Mayor of London, in the northern part of the city, with beautiful gardens, and buildings partly built from the designs of Inigo Jones, at the expense of archbishop Laud. 16. Jesus (1571), in the north of High Street, founded by Queen Elizabeth and Dr. Hugh Price. 17. Wadham (1613), in the northern part of the city, with a large quadrangle and elegant buildings in the later Perpendicular style, including a lofty hall, and a spacious chapel, with a beautiful east window. 18. Pembroke (1624), opposite Christ Church, with an elegant chapel in the Ionic style. 19. Worcester (1714), in the north-western part of the city, in a secluded position, with beautiful gardens. 20. Keble (1868), in the northern part of the city, founded in memory of the Rev. John Keble, author of "The Christian Year." It is in the Pointed style, and the college was completed and inaugurated in 1876. The halls of the university were originally private houses, erected by citizens of Oxford, and rented by the students for their accommodation. After the foundation of colleges, they diminished in number, and sunk into neglect; but five still remain, and have been improved by benefactions; viz., St. Alban's, St. Edmund's, St. Mary Magdalen, St. Mary's, and New Inn. Of the other buildings connected with the university, the public schools form, together with the Bodleian Library and the picture-gallery, a splendid quadrangle. In these schools, which were erected in the 15th century, the professors read lectures in the several sciences. The Bodleian, or public library, founded by Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, and restored and greatly augmented by Sir Thomas Bodley, now contains one of the most valuable collections of books and manuscripts in Europe. The Theatre, built by Sir Christopher Wren, is a magnificent building, on the plan of the theatre of Marcellus, at Rome, arranged to hold 4,000 persons, and used on great public occasions. The Radcliffe Library, one of the most splendid ornaments of the university, crowned by a dome, the most conspicuous feature of Oxford, was founded by Dr. Radcliffe, and completed in 1749. The Ashmolean Museum was founded in 1682, by Elias Ashmole, for the reception of rare productions, both natural and artificial. The Radcliffe astronomical observatory is an elegant structure, surmounted by a tower, in imitation of the Temple of the Winds at Athens. The Clarendon, built for a printing office, is now used as a museum, with lecture-rooms. The University Printing Office is a very extensive building, and the Taylor and Randolph Institution was established partly for the exhibition of works of art, and partly for the teaching of modern languages. The Union Debating and Reading Rooms, in the Gothic style, were erected in 1859. The University Museum, in the north part of the town, completed in 1861, consists of a quadrangle, with a roof of iron and glass, and surrounded by lecture-rooms. The Botanic Garden, near the Cherwell, is one of the oldest in the kingdom. The principal churches of Oxford, besides the cathedral already mentioned, are, St. Mary's, or the University Church, nearly in the centre of the High Street, and one of the finest Gothic structures in the city, with a beautiful tower and spire 180 feet high; St. Aldate's, an old church; St. Peter's-in-the-East, the most ancient of all the churches, originally in the Norman style, but with additions in later styles, and having a fine Norman crypt; St. Martin's, or Carfax, a modern structure, at the meeting of the four lines of road already mentioned; St. Thomas, founded in 1141, with a square embattled tower; All Saints, in the Grecian style; and St. Mary Magdalene, a beautiful edifice, with a modern "martyrs' aisle." Near the last-named church is the Martyrs' Memorial, a highly decorated monumental cross, nearly on the spot where Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley suffered martyrdom. There are altogether 25 parochial churches. Other public buildings connected with the city, rather than with the university, are, handsome chapels for Wesleyans, Independents, and other Dissenters, and Roman Catholics; a large town-hall; a corn-exchange, built in 1863; and the Radcliffe Infirmary, about a mile from the town. The keep of the old castle, built in the time of William Rufus, and some fragments of the old wall remain. In what may be termed the university portion of the town, Oxford is, perhaps, the most beautiful city of England; but on the western side, where the poorer inhabitants reside, the streets are narrow and crooked. The low-lying meadows are frequently flooded. There are pleasant suburbs recently erected in the vicinity.—A station on the London and North-Western, Great Western, and Midland railways.

Pop.—35,929.

History.—The Saxon name of the town was Oxnaford, and in Domesday Book it is given as Oxeneford. There was probably, in early times, a ford for cattle across the river. As early as the 8th century it was spoken of as an ancient seat of learning. King Alfred sometimes resided, Canute held parliaments there, and Harold Harefoot was crowned and died there. The Empress Maud was besieged in the castle by Stephen, and the council which terminated the war was held here. In subsequent reigns several parliaments were held in the city. Henry VIII. made it an episcopal see, it having been previously included in the diocese of Lincoln. In the Parliamentary war it was the headquarters of the king.

OXFORD, a county of Maine, United States. Area, 1,700 square miles. Pop. 32,627. The capital is Paris.

OXFORD, a county of the province of Ontario, Canada. Area, 759 square miles. Pop. 50,000. The capital is Woodstock.

OXFORDSHIRE, one of the central counties of England, bounded E. by Buckinghamshire, W. by Gloucestershire, S., S.W., and S.E. by Berkshire, N. by Northamptonshire, from which it is separated by the river Cherwell, and N.W. by Warwickshire. The surface is considerably diversified. In its southern districts it possesses a pleasing alternation of hill and valley, and in the south-east are the Chiltern Hills, rising to 820 feet, and in the northern part is Broom Hill, 836 feet high; but in its central division it loses, in a great measure, that inequality of surface. The meadow lands, for the richness of which this county was wont to be famed, have been greatly circumscribed by the progress of cultivation. Oxfordshire is said by Camden to have been anciently famous for its woods; and even at present it is better supplied with trees than most other counties of England. Large numbers of sheep are raised. Medicinal springs are frequent; among which the various orders of the chalybeate chiefly prevail.

Rivers.—The Thames, forming the southern border, and the Thame, Isis, Cherwell, Windrush, and Evenlode, all affluents of the Thames. The Oxford Canal traverses the county from N. to S., and connects the Thames with the Coventry Canal, which again is connected with the Mersey, Severn, and Trent.

Area.—739 square miles.

Pop.—179,650.

Chief Towns.—OXFORD (the capital), BANBURY, CHIPPING NORTON, HENLEY, WITNEY, and Woodstock.

Parliamentary Representation.—The county returns 3 members; Oxford, 1; Oxford University, 2; Banbury, 1; Woodstock, 1.

OXIA, ox-i'-a, one of the smaller Ionian islands, off Cape Skropha, Acarnania. Ext. 4 miles long, with a breadth of 2.

OXUS, or AMOO, or AMU-DARIA, ox'-us, a-moo' da'-re-a, a river of Central Asia, running principally through independent Tartary. It rises in the high ridge and table-land of Pamir, which forms the boundary between Eastern and Western Turkestan. Flowing through the vast plain of Bokhara and an extensive desert of Tartary, it falls, after a course of 1,300 miles, by several mouths into the Sea of Aral. It is supposed that this great river once flowed into the Caspian, and that it has since twice changed its course. It formed the northern limit of the dominions of Cyrus and Alexander the Great.

OYSTER BAY, ois'-ter, a watering place of Long Island, United States, 25 miles N.E. of New York, with which it has constant steam communication.

OZAKA, o-za'-ka, a city of Japan, on the south-western part of the island of Niphon, near the mouth of the Yodonaga, 25 miles S.W. of Kioto. It is one of the three imperial cities. There are 1,380 Buddhist temples, two native Christian churches, and a fine building, with a dome, and the imperial mint, erected in 1870. Guns of great size are cast in the government arsenal. The beer made from American hops is greatly in demand. Pop. 531,000.

OZARA, or OZORA, a town of Hungary, on the Sio, 73 miles S.E. of Pesth. There is a fine palace belonging to Prince Esterhazy. Pop. 4,000.

OZARK, a county of Missouri, United States. Area, 700 square miles. Pop. 3,500. The capital is Gainesville.

OZAUKEE, or PORT WASHINGTON, o-zo'-kee, a town of Wisconsin, United States, on the western shore of Lake Michigan, 105 miles N.W. of Chicago. There are iron foundries and breweries, and a large trade is carried on. Pop. 5,000.

OZAUKEE, a county of Wisconsin, United States. Area, 288 square miles. Pop. 16,000. The capital is OZAUKEE.

OZIERI, oda-zi-air'-e, a town of the island of Sardinia, 15 miles S.E. of Sassari. It has a college, an hospital, and several convents. Manf. Woollens, and linen. There is a good trade in horses, cattle, skins, wool, and dairy produce. Pop. 7,200.

OZOCKOV, o-zoc-kof', a town of European Russia, on the right bank of the Bzura, 76 miles S.W. of Warsaw. Pop. 5,200.

P.

PABO, pa-bo', a British prince and warrior, who was defeated, and sought refuge in Wales, where he was hospitably entertained by the king of Powys, who gave him a small territory. He afterwards led a religious life, and was accounted a saint. He founded a church in Mona, where his monument, with an inscription, yet remains.

Lived in the 5th century.

PACCA, CARDINAL, pak'-ka, minister of Pius VII., who drew up the bull of excommunication promulgated against Napoleon in 1809. He retired from Rome shortly afterwards, and remained at Fenestrella until 1813, when he rejoined Pius VII. at Fontainebleau. He returned to Rome in 1813, and in 1816 re-established there the order of the Jesuits. He left behind some interesting "Memoirs of his Life and Times."

Born at Benevento, 1756; died 1844.

PACE, RICHARD, paice, a learned English divine, and dean of St. Paul's, London, was employed by Henry VIII. in several embassies; but Wolsey, being jealous of his rising merit, procured his disgrace. He was held in great esteem by the most learned men of his time, particularly Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, and Cardinal Pole. Some Commentaries upon the Scriptures were written by him.

Born 1482; died 1532.

PAARL, paarl, a division of the western province of Cape Colony, South Africa, and the great wine-producing district. The chief streams are the Great and Little Berg. Area, 660 square miles. Pop. 15,700.

PAARL, the chief town of the above division. 38 miles E. of Cape Town, with which it is connected by railway. There are many pleasant residences, with good gardens. Pop. 5,000.—A settlement was made here early in the 18th century, and many French Huguenot refugees were among the first residents.

PACHECO, JUAN DE, pa-chaï'-ko, marquis de Villena, the favourite and prime minister of Henry IV., king of Castile. His authority was so great that he disposed at pleasure of all places in the kingdom. Louis XI. of France corrupted him by a pension, and this perfidious minister betrayed his master's interests in the peace of 1443, by many articles prejudicial to the kingdom of Castile. Henry, having discovered his treachery, reproached him with it, which so provoked Pacheco that he conspired against him, and proclaimed prince Alphonso king of Castile, in 1465. But this unscrupulous minister caused the young king to be poisoned soon afterwards, and was reconciled to Henry, whose favour he retained till his death.

Died 1473.

PACHECO, FRANCISCO, a Spanish painter and censor of pictures. In 1618 he received the appointment of censor of pictures by the Inquisition, it being one of his duties to prohibit the sale of pictures containing any nude figures. It is to his lessons that the great Velasquez owed much of his great skill as a painter. A portrait of Cervantes was one of his best works.

Born at Seville, 1571; died at the same city, 1654.

PACHOMIUS, pa-ko'-me-us, an Egyptian monk, who founded the first monastic institution at Tabenna, an island in the Nile. He also established, under the presidency of his sister, the first convent for nuns. He wrote some works of a fanciful and mystical character.

Died about 348.

PACHUCA, pa-tchoo'-ka, a town of the republic of Mexico, situated 8,100 feet above the sea level, 50 miles N.E. of Mexico. Some of the oldest mining works in Mexico are here. Pop. 5,000.

PACHYMERUS, GEORGE, păk'-i-meer'-us, a Greek writer, whose talents procured him the favour of Michael Palæologus, who conferred on him several offices in church and state. He wrote a valuable History of the East, which is inserted in the collection of Byzantine historians, and was published at Rome in 1669 with a Latin translation.

Born at Nicæa, 1242; died 1310.

PACIFIC, pa-sif'-ik, a name given by the Spaniards to the sea which lies between Asia and America. At the equator, which is its widest part, it is 10,000 miles across. Its area is computed at upwards of 80,000,000 square miles, which is more than all the dry land on the globe. There are two "sargassos," or weedy seas, one to the south-east of New Zealand, and another about 15° W. of San Francisco. The more important currents are the southern Pacific, rising to the south of Tasmania, flowing eastward, and dividing into two branches about lon. 98° W., the southern branch again dividing into the cold current of Peru; the equatorial current, which sweeps across the whole ocean from east to west, and subdivides into two branches, one of which flows through the Polynesian archipelago and past the east coast of Australia, and the other northward towards Japan and Kamschatka. The first European who saw the Pacific was Balboa, in 1513, and the first who traversed it was Maghaelan. Very little was known of it previous to the Voyages of Captain Cook.

PACIFIC, a county of Washington territory, United States. Area, 1,140 square miles. Pop. 800. The chief place is Oystervillc.

PACINI, GIOVANNI, pa-che'-ne, Italian musical composer, studied at Rome, Bologna, and Venice; his first opera, "Annetta," being produced at the latter town when he was only 18 years of age. Altogether he composed more than 30 operas, besides quartettes and other pieces. In 1836 he was appointed director of the conservatory at Viareggio.

Born at Syracuse, 1796; died at Pescia, 1867.

PACORUS, pak'-o-rus, son of Orodes, king of Parthia, signalised himself by the defeat of Crassus, whose army he nearly cut to pieces, B.C. 53. He embraced the cause of Pompey, and declared himself for the assassins of Cæsar. After ravaging Syria and Judæa, Ventidius defeated Pacorus, who was slain in the battle, B.C. 39.

PADDINGTON. (See LONDON.)

PADANG, pa-dang', a Dutch government of the west coast of Sumatra. It is divided into the residences of Upper Padang, Lower Padang, and Taponeoli. The two former are divided by a chain of mountains, some nearly 10,000 feet high, including the active volcano of Merapie. Some of the most beautiful scenery in the island is in the upper district, and coffee (in great quantities), cocoa-nut trees, pepper, indigo, caoutchouc, and other tropical products are cultivated, and there is a trade in camphor, tortoise-shell, trepang, birds' nests, wax, and oil. Gold, iron, copper, lead, and quicksilver are found.

PADANG, capital of the above government. The government buildings are on the right bank of the river of the same name. There are a Protestant and a Roman Catholic church, a fort, military hospital, government workshops, warehouses, and good schools. The houses of the natives, made of bamboos, are on the opposite side of the river. The roadstead is about three miles distant. A good trade is carried on with the interior of the island, Java, other islands of the Eastern Archipelago, and Europe. Pop. 12,000. Lat. 59° S. Lon. 100° 20′ E.

PADERBORN, pa'-der-born, a town of Prussia, province of Westphalia, at the source of the Pader, which rises in considerable volume. The town is old, with narrow streets. The cathedral is a fine building, erected in the early part of the 12th century, and has two noble façades. In it is the silver coffin containing the remains of St. Liborius. The town is the seat of a bishopric, and has an ecclesiastical seminary and a gymnasium. The town was founded by Charlemagne, and during the middle ages was a free imperial city, and one of the most important of the Hanseatic towns. In 1803 it was attached to Prussia, was afterwards a part of the kingdom of Westphalia, and restored to Prussia in 1813. Manf. Tobacco, starch, hats, and sugar. There is a considerable trade in cattle, corn, and oil. Pop. 14,000.

PADIHAM, pad'-i-ham, a township of Lancashire, 9 miles N.E. of Blackburn. Manf. Cotton. There are coal-mines and quarries in the neighbourhood. Pop. 8,983.—A station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire railway.

PADILLA, DON JUAN DE, pa-dil'-la, Spanish military hero, descended from an ancient family of Toledo. He was appointed military commander of Saragossa, by the emperor Charles V., but headed a formidable revolt of the inhabitants of some of the principal towns, occasioned by the excessive taxes imposed by the emperor for the purpose of carrying on the war with Germany, the Netherlands, and Italy. The insurgents were known as Communeros. For a time they were successful, and Padilla carried on the government, but in 1521 he was defeated by the royalists at Villalos, taken prisoner, and beheaded. After his death his wife defended Toledo for a considerable time against the besieging army, and then retired to Portugal. The pair are celebrated in many Spanish ballads and poems.
Died 1522.

PADUA, pad'-u-a (Ital. PADOVA, pa'-do-va), province of Italy, north of the Adige. It is generally flat, very fertile, and well watered, and many cattle and sheep are reared. Copper and building stone are found. Area, 805 square miles. Pop. 411,448.

PADUA, a city of Italy, capital of the above province, situate on the Bacchiglione, near the junction of the Brenta, 22 miles S.W. of Venice. It is surrounded by a mound and broad ditch, and is traversed by several canals; but the streets are narrow, dark, dirty, and ill-paved. There are several handsome gates, especially those of San Giovanni, Savonarola, and Falconetti, and some large squares, the finest being the Prato della Valle, which is planted with trees and surrounded by a stream. The houses are in general lofty and well built, and several of the public edifices are of magnificent architecture. The municipal palace, built between 1172 and 1219, is an immense building, in the form of an oblong quadrangle, and is supported by galleries resting on marble pillars. The interior contains some fresco paintings and a bust of Livy. The roof is said to be the largest unsupported by pillars in the world. The Café Redrocchi, in the Prato della Valle, is esteemed to be one of the finest edifices in Italy. It occupies the site of a Roman edifice, the marbles of which form the pavement of the chief court. The churches, monasteries, and convents are numerous. The Duomo, cathedral, the church of Sant' Antonio, remarkable for its splendid interior decorations, and the churches of San Giorgio and Santa Giustina (both highly decorated and adorned with pictures and sculpture), are among the finest of the ecclesiastical edifices. The Baptistery, a fine Lombard building, of the 12th century. The university, founded in the 13th century, was, at one time, celebrated throughout Europe. Its buildings may be classed among the finest of the kind, and include a museum and fine library. There are here, also, other literary and scientific institutions, in particular the Academy of Sciences, founded by the senate of Venice. Manf. Woollens, silk, ribbons, and leather. Pop. 69,658.—The city occupies the site of the Roman Patavium, and, according to Latin legend, was founded by the Trojan chief Antenor. It was destroyed by the Goths under Attila, and again by the Lombards, but was rebuilt, and became one of the most famous Italian cities. At the university here, Tasso and Columbus were educated. It is the birthplace of Livy and Belzoni, the traveller. In 1857 an earthquake overthrew a large part of the town and destroyed many of the inhabitants.

PADUCAH, pa-du'-kah, a city of Kentucky, United States, on the south bank of the Ohio, near the confluence of the Tennessee. There are 15 churches, ship-yards, and extensive manufacturing establishments, and a large trade is carried on, the rivers and several lines of railway offering great facilities. Pop. 8,036.

PAER, FERDINAND, pa'-air, Italian musical composer, who produced an opera, entitled "Circe," at Venice, when only in his 10th year. After visiting Padua, Naples, and Rome, in each of which cities he composed musical works, he returned to Parma, where the grand-duke bestowed a pension upon him. In 1795 he went to Vienna, and afterwards to Dresden, where he was appointed chapel-master. Having been introduced to Napoleon, after the battle of Jena, the emperor took him into his service, and, at a subsequent date, nominated him imperial composer and conductor of chamber music to the empress Maria Theresa. At the restoration of the Bourbons he became director of the Italian Opera of Paris; but lost the post in 1818, through professional intrigue. Paer was a voluminous composer; some of his works, such as "Griselda" and "Agnesi," ranking very high. He was a member of the French Institute.
Born at Parma, 1774; died at Paris, 1839.

PAEZ, FRANCISCO, pa'-ez, a Spanish Jesuit, who at the age of 24 was sent as a missionary to Abyssinia, but was captured on the way by pirates, and not liberated for seven years, when he was ransomed by the viceroy of India. In 1603 he again started for Abyssinia, and reached Massowa, where he acquired the native language, translating into it a compendium of Christian doctrine. He was the first European to visit the sources of the Blue Nile. He wrote several works relative to the history of Abyssinia.

Born near Valladolid, 1564; died in Abyssinia, about 1620.

PAEZ, JOSÉ ANTONIO, a Venezuelan soldier and politician, who, at the age of 20, collected a band of followers and defeated the Spanish troops. He was soon afterwards made commander of the revolutionary forces, and gained several important victories, afterwards acting in concert with Bolivar. When the new government of Columbia was formed, he represented Venezuela in the senate, but was impeached, and then put himself at the head of the army, and the party opposed to the constitution. In 1829 Venezuela was declared independent, and Paez became president. In 1848, his successor, Monagas, endeavoured to usurp the supreme authority, and Paez took command of the revolutionary army, but was captured and exiled, and went to New York. The overthrow of Monagas in 1858 led to his return, and he was appointed minister to the United States, but resigned in 1861. He was then invested with supreme authority, but failing to restore a state of order, returned to New York, afterwards residing in the Argentine republic and Peru.

Born near Acarigua, Venezuela, 1790; died at New York, 1873.

PAGAN, BLAISE FRANCIS, count of, pa'-ga, French mathematician and military engineer. He bore arms in his youth, and demonstrated great valour during the campaigns in Italy and Flanders. Louis XIII. made him a general, and sent him as envoy to Portugal in 1642. The same year he became entirely blind, by the loss of his eye at the siege of Montauban, having before been deprived of the sight of the other by illness. He then turned his attention to mathematical studies, and wrote a treatise on Fortifications, "Geometrical Theorems," "Theory of the Planets," "Astronomical Tables," "An Historical Relation of the River of the Amazons."

Born at Avignon, 1604; died at Paris, 1665.

PAGANI, GREGORIO, pa-ga'-ne, an eminent Italian painter, of Florence, whose pictures have been sometimes taken for those of Michael-Angelo Buonarotti.

Born at Florence, 1558; died at the same city, 1605.

PAGANINI, NICOLO, pa-ga-ne'-ne, Italian violinist, whose talents were so precocious, that, at the age of 8 years, he played in a church at Genoa, and at the public concerts. He was subsequently placed under Costa, an eminent violoncellist, and received lessons in harmony from the composer Paer. He was next invited to Lucca by Eliza Baciochi, sister of Napoleon I., to assume the direction of the court concerts. Subsequently he made a tour over Europe, exciting everywhere the greatest enthusiasm. After producing an enormous sensation at Paris, in 1831, he went to London, where he demanded, and occasionally received, enormous sums for his services. His great power over the violin was only excelled by his thirst for gold; in one instance, his avarice led him to demand £1,000 for three performances, which terms were rejected. Paganini was a marvellous performer: the purity of his tone, his feeling, harmony, and expression, were perfection; but his habit of playing upon one string, although an extraordinary feat, savoured too much of sleight-of-hand to be creditable to so great an artist. His harsh and eccentric character would seem to have made him many enemies. At Vienna he was charged with having murdered his wife; but he demanded proofs of his ever having had one; then he was accused of having stabbed his mistress, which charge he also refuted. At his death he left a fortune of upwards of £200,000, which devolved upon his son, sisters, and mother.

Born at Genoa, 1784; died at Nice, 1840.

PAGE, paige, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 19,667. The capital is Clarinda.

PAGE, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 250 square miles. Pop. 9,965. The capital is Luray.

PAGET, WILLIAM, first Lord, pa'-jet, was the son of a serjeant-at-mace in the reign of Henry VIII., who, taking favourable notice of the son, made him clerk of the signet, afterwards of the council, and of the privy seal. In these employments he conducted himself with so much discretion and skill, that Henry sent him as ambassador to the French court, and on his return conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. He also made him secretary of state, and appointed him one of the executors of his will. At the beginning of the reign of Edward VI., he was sent on an embassy to the emperor Charles V.; and on his return received fresh dignities, of which he was deprived and sent to the Tower, in consequence of his connection with the Protector, duke of Somerset, who had, in 1552, raised him to the peerage as Lord Paget of Beaudesert. Paget was reinstated in his employments by Queen Mary, and continued in favour (but took no share in public business) during the reign of Elizabeth, although he was a strict Roman Catholic.

Born 1506; died 1564.

PAGO, pa'-go, an island of Dalmatia, Austrian empire, in the Adriatic, in the Gulf of Quarnero, opposite to the coast of Croatia. It exports wine and salt. The chief town is of the same name. Area, 84 square miles. Pop. 4,600.

PAGO, a town of Naples, 12 miles from Ariano. Pop. 2,400.

PAGSANJAN, pag-san'-jan, a town of the island of Luzon, in the Philippines, on the Pasig, above Manilla. A considerable trade is carried on. Pop. 4,700.

PAHANG, pa-hang', a territory in the south-east part of the peninsula of Malacca. The interior is very little known. The coast is an alternation of rocky precipices and swamps. There are many small islands. The rajah, though nominally subordinate to the rajah of Jahore, is virtually independent. Pop. 16,000.

PAHLANPUR, pa-lan-poor', a state of India, tributary to the Gaekwar of Baroda, but protected by a British resident. The products are wheat, rice, sugar, and cotton. Pop. 216,000, mostly Hindoos. Lat. 23° 57'—24° 41' N. Lon. 71° 51'—72° 45' E.

PAHLANPUR, capital of the above state, a walled town, 260 miles S.E. of Hyderabad. It is a place of considerable trade and manufacturing industry. Pop. 17,000.

PAIMBŒUF, pain(g)-buf', a port of France, department Loire-Inférieure, on the left bank of the Loire (here about 3 miles broad), 22 miles N.W. of Nantes. There are a custom-house, school of navigation, large docks, with ship-building yards, and a commodious harbour. Manf. Sails, rope, marine stores, bricks, and tiles. There is a large trade in grain, wine, and timber. Pop. 3,500.

PAINE, THOMAS, pain, an English advocate of revolutionary and infidel opinions, who was the son of a Quaker, was brought up to the trade of a staymaker, and was afterwards an exciseman. Having drawn up a statement of grievances under which his fellow excisemen laboured, it was submitted to one of the commissioners, who was so struck by the excellence of the style in which the paper was written, that he gave Paine a letter of introduction to Benjamin Franklin. The latter recommended him to emigrate to America. Thither he accordingly went; and, after contributing articles to the periodicals for a short time, became editor of the "Philadelphia Magazine" in 1775. In the following year he produced a work entitled "Common Sense," of which Burke afterwards spoke as "that celebrated pamphlet which prepared the minds of the people for independence." This small work was the means of obtaining for its author the sum of £500 from the legislature of Pennsylvania, the M.A. degree from the university of that province, and the membership of the American Philosophical Society. Whilst the American war was in progress, he produced a series of patriotic appeals to the people; and in 1781 he was chosen to accompany Colonel Lawrence to France, in order to negotiate a loan. In this affair he was perfectly successful, and, upon his return to America in 1785, he obtained the appointment of clerk to the Assembly of Philadelphia, a gift of 3,000 dollars, and a small estate near New Rochelle. Upon the conclusion of the war, he engaged in some mechanical speculations, the prosecution of which led him first to Paris and afterwards to London. There he remained during several years, and in 1791-2 published his "Rights of Man," in answer to Burke's "Reflections on the French revolution." This work was proclaimed as a "false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and Paine, as its author, was brought to trial in the court of King's Bench. Notwithstanding an eloquent defence made for him by the Hon. Thomas Erskine, he was found guilty. Paine, however, contrived to effect his escape to France, where he became the deputy for the department of Pas-de-Calais to the National Convention, but having written a pamphlet in favour of preserving the life of Louis XVI., and proposing that he should accept an asylum in America, he was thrown into prison by Robespierre; upon whose fall he was restored to liberty. He remained in France until the year 1802, his pen constantly engaged in producing social, political, and theological works, the best known of which is "The Age of Reason," an attack on revealed religion. In 1802 his friend Mr. Jefferson, who had been elected president of the United States, offered Paine a passage to America in a sloop of war, which Paine accepted. The latter years of his life were spent in producing works upon finance, the building of ships of war, iron bridges, &c. Several years after his death, Cobbett caused his remains to be brought to England, where he expected to find them greeted with enthusiasm; but the undertaking brought only ridicule upon himself. In his political writings, Paine displayed a clear and vigorous style; but his religious treatises are coarse, and very deficient in scholarship.

Born at Thetford, Norfolk, 1737; died in America, 1809.

PAINESVILLE, pains'-vil, capital of Lake county, Ohio, United States, on the Grand river, 3 miles from Lake Erie. Manf. Leather, iron, and locomotive engines. The town has suffered greatly from disastrous fires. Pop. 3,800.

PAINSWICK, pains'-wik, a market-town of Gloucestershire, on a brook which runs into the Stroud, 6 miles S.E. of Gloucester. The church has a tower and spire 174 feet high. Manf. Woollen cloth. There are freestone quarries in the vicinity. Pop. 5,019.

PAISIELLO, GIOVANNI, pai'-se-ail'-lo, Italian musical composer. He was sent, at an early age, to the Jesuits' College of Tarento, to receive his education, and manifested such a decided taste for the musical art, that his father was prevailed upon to place him at the Conservatory at Naples, where the future composer made great progress under the tuition of the eminent musician Durante. He afterwards resided at St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Naples, and in 1802 went to Paris as chapel-master to Napoleon when first consul; for whom, also, when he constituted himself emperor, Paisiello produced a coronation "Te Deum." After spending nearly three years in Paris, he returned to Naples, and when Joseph Bonaparte became king, he nominated the composer to several high appointments, affixing to them a high salary. Napoleon I. created him chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and the French Institute elected him an associate. He was the composer of 90 operas, many masses, cantatas, and other musical pieces, marked by graceful melodies. Besides being a composer of remarkable power, he was an excellent scholar and generally accomplished man.

Born at Tarento, 1741; died at Naples, 1816.

PAISLEY, pais'-le, a municipal and parliamentary borough, and manufacturing town of Scotland, in Renfrewshire, on the White Cart, here crossed by three bridges, near its junction with the Clyde, 7 miles S.W. of Glasgow. It stretches out on both sides of the river, which divides it into the Old and New towns. The Old town consists of a number of large and small streets; and the principal street of the New town is composed of elegant modern houses. The most ancient ecclesiastical structure, and the chief architectural ornament of the town, is the Abbey, founded about the middle of the 12th century, for Cluniac monks, by Walter, high steward of Scotland, ancestor of the Stuarts. The nave, with its aisles, is in good repair, and constitutes the church of the abbey parish of Paisley a collegiate charge. It contains the ancient monuments of Marjory Bruce, daughter of King Robert II., and various other royal remains. The building was thoroughly restored in 1862, and there are fine stained glass windows. There are about 30 other places of worship for various denominations. The County Buildings, a quadrangular building in the castellated style, a very fine new town hall, the Neilson Educational Institute, in the form of a cross, with a fine dome; the Grammar School, founded by James VI., the present building being modern; the free public library and museum, the school of design, and the infirmary, are among the chief public buildings. There is a pleasure-ground, known as the Fountain Gardens. There are numerous charitable associations and institutions. Manf. Cotton thread (very extensive), tartan cloth, shawls, handkerchiefs, carpets, soap, starch, corn flour, and machinery. There are ship-building yards. Pop. 47,521.—A station on the Glasgow and South-Western and Caledonian railways.

PAKS, paks, a market-town of Hungary, on the Danube, 60 miles from Buda. Pop. 9,000.

PALACKEY, FRANTISEK (or Francis), pa-lak'-e, Bohemian historian and philologist, studied at Presburg and Vienna, and before he was 20 years of age he published "Principles of Bohemian Poetry." In 1823 he settled at Prague; in 1830 produced "Estimate of Bohemian Historians," for which he received the prize of the Bohemian Society of Sciences, and in the following year was appointed historiographer to the states of Bohemia, and undertook the compilation of a general history of the country. In 1848 he took an active part in politics, as leader of the Slav, or national party, at the Diet of Kremsier, and in 1861 became a member of the Austrian Reichsrath. In 1872 his "Political Testament" appeared. His great work, "History of Bohémia," greatly offended the German and Catholic critics. He wrote also on æsthetic and philological subjects, and a history of the Mongol invasion of 1241.

Born at Hodstavitz, Moravia, 1798; died 1876.

PALÆMON, RHEMMIUS, pa-lē'-mon, a celebrated Roman grammarian, was originally a slave in the reign of Tiberius; but, by attending his master's son to the academy, he acquired so much knowledge that his master gave him his freedom. He then became a preceptor, and gained great reputation as a rhetorician and poet.

Lived in the 1st century.

PALÆOLOGUS, pal-e-ol'-o-gus, an illustrious Byzantine family, several members of which attained the imperial dignity. The most eminent were Michael VIII., Andronicus II., Michael IX., Andronicus III., John VI., Andronicus IV., Manuel II., John VII., and Constantine XIII. (See separate headings.)

PALÆPHATUS, pa-lē'-fa-tus, a Greek philosopher, of whom remains a treatise "On Incredible Things," in which he endeavoured to explain the mythical fables. The date at which he lived is uncertain.

PALAFURGELL, pal-a-fur'-gel, a town of Spain, province of Gerona, 20 miles S.E. of the town of that name. Manf. Corks. Pop. 3,600.

PALAFOX, JUAN DE, pal'-a-fox, a Spanish prelate and historian, who studied at Salamanca, after which he was appointed a member of the council of war, and next of that of the Indies; but renouncing civil distinctions for the ecclesiastical state, he was made a bishop in Spanish America, with the title of judge of the administration of the three viceroys of the Indies. While there he administered justice with strict impartiality; but, through the intrigues of the Jesuits, he was compelled to return to Spain. He wrote the "History of the Siege of Fontarabia," "History of the Conquest of China by the Tartars," and some religious works.

Born in Aragon, 1600; died 1659.

PALAFOX Y MELZI, DON JOSÉ DE, Duke Saragossa, Spanish general. He was a member of a distinguished family of Aragon, and after the imprisonment of Ferdinand VII., at Bayonne, by the treachery of Napoleon, Palafox heroically defended Saragossa, against the French, one of the most brilliant incidents of the Franco-Spanish war. On the surrender of the town, he was taken prisoner, and, although suffering from illness, was treated with great hardship in the dungeons of Versailles. On his release, in 1813, he returned to Spain, and was appointed captain-general of Aragon. In 1836 he was created duke of Saragossa, and grandee of Spain.

Born 1780; died at Madrid, 1847.

PALAGONIA, pal-a-go-nē'-a, a town of Sicily, province of Catania, 21 miles S.W. of the town of that name. Pop. 4,900.

PALAMEDES, pal'-a-mē'-dēes, in Greek legend, a chief, son of Nauplius, king of Eubœa. He was sent by the Greek princes going to the Trojan war, to bring Ulysses to the camp, who, to avoid the expedition, pretended insanity, and used to sow salt instead of barley, in the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes, and to demonstrate it, he took Telemachus, his son, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulysses showed that he was not insane, by turning the plough a different way, not to hurt his child. This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war; but a mortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca bribed one of his servants, and made him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this, Ulysses forged a letter, which king Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes, desiring that, according to the conditions which were previously agreed upon when he received the money, he should betray the Grecian army. This letter was carried before the Grecian princes. Palamedes was summoned and protested his innocence, but vainly, as the money was discovered in his tent. He was found guilty by all the army, and stoned to death. Homer, however, is silent as to the miserable fate of Palamedes. Palamedes was a learned man, as well as a soldier, and, according to some, he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of some letters, and it is said that he was the first who ranged an army in regular line of battle, placed sentinels round the camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watchword.

PALANPORE, pal-an-poor', a town of India, in Guzerat, the capital of a small Mahometan principality, tributary to the Gaekwar of Baroda. Manf. Chintz counterpanes. Pop. 17,000.

PALAPRAT, JOHN DE BIGOT, pal'-a-pra, a French comic poet and lawyer. He distinguished himself at the bar, was made chief of the consistory in 1684, and was also employed in state affairs, which he discharged with reputation.

Born at Toulouse, 1650; died at Paris, 1721.

PALATINATE, or RHEIN PFALZ, pa-lat'-i-nat, sometimes known as the Lower Palatinate, or the Palatinate-on-the-Rhine, a province of Bavaria, extending along the left bank of the Rhine, and one of the most productive parts of Germany. Area, 2,293 square miles. Pop. 677,281.

PALATINATE, UPPER, or OBERPFALZ, a province of Bavaria. Area, 3,732 square miles. Pop. 528,564.—The Palatinate, the old name of these two provinces, have suffered more dynastic changes, and more disasters from war, than any other part of Germany, perhaps of Europe.

PALAUR, pa-lor', a river of India, rising in Mysore, and falling into the Bay of Bengal, 50 miles S. of Madras, after a course of about 220 miles.

PALAWAN, or PARAGOA, pal-a-wan', an island of the Asiatic archipelago, one of the Philippines. It is 270 miles long, with a breadth of 40; mountainous, with the coast flat. It is fertile, and produces gold and various kinds of fine wood. The capital is Tatay. Only a few places on the coast acknowledge the Spanish rule, and the inhabitants generally are in a savage condition. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 8° 37′ and 11° 30′ N. Lon. between 117° and 120° E.

PALAYE, N. DE LA CURNE, pa-lai', a French historical writer, who became a member of the French Academy, and that of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. He wrote "Memoirs of Ancient Chivalry," a work of curious research, and was also the author of a "Memoir upon the Chronicle of Glahor," in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions.

Born at Auxerre, 1697; died at Paris, 1781.

PALAZZOLO, pa-lats-o'-lo, a town of Italy, province of Brescia, on both sides of the Oglio, 18 miles W. of Brescia. There are a very fine parish church, and an old castle. Manf. Silk and leather. A good trade in corn is carried on. Pop. 2,700.

PALAZZOLO, a town of Sicily, 19 miles W. of Syracuse. There are many interesting remains in the vicinity. Pop. 11,500.

PALEARIUS, AONIUS, pal-e-air'-i-us, a learned Italian writer, who, after studying at different places, became professor of Greek and Latin at Sienna; but being suspected of Lutheranism, he found it necessary to withdraw to Lucca, and thence to Milan, where he was arrested and sent to Rome. The Inquisition caused him to be burnt for heresy in 1570. He wrote a Latin poem on the "Immortality of the Soul," and some theological works, which were condemned by the council of Trent.

Died 1570.

PALEMBANG, pal-em-bang', a Dutch residency, formerly an independent kingdom, on the east coast of Sumatra. There are mountains rising to 6,000 feet in the southern part, but in other districts there are extensive swamps, and almost impenetrable bush. Rice, cotton, sugar, pepper, and tobacco are cultivated; and in the forests are gutta percha and satinwood trees. The wild animals include elephants, rhinoceroses, tigers, leopards, panthers, deer, wild boars, goats, and monkeys. The climate, except in the swampy districts, is not unhealthy. Pop. 619,453. The natives are of Javanese and Malayan origin, and in the north-west interior is a tribe known as the Koeboes, who are in a very savage condition.

PALEMBANG, chief town of the above, extending five miles along the river Moesi, and other streams which fall into it, 52 miles from its mouth in Banca Strait. The river is wide and deep, so that vessels of large size can reach the harbour. The chief houses are floating buildings, communicating with one another by boats. The fort is built on the left bank of the river. The principal mosque is a pretty large building, nearly square, and covered with a pavilion roof of tiles. The houses of the common people are made of bamboos, with mats, and thatched. Manf. Cotton fabrics, embroidered silk stuffs, jewellery, and cutlery. The foreign trade is very important. Pop. 44,000, of whom 3,000 are Chinese, and 2,000 Arabians.

PALENCIA, pa-len'-shea, a province of Spain, part of the old province of Old Castile, bounded N. by Santander, E. by Burgos, S. by Valladolid, and W. by Leon. The soil is fertile, producing grain, vegetables, and fruit. Many sheep and goats are reared.

Rivers.—The Carrion, Cieza, Pisuerga, and several small streams.
Minerals.—Copper, chalk, gypsum, and saltpetre.
Area.—1,733 square miles.
Pop.—189,587.

PALENCIA, capital of the above province, on the Carrion, 30 miles N.E. of Valladolid. It is surrounded by old walls, 36 feet high and 9 feet thick, round which are public promenades. The cathedral, in the Gothic style, was built between 1321 and 1504, and there are five churches and several convents. Manf. Blankets and coarse woollens, candles, and earthenware. The vine is cultivated in the vicinity, and there is a good trade in wool. Pop. 14,493.—This town was besieged by the Black Prince, and was defended so bravely by the women, that Juan I. allowed them to wear a golden band in their head-gear in commemoration.

PALENQUE, pa-len'-ke, a ruined city of unknown, but very remote, origin, on a branch of the Usumasinta, in the state of Chiapos, Mexico. The ruins occupy a very large area, and are almost completely covered with dense tropical vegetation. One building is 228 feet long, 180 feet deep, and 25 feet high, standing on a pyramidal foundation. There are other large buildings, supposed to have been temples, and colossal figures, carved slabs with figures in relief, and hieroglyphs. The ruins were discovered in 1750, and are evidently the remains of a great city belonging to a people long anterior to the Mexicans, or any of the other inhabitants of the American continent, known to the European discoverers of the New World.

PALERMO, pa-lair'-mo, an archiepiscopal city and seaport of Sicily, the capital of the island and of a province of the same name, situate on the north coast, in a rich valley, known as La Conca d'Oro, "the Golden Shell," presenting the appearance of a magnificent garden filled with fruit-trees and watered by rivulets, and backed by mountains. The principal streets are spacious and handsome, and the houses have in general something striking in their architecture. The two principal streets are the Via Vittoria Emanuele (formerly the Cassaro), and the Strada Nuova, which intersect each other at right angles, dividing the city, in a manner, into four equal parts. Their point of intersection forms an open octagonal space, called, from its shape, the Ottangolo. Each of the eight sides of this open space is formed by a beautiful building, three stories high, composed of the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian orders. Of the other streets few are deserving attention; most of them being narrow, winding, and dirty, and built without the least regard to regularity. The town is upwards of four miles in circumference, is surrounded by walls, with 12 gates, and defended by batteries. The most frequented of the public walks of Palermo is the Marina, a raised platform or terrace, extending above a mile along the bay. At the extremity of this walk there is a delightful public garden, called the Flora, to which people of all ranks are admitted. The public edifices are numerous, among the most remarkable being the royal palace, a vast irregular pile, with a beautiful chapel, built in 1129, contains many beautiful pillars and mosaics with Arabic inscriptions. In the magnificence of its churches, Palermo is second only to Rome. There are 8 abbeys, 60 parish churches, 19 oratories, and 71 monasteries and convents. The cathedral (St. Rosalie), erected in the 12th century, was originally Gothic, but Greek additions have been made. It contains monuments of the emperor Frederick II., and of Roger, founder of the Norman monarchy in Sicily. The church of St. Giuseppe is profusely and richly ornamented, and contains some fine columns of grey Sicilian marble, nearly 60 feet high. There are several hospitals and numerous schools. The university is an extensive building, and was founded in 1806. There are an academy of arts and sciences, a medical academy, public libraries and theatres. The climate of Palermo is one of the most delightful in the world.

Manf.—Cottons, gloves, silks, oilcloth, leather, straw hats, paper, and chemicals. The mole, forming the harbour, stretches above a quarter of a mile into the sea, and has a lighthouse and battery.
Lat.—38° 6' N. Lon. 13° 20' E.

History.—Palermo is of great antiquity, having been the ancient Panormus, a Phœnician colony, and afterwards in possession of the Carthaginians and Romans. The Saracens made it the capital of their Sicilian territories. The Normans took it in 1072, and in 1282 it was the scene of the massacre called the Sicilian Vespers. From 1806 to 1815 it was the residence of the court of Naples, and in 1860 was bombarded by the troops of Garibaldi. In October of the same year its inhabitants voted for annexation to Sardinia.

PALERMO, a north-western province of the island of Sicily, Italy. The coast is irregular and the surface hilly, but there are many very fertile valleys. Area, 1,964 square miles. Pop. 730,280.

PALESTINE, or HOLY LAND, pal'-es-tine, a country of south-western Asia, comprising the southern portion of Syria, and included within the limits of the Turkish empire, forming the modern pashalics of Acre and Gaza, and the southern part of the pashalic of Damascus. The greater part of Palestine displays luxuriant fertility, and is traversed from N. to S. by the chain of LEBANON and ANTI-LEBANON. South of the Lebanon range is a central table-land, divided longitudinally by the remarkable valley through which the Jordan flows, and by other remarkable clefts, leaving partially isolated masses, like that on which Jerusalem stands. The greatest elevations are Hebron, 3,029 feet; Jerusalem, 2,610; Mount of Olives, 2,724; Safed, 2,775; Gerizim, 2,700; and Tabor, 1,900. The descent on the eastern side is steep and rugged. On the west the Carmel range extends from the central plateau, in a north-western direction to the Mediterranean, terminating in a bold headland known as Mount Carmel. Farther south the slope is gradual to the fertile vale of Sharon, and farther south the plain of Philistia, about 15 miles in width, and famous for four thousand years as a corn-growing district of astonishing fertility. The great plain of Esdraelon extends across the centre of the country, from the Mediterranean to the Jordan. The climate is very varied, but the extreme heat of summer is modified by the sea breezes. Fruits of nearly every kind are abundant, and the flowers are particularly varied and brilliant. The vine, fig, olive, and mulberry, are cultivated.

Rivers.—The Jordan is the only stream of importance. The most important lakes are Tiberias (Gennesareth), and the Dead Sea.

Pop.—Unascertained, but comprising Syrians, Turks, Arabs, and about 10,000 Jews, who almost all live in the holy cities of Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed.

Lat.—31° 13′—33° 20′ S. Lon. 34° 30′—35° 30′ N.

Divisions and Chief Towns.—The country is now divided into seven districts—El-Kads, including Jerusalem and Jericho; El-Khalel, including Hebron and the southern part of Judea; Gaza, in the south, on the coast; Loudd; Nablous, in which the ancient Samaria is included; Areta, comprising Mount Carmel, and part of the plain of Esdraelon; and Safed, nearly identical with ancient Galilee.

History.—This is the country in which the principal events recorded in the Scriptures took place. In the 6th century it fell under the sway of the Mahometans, and afterwards of the Turks, which gave occasion to the Crusades. Jerusalem was taken by the European forces, and was, under Godfrey of Boulogne, erected into a Latin kingdom, which endured for above eighty years, during which the Holy Land streamed continually with Christian and Saracen blood. In 1187 Judæa was conquered by Saladin, on the decline of whose kingdom it passed through various hands, till, in 1517, it was finally absorbed in the Turkish empire.

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI PIETRO DA, surnamed, pal'-lais-tre'-na, Italian composer, whose surname was taken from the place of his birth. His musical education was completed under Claude Goudimel, an eminent French musician, and a Huguenot, who was one of the victims of St. Bartholomew. In 1551 Palestrina became chapel-master to Pope Julius III., but lost the post, in consequence of being a married man, when Paul IV. obtained the tiara, in 1555. After remaining for some time in a poor and neglected condition, he obtained the office of director of chapel music to Santa Maria Maggiore. The council of Trent having resolved to reform the music of the Church, by getting rid of the vulgar melodies which had crept into the sacred service, Palestrina was engaged to write a mass of a grand and solemn nature. He entered upon his task with religious enthusiasm, and produced a work which set a great example for later musicians to follow, and which is one of the most beautiful masses to be found in the whole catalogue of Roman Catholic church music. Soon after he had completed this mass, he was reinstated in his former post at the Vatican. The subsequent years of his life were spent in composing sacred music for the Romish church. His works are considered to form a very important epoch in the history of music. After death, his remains were interred in St. Peter's, and were attended by the most distinguished persons in Rome.

Born near Rome, 1529; died in the same city, 1594.

PALESTRINA, an episcopal city of Italy, partly on the site of an ancient and very splendid city, 23 miles S.E. of Rome. There are a palace of the Barberini, built in the 15th century, and a fine church, Santa Rosalia. Pop. 6,000.

PALEY, DR. WILLIAM, pal'-le, a learned English divine and theological writer, who received his elementary education under his father, who was master of Giggleswick school, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He was afterwards sent to Christ's College, Cambridge, where, in 1763, he took the degree of B.A., and was elected fellow in 1766. In the following year he was ordained priest. He distinguished himself as a tutor, and became the friend of Dr. Law, bishop of Carlisle, who gave him a living in Cumberland, and afterwards that of Appleby, in Westmoreland. He also obtained a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Carlisle, with the living of Dalston. About 1780 he became chancellor of Carlisle. In 1785 he published his "Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy." His next work, published in 1790, was "Horæ Paulinæ," or observations upon the epistles of St. Paul; in which he establishes a comparison between the epistles and the history of the apostle as given in the Acts; and from the term the "undesigned coincidences," seeks to prove the genuineness of revealed religion. His "View of the Evidences of Christianity" appeared in 1794. After this, Dr. Paley obtained a prebend of St. Paul's from the bishop of London, the sub-deanery of Lincoln from the bishop of that diocese, and the living of Bishop-Wearmouth from the bishop of Durham. To the last-mentioned prelate he dedicated his book entitled "Natural Theology," which was given to the world in 1802.

Born at Peterborough, 1743; died 1805.

PALGRAVE, SIR FRANCIS, pal'-graiv, historian and historical antiquary. He was of Jewish parentage, being the son of Mr. Cohen, a London stockbroker, but changed his name to Palgrave on his marriage. He was brought up in a solicitor's office, and first became known in literature as the editor of some antiquarian works published under the sanction of the commissioners of public records. He was called to the bar in 1827, obtaining a considerable practice, especially in cases of disputed pedigree. In 1831 he produced a valuable little work, entitled "History of England,—Anglo-Saxon Period," for the series named "The Family Library;" and in the following year was knighted for his services to constitutional and parliamentary literature. His valuable "Rise and Progress of the English Commonwealth,—Anglo-Saxon Period; containing the Anglo-Saxon Policy and the Institutions arising out of the Laws and Usages which prevailed before the Conquest," was produced in the same year. In the preliminary inquiries which led to the reform act of the municipal corporations of England and Wales, he took, as one of the commissioners, an energetic and distinguished part, and in 1838 was appointed deputy keeper of her majesty's records. Whilst worthily filling that post, he published a series of works of the greatest value to the students of English literature; some of the most important of which were, "Calendars and Inventories of the Treasury of the Exchequer," "Documents illustrating the History of Scotland," "Truths and Fictions of the Middle Ages," an imaginary history of Marco Polo, the traveller, and Friar Bacon, and a "Handbook for Northern Italy." He also contributed to the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews. The first volume of his greatest work, the "History of Normandy and England," was given to the public in 1851, and another volume in 1857, but was incomplete at the time of his death.

Born in London, 1788; died 1861.

PALINURUS, pal-i-nu'-rus, in classical legend, a skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and agitation of the sea, and at last came safe to the sea-shore, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him. Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, saw Palinurus, and assured him that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed, should be adorned with a monument, and bear his name.

PALISSY, BERNARD, pa'-lis-se, French potter and chemist who, for his ingenuity in painting on glass and other works, was patronised by Henry III., who endeavoured to persuade him to become a Roman catholic. But Palissy was an inflexible Calvinist, and would not comply; and was specially exempted by the queen from the massacre of St. Bartholomew. He devoted 16 years and reduced himself to extreme poverty, to the discovery of the secret of producing the white enamel which gave such beauty to the Faïence porcelain. He was at length rewarded, and achieved fame and fortune. He also wrote several works upon natural philosophy, and upon subjects connected with the art of pottery. In 1575 he delivered a course of lectures on natural history and physics, and many of his theories have been confirmed by subsequent investigations; and he was the first in France who formed a collection of objects of natural history. His pottery has become celebrated and few things are more prized by connoisseurs than the famous "Palissy ware." In 1588 he was arrested as a heretic, and imprisoned in the Bastille, where he died.

Born at Agen, 1510; died 1590.

PALLADIO, ANDREA, pal-la'-de-o, a celebrated Italian architect. He at first commenced the study of the art of sculpture, but Trissino, the poet, advised him to apply himself to architecture, and sent him three times to Rome, where Palladio studied and designed after the ancient monuments of that city. In these pursuits he discovered the true principles of an art which, in his time, was buried in Gothic barbarity. Among the noble structures which this illustrious architect built, one of the principal is the theatre called the Olimpico, at Vicenza. He published a valuable treatise on architecture in 1570, in folio, with plates; and after his death was published a work of his on the antiquities of ancient Rome.

Born at Vicenza, 1518; died 1580.

PALLADIUS, pal-la'-di-us, an early Christian father, who became a hermit in 388, and in 401 was chosen bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia. For his attachment to St. Chrysostom, he was greatly persecuted, and driven from his diocese. At the desire of Lausus, governor of Cappadocia, he wrote the "History of Anchorets." There is also attributed to him a life of Chrysostom, in a dialogue, Greek and Latin.

Born about 367.

PALLANZA, pal-lant'-za, a town of northern Italy, province of Novara, on Lago Maggiore, 32 miles N.W. of Novara. There are several handsome churches, an ancient tower, used as a belfry, two convents, a town-house, barrack, and college. Manf. Cotton, silk, and starch. There is a trade in horses and cattle. Pop. 3,600.

PALLAS, pal'-las, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, over whom he had so great an ascendancy, as to persuade him to espouse Agrippina, his niece, and to adopt Nero for his successor. Pallas, in concert with Agrippina, is charged with having hastened the death of Claudius by poison. Nero subsequently caused him to be secretly put to death, confiscated his treasure, amounting to upwards of two millions sterling; but erected a superb monument to his memory. Pallas was brother to the Felix before whom St. Paul pleaded.

Lived in the 1st century.

PALLAS, a name of Minerva. (See MINERVA.)

PALLAS, PETER SIMON, pal'-las, German naturalist and traveller, son of a physician at Berlin, and educated for the medical profession. In his youth he evinced a great aptitude for the acquirement of languages, and for any knowledge bearing upon the natural sciences. After studying at the universities of Berlin, Göttingen, and Leyden, he proceeded to London in 1761, and there assiduously studied the collections of natural history. In 1768 he went to the Hague, and published a work upon zoology, which acquired him a great reputation, and led to an invitation from the empress Catherine to St. Petersburg. Thither he proceeded in 1768, and was appointed professor of natural history in the Imperial Academy of Sciences. Shortly afterwards he was one of the members of the expedition for observing the transit of Venus, dispatched to northern Russia and Siberia, for the purpose of investigating the natural history of those regions. After an absence of six years, during which his companions and himself penetrated as far as the frontiers of China, he returned to St. Petersburg in 1774, with a fine collection of specimens of natural history (which formed the nucleus of the museum of the Academy of St. Petersburg), and a large mass of notes and observations, to arrange and publish which, cost him several years of intense application. For his services he was ennobled, and appointed preceptor to the grand-dukes Alexander and Constantine. In 1794 he proceeded to the newly-conquered province of the Crimea, where he resided during fifteen years, busily engaged in accumulating facts and preparing his scientific works for publication. At length, feeling the advance of age, he requested permission to return to Germany; and this being granted, he arrived at Berlin after an absence of forty-two years. Pallas was an untiring observer of natural phenomena, and a most voluminous writer. The most valuable of his works are: "Travels through different Provinces of the Russian Empire;" an uncompleted work on the animals of European and Asiatic Russia, entitled "Zoographia Russo-Asiatica;" a "History of the Mongolian Nations;" and "Travels through the Southern Provinces of the Russian Empire." He likewise contributed a number of papers on geology and natural history to the Transactions of the Academy of St. Petersburg, and to those of the Royal Society of London and the Institute of France, of which learned bodies he was a member.

Born at Berlin, 1741; died at the same city, 1811.

PALLAVICINO, PIETRO SFORZA, pal'-la-ve-che'-no, Italian cardinal and historian. Though the elder son of a noble family, he renounced the advantages of birth, and entered the order of the Jesuits. After his novitiate, he professed philosophy and theology in his society. Innocent X. employed him in several important affairs, and in 1657 Alexander VII. made him cardinal. His principal work is a "History of the Council of Trent," written in opposition to that of father Sarpi. The style is good, but the book is partial. He was also the author of a treatise on style in written composition, a philosophical treatise on happiness, a tragedy, "Ermengilda," and other works.

Born at Rome, 1607; died at the same city, 1667.

PALLAVICINO, FERRANTE, an Italian writer. He became a canon regular of the order of St. Augustine, but fell into licentious habits, and supported himself by writing immoral books. Having written some satires against pope Urban VIII. and his relatives the Barberini, he found it expedient to retire to Venice, as a price was set upon his head. A Frenchman, who pretended to be his friend, persuaded him to go to France, promising him a brilliant career. Ferrante followed his advice, but was no sooner out of the Venetian territory, than he was seized and conducted to Avignon, where he was put to death. The man who had betrayed him was assassinated some time afterwards by a friend of Pallavicino. His works were printed at Venice. The principal is entitled, "The Celestial Divorce; or, the Separation of Christ from the Roman Church."

Born at Parma, 1615; died 1644.

PALLI, pal'-le, a town of India, in Joudpore, on the right bank of the Luni. It is the seat of an extensive trade, especially in opium and European manufactured goods. Pop. 50,000.

PALLISER, SIR HUGH, pal'-li-ser, an English admiral, who early in life distinguished himself in the navy, and was made post-captain in 1746. He was at the taking of Quebec, and was made comptroller of the navy, and created a baronet in 1773. Serving as second in command under admiral Keppel, in the famous engagement off Ushant, July, 1778, a misunderstanding arose between them, and sir Hugh preferred a charge against admiral Keppel, who was acquitted. Sir Hugh was then tried in his turn and reprimanded. He was, however, a brave and experienced officer, and became governor of Greenwich Hospital.

Born 1721; died at Greenwich, 1796.

PALLISER'S ISLANDS, a cluster of islands in the South Pacific Ocean. Lat. 15° S. Lon. 145° W.

PALM, JOHANN PHILIPP, palm, a bookseller of Nuremberg, who in 1806, published a pamphlet, "Germany in its Lowest Humiliation," which was very severe on Napoleon, and exposed the conduct of the French troops in Bavaria. For this he was arrested, and having been examined before marshal Bernadotte was sent to Brunau, and tried by an extraordinary court-martial, which condemned him to death. He was not permitted to have an advocate, and all intercession was in vain. The orders of the emperor Napoleon were positive, and Palm was shot two or three hours after the sentence was pronounced. Subscriptions were raised for his family at St. Petersburg, the emperor and empress of Russia contributing; and in England and many of the principal German towns.

Born at Schorndorf, 1766; died 1806.

PALMA, pal'-ma, the most north-western of the CANARY ISLANDS. It is 33 miles long, by 15 broad. It is mountainous and volcanic, the highest point being the peak called Roque, 8,426 feet above sea level. A very large crater, 13 miles in circumference, is in the northern part. There are extensive pine forests, as well as good timber for shipbuilding. The coasts are very fertile. The chief products are the vine, almonds, honey, and wax. The sugar-cane is also successfully cultivated, and the inhabitants are engaged in the fishery on their coasts. Manf. Silks, satin, and ribbons. Pop. 35,000. Lat. 28° 51′ N. Lon. 17° 53′ W.

PALMA, the capital of the island of Majorca, in the Mediterranean, on the south-west coast of the island, at the bottom of a large bay, formed by the two capes Blanco and Figuera. It is surrounded by walls, flanked with bastions. Some of the streets are narrow and ill-paved, but those in the lower part of the town, and all the squares, are spacious and regular. Most of the houses are in the Moorish style of architecture, and some are built of marble. Of the public buildings the most conspicuous is the cathedral, a large and handsome Gothic building, with a very graceful spire, known as "the angels' tower," and the church of St. Michael is still more ancient, and served for a mosque under the Moors. The exchange is a beautiful Gothic building, and there are, besides, the governor's palace, an arsenal, barracks, a state prison, several convents, and important educational institutions, including an academy of medicine and surgery, a college for poor young men studying for the church, a college for ladies, and the Colegio de Pureza, also for females. There are two public libraries and a picture gallery. The harbour has a mole of nearly half a mile in length. There are shipbuilding yards for the small "lateen" vessels. Manf. Woollens, silk, thread, cordage, soap, and glass. Pop. 58,224. Lat. 42° 49′ 57″ N. Lon. 1° 39′ 28″ W.

PALMA, a town of Spain, province of Cordova, at the confluence of the Guadalquivor and the Gerril, 30 miles S.W. of Cordova. It is well built, with broad streets. Manf. Oil, soap, earthenware, and bricks. There is a trade in grain, oil, fruit, cattle, and timber. Pop. 5,500.

PALMA, a town of Italy, province of Caserta, 4 miles S.E. of Ada. There are a castle, three churches, and two convents. Pop. 5,800.

PALMA, a town of Sicily, province of Girgenti, 14 miles S.E. of the town of that name. There are several churches, and on a hill to the west of the town, the strongly-fortified castle of Monte Chiaro. Pop. 11,000.

PALMA LA, a town of Spain, province of Huelva, on the Pescaderia and Muladar, 30 miles

W. of Seville. The church has a fine tower, 150 feet high. Pop. 3,600, chiefly engaged in agriculture.

PALMA (NUOVA), a town of Italy, province of Venezia, 56 miles N.E. of Venice. It is regularly fortified. A considerable trade in silk is carried on. Pop. 4,200.

PALMA (SANTA CRUZ DE LA), capital of the island of Palma, in the Canaries, situated on a spacious bay of the east coast. The church of St. Salvador is very handsome, with three naves, and highly ornamented. There are several monasteries, a town-house, a foundling hospital, schools, and two public fountains. Manf. Silk fabrics, including ribbons, stockings, purses, and gloves, and sweetmeats. There are shipbuilding yards. Pop. 5,700.

PALMAS, or LUGAR DE SAN JUAN, a town of Spain, province of Murcia, 3 miles S. of the town of that name. Pop. 6,000.

PALLANTIDES, the 50 sons of Pallas.

PALMBLAD, VILHELM FREDERICK, palm'-blad, Swedish author. He studied at the university of Upsala, and while there issued several literary and scientific publications which attracted great attention. With the aid of other writers he endeavoured to discourage the taste for the French literature and style which was then so prevalent in Swedish literary and artistic circles. He was appointed professor of history and geography, and afterwards of Greek literature, in the university of Upsala. He wrote educational works on history and geography, several novels, and edited a great work on Swedish biography, besides contributing to German encyclopædias.

Born at Liljested, East Gotland, 1788; died 1852.

PALMERSTON, HENRY JOHN TEMPLE, Viscount, pa'-mer-ston, a modern English statesman, whose family, the Temples, were descended from a Saxon earl, anterior to the Conquest, although the title belongs to the Irish peerage, the family having removed to Ireland in the time of Elizabeth. He was sent first to Harrow school, afterwards to the university of Edinburgh, and finally to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took an M.A. degree. In his 21st year he succeeded his father as viscount, and sought to enter the House of Commons as the Tory representative of the university of Cambridge in succession to Pitt, but was defeated by lord Henry Petty, afterwards marquis of Lansdowne. Shortly afterwards, however, he was returned to parliament for the borough of Newport, his colleague being Arthur Wellesley, afterwards duke of Wellington, and in 1811 he succeeded in securing the suffrages of the university of Cambridge, for which he sat for twenty years, losing his seat when he became a member of earl Grey's administration, and supported the Reform Bill. He then for two years represented the now extinct borough of Bletchingly. From the very outset of his parliamentary career, his ability and business talents were conspicuous, and in 1807, although only in his 25th year, he became a junior lord of the Treasury in the Tory administration of the duke of Portland and Mr. Perceval. In the following year he made his first great speech in parliament, in opposition to a motion of Mr. Ponsonby for the production of papers relative to lord Cathcart's expedition to Copenhagen. In 1809 he was appointed secretary at war, upon the resignation of lord Castlereagh. In this office he remained through the various Tory administrations for nearly twenty years. But in this interval his political views had undergone considerable modification, and after Canning's death he found himself unfitted for co-operation with the Tories. Between May 1828, and March 1830, he was without office, and as an independent member, signalised himself so much upon foreign questions, that, when the Whigs came into power, he received the appointment of foreign secretary, and kept it until the year 1834. After the fall of the Conservative ministry of sir Robert Peel, in the following year, lord Palmerston again resumed his functions in the Foreign Office. He remained in office until 1841, and it was during these six years that the name of Palmerston became so celebrated as a foreign minister. Throughout the continent from Spain to Turkey, his name represented the power and influence of England,—an object of fear and execration with some governments, of admiration with others; synonymous with alertness, brilliancy, and foresight with all. Between the years 1841—1846, he was in opposition to the Conservative ministry of sir Robert Peel; but in the last mentioned year he was again appointed foreign secretary under the Whig administration of lord John Russell. In 1850, the affair of don Pacifico and the quarrel with Greece, for which Palmerston, as foreign minister, was chiefly responsible, led to the proposition of a vote of censure, in 1850, and the debate lasted four nights, and Palmerston defended himself successfully in a speech of five hours' duration, and the vote was rejected. It was on this occasion that sir Robert Peel said, "We are all proud of him." His too ready acknowledgment of the coup d'état effected by Louis Napoleon in 1851, led to serious differences between himself and his colleagues, and, in consequence, he was compelled to resign. His secession, however, speedily led to the fall of the Russell ministry, and upon the accession of the Coalition administration, in the following year, he took the office of home secretary. The mismanagement of affairs in the Crimea brought about the fall of the Coalition ministry in 1855, immediately after which lord Palmerston became first lord of the Treasury, and prime minister of Great Britain. In 1857 Mr. Cobden carried a motion condemnatory of the Chinese war, against the ministry. Palmerston appealed to the country, and the general election gave him a great majority. His too great deference to the wishes of Napoleon III., in the matter of the "Conspiracy Bill," introduced to the House of Commons shortly after the attempt upon the life of the emperor of the French by Orsini and others, aroused strong feelings against his cabinet, and before that expression of public indignation he was compelled to retire, in 1858, and to give place to the Conservative ministry of lord Derby. In 1859, however, he overcame the Conservative party, and returned to power as premier, an office he held until his death. He was, notwithstanding the vigorous opposition he frequently encountered, one of the most popular of English ministers. Witty and genial, as well as vigorous, manly in tastes and habits (exhibiting even in his 80th year remarkable physical vigour), "ready to hit hard and then forget all about it" (to quote his own words), he had no personal enemies. As a speaker he was practical rather than rhetorical, but capable of great occasional effects. For many years he represented Tiverton in the House of Commons. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. In 1839 he married the widow of earl Cowper, and sister of lord Melbourne, a lady who fully shared his popularity.

Born at Broadlands, Hampshire, 1784; died at Brockett Hall, Herts, 1865.

PALMI, pal'-me, a town of Italy, province of Reggio, on the Gulf of Gioja, 21 miles N.E. of Reggio. In the centre of the town is a fine square, in which the principal streets terminate. Manf. Silk. Pop. 9,800.

PALMYRA, pal-mi'-ra, an ancient city of Asia (the Hebrew Tadmor), situate in the heart of the desert of Syria, now a mass of splendid ruins, 120 miles N.E. of Damascus. It was almost destroyed by the Romans in 275, and the work was completed by the Saracens in 740. Its site was long unknown, until the spot was at last penetrated by some European travellers. It had an immense temple dedicated to the sun, of which 60 columns out of 390 still remain. Lat. 34° 18′ N. Lon. 38° 13′ E.

PALO ALTO, pal'-lo al'-to, a county of Iowa, United States. Area, 576 square miles. Pop. 4,131. The capital is Emmetsburg.

PALO PINTA, pin-ta, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 974 square miles. Pop. 5,885. The capital is Palo Pinta.

PALOTA, pa-lo'-ta, a market town of Hungary, 13 miles W. of Stuhlweissenberg. There are two churches, a synagogue, and a handsome chateau. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 5,900.

PALSGRAVE, JOHN, pals'-graiv, an English divine, who studied at Cambridge and at Paris, and became tutor in the French language to the princess Mary, on her marriage with Louis XII. of France; and after his return to his own country he obtained some preferment. He translated a Latin comedy, called "Acolastus," into English.
Born 1480; died 1554.

PAMAKASSAN, pam'-a-kas-san', a central district of the island of Madura, Indian Archipelago, nominally a kingdom, but really a dependency of the Dutch provinces in Java. Pop. 18,000.

PAMAKASSAN, chief town of the above district. There are a palace of the native prince, and a mosque. A good trade is carried on. Pop. 5,000.

PAMIERS, pa'-me-ai, a town of France, department Ariège, on the Ariège, 10 miles N. of Foix. It is well built, with wide streets, has a cathedral, seven other churches, an episcopal palace, Carmelite convent, town-hall, and college. Manf. Worsted, cotton, serge, hosiery, paper, files, and nails. Pop. 7,800.

PAMIR, pa-mir', an extensive table-land of Central Asia. Its highest point, called by the natives the "roof of the world," is in lat. 37° 27′ N., lon. 73° 40′ E. (See AGRA).

PAMLICO SOUND, pam'-li-ko, a large bay on the coast of North Carolina, United States, 80 miles long, and from 10 to 30 broad. It is separated from the Atlantic by a beach of sand, hardly a mile wide, generally covered with small trees or bushes, through which are several small inlets. This sound communicates with Core and Albemarle sounds, and receives the Pamlico and Neuse rivers.

PAMLICO, a new county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 6,323. The capital is Vanderman.

PAMPANGA, pam-pan'-ga, a province of the island of Luzon, in the Philippines. It is very beautiful and fertile, especially in the coast regions. The chief river, which bears the same name, joins the Quingos. Rice, cotton, tobacco, and indigo are cultivated, and fruit is very abundant. Pop. 226,309.

PAMPAS, pam'-pas. (See SOUTH AMERICA.)

PAMPELUNA, or PAMPLONA, pam-pai-loo'-na, a fortified town in the north of Spain, and capital of the province of Navarre, on the left bank of the Arga, 200 miles N.E. of Madrid. It stands partly on an eminence, partly on a plain, and is surrounded by mountains at some distance from it. Its principal defence are two castles, one on the inside, the other on the outside of the walls: the latter is the citadel, of great strength, of pentagonal form, each side being 1000 feet long. The principal edifices are the cathedral, churches, monasteries, and palaces of the viceroy. It has, besides, a promenade, and public fountains, supplied by a splendid aqueduct, 2,300 feet long, 65 feet high, and having 97 arches, and an arena for bull fights, which will hold 10,000 persons. Manf. Linen and leather. There is a trade in wine. Pop. 25,630.—The ancient name (from which the present name is derived) was Pompeiopolis, it having been rebuilt by the sons of Pompey. Under the Moors it was named Bambilonah, the origin of Pamplona. In 1813, Pampeluna was the scene of obstinate fighting between the British and French, and surrendered to the former.

PAMPHILUS, pam'-fi-lus, a painter of Macedon, who flourished under king Philip. He was the first who applied the laws of proportion and of perspective to his art, which he honoured by his manners and his talents. He founded a school at Sicyon, the most famous of all the ancient academies of painting, and procured an edict that none but those of noble birth should be instructed in painting. The same law was afterwards extended throughout Greece. Apelles was the disciple of this master.
Lived in the 4th century B.C.

PAMPHILUS, ST., bishop and martyr of Cæsarea, in Palestine, to which city he presented a library, consisting of most of the works of the ancients. He transcribed the Bible with his own hand, and with the utmost exactness.
Died 309.

PAMPHILUS. (See EUSEBIUS.)

PAMPHYLIA, pam-fi'-li-a, anciently a country on the south coast of Asia Minor. (See ASIA MINOR.)

PAMPLONA, pam-plo'-na, a town of South America, New Granada, in the department of Boyaca, 200 miles from Bogata. It has several churches and convents. Pop. 3,500.—In the neighbourhood are gold and silver mines.

PAMPUR, pam-poor', a town of Cashmere, on the left bank of the Jailum, 7 miles S.E. of Cashmere. There are a bazaar and two mahometan shrines. The town is surrounded by luxuriant orchards, and saffron is extensively grown in the district.

PAN, pan, in greek mythology the god of shepherds, of huntsmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the son of Mercury, according to Homer. Pan, however, was a monster in appearance: he had two small horns on his head; his complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were those of a goat. His education was entrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, but who, according to Homer, was so terrified at the sight of the monster, that she fled from him. He was wrapped up in the skins of beasts by his father, and carried to Heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themselves with the oddity of his appearance. There Bacchus gave him the name of Pan. The god of shepherds chiefly resided in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with seven reeds, and was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and captivated Diana by transforming himself into a beautiful white goat. The worship of Pan was well established, particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on Mount Lycæus. His festivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of Lupercalia. The worship and the different functions of Pan are derived from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians. Some modern writers consider Pan to have been a personification of the universe, taking his name to be equivalent to pan, "the whole," from which comes the system of Pantheism.

PANÆTIUS, pa-ne'-shi-us, a Stoic philosopher of Rhodes. He studied at Athens, under Diogenes the Stoic, with such credit as to be offered the rights of citizenship, which he refused, saying, "A modest man is content with one country." He afterwards went to Rome where he had numerous disciples; among the rest, Lælius, Scipio, and Polybius. Panætius accompanied Scipio in his expeditions, and rendered eminent services to the Rhodians by his interest with that commander. Cicero mentions a work of his on the duties of man, which is lost.

Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

PANAGURISHTA, or OTLUK-KUI, pan'-a-goo-rish'-ta, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, province of Tatar-Bazardjik. Pop. 15,000.—In 1876 about 3,000 of the inhabitants, mostly women and children, were massacred, many having previously been subjected to revolting outrages by the Turkish irregular troops, ostensibly engaged in suppressing a slight insurrection.

PANAMA, pan-a-ma', one of the states of the republic of Colombia, South America, comprising the isthmus of the same name. The coast line on the Atlantic is about 420 miles long, and on the Pacific 650 miles. It is divided into the provinces of Panama, Azuero, Chiriqui, and Veraquas.

PANAMA, a city and seaport, capital of the above state, on the southern shore of the isthmus, at the head of the bay of the same name, and occupying a strip of land stretching out a considerable distance into the sea. The harbour is safe, but only vessels of small size can approach the shore, larger ships anchoring about three miles distant. There are a very fine cathedral, a college, and several convents. The city is the Pacific terminus of the Panama railway, 40 miles long, connecting Panama with Aspinwall on the Atlantic coast, and completed in 1855. There is a trade in pearls, mother of pearl, shells, and gold-dust. Pop. 25,000, of mixed races.—The ruins of the old city, founded in 1518 by the Spaniards, as the seat of colonial government, are about 6 miles to the north-east of the present city. It was sacked and destroyed by the buccaneer Morgan.

PANAMA, ISTHMUS OF, connects Central and South America. It is traversed by a range of mountains, forming the boundary between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the highest peak being Picacho (7,200 feet), in the western part. On the north, or Atlantic coast, the chief harbours are Chiriqui, San Blas, Escoces, and Caledonia; on the south, or Pacific side, San Miguel, Golfa Dulce, and Damas (in the island of Coiba). The Bay, or Gulf of Panama, 120 miles wide, and of equal length, is on the Pacific side, and off that coast are several beautiful islands, the most important being Coiba, and Las Perlas, so named from the pearl fisheries carried on. The climate in the coast districts is very unhealthy. Maize, rice, plantains, and tropical fruits and vegetables are cultivated. The exports, of the annual value of about £500,000, consist chiefly of cotton, india-rubber, panama grass hats, and matting.

River.—The Tuira, 162 miles long, falling into the Gulf of Panama.

Area.—31,500 square miles.

Pop.—285,000.

History.—The Atlantic coast of the isthmus was discovered by Columbus in 1502, and the isthmus was crossed in 1513 by Bilboa. A Scotch settlement, known as the Darien settlement, was formed in 1698, by Paterson, the founder of the Bank of England, on the Atlantic coast, but it proved a failure.

PANAY, pa-nai', the most central of the Philippine Islands. It is nearly triangular in form, the sides being about 110 and 100 miles long. It is mountainous in parts, but has a remarkably fertile soil. There are large forests of fine timber, with large herds of buffaloes, wild oxen, stags, and boars. The birds are remarkable for beauty of plumage. Large crops of maize, rice, sugar, coffee, cotton, tobacco, and pimento are raised. The inhabitants are industrious and intelligent. The women weave beautiful tissues, remarkable for elegant designs and rich and varied colours. Many of the men are good sailors. There are three provinces, Copiz, Iloilo, and Antique. The capital is ILOILO. Pop. 453,000.

PANCKOUCKE, CHARLES JOSEPH, pan-kook'. He was a publisher at Paris, and his knowledge of typography made him celebrated all over Europe. He established the "Moniteur" newspaper and the celebrated "Encyclopédie Méthodique." His works are, "Mathematical Memoirs," addressed to the Academy of Sciences; translations of Lucretius, of Tasso's "Jerusalem," and of the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto; a "Philosophical Discourse on Beauty," and another on "Pleasure and Grief."

Born at Lille, 1736; died at Paris, 1799.

PANCSOVA; pan-cho'-vo, a town of the Austrian empire, on the military frontier, near the mouth of the Temes, on the Danube, 8 miles N.E. of Belgrade. It is a military station. Manf. Silk and brandy. A good trade is carried on in cattle, pigs, and corn. Pop. 14,000.

PANDARUS, pan'-da-rus, in Homeric legend, a son of Lycaon, who broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans; he also wounded Menelaus and Diomedes; but was at last killed by Diomedes. Æneas then carried him off in his chariot, and, attempting to revenge his death, nearly perished by the hand of the furious enemy.

PANDERMA, pan-der'-ma, a town of Turkey in Asia, near the south shore of the Sea of Marmora. There is regular steamboat communication with Constantinople, and an active trade is carried on. Pop. 4,000, chiefly Greeks.

PANDORA, pan-do'-ra, in Greek Hesiodic theogony, the name of the first mortal female. She was fashioned of clay by Hephæstus, at the request of Zeus, who wished to punish the impiety of Prometheus by giving him a wife. When the clay statue became imbued with life, all the gods vied with each other in making her presents, from which is derived her name, which signifies the recipient of every gift. Subsequently, Jupiter gave her a box to present to the man who married her, and she was conducted to Prometheus. But that subtle mortal, sensible of the deceit, would not allow himself to be captivated by her charms. His brother, Epimetheus, was not possessed of the same prudence. He married Pandora, and, upon opening the box which she presented to him, there issued from it a multitude of evils, which dispersed themselves over the world, and began to afflict the human race. Hope, however, remained at the bottom of the casket, to render, says the poet, troubles and sorrows less painful in life. Another version of the legend says it was Prometheus who opened the box.

PANGASINAN, pan-gas'-i-nan, a province of the island of Luzon, in the Philippines, to the north-west of the Philippines. It is very fertile, and highly cultivated, producing abundant crops of rice and indigo, which are exported. Gold is found in the sands of the rivers. Manf. Cabinet-work and jewellery; and ship-building is successfully carried on. The capital is LINGAGEN, or LINGAYEN. Pop. 293,291.

PANIGAROLO, FRANCISCO, pa'-ne-ga-ro-lo, an eminent Italian prelate, whom Sixtus V. created bishop of Asti, and sent with Bellarmine and cardinal Gaetano to France, to strengthen the party of the League against Henry IV. On that occasion Panigarolo displayed great zeal and eloquence. On his return, he set about reforming his diocese, which is said to have given such offence, that he was poisoned. He was the author of some fine sermons, which were printed at Rome; but his principal work is a treatise on the eloquence of the pulpit, under the title of "Il Predicatore."
Born at Milan, 1548; died 1594.

PANIN, NAKITA IVANOWITZ, pa-nin', Count de, a Russian statesman. His father, who was lieutenant-general in the service of Peter I., came originally from Lucca, in Italy. Panin commenced his career in the cavalry-guards of the empress Elizabeth; but having secured the patronage of the prince Kourakin, he became gentleman of the chamber. By his address he gained the favour of his sovereign, who sent him, in 1747, to Copenhagen, and afterwards to Stockholm, with the title of minister plenipotentiary. On his return he was made governor of the grand-duke Paul, and lastly prime minister to Catherine II. He was a man of considerable powers and enlarged views, and during his stay in Sweden he conceived a great admiration of the more liberal form of government existing in that kingdom, and which he afterwards attempted to introduce in Russia, but without success.
Born 1718; died 1782.

PANINI, PAUL, pa-ne'-ne, an Italian painter, who painted architectural subjects with great accuracy and beauty, and decorated the palace of the kings of Sardinia at Rivoli.
Born at Piacenza, 1691; died 1764.

PANINI, pan'-in-e, a grammarian of ancient India, whose work on the Sanscrit language is still the great authority. Nothing certain is known of his personal history, beyond that he was a native of the north-western part of Attock, on the Indus.
Lived probably in the 6th century B.C.

PANIPUT, or PANEEPUT, pan-i-poot', a town of British India, in the Punjab, province of Delhi, 54 miles N.W. of Delhi, in the midst of a very fertile country. It is an important station on the great military road between the Punjab and Afghanistan, and has been the scene of several great battles, especially in 1526, when Baber obtained the victory, which made him emperor of India, the first of the Great Mogul dynasty; and in 1761, when the ruler of Afghanistan destroyed the power of the warlike Mahrattas. Pop. 25,022.

PANIZZI, ANTONIO, SIR, pa-nit'-se, librarian of the British Museum, was educated for the legal profession at Reggio and Parma. Seriously compromised in the Italian troubles of 1821, he was compelled to seek an asylum in England, where, through the interest of lord Brougham and Mr. Roscoe, he obtained the appointment of professor of Italian literature in the University of London. In 1831 he was nominated assistant-librarian at the British Museum; and in 1856 became principal librarian of the same institution, which, under his excellent supervision, vastly improved. The reading-room, the finest in the world, was designed by him. He edited the Orlandos of Boiardo and Ariosto, with memoirs and literary notes, and a collection of the reprints of the first four editions of Dante, and also contributed to periodical literature. In 1866 he retired on a pension, and three years afterwards received the order of K.C.B. [1879.
Born at Brescello, Modena, 1797; died in London,

PANNAH, or PUNNAH, pan'-na, a town of British India, division of Allahabad, North-Western Provinces, in an elevated situation, 115 miles S.W. of Allahabad. It is mostly in a ruinous condition, though once a splendid city, with a beautiful palace of the rajahs. A great number of monkeys occupy the deserted houses. In the vicinity are diamond mines, formerly a source of great wealth, but now little valued.

PANNONIA, pan-no'-ne-a, a province of the ancient Roman empire, including part of modern Hungary, Slavonia, Bosnia, Croatia, Casmola, Styria, and Lower Austria.

PANOLA, pan'-o-la, a county of Mississippi, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 28,352. more than half being coloured. The capital is Panola.

PANOLA, a county of Texas, United States. Area, 750 square miles. Pop. 12,219., about 4,000 being coloured. The capital is Carthage.

PANTELLARIA, pan-tel'-a-re'-a, the ancient Cossyra, a small island in the Mediterranean, belonging to Sicily, and situate between that island and the coast of Africa. It has a circuit of about 30 miles, is volcanic, and produces grapes of excellent quality, other fruits, and corn. It is also distinguished for a fine breed of asses. The chief town is Oppidolo, in the north-west. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 36° 45' 40" N. Lon. 18° 26' 25" E.

PANTEN. (See PARIS.)

PAOLA, pa'-o-la, a town of Italy, province of Cosenza, on a height near the sea, 12 miles N.W. of Cosenza. It is defended on the side of the sea by a fortress and two towers. Manf. Woollens, silks, and earthenware. Pop. 6,800.

PAOLI, PASQUALE DE', pa'-o-le, Corsican patriot, whose father Hyacinth was, in 1735, elected one of the chief magistrates of the island, and subsequently acted as a leader in the revolt against the Genoese. On being compelled to quit Corsica in 1739, he retired to Naples with Pasquale, who was placed in the military college of that city. After serving for a short time as lieutenant in the Neapolitan army, he was invited by the Corsicans to become their captain-general. In 1755 he put himself at the head of his countrymen, and, during twelve years, waged a fierce war with the Genoese, who were in the end driven from almost every fort in the island. He established a legislative assembly, in which sat 500 deputies, elected by the country. This assembly elected an executive body of nine members, of which Paoli was the president, with the title of general of the kingdom, and chief of the supreme magistracy of Corsica. He organised a well-trained militia of 30,000 men, and established a fleet, which constantly harassed the Genoese vessels. Genoa, however, gave up the island to France in 1768; and soon afterwards a large force was landed, under the command of count Marbœuf, against whom Paoli and his followers fought desperately, and in two engagements defeated the French with great slaughter. But large reinforcements arriving to the French, the Corsicans were totally routed at Pontenuovo; whereupon the island submitted. Paoli went first to Leghorn and afterwards to England, where he remained until 1789, in which year, Mirabeau having moved in the National Assembly the recall of all Corsican patriots, Paoli repaired to Paris. He was received with enthusiasm in the French capital, and was created by Louis XVI. military commandant in Corsica. Whilst the government of France was monarchical, Paoli remained faithful; but at the outbreak of the Revolution, he requested the assistance of the English in driving the French out of Corsica. The crown of the kingdom was subsequently offered to the king of Great Britain, and sir Gilbert Elliot named viceroy. The Corsicans had desired that Paoli should have been appointed to that office; and to avoid dissensions, the patriot quitted the island and went to England, and resided in London until his death, living upon a pension allowed him by the British government. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory.

Born at Morosaglia, Corsica, 1726; died near London, 1807.

PAOLUCCIO, PAUL ANAFESTO, pa'-o-loo'-cho, the first doge of Venice, before whose time the republic was governed by tribunes chosen every year. The Venetians elected Paoluccio doge in 697.

Died 717.

PAPA, pa-pa', a market town of Hungary, in a beautiful district on the Tapolcza, 60 miles S.E. of Presburg. There are a large castle, catholic and Lutheran churches, and colleges, and an hospital. Manf. Paper, glass, and stoneware. There is a trade in wine. Pop. 14,500.

PAPAL STATES, PONTIFICAL STATES, or STATES OF THE CHURCH. A former division of Italy, united under the sovereignty of the pope, comprising the modern provinces of Ancona, Arcoli, Pieeno, Bologna, Ferrari, Forli, Macerata, Pesare, and Urbino Ravenna, and Rome. (See ITALY.)

PAPASQUIARO, pa'-pa-ske-ar'-o, a town of Mexico, department of Durango, on the left bank of the Culiacan, 62 miles N.W. of Durango. Pop. 5,000.

PAPENBURG, pa'-pen-boorg, a town of Prussia, province of Hanover, district of Osnabruck, 27 miles S.E. of Emden, on the bank of a canal navigable for sea-going vessels, and a considerable trade is carried on. Manf. Sail-cloth and rope. Pop. 6,200.

PAPHLAGONIA, paf-la-go'-ne-a, an ancient province in the north of Asia Minor. (See ASIA MINOR.)

PAPIAS, pai'-pe-as, one of the early Christian writers, and bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia. He was an associate of Polycarp, who had been a disciple of the apostle John, and a millenarian, or believer in the visible reign of Christ upon earth one thousand years before the resurrection. He was the author of some commentaries upon Scripture, fragments of which are preserved in the writings of Irenæus, Eusebius, and others. It is said that he suffered martyrdom at Pergamus.

Died 163.

PAPIN, DENIS, pap-a(ng)', French physical philosopher, and one of the inventors of the application of steam power. He studied medicine at Paris, and practised there as a physician, but obtained celebrity by his investigations into the action of heat on fluids. He visited England in 1681, and became a member of the Royal Society. In 1687, he became professor of mathematics at the university of Marburg, Hesse-Cassel. He first adopted the piston for the purpose of producing motion, and invented the safety valve. He made many other discoveries in physical science. A statue was erected to his memory at Blois, in August, 1880.

Born at Blois, 1647; died at Marburg, 1714.

PAPINEAU, LOUIS JOSEPH, pap'-e-no, Canadian politician, educated for the bar, and entered the provincial parliament at the age of 22. In 1815 he was elected speaker of the house. He was afterwards the leader of the radical party, and in 1823 went to England to remonstrate against the union of Upper and Lower Canada. In 1827, notwithstanding the objection of lord Dalhousie, the governor-general, he was re-elected speaker, and prepared the famous 92 resolutions expressing the grievances and demands of his countrymen. When, in 1836, Lower Canada broke out into rebellion, he supported the views of the liberal party, but did not take up arms. On the defeat of the rebels, his arrest for high treason was ordered, but he took refuge in the United States, and afterwards went to Paris, where he lived for eight years. In 1847, a general amnesty having been proclaimed, he returned to Canada, and was again elected member of parliament. In 1854 he retired from public life.

Born near Montreal, 1789; died near Quebec, 1871.

PAPINIANUS, ÆMILIUS PAULUS, pap-in-i-a'-nus, Roman jurist, who held high offices under the emperor Severus, but was dismissed and soon afterwards put to death by Caracalla, who was jealous of the influence he had gained by his ability and high character. He wrote many books of the highest authority on jurisprudence, and had many eminent pupils.

Lived in the 2nd century.

PAPIRIUS, pa-pi'-ri-us, surnamed Cursor, or the Courier, from the swiftness of his course, was at first master of the horse to Crassus, and became dictator of Rome about 326 B.C. He defeated the Samnites several times, and appropriated the spoils to the building of a temple to Fortune. Livy declares Papirius Cursor to have been the most illustrious general of his time, and worthy of contending with Alexander the Great, had the latter turned his arms against Rome after the subjugation of Asia.

Lived in the 4th century B.C.

PAPPENHEIM, GOTTFRIED HEINRICH, COUNT VON, pap'-pen-hime, general of the German empire, descendant of an ancient Suabian family, distinguished for military achievements. He was educated as a protestant, but at the age of 20 adopted the Roman catholic religion, and was afterwards one of the most inveterate opponents of protestantism. He served for some time under the king of Poland, against the Russians and Turks, and then joined the Catholic League. Afterwards he was united with Tilly and Wallenstein, distinguishing himself by his impetuous bravery, and many brilliant achievements, unfortunately allied with extreme ferocity. He received his death wound at the battle of Lützen, and died a few hours afterwards, expressing his gratification that king Gustavus Adolphus, of Sweden, the great protestant leader, was killed in the battle.

Born at Pappenheim, Bavaria, 1594; died at Leipsic, 1632.

PAPPUS, ALEXANDRINUS, pap'-pus, a Greek philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, whose most important writings are "Mathematical Collections," a Latin version of which appeared in 1588; a comment upon the "Almagest" of Ptolemy, "Description of the Rivers of Libya," "Treatise on Military Engines," "Commentaries on Aristarchus, concerning the Magnitudes and Distances of the Sun and Moon," a translation of which last was published by Dr. Halley.

Lived at the close of the 4th century.

PAPUA, or NEW GUINEA, a very large but little known island, to the north of Australia, and immediately south of the equator, connecting the Indian archipelago with Polynesia. The extreme length is supposed to be nearly 1,500 miles. The outline is very irregular, the western extremity is nearly insulated, being connected with the mainland by an isthmus only 35 miles wide, and the south-eastern is a narrow, mountainous peninsula, rising to 14,000 feet, beyond which a large channel, China Straits, divides it from several islands. Off the south-west coast is a large island, Frederick Henry Island, separated by a narrow strait from the larger island, and on the south coast Stacey Island, until recently supposed to be the south cape of the mainland. The most northern point of Papua is Cape of Good Hope, Lat. 0° 19' S.; the most western, Cape Salu, Lon. 131° 2' E.; and the most southern and eastern point is in Lat. 10° 34' S., Lon. 151° 12' E. The whole of the south-eastern coast is fringed with dangerous coral reefs, some of which enclose good harbours. The best known part of the coast is on the south, lying east of Torres Straits, and facing the Great Bight, the eastern side of which is bold and rocky, but the west is flat and marshy, with innumerable narrow and tortuous fresh water channels, forming a network of canals, like the delta of a great river, and forming extensive mudbanks which hinder approach. The north coast, at present scarcely explored, is rocky and lofty. A range of mountains, to which the name of Charles Louis Mountains has been given, appears to traverse the island from west to east. The height of some of the loftiest peaks has been ascertained—Mount Owen Stanley, 13,200 feet; Mount Suckling, 11,220; Mount Obree, 10,240; Mount Yule, 10,040. Near the south-eastern coast is a group of mountains; the highest of which, Mount Astrolabe, is 3,800 feet. Throughout the island, as far as is known, are forests, and much of the timber is of gigantic size. The iron-wood tree, ebony, canary-wood, camphor-tree, the sago palm, and the wild nutmeg are conspicuous. Rice, maize, yams, cocoa nuts, sago, sugar cane, bananas, and other tropical products are cultivated. The flora generally resembles that of Australia rather than of Asia, and the same remark applies to the fauna. There are none of the large quadrupeds and apes which abound in the neighbouring Asiatic islands; but there are climbing kangaroos, and one true kangaroo, similar to the Australian animal. Under the heading ASIA, we mentioned Mr. Wallace's discovery of a line of demarcation, at the west of which the flora and fauna are of the Asiatic type, while to the south and east the Polynesian characteristics are distinctly marked. Papua lies to the east of this line, and abundantly confirms the theory. The birds are remarkable for beauty and variety of plumage, and include many varieties of parrots and birds of paradise of rare beauty. There are 29 species of birds peculiar to the country. Insects are abundant and varied, being as remarkable as the birds for variety of colour. The climate is hot and moist, but except in the swampy districts, not unhealthy. The rainy season begins about the middle of April and ends in September, on the south-west coast, but on the north coast, it begins in September and ends in April.

History.—The earliest record we have of this island dates back so far as A.D. 1526, when Don Jorge de Menenis, a Portuguese navigator, in making a voyage from Malacca to the Moluccas, being driven somewhat out of his course, accidentally sighted land, and, making for it, landed and remained there a month. This land, supposed to be the mainland of New Guinea, he called Papua, a word which means, according to some philologists, "black," and, according to others, "curled hair." In 1528, another Portuguese, Alvarez de Saavedra, landed on its shores, and although he did not, so far as is recorded, penetrate inland, he called it "Isla del Oro," from the idea which he formed of its abounding in gold. In 1545, a Spanish mariner, named Yuigo Ortiz de Retz, also voyaging to the Moluccas, sailed 250 miles along its northern coast, and gave it the name of Nueva Guinea, from some resemblance, or fancied resemblance, it bore to the Guinea coast on the west of Africa. In 1606, in the Spanish frigate, La Almiranta, Torres sailed 300 miles along the east coast, and landing in several places. In 1616 the Dutch navigator, Schouter, visited the country, and was attacked by the natives, losing 18 men. In 1699 Dampier landed, and met with considerable resistance; the natives using, as arms, clubs, spears and hollow sticks, probably canes, from which they were said to throw fire at their opponents. In 1770 Cook sailed along the coast, but left it without anchoring, on account of the hostility of the natives. There were several visitors after this: amongst others, Forrest, in 1774; Edwards, in 1791; Bampton, in 1793; and Blackwood, in 1843; but little or no further information relative to the place was given until Stanley, in H.M.S. Rattlesnake, ran along the coast and made a rough survey of a portion of it. In 1858 the Dutch government sent a surveying expedition, and in 1871 there were Russian and Italian explorations. In 1873 Captain Moresby, with H.M.S. Basilisk, surveyed a considerable portion of the eastern coast. The London Missionary Society made some settlements on the south-eastern coast, and ascended the Fly river for 150 miles. The earliest attempt at actual settlement by Europeans, of which there is any record, was by Captain Steenboom, of the Dutch ship Triton, who in 1828 took possession, in the name of the Dutch government, of all the territory from 140° E. westward to the sea. He built a fort at a place he called Triton Bay, in the N.W.; but the rankness of the vegetation caused it to be so unhealthy that occupation was for a long time limited to a few small places on the west coast, which have, however, gradually extended, until the separate constitution of Queensland brought New Guinea into prominent notice, and created a desire throughout the Australian colonies for English annexation. Representations to such effect were made to the home government, but in vain, until Sir Thomas Mellwraith, then the Premier of Queensland, undertook the annexation in 1883, and he accordingly performed the ceremony of taking possession, in the name of the Queen, of so much of New Guinea as was not in the occupation of the Dutch. The home government repeatedly declined to sanction, and eventually refused to confirm the annexation. Great disappointment was expressed throughout Australia, and an International Convention, which met at Sydney, unanimously urged the home goverment to immediately confirm the annexation. In reply to this the home government, in 1884, agreed to proclaim a British Protectorate of the southern coast, and the British flag was accordingly hoisted on November 6th, when regulations were framed specially securing to the the natives their land, General Sir Peter Strachey being eventually appointed High Commissioner. The Australians in general did not consider this sufficient, New South Wales alone concurring; and before the close of 1884 the German government formally took possession of the north-eastern portions of New Guinea and the adjacent islands, including New Britain and New Ireland. Indignant protests proceeded from the Australians, but the final work was done, and New Guinea henceforth became the joint possession of Holland, Great Britain and Germany. The government of the British portion is under Her Majesty's Special Commissioner, under whom is a Deputy Commissioner. Persons who are desirous of visiting, exploring, trading or cutting timber within the limits of the British Protectorate are required to apply by letter to the Special Commissioner for permits. They must specify in detail for what purpose a permit is required, giving the names and addresses of their partners, if any.

Area.—About 250,000 square miles.

Pop.—Dutch portion, 200,000; rest about 1,000,000.

PARA, pa-ra', a northern maritime province of Brazil, South America, bounded N. by Guiana and the Atlantic, E. by the provinces of Maranhao and Goyaz; S. by the province of Matto Grossa, and W. by that of Amazonas. It forms a portion of the valley of the Amazon; the surface is generally level, with immense forests of valuable timber, and rich pastures. The soil is remarkably fertile, and the climate, though hot, not unhealthy. Only a small portion of the province is under cultivation, and coffee, rice, millet, and cotton are the chief productions.

Rivers.—The Para (the southern branch of the Amazon), and its great affluents the Toncantins, Tapajos, and Xingu.

Minerals.—Coal, iron, and diamonds are known to exist, but are not worked.

Area.—412,440 square miles.

Pop.—343,511.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are six comarcas, or districts. The capital is Para.

PARA, or BELEM, a city and seaport of Brazil, capital of the above province, on the east bank of the Para (here 20 miles broad), and 80 miles above its mouth. The harbour will accommodate vessels of the largest size. The town is well-built, and the streets broad and well-paved. The cathedral is a large and handsome edifice, and there are several fine churches, a presidential palace, college, good public squares, and botanic garden. There are large coal depôts and wharves, and the export trade in sugar, raw cotton, cocoa, hides, india-rubber (very extensive), tobacco, and diamonds is very considerable. Pop. 40,000. Lat. 1° 28′ S. Lon. 48° 28′ W.

PARA, the southern outlet of the Amazon, South America, discharging into the Atlantic on the southern side of the island of Marajo, where it is 40 miles wide. The length of the course is 200 miles. There is a "bore" 15 feet high at the time of the spring tides.

PARACELSUS, par-a-sel'-sus, a medical empyric, whose real name was Philip Aureolus Theophrastus. His father, the natural son of a prince, was a physician of Switzerland, and his mother the lady superintendent of a convent hospital. His education was irregular, but he acquired a considerable amount of knowledge, and having a fertile genius, applied himself to the study of medicine, in which he made great progress. He rambled into Asia and Africa, supporting himself in the usual fashion of wandering quack doctors, and then diligently studying chemistry, especially the medicinal virtues of metals, and dabbling in the then fashionable alchemy. He afterwards went to France, Spain, and Italy, for improvement, and on his return to Switzerland, settled at Basel, where he acquired great reputation by his practice, and was appointed professor of physic and surgery. He began his academical career by publicly burning the works of Galen. He acquired habits of intemperance, and his classes dwindled. His charges to patients, like those of empirics in general, were exorbitant, and, having cured a canon from a dangerous complaint, his demand was so great that the patient refused to pay it, which produced a hearing before the council, who ordered the canon to pay only the accustomed fee. This so irritated Paracelsus, that he abused the judges, and was in consequence compelled to leave the town. He then went into Alsace, where he became noted as an alchemist, and pretended to have found not only the philosopher's stone, but the elixir of life. He contrived to quarrel with everybody, and at last, having insulted a doctor of Salzburg in the Tyrol, he was thrown out of an inn window, and his neck was broken by the fall. He was undoubtedly a man of great ability, notwithstanding his quackeries, and he gave a most important turn to pharmaceutical chemistry by his introduction of some of the most valuable remedies known to medical science.

Born at Einsiedeln, Switzerland, 1493; died at Salzburg, 1541.

PARACLET, par'-a-klai, a hamlet of France, in the department Aube, 3 miles from Nugent-sur-Seine. Here are the ruins of the convent founded by Abelard in the 12th century. Heloise was its abbess.

PARADAS, pa-ra-das', a town of Spain, province of Seville, 30 miles E. of Seville. Pop. 4,300.

PARADISI, AGOSTINO, Count, pa'-ra-dé'-se, an eminent Italian poet, whose verses obtained for him admission to the academy of Reggio at the early age of 16. After visiting Genoa, Venice, and Bologna, he (1772) became professor of belles-lettres in the university of Mantua. In 1776 the duke of Mantua created him a count. His lectures were attended not only by his own countrymen, but by distinguished persons from France and Germany. He returned to Reggio in 1780, and held a high official employment there, giving his leisure to literary pursuits, until his death.

Born at Vignola, 1736; died at the same place, 1783.

PARAGUA, pa-ra-gwa', a river of Venezuela, flowing in a northern and then in an eastern direction, and falling into the Carony, 20 miles below Barcelonetta, after a course of 240 miles.

PARAGUAÇU, pa-ra-gwa'-su, a river of Brazil, rising in the province of Bahia, and descending from the Sierra de Chapada in lofty cascados, and, after a circuitous course, entering the Bay of All Saints by a very wide mouth. Length of course, 300 miles.

PARAGUAY, pa-ra-gwai', a republic of South America, bounded N. and N.E. by Brazil, S. by the Argentine Confederation, and N.W. by Bolivia. It is undulating, with extensive grassy plains in the northern part, and running from north to south in the Sierra Anambahy, a mountain chain, which divides into two branches on the south, forming the watersheds of various tributaries of the Parana and Paraguay. The southern part of the province is extremely fertile, and there are hills, wooded slopes, rich alluvial plains (with extensive marshes and shallow pools), and large savannahs, affording excellent pasture. The low-lying lands are generally destitute of trees, except on the banks of the Parana and Paraguay, where are extensive forests. The climate is, for a tropical country, temperate, and the cultivated parts abound with all kinds of grain, beans, pease, melons, cucumbers, and European vegetables and fruits; coffee, rice, indigo, cocoa, tobacco, sugar-cane, and cotton are cultivated. Other products are medicinal plants and the Paraguay tea, or maté, a plant an infusion of which supplies the inhabitants with a refreshing drink. The forests abound with a variety of woods, medicinal and aromatic, many of them yielding useful dyes, and the india-rubber tree. The trade of Paraguay consists in the export of its tea, tobacco, sugar, cotton, hides, tallow, wax, honey, cattle, horses, mules, wool, leather, hemp, rice, and ornamental timber. Nearly three-fourths of the whole land is national property, mostly let out in small holdings. The ostrich is seen in the plains, and is remarkable for its immense size, fine plumage, and swift motion. The wild animals are the jaguar or tiger, the puma or cougar, the black bear, the ant-bear, and the tapir, or river cow. Mosquitoes and an innumerable variety of insects infest both the waters and the land, with snakes, vipers, and scorpions. The great boa-constrictor is found in the moist places adjoining the rivers, and some parts are haunted by the vampire bat.

Rivers.—The Parana and Paraguay, and their tributaries. In the rainy season they overflow their banks, inundating large districts.

Area.—97,970. square miles.

Pop.—346,048, the proportion of females to males being about four to one. The inhabitants of the towns consist chiefly of whites, or of half-breeds, speaking Spanish. The native population of the provinces are mostly Guarani Indians, with a language of their own.

Government and Constitution.—A congress, meeting at Asuncion in June 1870, voted a new constitution, which was publicly proclaimed on the 25th of November 1870. The constitution is modelled closely on that of the Argentine Confederation, the legislative authority being vested in a congress of two houses, a senate and a house of deputies, and the executive being entrusted to a president, elected for the term of six years, with a non-active vice-president at his side. The president exercises his functions through a cabinet of responsible ministers, five in number. The established religion is the Roman Catholic. The people generally are well educated.

Railways and Telegraphs.—The only railway is a short line of 45 miles, from Asuncion to Paraguay, by the side of which is the only telegraph line in the country.

History.—Paraguay was first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, in the year 1526. In 1556 the Jesuits made their appearance, and, by the effect of gentleness and policy, succeeded in obtaining a great ascendancy over the minds of the natives, and in establishing settlements in different parts of the country. In 1768 they were expelled, and in 1811 the people rebelled against the yoke of Spain, and established their independence. After a short government by two consuls, the supreme power was seized, in 1815, by Dr. Francia (see FRANCIA), who exercised autocratic sway as dictator, till his death. His reign was followed by a state of anarchy, which lasted till 1842, when a national congress elected two nephews of the dictator, don Alonso and don Carlos Antonio Lopez, joint consuls of the republic. Another congress voted, March 13, 1844, a new constitution, and, March 14, elected don Carlos Antonio Lopez sole president, with dictatorial powers. At the death of don Carlos, September 10, 1862, his son, don Francisco Solano Lopez, born 1827, succeeded to the supreme power, by testamentary order, without opposition. President Lopez, in 1865, began a dispute with the government of Brazil, the consequence of which was the entry of a Brazilian army, united with forces of the Argentine Confederation and Uruguay, into the republic, June 1865. After a struggle of five years, Lopez was defeated and killed in the battle of Aquidaban, March 1, 1870. (See LOPEZ.)

PARAGUAY, a large river of South America, which has its source 9,530 feet above the sea level, in a number of lakes, in the Brazilian province of Matto Grosso, and follows a south-westerly and southerly course, partly through the immense marsh of Xarayes, and forms part of the boundary between Brazil and Bolivia, and thence through Paraguay, until it joins the Parana, in lat. 27° 17′ S. The chief affluents are the Cuyaba, Taeoary, Mondego, and Apa, on the left bank, and the Tauru, Pilcomayo, and Vermejo, on the right. The entire length is about 1,800 miles.

PARAHYBA, pa-ra-é-ba, an eastern maritime province of Brazil, bounded N. by the province of Rio Grande de Norte; S. by the province of Pernambuco; W. by the province of Ceara; and E. by the Atlantic. It is traversed by mountain ridges. The soil of the valleys is generally dry and sandy, but cotton and tobacco are grown. The capital is PARAHYBA. Area, 20,340 square miles. Pop. 423,817.

PARAHYBA, a seaport, capital of the above province, on the river of the same name, 10 miles from the sea. There are a cathedral, several monasteries and convents, two colleges, and other educational institutions. There is a good harbour, much frequented by coasting vessels. Pop. 15,000.

PARAMARIBO, pa-ra-ma'-re-bo, a seaport, the capital of Dutch Guiana, South America, on the western bank of the Surinam river, about 10 miles from its mouth, in the Atlantic. It is built in the form of an oblong square, with the streets perfectly straight, and lined with orange, shaddock, tamarind, and lemon trees, which appear in everlasting bloom. They are finely paved with gravel. The houses, with few exceptions, are built of fine timber, and are, in general, elegantly furnished, and the aspect of the town is bright and picturesque. Fort Zeelandia, which protects the port, has a large and commodious barrack, and the chief buildings in the town are three Protestant and two Roman Catholic churches, two synagogues, the bureau of finance, and the court of justice. There is a considerable trade. Pop. 22,000, including 10,000 slaves. There is a noble road for shipping, the river before the town being about a mile in breadth. Lat. 5° 45′ N. Lon. 55° 15′ W.

PARAMATTA, (See PARRAMATTA.)

PARAMITHIA, pa-ra-mit'-i-a, a town of European Turkey, in Albania, 32 miles S.W. of Janina. It is beautifully situated on the side of a rock, on the summit of which is a castle. There are several Greek churches and mosques and public fountains. Pop. 5,000.

PARAMO, LOUIS DE, pa-ra-mo', a Spanish inquisitor, who published at Madrid, in 1598, a curious work, called the "Holy Office," a history of the Inquisition, written with great candour and accuracy.

Died about 1619.

PARANA, pa-ra-na', a large river of South America, and one of the principal which contribute to form the Plata. It rises by numerous heads in Brazilian province of Minas Geraes, about 100 miles N.W. of Rio de Janeiro, and after a course of 2,400 miles, in which it has joined the Paraguay, and next the Uruguay it forms the estuary of the Plata.

PARANA, a province in the south of Brazil, bounded N. by the province of San Paulo; S. by that of Rio Grande de Sul; E. by the Atlantic; and W. by the province of Matto Grosso and the republic of Paraguay. About 80 miles inland, a range of mountains runs parallel to the coast, throwing out branches westward. The sea coast is indented by several bays. There are numerous small rivers flowing into the Atlantic, but the principal streams (among them the Paranapanema, Ivay, Piguary, and Yguassu,) rise in the western slope of the mountain range, are of considerable length, and are affluents of the Parana. The climate is very healthy, and the soil fertile. The chief employments of the inhabitants are agriculture, rearing cattle and pigs, and gathering Paraguay tea, or mâté. Area, 72,000 square miles. Pop. 189,668.

PARANAGUA, pa'-ra-na-gwa', a maritime town of Brazil, province of Parana, 180 miles S.W. of San Paulo. It is mostly built of stone, and has an excellent port. There is a very large export of mâté. Pop. 3,000.

PARASARA, pa-ra-sa'-ra, in Hindoo mythology, the name of several personages, whose adventures are related in the Purânas, the Mahâbhârata, and other ancient works.

PARATI, pa-ra'-te, a town of Brazil, on the west coast of the Bay of Angra dos Reis, 100 miles S.W. of Rio de Janeiro. It has several churches and a grammar-school, with an extensive trade in sugar, coffee, rice, and rum. Pop. 10,000.

PARAY-LE-MONIAL, pa-rai'-le(r)-mawng-e-al, a town of France, department Saone-et-Loire, on the left bank of the Bourbince, 8 miles N.W. of Charolles. There is a handsome Gothic church, erected at the beginning of the 11th century. Pop. 3,500.

PARCÆ, or FATES, par'-se, in the Greek mythology, three powerful goddesses, who presided over the birth and life of mankind. They were, according to Hesiod, three in number, and were named Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment of man's birth, and held a distaff in her hand; Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of man's life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors.

PARCÉ, par'-sai, a town of France, in the department of Sarthe, 12 miles from La Flèche. Pop. 2,500.

PARCHIM, par'-kim, a town of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, on the Elde, 23 miles S.E. of Schwerin. The town is very old, and irregularly built. Manf. Woollen cloth, leather, chicory, straw hats, and tobacco. Pop. 8,000.

PARDIES, IGNATIUS GASTON, par'-de, an eminent French mathematician, who entered the order of the Jesuits at the age of 16, and afterwards became professor of rhetoric in the College Louis-le-Grand at Paris. His principal works are "Dissertation on the Nature and Course of Comets," "Discourse on Local Motion," "Elements of Geometry," and "Discourse on the Knowledge of Beasts."

Born 1636; died 1673.

PARDO, par'-do, a river of Brazil, formed by the junction of two smaller streams, in the southern part of the province of Matto Grosso. The first 120 miles of its course is a series of cataracts. Beyond them it becomes a noble river, and after a course of about 280 miles joins the right bank of the Parana in lat. 21° 36′ S.

PARDOOBITZ, par-doo-bitz', a walled town of the Austrian empire, in Bohemia, on the Chrudimka, at its junction with the Elbe, 13 miles S.W. of Königgratz. There are a castle, four churches, a high school, and three hospitals. Manf. Paper, and iron and copper articles. Pop. 8,500.

PARÉ, AMBROISE, pa'-rai, the most celebrated of the old French surgeons. He was apprenticed to a barber, but he soon quitted that employment and went to Paris, where he pursued medical and anatomical studies under great difficulties. After completing his education, he went into Italy with the French army, and served during several campaigns, gaining so great a reputation that he was appointed president of the Royal College of Chirurgeons, and in 1552 Henry II. appointed him his surgeon. Though a Protestant, he was afterwards surgeon to Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III.; and, at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, Brantôme tells us that Charles IX. saved him by shutting him up in his own bedroom. Paré made several discoveries in anatomy was the first to substitute ligature of the arteries for cauterization after amputation, and wrote some esteemed books on surgery.

Born at Laval, 1509; died at Paris, 1590.

PAREDES, DIEGO GARCIA DE, pa-rai-dais, Spanish general, usually styled "the Spanish Bayard." Entering the army at an early age, he fought gallantly against the Moors at Baza, Velez, and Malaga, in 1485. When the Moorish war was concluded by the capture of Granada, in 1492, he sought further distinction on the battle-fields of Italy. He was appointed to a high rank in the army of pope Alexander VI., and served with distinction under the papal banner during seven years. In 1501 he assisted at the capture of Cephalonia from the Turks, was taken prisoner, but contrived to effect his escape. During the war between the French and Spaniards in Naples, Paredes was one of the most undaunted and skilful soldiers in the ranks of the latter power. At the battle of Cerignola, he commanded the Spanish centre, and, during the fight, contended alone against a number of French knights until his own men came up. Some assert that he subsequently cruised in the Levant as a corsair; but this is doubtful. At the famous battle of Pavia, however, he greatly signalised himself, and, it is said, assisted in taking Francis I. prisoner.

Born in Spain, 1466; died 1530.

PAREDES (DE NAVA), a town of Spain, province of Palencia, 16 miles W. of the town of that name. There are four churches, a nunnery, and an hospital. Wool-spinning is the principal industry. Pop. 6,000.

PAREDON, pa'-re-don, an island of the West Indies, lying to the N. of Cuba, in the old Bahama channel. Ext. 10 miles long, with a breadth of 2. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 22° 25′ N. Lon. 78° 8′ W.

PAREJA, JUAN DE, pa'-rai-ha, an eminent Spanish painter, who was a West-Indian half-caste, and became the slave of Diego Valesquez. In the absence of his master, Pareja laboured assiduously in drawing and copying his works; but secretly, for fear of giving offence. Philip IV., king of Spain, coming one day to visit Velasquez, Pareja contrived to place in his way one of his own pictures, with which his majesty was extremely pleased. The slave then fell on his knees, and besought the king to ask his master to forgive him. Philip not only did this, but obtained him his liberty. The faithful Pareja, however, would not quit Valesquez, and, after his death, continued to serve his daughter. His portraits are very fine, and were so close a copy of his master's style, that they could not be distinguished from them.

Born in the West Indies, 1610; died 1670.

PARENNIN, DOMINIC, pa-ren'-na, a French Jesuit, who was a missionary in China, where he was greatly esteemed by the emperor Kang-Hi, for whom he translated into Chinese several articles upon scientific subjects. A difference arising between the Chinese and Russian courts, Parennin was charged to negotiate a reconciliation, which he effected. After his death, his remains were magnificently interred by order of the emperor. In Duhalde's "China" are several curious maps and letters of this learned man.

Born at Bussy, France, 1665; died at Pekin, 1751.

PARENT, ANTHONY, pa'-rawng, an eminent French mathematician, who was educated for the law, which he renounced for science, and became a member of the Academy, whose Memoirs he enriched with many valuable papers. His most important works are, "Mathematical and Philosophical Researches," "Theoretical and Practical Arithmetic," "Elements of Mechanics and Natural Philosophy."

Born at Paris, 1666; died 1716.

PARENT-DUCHATELET, ALEXANDER JEAN BAPTIST, doo-shat'-o-lai, an eminent French physician and writer, who, upon the conclusion of his medical studies, commenced the practice of his profession at Paris, in 1814. After spending some years in that pursuit, his attention was directed to questions concerning the public health. With great devotedness to this task, he laboured during fifteen years, and through his exertions, some of the most useful and efficient reforms in the sanitary arrangements of Paris were due. He wrote extensively on subjects connected with the public health, and, in 1824, produced a great work upon the common sewers of the French capital, and another upon the cholera.

Born at Paris, 1790; died at the same city, 1836.

PARENZO, pa-rain-dzo', a town and seaport of Austria, on a peninsula in the Adriatic, 30 miles S.W. of Trieste. There is a fine ancient cathedral. The harbour is good, and a considerable coasting trade is carried on. Pop. 3,200.

PARGA, par'-ga, a fortified seaport of European Turkey, on the coast of Albania, opposite to the south point of the island of Corfu, 35 miles from Arta. It stands near the mouth of a river, the Acheron of the ancients. Pop. 4,000. Lat. 39° 16' N. Lon. 20° 23' E.

PARIA, GULF OF, an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, South America, lying between the island of Trinidad and the mainland of Venezuela. From these two lands on the north two points jut out, with two islands intervening, which leave four openings, called the Mouths of the Dragon, by which the gulf communicates with the Caribbean Sea. This part is about 13 miles wide, and contains several islands. The length of the gulf is estimated at 95 miles, and the breadth is about 35 miles.

PARINI, JOSEPH, pa-ré'-ne, an eminent Italian poet, whose pursuit of knowledge in early life was performed under considerable difficulty. In his 23rd year he produced a volume of poems, which attracted the notice of the Borromei family, in which he became tutor. His next work was the first portion of a poem satirising with exquisite grace the follies of the fashionable world, entitled, "Il Giorno," a famous piece in Italian literature. This gained him the patronage of count Firmian, the Austrian minister in Lombardy, and through his influence Parini subsequently became professor of eloquence in the college of the Brera at Milan. When Benaparte entered Milan at a later period, he caused him to be chosen magistrate; but the poet soon retired from the office.

Born at Bosisio 1729; died at Milan, 1799.

PARIS, par'-is, (Fr. pa'-re,) the capital of France, and, after London, the largest and most populous city in Europe, is situated on both sides of the river Seine, 111 miles from its mouth, and about a mile below its junction with the Marne. The average elevation of the city is about 190 feet above the sea level, and it is surrounded by low hills, the highest of which, Montmartre and Belleville, on the northern side, do not exceed 300 feet in height. The river enters the city on the south-east, at Bercy, and, after a winding course of about 5 miles, quits it near Auteuil, dividing the city into two unequal parts. Near the centre it forms two islands—the Ile St. Louis, about the third of a mile long and connected with it by two bridges; and the Ile de la Cité, nearly three-quarters of a mile in length. The Ile de la Cité is the oldest part and the original nucleus of Paris. Beyond these islands, the width of the river within the limits of the city is only about 200 yards, about two-thirds the width of the Thames at London bridge. On each side of the river are lines of quays, forming below the islands fine promenades planted with trees. On the northern bank, between the Pont Neuf (the bridge across the western end of the Ile de la Cité) and the Place du Carrousel, is the Quai de Louvre; farther west, reaching to the Place de la Concorde, Quai de Tuileries; and still farther, extending to the foot of the Pont de l'Alma, Cours la Reine. On the southern bank, from east to west are Quai de la Gare, Quai d'Austerlitz, (between the Bercy and Austerlitz bridges), Quai St. Bernard, Quai de la Tournelle, and beyond the Pont Neuf, Quai Conti, Quai Malaquais, Quai Voltaire, and Quai d'Orsay, a splendid promenade, the greater part planted with lines of trees, and extending for two miles, past the gardens of the Hôtel des Invalides, and the entrance to the Champ de Mars from the Pont de Jena. These quays are not only attractive promenades, but, being built of solid masonry, protect the lower parts of the city from inundation. The river is crossed by 27 bridges, two on the suspension system; four with iron arches, on stone piers; one of wood, and the rest of stone. (These bridges are more particularly described farther on.) The entire city is enclosed by a belt of fortifications, erected by king Louis Philippe, and greatly strengthened by the late emperor Napoleon III. This wall is 21 miles in circuit, 34 feet high, bastioned and terraced, and surrounded by a ditch 49 feet wide. There are 57 gates, besides entrances of railways. Beyond this wall, at distances varying from about one to three miles, are 16 outlying forts, and still farther to the east the large forts of Rosny and Noisy. The larger and most important division of the city is on the right bank of the river; and it may be said generally that the most fashionable quarter extends westward between the Tuileries and the Barrière de Neuilly; the very centre of brilliant Paris life, with the most superb shops, is near this quarter, on the Boulevards des Capucins, des Italiens, and Montmartre; farther east, between the Place Hôtel de Ville and the Place des Vosges (formerly the Place Royale) are old mansions, the residences of the nobility before the time of Louis XIV., some of them interesting, though decayed, specimens of Renaissance architecture; on the Ile de la Cité are the famous cathedral of Nôtre Dame; the great hospital, Hôtel Dieu, the law courts, and other public buildings; on the south side of the river are the Faubourg St. Germain, the residences of many members of the old aristocracy, and of several of the foreign ministers, some of the government offices, the Quartier Latin, with the schools of law, medicine, science, and theology, and a large student population, and the palace of the Luxembourg. Many of the principal commercial establishments are in the neighbourhood of the Boulevard de Sebastopol, which crosses the river across the Ile de la Cité, near its centre; in the eastern part of the city, popularly known as the Faubourg St. Antoine, are numerous manufactories and dwellings of working people. The Boulevards Intérieures is the name given to the line extending from the church of the Madeleine with an eastern and southern curve to the Place de la Bastile. They mark the site of the former wall, destroyed about 1670, and include the Boulevards de la Madeleiné, des Capucins, des Italiens, Montmartre, Poissonière, St. Martin, du Temple, Calvaire, and Beaumarchais, or St. Antoine. They are planted with trees, and there are restaurants, cafés, and almost innumerable places of amusement. The Boulevards Extérieures are a line of broad roads on the line of the old octroi wall, at the gates of which the octroi, or duties on goods brought into Paris were levied, previous to the extension of the municipal limits to the line of fortifications. The wall had 50 gates, or barriers, some of them very fine structures, especially the Barrière de Neuilly, and the Barrières de Vincennes, de St. Martin, de Fontainebleau, de Neuilly, de Chartres, and de Passy. There are in Paris altogether about 3,620 streets, places, courts, quays, and minor thoroughfares, 300 isolated public edifices, and 65,000 houses. The houses are almost all built of stone, are from five to six stories in height; and are let out into suites of apartments, reached by a common stair. Some are built in quadrangles, with an inner courtyard, guarded by a lodge. Even in the new districts the houses are built in this style—small residences, with gardens, such as adorn the suburbs of London, being unknown. In some districts, occupied by a dense working population, houses of 11 stories have recently been built, with hydraulic lifts in place of the common staircase. Rents in the better districts are high, a suite of rooms on the fifth floor costing as much as a good-sized villa, with garden, in the most favourite suburbs of London. A brief sketch of the direction of the leading thoroughfares and of the central places whence many of them radiate may sufficiently convey a general impression of the general topography of Paris, and the most important of the buildings and memorials of interest will be separately described. One main line of road, from the Arc de Triomphe in the north-west to the Place du Trône, in the east, on the northern side of the Seine, and nearly parallel to the course of the river, includes the broad and finely-planted Avenue des Champs Elysées to the Place de la Concorde, and then the Rue de Rivoli, skirting the northern side of the Tuileries and the Louvre, and farther east the Rue St. Antoine, the Place de la Bastile, and the Faubourg St. Antoine. Farther north, and nearly parallel are the Faubourg St. Honoré and the Rue St. Honoré, joining the Rue Rivoli near the Palais Royal. We have already mentioned the line of the Boulevards Intérieures. Another main line of road is from the Arc de Triomphe in a north-eastern direction, including the Boulevard Haussmann to the new Grand Opera, and beyond it, the Rue de la Fayette, to the railway station du Nord, and so by way of the Rue d'Allemagne to the suburb of Panton, beyond the fortifications. A magnificent straight thoroughfare, the Boulevard de Sebastopol, more than two miles long, traverses the city from the Observatory and the Rue d'Enfer in the south, to the Strasbourg railway station in the north-east, crossing the Seine and the Ile de la Cité, that part beyond the Boulevards Intérieures being named the Boulevard de Strasbourg. The most prominent open place in the western part of the city is the Place de l'Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile, at the extremity of the broad Avenue des Champs Elysées. It is circular, about 300 yards in diameter, and in the centre is the superb triumphal arch, the erection of which was commenced by the emperor Napoleon in 1806, but not completed until 1836, the cost being about £400,000. It is 152 feet high, and 137 feet wide, and is adorned with numerous sculptures, representing the victories of Napoleon. From this central place diverge a broad avenue leading to the Bois de Boulogne; the Avenue de Grande Armée, leading to the Avenue de Neuilly; westward, the Avenue du Roi de Rome, and in an eastward direction the Avenue de Friedland, leading to the Boulevard de Haussmann. The Place de la Bastile is a large irregularly shaped place in the eastern part of the city, at the end of the long line of the Boulevard Intérieure. Here stood the famous fortress and prison, so memorable in the history of old Paris, and destroyed in 1789, at the outbreak of the great Revolution. In this place meet the Rue St. Antoine, from the west, and the Rue du Faubourg St. Antoine, from the east. The latter is about a mile and a quarter long, and at the extreme end is a large circus, 200 yards in diameter, and planted with trees. The Place du Trône, from which diverge the Cours de Vincennes, to the east, and to the north-west the Boulevard Voltaire, crossing the Boulevard Richard Lenoir, so named by the emperor Napoleon III. in honour of the great French manufacturer, but previously named Boulevard de la Reine Hortense. The centre of this boulevard is a continued archway over the canal St. Martin, and there are numerous flower gardens, from which rise perpendicular shafts giving light and air to the towing-path and footway below. On the south side of the river, a central spot is the Place Vauban, immediately at the south of the Hôtel des Invalides, and at the northern end of the wide Avenue d' Auteuil, half a mile long, and planted with rows of trees, and the Avenue de Sequer. Another road, with trees, meeting at the same point, the Avenue de Villars, joins the Boulevards des Invalides, which skirts the eastern side of the Hôtel, and then curves southward, continuing, with the name Boulevard du Mont Parnasse, to the southern end of the broad avenue leading to the gardens of the Luxembourg Palace. From near the middle of the Boulevard du Mont Parnasse, the Boulevard d'Enfers, runs southward to a southern line of Boulevards Extérieures, running eastward to the Place d'Italie, and on the right hand of which are various barriers. These boulevards are named St. Jacques and des Gobelins, and, continuing their line to the river at the Pont de Bercy, is a broad road planted with trees. Running in a north-eastern direction from the Place d'Italie is the Boulevard de l'Hôpital, nearly a mile long, leading to the Pont d'Austerlitz. The leading features of the plan of Paris may be briefly indicated. Antique ecclesiastical Paris is on the Ile de la Cité; the Paris of kings and emperors stretches beyond the island westward, along the northern bank of the Seine, beginning with the Louvre, beyond which are the Palace of the Tuileries (burnt by the Communists in 1871), the Place de la Concorde, the Champs Elysées, and the Avenue des Champs Elysées, with the fine Arc de Triomphe at the end, bearing the trophies of imperial achievements. The Place de la Concorde is a large open place between the garden of the Tuileries and the Champs Elysées, at the foot of the Pont de Concorde, with a short, wide road on the north, the Rue Royale leading to the front of the Madeleine church In the centre of this place is the famous Luxor obelisk, 75 feet high, and covered with hieroglyphics, brought from Egypt, and erected where it now stands in 1836. It marks the site of the terrible guillotine of the Revolution at which Louis XVI., Marie Antoinette, Philippe Egalité, of Orleans, Madame Roland, Robespierre, Danton, and hundreds of others were decapitated. Another famous place of execution, the Place de Grève, is near the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, where stood the Hôtel de Ville, one of the most magnificent edifices in Paris, quadrangular, with four façades, burned by the Communists, but since rebuilt. The Place Vendôme is another memorial of Imperial Paris, between the Rue Rivoli and the Boulevard des Capucines. In this place is the column, 133 feet high, erected to the memory of Napoleon and the great army, which was deliberately pulled down in May, 1871, by the Communists, but has since been restored by the Republican government. The Place du Carrousel, between the Louvre and the Tuileries, contains a triumphal arch, designed after the arch of Septimus Severus at Rome. The Place du Châtelet has a fountain in the centre, consisting of a circular basin, 20 feet in diameter, with columns 58 feet high, inscribed with the names of the principal victories gained by the emperor Napoleon. We have already mentioned that the most fashionable quarter of Paris is in the north-west; most of the finest shops are in the Boulevards des Capucines and des Italiens, and in the vicinity of the Palais Royal, near the Louvre, and Paris is seen in its gayest aspect on the long line of the Boulevard Intérieur. Manufacturing and commercial Paris lies farther to the east. South of the Seine are the old palace of the Luxembourg, the Hôtel des Invalides, and the spacious Champ de Mars, an immense area, where, in the revolutionary times, great political demonstrations were made, where reviews of troops are held, and which was, in 1867, the site of the Great International Exhibition. Since 1852, several squares, laid out in the English style, have been formed in the city, averaging about 7 acres each, and similar squares have also been laid out in some of the suburban quarters. There are 60 ornamental fountains. There are in Paris about 4,000 hotels, and a large number of private establishments where visitors are accommodated.

Palaces.—The Tuileries, so named from the tilekilns which formerly stood on the site, long the residence of the kings of France, and the scene of many of its most remarkable events, was begun in 1566 by Catherine de' Medici, and finished, after various interruptions, in the 17th century. It was a noble and venerable structure, with a façade more than 1,000 feet long, and a beautiful park, laid out with lakes, flower-beds, and groups of statuary, and one of the most favourite resorts in Paris. In 1871 the Communists burnt the palace, which has not been rebuilt, and in June, 1877, a road, the Rue des Tuileries, passing through and destroying the private gardens, was publicly opened. The Louvre, intended to be another palace, was formerly nearly a quarter of a mile to the east of the Tuileries; but Napoleon III. carried out the idea of the junction of these two palaces, and formed them into one vast building. The form of the Louvre is square, with a large interior court, 400 by 400 feet. It was finished in the age of Louis XIV., and its magnificent halls are filled with objects of taste and art. (See MUSEUMS and ART COLLECTIONS.) The eastern and southern fronts are superb specimens of architecture. The Elysée, a palace in the Champs Elysées, has no striking architectural features, but many interesting associations are connected with it, and it is the town residence of the President of the Republic. The Palais Royal, situated near the Tuileries and the Louvre, forms a large pile of building, entered in three distinct parts by as many portals or archways, and bearing less the appearance of a princely residence than of a place of business. The façade fronting the Rue St. Honoré was built in 1781, and is ornamented with Doric and Ionic pillars. This portion of the building was burnt in 1871 by the Communists. At the back of these courts, and at a distance from the main building, is the garden of the palace, a spacious oblong, nearly 250 yards in length, and 100 yards broad, having in its central part a basin with jets d'eau, and at either end a shrubbery. Around the garden are buildings of uniform architecture, standing on arcades, which form a broad gallery, and on the first floor are some of the finest shops in Paris. No spot in all the city is so much frequented, and, it has been observed, "nowhere can a stranger get a readier glimpse of all the phases of Parisian life." The Palais Royal was built by cardinal Richelieu, and was presented by him to Louis XIV., when it received its present name. In 1692 it became the residence of the duke of Orleans, and between 1814 and 1830 Louis Philippe resided there. Under the second empire it was the residence of prince Jerome and his son, prince Napoleon. The Palace of the Luxembourg is on the south side, about half a mile from the river, with extensive gardens, laid out in avenues, with fine old trees, and forming one of the most agreeable resorts in Paris. The palace was built by Marie de' Medici, on the model of the Pitti Palace at Florence. There are many superb rooms, some of which are used as picture galleries. It was the place of meeting of the Chamber of Peers when that body existed, and since 1871 has been used as the Hôtel de Ville. On the southern bank of the Seine, at the foot of the Pont de Concorde, is the Palais Bourbon, so named from having been originally erected by a dowager-duchess of Bourbon, and afterwards occupied by the house of Condé. It has a magnificent river front, with a Corinthian portico, approached by a flight of 20 steps. Here, in a splendid semi-circular hall, the Corps Législatif, or Chamber of Deputies, met, previous to the establishment of the present republic, when Versailles was selected, instead of Paris, as the place of meeting.

Official and Municipal Buildings.—The Hôtel de Finances (Treasury) is a large building in the Rue de Rivoli. The Hôtel de la Marin (Admiralty), forming the north-eastern side of the Place de la Concorde, is a fine building, formerly known as the Garde Meuble de la Couronne, the place where the crown jewels were kept. The Mint is on the Quai Conti, on the south side of the Seine. The Post Office is a well-arranged building, with a good front, near the Palais Royal. La Bourse (the Exchange), built in 1826, is a noble structure, in the Rue Vivienne, 212 feet long and 126 feet wide, surrounded by a covered gallery, approached by a flight of steps extending along the whole of the west front, and having a noble saloon (the Salle de Bourse), where business is transacted, and accommodates the Tribunal de Commerce, and other commercial bodies. The Palace des Archives Nationales (record office) occupies the former palace of the Prince de Soubize, in the Rue de Parades. The government printing-office, one of the most complete in the world, is in the old Palais Cardinal, in the Rue Vieille du Temple, formerly the residence of Cardinal de Rohan. The Palais de Justice is on the northern side of the Isle de la Cité. It is an immense building, part of which dates from the 14th century; the newer portion, built in the reign of Napoleon III., was set on fire by the Commune and nearly destroyed. The principal courts of law sit here, and adjoining the older part of the building is the prison of the Conciergerie, so memorable in connection with the revolutionary Reign of Terror. On the southern side of the river is a magnificent establishment, the Hotel des Invalides, founded in 1670, for old soldiers. It has a noble front, 612 feet long, and a gilded dome, making it one of the most conspicuous objects in Paris. In the church were deposited, in 1861, the remains of the emperor Napoleon I., brought from St. Helena by the French government. The Observatory is a large building, near the Luxembourg gardens, where astronomical observations are carried on.

Churches.—The cathedral of Notre Dame, at the eastern end of the Ile de la Cité, was built between the 12th and 15th centuries, on a site successively occupied by a pagan temple, and a Christian church of the Merovingian times. It is cruciform, with a magnificent western front 128 feet wide, flanked by two towers, 204 feet high; the length of the cathedral 390 feet, width of transept 144 feet, and height of vaulting 182 feet. It has been magnificently restored, and is now one of the finest specimens of Gothic architecture in Europe. St. Germain des Prés (completed in 1163) is the most ancient church in Paris. The Sainte Chapelle, within the precincts of the Palais de Justice, was built by St. Louis, in 1248, for the reception of the various relics he brought from Palestine. It is brilliantly decorated, and the late emperor restored it at great cost. St. Etienne du Mont is an ancient church, containing the tomb of St. Geneviève, the patron saint of Paris and the burial place of Pascal. St. Germain l'Auxerrois is another ancient church, with rich decorations and frescoes, and historically memorable belfry, from which was tolled the signal for the massacre of St. Bartholomew. St. Eustache is, next to Notre Dame, the largest church in Paris, and other old churches are St. Denis du St. Sacrement; St. Gervais, with a very beautiful chapel; St. Medard, St. Paul, and St. Louis, with a fine front and a lofty dome; St. Roch (the court church in the reign of Louis Philippe), St. Severus, St. Thomas d'Aquin, and the church des Val de Grace, with a dome painted in the interior with frescoes of great beauty; the church of the Sorbonne, where Richelieu is buried, and St. Sulpice. Among the modern churches, the Madeleine is one of the most conspicuous. It occupies a fine site at the northern end of the Rue Rivoli, and is built in the form of a Greek temple, surrounded by a colonnade of 52 Corinthian pillars, with colossal statues of saints in niches in the walls. At the southern end is the largest sculptured pediment in existence. The interior is very gorgeous, being lined with rich marble, and the roof supported by Corinthian pillars. On the southern side of the river near the Jardin des Plantes, is the grand church of St. Geneviève, formerly the Pantheon, intended by the constituent assembly of republican France as a temple dedicated to the memory of distinguished Frenchmen, but restored to the church by Napoleon III. It is cruciform, with a dome 282 feet high, is 288 feet long by 252 feet broad, and is entered by a noble Corinthian portico. Notre Dame de Lorette, St. Clotilde (on the southern side of the river), and St. Vincent de Paul are modern churches of attractive architecture. About half a mile beyond the Arc de Triomphe is the beautiful Chapelle de St. Ferdinand, marking the spot where the duke of Orleans, eldest son of Louis Philippe, was accidentally killed by being thrown from his carriage in 1842. The chapel is of the form of a Greek cross, and contains a bas-relief, designed by Ary Scheffer, representing the duke on his death-bed. There are two English episcopal chapels, and several other Protestant churches, a Greek church, and two synagogues. There are numerous monasteries and convents.

Bridges.—The Seine is crossed, within the limits of the city, by 27 bridges. Following the course of the river from east to west, they are, Pont National; Pont de Bercy; Pont d'Austerlitz, leading to the Jardin des Plantes, 480 feet long, 37 feet wide, with five cast-iron arches resting on stone piers; Pont de Constantine; Pont de la Tournelle, to the left of the Ile St. Louis; Pont Marie and Pont Louis Philippe, on the right of the same island; Pont St. Louis and Pont de la Cité, connecting the two islands; Ponts de l'Archevêché (palace of the archbishop, which was destroyed in 1831), au Double, St. Charles, and St. Michel, on the left of the Ile de la Cité; Ponts d'Arcole, Nôtre Dame (erected in 1500), and au Change, on the right side of the same island; Pont Neuf, built between 1578 and 1604, and renovated in 1852, the largest of all the bridges, with 12 arches, and crossing the eastern end of the Ile de la Cité, with an equestrian statue of Henri IV.; Pont des Arts, an elegant iron bridge of nine arches; Pont du Carrousel; Pont Royal; Pont de Solferino, adorned with sculptures commemorating the victory gained by the French in 1859; Pont de la Concorde, built between 1787 and 1790, a fine structure 480 feet long, with 12 colossal statues of white marble; Pont des Invalides; Pont de l'Alma, with sculptures commemorating the victory of the allied armies in the Crimea; Pont de Jena, a handsome structure, with five elliptical arches, and a cornice copied from the temple of Mars at Rome; and the Pont de Grenelle. There is also a railway bridge with five large arches, in the extreme south-western part of the city.

Museums, Art Collections, and Libraries.—The Louvre contains one of the most magnificent collections in the world, including galleries of paintings rich in specimens of the Italian, Spanish, Flemish, and modern French schools, sculpture, jewellery, cameos, porcelain, Egyptian, Greek, Roman and Assyrian antiquities, a naval museum, objects of interest from India and America, and a library of rare books. The Luxembourg Museum contains some of the finest works of living French artists. The Musée d'Histoire Naturelle, in the Jardin des Plantes; the Musée d'Artillerie and the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers, in the Rue St. Martin, a valuable collection of machinery, models, and drawings relating to almost all branches of art and industry; the Gobelins, in the southern part of the city, famous for the production of beautiful artistic tapestries; the Hôtel Cluny, with curious relics of the arts and usages of the French people from the earliest period; and the Palais d'Industrie, an immense building in the Champs Elysées, have all interesting collections. The principal public library is the Bibliothèque Nationale (formerly Royale or Imperial), in the Rue Richelieu. It contains more than a million books and pamphlets, 80,000 MSS., a magnificent collection of engravings, and fine collections of ancient sculpture, coins, and medals. In connection with this library, a reading-room, capable of accommodating 400 readers, was opened in 1868. There are several other extensive libraries open to the public.

Literary and Educational Establishments.—The University of France has superseded the famous University of Paris, founded by Charlemagne, and suppressed at the time of the great Revolution. The educational institutes connected with it are situated in the Quartier Latin, on the south side of the river, where are the Sorbonne, a large building erected by cardinal Richelieu, and in which gratuitous lectures are delivered by eminent professors; the Collége de France, L'Ecole Polytechnique, schools of medicine and law, and other educational establishments. There are a large number of public schools devoted to different branches of literature, science, and art. L'Ecole des Beaux Arts (school of fine arts) occupies a fine building, on the southern bank of the river, near the Pont de la Concorde. The most famous literary and scientific association is the Institute de France, divided into five academies or sections, and including in its list of members and associates the most distinguished scholars and philosophers of Europe. The Palais de l'Institut is on the Quai Conti, on the south bank of the river, with a façade surmounted by a dome. It was erected in 1662.

Places of Amusement.—The most superb theatre is the Opera-house, completed in 1875, at an immense cost, and unrivalled for magnificence of decoration and completeness of construction. It is situated between the Boulevard des Capucines, and the Boulevard Haussmann. There are about 33 theatres, some of the highest rank in connection with the dramatic art, a capacious hippodrome, or circus, and innumerable minor places of amusement. The most frequented public gardens are the Mabille, in the Champs Elysées; the Château Rouge, near Montmartre, and the Closerie des Lilas, on the southern side, near the students' quarter.

Public Parks and Gardens.—To the west of the city, beyond the fortifications, is the Bois de Boulogne, the most fashionable resort, a beautiful laid out park, with large flower-beds and avenues. It was presented by Napoleon III to the municipality in 1852. It occupies about 2,500 acres, or more than six times the area of Hyde Park. The Champs Elysées, and the gardens of the Tuileries and Luxembourg, are most attractive, and parks have been formed at Monceaux (26 acres), and on the hill of Chaumont, near La Villette. The Jardin des Plantes, a famous botanic garden and zoological collection, is on the south side of the river, near the Pont d'Austerlitz. On the north bank of the river, opposite the Champ de Mars, is a planted eminence, the Trocadero, commanding fine views, and a favourite resort.

Markets.—The Great Central Markets, or Halles, are near the eastern side of the Rue du Louvre. They cover an area of nearly 20 acres, and consist of 14 pavilions for the various trades; and beneath them are extensive vaults, with tanks for live fish, and storehouses for vegetables, communicating with underground railways. The Halle aux Vins, or wine-market, where 500,000 casks of wine can be stowed, is on the southern bank of the river, near Pont de Constantine, occupying a large parallelogram divided by streets bearing appropriate names, as Rue de Champagne, Rue de Bourgogne, &c. The Marché aux Fleurs, or flower-market, is a very attractive resort. The great cattle market is in the northern suburb of La Villette, adjoining the Canal de l'Ourcq, and in connection with the leading lines of railway. On the opposite bank of the canal is the Abattoir, or general slaughter-house, covering 67 acres, and constructed in 1865. There are a horse market and a dog market, and a very large and attractive market for articles of dress, the Marché du Temple, carried on in two very large iron pavilions, surmounted by a dome.

Hospitals and Benevolent Associations.—The oldest hospital is the Hôtel Dieu, situated partly on the south side of the Ile de la Cité, and partly on the southern bank of the river; and there are besides, Hôpital de la Pitié, Hôpital de la Charité, three other general hospitals, and hospitals for special diseases in women and children. The hospices, or almshouses, are also numerous, the largest being the Saltpetrière, for old women, the largest establishment of the kind in the world; the Bicêtre, for old men, a foundling asylum, and two for incurables.

Prisons.—The largest prison is La Force; the Pelagie receives political offenders and convicts whose terms of imprisonment are short; St. Lazare is for females; the Nouveau Bicêtre for convicts sentenced to imprisonment for life; the Madelonnettes for children; and the Conciergerie, previously mentioned, for prisoners awaiting trial.

Cemeteries.—There are three large and 12 smaller cemeteries. The largest and most famous is Père-la-Chaise, on the eastern side of the city. It extends over 200 acres, and occupies the site of the house and grounds of a great establishment of Jesuits, Mount Louis, of which the favourite confessor of Louis XII., Père-la-Chaise, was principal. The site was purchased for a national cemetery in 1814, and many eminent persons have been buried there. Beneath the southern part of the city are the catacombs, quarries whence stone for building Paris was obtained, and which were appropriated as a place of burial in 1784, and in them are deposited the bones collected from the ancient cemeteries of Paris. At the eastern end of the Ile de la Cité is the Morgue, where the bodies of unknown persons who have met with violent deaths are exposed for recognition.

Railways.—Within the line of fortifications is the Chemin de Fer de Ceinture, or circular railway, entirely surrounding the city, with numerous stations. The leading lines of railway have stations within the city. The northern (du Nord) station, at the northern end of the Boulevard de Magenta, is a handsome building, with nine statues, symbolising Paris and other great towns on the line. The eastern station (de l'Est) is near it. The western lines (L'Ouest) have two stations, one on the north side of the river, in the Rue St. Lazare, and the other on the south side, in the Boulevard de Mont Parnasse. Farther to the south-east, on the same side of the river, near the Boulevard St. Jacques, is the Sceaux station, and on the same side, near the river and Pont d'Austerlitz, the Orleans station, with a large central hall, 540 feet long and 80 feet wide. The station of the Vincennes railway is on the north side of the Place de la Bastille, and nearer the river and the northern end of the Pont d'Austerlitz the station of the Lyons railway.

Water Supply and Sewerage.—A supply of nearly 900,000,000 gallons daily, from the river Dhuis, by an aqueduct 80 miles long; and water is obtained also from the Marne and St. Maur; the water of the Seine is filtered, and there are several artesian wells, supplying the public fountains, 200 in number, from which water is taken in carts and buckets to supply those districts in which there is no regular service. Recently, extensive underground reservoirs have been constructed at Montsouris, which receive water brought from the Vanne, in Morbihan, 140 miles distant. The sewers are of modern construction. There are more than 350 miles now open, and 250 more in course of construction. A remarkable feature of the system is a gigantic syphon, three feet in diameter, passing under the bed of the Seine.

Traffic.—There are at work in the streets of Paris about 10,000 hackney carriages, 730 omnibuses, and 250 tramcars. There are 30 lines of tramways, and 33 omnibus lines.

Municipal Government.—Paris is divided into 20 arrondissements, subdivided each into four quarters. Each arrondissement has a mayor and juge de paix (magistrate), and each quarter a commissary of police. Over all are the prefect of the Seine, with a municipal council, and the prefect of the police. There are 64 parishes. The police force for the protection of the streets consists of nearly 5,000 gardiens de la paix, and there is an efficient fire brigade of 1,300 sapeurs pompeurs.

Pop.—The census taken 1886 gave the number of inhabitants as 2,254,306, showing a regular but moderate increase. It is estimated that there are about 60,000 Protestants, 20,000 Jews, and 30,000 of other creeds, the remainder being Roman Catholics.

Environs.—Interesting places a short distance from Paris are Asnières, Denis (St.), Germain-en-Laye (St.), Neuilly-sur-Seine, Versailles, and Vincennes. Arcueil, a favourite holiday resort, is 4 miles S. of Paris, notable for the aqueduct, built in 1624 by Marie de' Medicis, to supply the fountains of the metropolis. Passy, just outside the walls on the west, is on the banks of the Seine, and has many hotels and taverns.

Lat. 48° 50′ N. Lon. 2° 20′ E.

History.—Julius Cæsar describes Lutetia (the original of Paris, occupying the Ise de la Cité) as a collection of mud huts. In the 4th century it was known as Parisia, from the Celtic tribe, the Parisii, who occupied it. Clovis selected it for his capital in the 6th century, and in the 10th century, under Hugh Capet, it became the capital of the French monarchy. In the 15th century it suffered terribly from sieges, famine, and pestilence, and under Henry IV. and Louis XIII. and XIV., the city grew in size and importance, many fine new buildings being erected. Under the first Napoleon several great works were completed, and during the reign of Louis Philippe, the city made wonderful progress. But it was reserved for Napoleon III. and the energetic prefect of the Seine, Baron Haussmann, to make Paris the splendid city it is to-day. About £30,000,000 was expended in buildings and public works. Spacious boulevards took the place of narrow squalid streets, sewers were constructed, and the city assumed an entirely new aspect. The German siege of 1870, and the subsequent outrages of the Commune, inflicted immense injury. A statue of the Republic, 70 feet high, was erected in the Place de la Republique, formerly the Place Chateau d'Eau, in 1880.

PARIS, Matthew, an English chronicler, was a monk of the order of Benedictines, at St. Albans. He was a man of great knowledge and integrity, and was employed by king Hakon, of Norway, in reforming the monasteries of that country, which service he discharged with wisdom and zeal. His principal work is a "History of England from the Conquest." The work was interrupted by the death of the author, but continued to the death of Henry III. by William Rishanger, another monk. It was published by archbishop Parker, at London, in 1571.

Born at the close of the 12th century; died at St. Albans, 1259.

PARIS, Counts of, a French title created by Charlemagne in the 8th century. After remaining extinct during eight centuries, it was revived by Louis Philippe, and bestowed upon his grandson, son of the duke of Orleans.

PARIS, also called Alexander, one of the leading characters of the Homeric poems, was the son of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba, and, says Homer, was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country. When his mother, in her pregnancy, had dreamed that she should bring forth a torch which would set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold her offspring would prove the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child as soon as born. The slave, touched with humanity, spared his life, but exposed him on Mount Ida, where a she-bear suckled him, and until he was found by Agelaus, a shepherd. Paris gave early proofs of courage, and from his care in protecting the flocks of Mount Ida against the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). His subsequent adventures—acting as an umpire in awarding the golden apple to the most beautiful of the three goddesses, Here, Athene, and Aphrodite, and his abduction of Helen, wife of Menelaus, king of Lacedemonia, which led to the Trojan war—are well known.

PARIS-DUVERNEY, Joseph, a French financier, who reduced the national debt of France by nearly one half. In 1724 he proposed a measure for the abolition of pauperism, and afterwards suggested to Louis XV. the marriage with Maria Leczinsky. In 1726 he was imprisoned in the Bastile; but afterwards regained his liberty, and was reinstated in the favour of the court. This capitalist helped both Voltaire and Beaumarchais to make considerable fortunes.

Died 1770.

PARK, Mungo, explorer in Africa, was the son of a substantial Scotch farmer, who gave him a good education. In his 15th year he was apprenticed to a surgeon at Selkirk, and remained in that capacity for three years. In 1789 he went to the university of Edinburgh, and after completing his professional education there, repaired to London, where, through the introduction of Sir Joseph Banks, he obtained an appointment as assistant-surgeon to the Worcester, East Indiaman. In this vessel he sailed for Sumatra in 1792, and upon his return, in the following year he published an account of some new fishes which he had observed upon that coast. Soon afterwards, Sir Joseph Banks introduced him to the African Association, by whom Park was engaged to solve a problem which was engaging the minds of geographers; viz., the existence and course of the river Niger. In 1795 he left England and reached Pisania, some 200 miles up the river Gambia, at which place he stayed several months, acquiring the Mandingo language. Setting out at length, he penetrated as far as Yarra, a frontier town of Ludamar, where he was detained by the chief for five months; at the end of which time he made his escape, with a horse, a few articles of clothing, and a pocket compass. Thus scantily equipped, he pushed on to Sego, and thence explored the river Joliba down to Saba; after which he proceeded as far as Kamalia, a Mandingo town 500 miles from any European settlement. There he was prostrated by fever; which passed away in a month; but it was five more before Park could obtain the means of travelling to Pisania. This last place was reached, however, after an absence of nineteen months, and he was there received by a friend "as one risen from the dead." After his return to London, where he was warmly received by the scientific public, he commenced the preparation of a narrative of his travels. The work was completed and published in 1799, and was highly successful. In 1801 he commenced practice as a surgeon at Peebles, in Scotland; having in the meanwhile married the daughter of his old master at Selkirk. In 1805 the government sent him to Africa, in command of an expedition, the object of which was to prove whether the Congo and the Niger were one stream. Park proposed to cross from the Gambia to the Niger, and then to sail down that river to the ocean. In May, 1805, Park and his party, consisting of his brother-in-law, a surgeon, a draughtsman, five artisans, from the royal dockyards, thirty-five privates of the Royal African corps, under the command of lieutenant Martyn, and a Mandigo guide, left Pisania. After penetrating beyond the Gambia, the party went on to Foulah Dougou, by which time eleven white men had died. In an eight days' march from Foulah Dougou to Sego, twenty-six men were lost by the rains, damps, &c. Upon his departure from Sansanding, Park wrote to the colonial secretary: "I am sorry to say that of forty-four Europeans who left the Gambia in perfect health, five only are at present alive; viz., three soldiers (one deranged in his mind), lieutenant Martyn, and myself. We had no contest whatever with the natives, nor was any one of us killed by wild animals or any other accidents. Your lordship will recollect that I always spoke of the rainy season with horror, as being extremely fatal to Europeans; and our journey will furnish a melancholy proof of it." After leaving Sansanding, Park proceeded towards Houssa, and from that time, neither he nor his companions were ever again seen. Their fate was narrated by their guide, who declared that after Park had quitted Yaouri, the chief of that place falsely stated that the white men had gone away without leaving the usual present. The king became enraged at this, and put the guide, who had been left behind, in prison, and sent a number of armed men to intercept Park and his companions at the narrows of the river. When the guide obtained his release, he gathered from a slave who had been with Park, that the white men's boat had been drawn into a rapid whilst they were endeavouring to effect their escape from a party of the natives who were attacking them. Mungo Park was possessed of many qualities calculated to raise him to high distinction as a traveller, had his career not been so unhappily and so prematurely brought to an end. He was of an athletic frame, had a fair share of scientific knowledge, was cool, courageous, and self-possessed, and, above all, was scrupulously veracious in his observations.

Born at Fowlshiels, near Selkirk, Scotland, 1771; died at Boussa, 1805.

PARKE, a county of Indiana, United States. Area, 440 square miles. Pop. 20,000. The capital is Rockville.

PARKER, MATTHEW, par'-ker, English prelate, who was educated in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and was ordained priest in 1527. He was favourable to the doctrines of the Reformers, and was appointed chaplain to Anne Boleyn, and dean of the monastic college of Stoke-Clare, in Suffolk; and, in the succeeding reign, was chosen master of his college. Three years afterwards he married, and about the same time published his defence of the marriage of priests. In 1552 he was presented by Edward VI. to a canonry in the cathedral of Lincoln; but in the reign of Mary he was deprived of his preferments. On the accession of Elizabeth, Dr. Parker was preferred to the archbishopric of Canterbury. The archbishop was zealous in promoting the Reformation, and in restraining the encroachments of the Puritans. He superintended the improved translation of the Scriptures, called the Bishops' Bible, which was completed in 1568, and had the chief share in arranging the Prayer-book. He was particularly versed in Saxon literature and the early English history, and published an edition of Matthew Paris, a treatise on the Antiquities of the English Church, a translation of the Psalms into English metre, and other works.

Born at Norwich, 1504; died 1575.

PARKER, SAMUEL, an English prelate, who received his education at Wadham College, Oxford. His father was a member of the High Court of Justice, and one of the barons of the Exchequer during the Commonwealth; but, at the Restoration, he became king's serjeant-at-law. The son followed his example, by complying with all changes. He was at first a zealous Puritan, but conformed to the Church of England, and obtained preferment. In the reign of James II., he was made, for his servility to the king's arbitrary measures, bishop of Oxford and privy counsellor. He was also constituted president of Magdalen College, in violation of the privileges of that society. He wrote the "History of His Own Time." Andrew Marvell, in his "Rehearsal Transposed," held Parker up to ridicule. The bishop replied, but with little effect. He is said to have contemplated, with James II., the placing of the English Church under the authority of the pope.

Born at Northampton, 1640; died at Oxford, 1687.

PARKER, THEODORE, American theologian and preacher, son of a small farmer and mechanic. As a boy he worked on the farm and in the workshop, and by teaching in a school obtained means to enter Harvard College when he was 20 years old, and he afterwards became pastor of a Unitarian congregation at West Roxbury. Between the years 1840—1843, he contributed extensively to the "Christian Examiner," and about 1844, formed a collection of his most important articles, which were published under the title of "Critical and Miscellaneous Writings." He shortly afterwards gave to the public a "Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion," wherein he declared his views relative to the authority of the Church, the infallibility of the Scriptures, and as to the divine attributes of our Saviour. For this expression of his sentiments, the Unitarian communions of Boston rejected him, —and, his health being weak, he made a tour in Europe, and on his return to Boston he placed himself at the head of a congregation called the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society at Boston. A rationalist minister belonging to no sect, a theoretical politician belonging to no party, his sermons, delivered occasionally to very large congregations, were filled with allusions to every possible topic,—questions of politics or morality, political or domestic economy, war, reform, or slavery. In 1852 he published "Sermons of Theism, Atheism, and Popular Theology," and "Discourses, Addresses, and occasional Sermons." His latest works were "Ten Sermons on Religion," and "Old Age." In 1859 he was attacked with bleeding from the lungs, and made a voyage to Mexico, where he wrote "Experience of a Minister," and then went to Italy, where he died.

Born at Lexington, Massachusetts, 1810; died at Florence, 1859.

PARKER, SIR HYDE, English admiral greatly distinguished himself as commander of the British fleet, in an action with the Dutch off the Doggerbank, in August, 1781. In 1783 he was appointed to the command of the British fleet in the East Indies, but the ship in which he sailed was lost with all on board.

Died 1783.

PARKER, SIR HYDE, second son of the preceding, distinguished himself in the American War, and in 1795 commanded the British fleet in the West Indies. In 1801 he was appointed to the chief command of the Baltic fleet to act against Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. The second in command was Nelson, who disobeyed Parker's orders, and by doing so gained the victory of Copenhagen.

Born 1734; died 1807.

PARKER, SIR WILLIAM, English admiral, who entered the navy at a very early age, and, in 1796, assisted in the attack made upon St. Domingo. In 1801 he obtained post rank; a few years after which, he, with the Amazon frigate, engaged the Belle Poule, in which, after an obstinate fight, he had the advantage. Other acts of bravery,—the taking of Ferrol in 1809 particularly—won for him the order of the Bath. In 1830 he became rear-admiral, and was sent with an English fleet to the Tagus. Between the years 1834-1841 he acted as lord of the admiralty, but in the latter year succeeded admiral Elliott in the command of the naval operations in China. With the co-operation of Lord Gough, he captured Chusan, Ningpo, and, forcing the entrance of the Yellow River, appeared before Nankin. For these services he was created a baronet in 1844. During the revolutions of 1848, he commanded the Mediterranean fleet, and in the autumn of 1849 was sent with an English fleet to the Dardanelles, to encourage the sultan in his resistance to the demands of Austria and Prussia, with respect to the Hungarian refugees; and in 1850, by blockading the Greek ports, compelled the government to comply with the demands of Britain. In 1854 he became port-admiral at Plymouth. He was made admiral of the Blue in 1851, of the White in 1853, of the Red in 1858, and rear-admiral of the United Kingdom in 1862.

Born at Almington Hall, Staffordshire, 1781; died 1866.

PARKER, RICHARD, an English seaman, who was the chief of the mutineers at the Nore in 1797. He was a native of Exeter, and had received a good education: after which he entered the navy and became a midshipman, but was reduced in rank for some misconduct. Having a good address and great fluency of speech, he was chosen principal of the delegates, when the sailors rose on account of their wages and prize-money; on which occasion he assumed the command of the fleet, and was called admiral Parker. He exercised great authority for some time, to the alarm of the nation; but when the insurrection was suppressed, he was tried and executed on board the Sandwich.

Died 1797.

PARKER, a county of Texas, United States, Area, 900 square miles. Pop. 15,870. The capital is Weatherford.

PARKERSBURG, a port of Virginia, United States, on the Ohio river, at the mouth of the Little Kanawha, 65 miles N. of Charleston. Manf. Petroleum, chemicals, machinery, leather, tobacco, and pottery. Pop. 7,000.

PARKHURST, JOHN, park'-hurst, a learned English divine, who was educated at Rugby and Clare Hall, Cambridge, and afterwards settled at Epsom, in Surrey. He published a Hebrew and English lexicon, which was for many years a standard work, but is now superseded, and wrote an answer to Dr. Priestley, on the Pre-existence of Christ, and a pamphlet against John Wesley, on the doctrine of Assurance.

Born at Catesby, Northamptonshire, 1728; died at Epsom, Surrey, 1797.

PARMA, ALESSANDRO, Duke of. (See FARNESE.)

PARMA, a province of the kingdom of Italy, and formerly, with the province of Piacenza, an independent duchy to the south of the Lombardian and Venetian provinces. In the southern part are mountains belonging to the Apennines, the loftiest peaks being Monte Alpe di Succisio, 7,000 feet, and Monte Parma and Monte Orsajo, each more than 5,250 feet. Lower spurs of the range trend northward, sinking into a fertile plain, gently undulating and sloping towards the Po. There are noble forests of oak and chestnut on the mountains. Cattle and poultry are reared, and silk and cheese exported. The capital is PARMA.

Rivers.—The Parma, Enza, Chiavenna, Ardo, Taro, Trebbia, and other small streams, all discharging into the Po, which forms the northern boundary of the province.

Minerals.—Marble, alabaster, salt, and petroleum.

Area.—1,251 square miles.

Pop.—272,942.

History.—In 1543 Pope Paul III. formed the duchy and conferred it upon his natural son, Pier Luigi Farnese. In 1735 Don Carlos of Spain, who had obtained the duchy, exchanged it with Austria for the Two Sicilies. In 1748 Spain obtained possession, and the Infante Don Philip became duke. On the death of his son Ferdinand, in 1802, his dominions were taken possession of by the French, and in 1805 formed into the department of Taro. In 1814, by the treaty of Paris, the ex-empress, Maria Louisa, became sovereign duchess, and on her death in 1847 the duke of Lucca succeeded. In 1848, he was driven out by a revolution, but his son was restored by the Austrians in 1849. He was assassinated in 1854, and his widow, Louise Marie de Bourbon, daughter of the last Duke de Berri, carried on the government as regent for her son until 1859, when she was compelled by the outbreak of the war between Sardinia and Austria to leave the country. In 1860, the duchy was annexed to the new kingdom of Italy.

PARMA, a city of Italy, and the capital of the above province, divided by the Parma into two unequal parts, 75 miles S. of Milan. Its circumference is about three miles, inclosed by walls and ditches with bastions, and entered by five gates. The streets are broad, straight, and tolerably clean, the principal being a part of the old Roman Via Æmilia. In the centre of the town is a handsome square, surrounded with arcades or piazzas. The cathedral, built in the Lombard style of architecture, is remarkable chiefly for its dome and some splendid frescoes. It was completed in 1806. The Baptistery, built in the 13th century, is one of the finest in Italy, and there are nine churches, one of which, San Giovanni, is a fine cruciform structure, with a dome. The Farnese palace is an irregular and unattractive building, and connected with it is the great theatre, an edifice on the plan of the ancients, built of wood, and in a dilapidated condition. There are a new theatre, a large and valuable public library, a museum, botanic garden, and academy of fine art, possessing valuable works by Correggio and Raffaelle. Manf. Silk, cotton, and fustian, sugar, wax candles, cutlery, confectionary, musical instruments, porcelain, and crystal articles. There is an annual silk fair. Pop. 42,332.

PARMAGUDI, par-ma-goo-dee', a town of India, province of Madras, 21 miles N.W. of Madura, on the right bank of the Vigay. Manf. Fine cloth, silks, muslins, silk carpets, vestures, and turbans. Pop. 5,000.

PARMENIDES of Elis, par-men'-i-dees, a Greek philosopher, of the Eleatic school. He asserted the rotundity of the earth, which he placed in the centre of the system. He wrote a poem, "Nature," which contains his philosophical system, the design being to show the necessity of the existence of a supreme Power, the nature of which is inconceivable by our faculties.

Born about 513 B.C.

PARMENIO, par-mé'-ni-o, a celebrated Macedonian general under Philip and Alexander. (See ALEXANDER.)

Died 330 B.C.

PARMENTIER, JEAN, par-man'-te-ai, a French navigator, who was the first who conducted vessels to the coast of Brazil. He was well skilled in astronomy, and drew several good maps.

Born at Dieppe, 1494; died at Sumatra, 1543.

PARMEGIANO. (See MAZZUOLI, FRANCISCO.)

PARNAHYBA, par'-na-hi'-ba, a town of Brazil, on the bank of the river of the same name, near its mouth. It is an entrepôt for leather and cotton. Pop. 10,000.

PARNAHYBA, a river of Brazil, rising about 11° S., and after a course of 750 miles, entering the Atlantic by five mouths, in lat. 2° 50′ S., lon. 40° W. It forms the boundary line between the provinces of Piauhi and Maranhao.

PARNASSUS, par-nas'-sus, a famous mountain of Greece, in Phocis, to the N.W. of Mount Helicon. It has three steep peaks covered with snow, the lofticst being 8,000 feet high. The modern name is Zagora. This mountain is celebrated in Greek legend as being the seat of the Muses, for its Corycian cave, and its Castalian stream, which runs between it and a neighbouring peak.

PARNELL, THOMAS, par-nel', an Irish poet and divine, who was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took his degree of M.A. and entered into orders. He obtained a living in Ireland, and the archdeaconry of Clogher. He was the friend and correspondent of Pope, Swift, Gay, Arbuthnot, and other eminent wits of the time of Queen Anne. Dr. Parnell wrote the Life of Homer for Pope's translation. His poems were published in one volume; the best known is that entitled the "Hermit." He also wrote some papers in the "Spectator."

Born at Dublin, 1679; died at Chester, 1717.

PARNY, EVARISTE DÉSIRÉ DESFORGES par'-ne, a French poet, usually styled "the Tibullus of France." He was destined for the church, but entered the army, became captain of dragoons, and, as aide-de-camp, accompanied the governor-general of the French East Indies to Pondicherry. In 1786 he quitted the military service and retired to an estate in France, where he gave himself up to depicting, in verse, an all-absorbing passion for a young and beautiful Creole lady, who, however, preferred to marry a planter, who had more money than the poet.

Born in the Isle of Bourbon, 1753; died in France, 1814.

PAROS, pa'-ros, an island in the central part of the Grecian archipelago, W. of Naxos. It is 15 miles long, and 9 miles wide. The surface is mountainous, but tolerably fertile. Pro. Cotton, corn, wine, fruit, and vegetables. In ancient times Paros owed its chief celebrity to its marble, so famed for its whiteness and solidity. Port Nassau, on the north coast, is one of the best harbours in the archipelago. The chief town is Parekhia, on the west coast. Pop. 6,000.

PARR, CATHERINE, par, sixth wife of Henry VIII., was the daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, and received, according to the custom of that age, a learned education. She had been twice married before marrying the king, first to Edward Borough, and the second time to Lord Latimer. She was a friend of the Reformation, on which account Bishop Gardiner and other zealots of the Romish church endeavoured to effect her ruin; but, by her prudence, she preserved the king's favour till his death. In 1547 she married Sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who is said to have treated her so ill as to cause her death. She wrote Prayers, Meditations, and other religious pieces.

Born 1509; died 1548.

PARR, THOMAS, a Shropshire peasant, who lived to the age of 152 years and 9 months. At the age of 100 he did penance for an illegitimate child, and at 120 he married a second wife, by whom he had issue. In 1635 he was brought to London by Lord Arundel, and introduced at court to King Charles I.; but the change of air, and mode of living, particularly drinking wine, occasioned his death the same year.

Born 1483; died 1635.

PARR, SAMUEL, a learned English divine, who was destined for the profession of surgery; but a decided inclination for the study of the ancient classics induced his father to send him to Cambridge, where he pursued a very brilliant career, which was, however, cut short by the death of his parent in 1767. He next became assistant master in Harrow school, and after the death of the master, Dr. Sumner, offered himself as candidate for the appointment. He was unsuccessful, but in 1777 he became master of Colchester school, and having been ordained, held two curacies. In 1778 he was appointed master of Norwich school, but in 1786 settled at the small living of Hatton, in Warwickshire, where the remainder of his life was spent. He was a man of vast learning and strong political views as a Whig; but, although he left a mass of writings of great erudition, no great work emanated from him. His reputation rests on his conversational powers, his dogmatic and often arrogant and egotistical style, and a remarkable epigrammatic power of repartee.

Born at Harrow-on-the-hill, 1747; died 1825.

PARRAMATTA, par-ra-mat'-ta, a town of New South Wales, Australia, and, next to Sydney, the oldest town in the colony. It is situated on the Parramatta river (really an elongation of Port Jackson), 14 miles W. of Sydney. It was at one time known as Rosehill, but the aboriginal name was afterwards adopted. The town is well laid out, and the public buildings are good. They include an episcopal church, six chapels for dissenters, a Roman Catholic chapel, a government house, benevolent asylum, lunatic asylum, a large jail, and fine public schools. There is a beautiful park planted with the largest oaks in Australia. The town is lighted with gas, and there are 36 miles of streets. A railway, connecting the town with Sydney, was opened in 1855. Manf. Tweeds and woollen cloth. Pop. 8,432.

PARRAS, par'-ras, a town of Mexico, state of Coahuila, near a lake of the same name. It is well built, with many good houses, and a fine public promenade. Good wine is produced in the neighbourhood. Pop. 9,000.

PARRHASIUS, par-ra'-se-us, a Greek painter, who was a native of Ephesus, but became a citizen of Athens, and was the contemporary and rival of Zeuxis. He was remarkable for the power of giving his figures the expression of strong passions. There is a story that he slowly tortured a man to death, for the sake of copying with accuracy the agonized expression of the countenance and the writhings of the muscles. But this horrible legend (which forms the subject of a powerful poem by N. P. Willis, the American writer,) is no doubt apocryphal. In an allegorical picture, he represented the people of Athens with all the distinctive traits of their national character; for which he was crowned "Prince of Painters."

Lived in the 5*th century* B.C.

PARRHASIUS, AULUS JANUS, an eminent grammarian, whose real name was Parisio, which he altered, according to the pedantic custom of the age, to Parrhasius. He was the founder of the Consentine College in his native city, and taught grammar and rhetoric at Milan with great reputation. Some commentaries upon Horace, Ovid, and Cicero came from his pen.

Born at Cosenza, near Naples, 1470; died 1534.

PARROCEL, JOSEPH, par'-ro-sel, an eminent French painter and engraver, who studied first under one of his brothers, and afterwards under Bournignon, the famous battle-painter. He was a member of the French Academy of Painting. Parrocel painted portrait, history, and battles; he also engraved in a good style.

Born at Brignoles, Provence, 1648; died 1704.

PARRY, SIR WILLIAM EDWARD, an English navigator, the son of a physician, and intended for the medical profession, but, preferring the life of a sailor, entered, in 1803, the royal navy on board the Ville de Paris flag-ship, of the Channel fleet. After seeing a good deal of service in the Baltic, in the northern seas, and upon the American coast, he became lieutenant. About this time he wrote a valuable treatise on "Nautical Astronomy by Night." He returned to England in 1817, and shortly afterwards was appointed to the command of the Alexander, one of two ships sent out under Captain Ross, for the purpose of ascertaining the probabilities of a north-west passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The expedition set sail from the Thames in April, 1818, and, on the 30th of August, in the same year, reached Lancaster Sound, which was found to be free from ice; but, instead of proceeding, Ross retraced his course, and set sail for England. The Admiralty subsequently discovered that lieutenant Parry's views were totally opposed to those of his late commander; whereupon he was appointed to the command of another expedition, during which he discovered Barrow Strait, Melville Island, Prince Regent's Inlet, and the Wellington Channel. He also gained a reward of £5,000 for penetrating within the Arctic circle. In November, 1820, he reached England, and was soon afterwards promoted to the rank of commander, and created F.R.S., &c. His experiences were given to the world in the following year, in a work entitled "Journal of a Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage," which was produced under the authority of the lords of the Admiralty. In May, 1821, he went out in command of a second expedition to the Arctic regions, during which he discovered the Fury and Hecla Strait, and, after an absence of nearly three years, returned to England. A record of this voyage was given in his work entitled "Journal of a Second Expedition for the Discovery of a North-West Passage." About the same time he received the appointment of acting hydrographer to the Board of Admiralty. In 1824 he again sailed northward as commander of a third expedition, which, however, met with much less success than his former ones. He was absent little more than a year, during which one of the two exploring vessels was wrecked. In 1826 Captain Parry published his third journal, and soon afterwards became hydrographer to the Admiralty. In 1827 he submitted a proposal for reaching the north pole by means of a land expedition in flat-bottomed boats, and was accordingly sent out in command of the Hecla, in 1827. When the expedition reached Treurenburg Bay, on the north coast of Spitzbergen, two flat-bottomed boats were despatched across the ice, one under the orders of himself, the other under lieutenant Ross. After undergoing great hardships, the boats were drawn over the ice until the latitude of 82° 45′ was attained—the nearest point to the pole reached previous to the expedition under captain Nares, in 1875. After an absence of 61 days from the ship, the boats returned, and shortly afterwards the Heela sailed for England. A narrative of this expedition, which closed the labours of captain Parry in the Arctic regions, was published in 1827, with the title "Narrative of an Attempt to reach the North Pole in Boats fitted for the purpose." In 1829 he went out to Australia as commissioner of the Agricultural Company of that colony, and remained there until the year 1834. Meanwhile he had been created a knight, and, in 1837, was appointed to supervise the packet service between Liverpool and Ireland. Between the years 1837—1846, he acted as comptroller of the steam machinery for the royal navy. In 1852 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the White, and, in 1853, became lieutenant-governor of Greenwich Hospital, an office he filled until his death. He received the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford at the same time as the gallant sir John Franklin.

Born at Bath, 1790; died at Ems, Germany, 1855.

PARRY'S GROUP, a number of small islands, forming the north cluster of the Bonun Islands, in the North Pacific Ocean, near Japan. They belong to Great Britain, and a small settlement from the Sandwich Islands has been made on them. Lat. 27° 45′ N. Lon. 142° 7′ E.

PARSEVAL-DESCHENES, ALEXANDER FERDINAND, par'-se-val dai-shain, French admiral, who entered the navy in 1804, and in the following year served on board the Bucentaur, at the battle of Trafalgar. After many years of gallant service, he became rear-admiral in 1840, and six years later attained the grade of vice-admiral; the appointments of maritime prefect at Toulon, inspector-general of the navy at the ports of Toulon, L'Orient, and Cherbourg, following in rapid succession. In 1854 he received the command of the French Baltic fleet, and, together with the English armament under Sir Charles Napier, destroyed the fortresses at Bomarsund. At the close of the same year he was created admiral, and in virtue of his rank became a member of the senate. In 1844 he was nominated grand officer of the Legion of Honour. M. Deschenes was a thorough seaman, and a man of large scientific acquirements.

Born at Paris, 1790; died 1860.

PARSONS, or PERSONS, ROBERT, par'-sons, an English Jesuit, who was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, of which he became bursar and dean in 1572, but being charged with embezzling the college money, he went to Rome and turned Catholic. He there obtained leave from the pope to establish a seminary for the education of English students designed for missionaries for the propagation of the Roman Catholic faith in their native country. Parsons frequently visited England, where he endeavoured to foment sedition, and a price was set upon his head. He was a subtle disputant, and wrote several polemical books, and others on practical divinity.

Born in Somersetshire, 1546; died at Rome, 1610.

PARSONSTOWN. (See BIRR.)

PARTANNA, par-tan'-na, a market-town of Sicily, province of Trapani, 36 miles S.W. of Palermo. Pop. 13,000.

PARTHENAY, par'-te-nai, a town of France, department Deux Sèvres, on the right bank of the Thouet, 25 miles N.E. of Niort. The most remarkable buildings are a church erected in the 9th century, and the gate of St. Jacques (12th century), which has two elliptical towers, 65 feet high. Manf. Cloth, serge, druggets, and leather. Pop. 4,800.

PARTHENAY, ANNE DE, an accomplished lady of the illustrious French noble house of Parthenay, was the wife of Anthony de Pons, count de Marennes, who was one of the brightest ornaments of the court of Renée, daughter of Louis XII. of France, and duchess of Ferrara. This lady was a zealous Protestant, an excellent musician, and was well versed in the Greek and Latin languages.

Lived in the 16th century.

PARTHENAY, CATHERINE DE, niece of the preceding, and heiress to the lordship of Soubise, was married in 1568 to the baron de Pons, and in 1575 to René, Viscount Rohan. The famous duke de Rohan, who so courageously defended the Protestant cause in France during the civil wars of Louis XIII., was her eldest son. Catherine de Parthenay was at Rochelle in the time of its siege, and when the place surrendered, she and her daughters were sent to the castle of Niort. She published poems in 1572, and two years afterwards, a tragedy, entitled "Judith" was performed at Rochelle. She also translated the "Precepts of Isocrates" into French, and wrote some other pieces.

Born 1554; died 1631.

PARTHENOPE, par-then'-o-pe, in Greek mythology, a siren after whom the city of Neapolis (the modern Naples) is supposed to have been first named. Under the French, in 1799, the Neapolitan kingdom was for a short time known as the Parthenopean republic.

PARTHIA, par'-the-a, the ancient name of a country of Western Asia, lying to the south-east of the Caspian Sea, from which it is separated by a narrow strip known as Hyrcania. It now forms the northern portion of the Persian province of Khorassan. It was a portion of the ancient Persian empire, was conquered by Alexander the Great, and after his death formed part of the Syrian kingdom, but revolted and achieved its independence, which it retained, notwithstanding many efforts of the Romans to subdue them, until 2*x*4, when the last king, Artabanus IV., engaged in warfare with Persia, and was defeated and killed. Since then Parthia has been absorbed in Persia.

PARTICK. (See GLASGOW.)

PARTINICO, SALADI, par-tin'-e-ko, a town of Sicily, province of Palermo, 19 miles S.W. of the town of that name, in the midst of a very fertile district. Manf. Linen and woollen goods. Pop. 21,000.—There are some traces of an ancient town, supposed to be the Parthenicum, mentioned by Antoninus, in the neighbourhood.

PARUTA, PAUL, pa-roo'-ta, a Venetian noble, who became historiographer to the republic, and also discharged several great offices and embassies with honour. He wrote, in Italian, "Notes upon Tacitus," "A History of Venice," "Political Discourses," and other works.

Born at Venice, 1540; died at the same city, 1598.

PARVATI, par-va-ti', in Hindoo mythology, one of the names of Durga, consort of Siva. The name means "mountain-born."

PAS, MANASSES DE, marquis de Feuquières, pa, a French general and diplomatist, was the posthumous son of Francis de Pas, who was slain at the battle of Ivry, and distinguished himself as an able general and negotiator. At the siege of Rochelle, he was taken prisoner, and continued in confinement nine months. He was afterwards appointed ambassador to Sweden and Germany, where he showed great talents. In 1635 he commanded the army in conjunction with the duke of Saxe-Weimar.

Born at Saumur, 1590; died 1639.

PAS, ANTHONY DE, marquis de Feuquières, grandson of the preceding, was one of the greatest generals of his age. He signalised himself at the battle of Stasardo, at the taking of Suza, and other places in Italy; but he was so severe a disciplinarian that it was usually said, "He must be the bravest man living, since he slept every night in the midst of a hundred thousand enemies." His memoirs have been printed.

Born 1648; died 1711.

PASCAL, BLAISE, pas'kal, a French scholar and philosopher, whose father, president of the Cour des Aides, in Auvergne, superintended his education; but though he was himself a mathematician, he interdicted his son from that study. Young Pascal, however, in secret applied to geometry, and, without any assistance, demonstrated one of the most difficult propositions in Euclid. His father then permitted him to pursue his inclination, and, at the age of 16, the youth published his treatise on conic sections, which Descartes could not believe to be the production of a mere youth. At 19 he invented an arithmetical machine, which, though simple, was unequalled. The Toricellian experiments as to the nature of fluids, next engaged his attention, and, at the age of 24, he made considerable improvements upon it. Not long afterwards, he solved a problem proposed by Mersennus, which had perplexed all the mathematicians in Europe. His mind was now suddenly diverted to religious studies, by the influence of the Abbé Guilbert, a distinguished Jansenist, of Rouen, where the father of Pascal had settled. Becoming more abstracted from the world, he retired to the congregation of the Port Royal, where he applied to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, and composed the famous "Pensées," or "Thoughts on Religion and some other Subjects," not published until after his death. He espoused the cause of the Jansenists, and exposed their enemies, the Jesuits, to ridicule, by his work entitled "Provincial Letters," in which the principles and practices of that celebrated order were laid open in a fine strain of ridicule, and with the irresistible force of truth. Boileau and Voltaire have pronounced them the finest productions in the French language. The life of this remarkable man was written by his sister, Madame Perier. Pascal was called by Bayle "one of the sublimest spirits in the world."

Born at Clermont, Auvergne, 1623; died at Paris, 1662.

PASCHAL I., Pope, pas'-kal, was a Roman, of the name of Paschasius, and succeeded Stephen V. in 817.

Died 819.

PASCHAL II., (RANIERI,) was a native of Tuscany, and succeeded Urban II. in 1099. He had a contest with the emperor Henry IV., and also with Henry I., king of England, respecting the right of lay investitures for ecclesiastics. The former visited Rome to be crowned by the pope, who refused to perform the ceremony unless he yielded the matter in dispute. On this Henry caused Paschal to be seized by his troops, which gave so much offence to the Romans, that they rose in behalf of their pontiff, and Henry retired from Rome, but carried the pope with him. Paschal, after a captivity of two months, conceded his claim to the investitures. This concession was afterwards cancelled in two councils.

Died 1118.

PASCHAL III., (GUIDO DI CREMA,) became pope in opposition to Alexander III. in 1164, through the influence of the emperor Frederick I. He remained in possession of the papal chair while Alexander was absent at Benevento.

Died 1168.

PASCO, or CERRO DE PASCO, pas'-ko, the principal mining town of Peru, 80 miles N.E. of Lima. It is the highest city in the world, being 13,675 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. varies according to the state of the mines from 5,000 and 12,000.

PASCUARO, or PATZQUARO, pas-koo-a'-ro, a town of Mexico, on the east bank of a lake of the same name, 30 miles S.W. of Valladolid. There are copper mines in the vicinity. Pop. 6,000.

PAS-DE-CALAIS, pa'-de-ka'-lai, a department of the north of France, bounded N. and W. by the Straits of Dover and the English Channel. A ridge of hills runs from the south-east to the north-west, advancing on Cape Grisnez; in other parts the surface is level. The coast line, 80 miles long, is in general low and sandy, but on each side of Grisnez, there are lofty chalk cliffs. There are two good harbours, Calais and Boulogne. The soil is very productive, and the climate mild but variable.

Rivers.—The Scarpe and Lys, discharging into the North Sea, and the Auchie and Canche, into the English Channel.

Minerals.—Building stone and coal.

Area.—2,551 square miles.

Pop.—819,022.

Administrative Divisions and Chief Towns.—There are 6 arrondissements, and 904 communes: the chief towns are ARRAS (the capital), BOULOGNE, CALAIS, MONTREUIL, ST. OMER, and ST. POL.

PASEWALK, pasé-valk, a town of Prussia, province of Pomerania, on the Uker, 25 miles N.W. of Stettin. Manf. Cloth and leather. A large general trade is carried on. Pop. 8,200.

PASIG, pa'-sig, a town of Luzon, in the Philippines, on a river of the same name. There are a handsome church and nunnery. Pop. 16,500.

PASITANO, pa'-se-ta'-no, a town of Italy, province of Salerno, on the Gulf, and 15 miles S.W. of the town of that name. There is a small harbour, and a good trade is carried on. Pop. 4,000.

PASKEVITCH, IVAN FEDOROVITCH, pas'-ke-vitch, count of Erivan and prince of Warsaw, a Russian field-marshal, who was descended from an ancient Polish family, but was educated at St. Petersburg, and afterwards became page to the emperor Paul. His first service in the field was at the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805; in the following year he was the bearer of the Russian ultimatum to the Porte, and narrowly escaped death at Constantinople. At the assault of Brahilow he was left for dead; but was picked up, and was shortly afterwards promoted to the rank of colonel for his gallantry. In 1812 he fought against the French at Borodino; was subsequently nominated to the command of a division of the Russian army, amounting to 30,000 men, and, after sharing in the campaign in Germany, assisted at the capture of Paris. Subsequently to the peace, he made a three years' tour in Europe, as the companion of the grand-duke Michel; and, after the accession of the emperor Nicholas, was appointed to the command of the Russian army on the Persian frontier. War broke out between Russia and Persia in 1825, and Paskevitch defeated the shah's army at Elizabethpol and at Erivan. The treaty of Turkmanchay restored peace between the belligerents; but war against Turkey almost immediately followed. In 1828 he took Kars, and, in the following year Erzroum; for which services the emperor Nicholas created him field-marshal. In 1830 he fought against the Circassians, and, in the year following, succeeded marshal Diebitsch as commander of the Russian army acting against the Poles. His invariable good fortune attended his efforts, and he was soon the master of Warsaw. Elevated to the rank of prince of Warsaw, and created governor-general of Poland, he spent the subsequent sixteen years in crushing the nationality of that country, and in converting Warsaw into a strong fortress capable of overawing the Poles. In 1849 he went into Hungary as commander of a powerful Russian army, and was soon afterwards able to commence his despatches to Nicholas with the words "Hungary is at your feet." When war broke out between Turkey and Russia, Paskewitch was summoned to the field; but was wounded at the repulse of the Russians at Silistria. His want of success induced a melancholy, caused serious illness, which terminated in his death.

Born at Pultowa, 1782; died at Warsaw, 1856.

PASLEY, SIR CHARLES WILLIAM, pas'-le, British engineer officer, who at first served in the artillery, but subsequently exchanged to the engineers. He was at the defence of Gaeta, in 1806; at the siege of Copenhagen in the following year; was aide-de-camp to Sir John Moore, in Spain, in 1808-9; and chief engineer to the marquis of Huntley's division in the Walcheren expedition. At the siege of Flushing he received a wound in the thigh and an injury to the spine. He subsequently served in the Peninsular war. Among his most important publications may be mentioned—"Course of Military Instruction for the Use of the Royal Engineer Department," "Exercise of the New-decked Pontoons," invented by himself; "Rules for Conducting the Practical Operations of a Siege," and a very valuable work to architects and many sections of the general public, entitled "Observations on Limes, Cements, Mortars, Stuccoes, Concretes, &c." In 1853 he was named colonel-commandant of the royal engineers, having previously been created lieutenant-general, and a knight commander of the Bath, as well as receiving the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford.

Born 1781; died 1861.

PASO (DEL NORTE), pai'-so, a town of Mexico, department of Chihuahua, on the left bank of the Rio-Grande. There are several suburbs stretching along the river. There are ruins in the neighbourhood, showing that it was once a much larger town. Pop. 10,000.

PASQUIER, ETIENNE, pas'-ke-ai, French lawyer and historian, who pleaded so ably against Versoris, the defender of the Jesuits, that Henry III. made him advocate-general to the Chamber of Accounts. His works are, "Researches relative to the History of France," an authority upon the civil history of the old French monarchy; letters, portraits, epigrams, and epitaphs. The most famous of his poems is that called "Puce," occasioned by the author's seeing a flea on the bosom of a lady.

Born at Paris, 1529; died 1615.

PASQUOTANK, pas'-ko-tank, a county of North Carolina, United States. Area, 300 square miles. Pop. 10,369, nearly half being coloured. The capital is Elizabeth City.

PASSAGE, pas'-sej, a seaport and watering place of the county of Cork, Ireland, on the estuary of the Lee, 6 miles below Cork, with which it is connected by railway, and of which it is the shipping port and marine suburb. There are ship-building yards. Pop. 2,400.

PASSAGLIA, CARLO, pas-sa'-le-o, Italian theologian and politician. His parents were poor, and he was educated by the Jesuits, becoming a member of the society at the age of 15. His talents and energy in the schools led to his appointment as professor of canon law, and afterwards of dogmatic theology in the Roman college. When the Jesuits withdrew from Rome in 1848, he came to England, where he remained until 1851, when the college was re-established, and he resumed his professorship, which he shortly afterwards resigned, his lectures not giving satisfaction to the authorities of the order. He then for a short time occupied the chair of philosophy, (established specially for him by the pope), in the Roman university. About 1858, he quitted the society of the Jesuits, and soon afterwards, having fallen under suspicion at Rome, and his house having been searched by the police, he went to Turin, where he was received by the king of Italy, and where he established a journal. He was appointed professor of moral philosophy, and afterwards of theology, in the university of Turin, and in 1863 became a member of the Turin parliament. He was an advocate of Italian unity, and opposed the temporal power of the papacy. He wrote several learned theological works, and a reply to Renan's "Vie de Jesus."

Born at Lucca, 1812.

PASSAIC, pas-sai'-ik, a river of the United States, rising in New Jersey, and after a circuitous course of 90 miles, falling into Newark Bay.

PASSAIC, a county of New Jersey, United States. Area, 220 square miles. Pop. 68,860. The capital is Paterson.

PASSAMAQUODDY BAY, pas'-sa-ma-quod'-de, a bay which forms part of the boundary between the British province of New Brunswick and Maine, one of the United States of America. It is about 6 miles from north to south, and 12 from east to west. It forms the harbour of EASTPORT, and receives the St. Croix, Didgequash, and other rivers.

PASSAROWITZ, pas'-sa-ro-witz', a town of Servia, near the Morawa, 37 miles S.E. of Belgrade. Pop. 7,000.—Here a treaty of peace was concluded between the Turks and the imperialists in 1718.

PASSAU, pas'-sou, a town of Bavaria, at the confluence of the Inn and the Ilz with the Danube, 90 miles N.E. of Munich. Passau proper is situated on an eminence between the Danube and the Inn, and there are four suburbs, Innstadt, Anger, Fort Oberhaus (on a cliff 400 feet high), and Ilzstadt. There are a wooden bridge over the Inn, and a fine granite bridge over the Danube. Its fortifications are of considerable strength, including Fort Oberhaus, the castle of Niederhaus, and 10 detached forts. The principal public edifices are the cathedral (on the site of an older edifice, destroyed by fire in 1662), the bishop's palace, the old church of St. Michael, the post office, where the treaty of Passau (by which the Lutheran faith, recognised in the German empire) was signed in 1552, and the Jesuits' college, used as a school. There are several picture galleries, collections of antiquities, and in the cathedral square a statue of king Maximilian Joseph, erected in 1828.

PASSEMANT, CLAUDE SIMEON, pass'-mont, a French mechanician, who was bred to trade, but having a great inclination to scientific pursuits, devoted himself to the construction of mathematical instruments. He published an account of a large reflecting telescope, made by him in 1738, and also constructed an astronomical pendulum surmounted on a celestial sphere, which he presented to Louis XV.

Born at Paris, 1702; died 1769.

PASSERI, GIOVANNI BATISTA, pas'-se-re, an Italian painter and poet, the pupil of Domenichino. He wrote, "Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects" of his time, a work containing thirty-six lives.

Born at Rome, about 1610; died 1679.

PASSERONI, GIAN CARLO, pas'-se-ro'-ne, an Italian poet, who was educated under the Jesuits at Milan, and was afterwards ordained a priest. He went to Rome with Lucini, the papal nuncio, but constantly refused all preferment, choosing rather to live a studious life in a condition almost bordering upon destitution. Returning to Milan, he became a member of the Institute of the Cis-Alpine Republic, and wrote a poem entitled "The Cicerone," in which he ridiculed the follies and vices of society. The poem is highly original in style and treatment, and is so flowing and natural, that its author has been compared to Ovid. He also wrote several volumes of fables in verse, after the manner of Æsop, Phædrus, and others.

Born at Condamini, in the county of Nizza, 1713; died at Milan, 1803.

PASSIONEI, DOMENICO, pas'-se-o-nai-e, an Italian cardinal, was of an illustrious family at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino. He formed a rich library and collection of manuscripts. In 1706 he went to Paris, where he was much respected, particularly by Montfaucon: thence he went to Holland, and was at the congress at Utrecht in 1712. He was employed in various negotiations, particularly in Switzerland, of which he published an account. He pronounced the funeral oration of Prince Eugene, and was made archbishop of Ephesus. His library was purchased by the Augustine monastery.

Born 1682; died at Frascati, 1761.

PASSOEROEAN, or PASSAROEWANG, pas-so'-re-an, a province of the eastern part of Java. The soil, except in the hilly parts, is generally fertile. Coffee, sugar, rice, cotton, tobacco, and indigo are cultivated. The province is divided into three governments, Passoerean, Bangil, and Malang. Area, about 180 square miles. Pop. 310,000

PASSOEREAN, the capital of the above province, near the northern shore, on the strait of Madura. The streets are broad, planted with tamarind trees, and there are good houses in the European style, and handsome residences of the native nobility. There is a large market place, and an active trade is carried on. Pop. Unascertained.

PASSY. (See PARIS.)

PASTA, GIUDITTA, pas'-ta, an Italian singer, who was of Hebrew extraction, and studied music, first under the chapel-master of the cathedral at Como, and afterwards at the Conservatoire of Milan. In 1816 she appeared at the Italian Opera of Paris, and afterwards passed to London, but obtained only a small amount of success in both these cities. This partial failure caused her to return to Italy for the purpose of increasing her musical knowledge. In 1820 she again sang at several of the principal Italian opera-houses, and everywhere met with an enthusiastic reception. At Paris, where she re-appeared in the following year, she achieved the greatest triumphs as a vocalist, and when she repaired to London, was greeted with a brilliant reception. After reigning as the queen of song during fifteen years, she, in 1836, retired to a magnificent villa on the Lake of Como. She made one attempt to reappear, later in life, but the result was a failure. She had a magnificent voice, and in characters requiring energy and tragic power was unsurpassed.

Born in Milan, 1798; died 1865.

PASTAÇA, pas-ta'-sa, a river of S. America, rising in the Andes, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining the Amazon.

PASTEUR, LOUIS, pas-ter', French chemist, professor of physical science at Dijon in 1848 and 1840, and afterwards until 1854 professor of chemistry at Strasburg. In 1857 he was appointed scientific director of the normal school at Paris; in 1863 was appointed professor of geology, physical science, and chemistry, at the School of Fine Arts, and afterwards of chemistry at the Sorbonne; in 1874 he was granted a pension of 20,000 francs. He is best known for his opposition to the theory of spontaneous generation, and for his researches and operations upon hydrophobia.

Born at Dôle, 1822.

PASTO, pas'-to, a town of the confederation of Colombia, South America. It is situated 8,500 feet above the sea level, between two ridges of the Andes, 148 miles N.E. of Quito. Pop. 7,800.

PASZTO, paz'-to, a market town of Hungary, on the Zagyva, 41 miles N.E. of Pesth. There are a church, abbey, and synagogue. Pop. 4,300.

PATA, or PATTA, an island off the east coast of Africa, separated from the mainland by a small creek. It is about 12 miles long from east to west. At one time there were three large and busy towns, but they were sacked by the Portuguese in the 16th century, and now there is but one remaining. Pata, which, after a long struggle for independence was compelled to submit to the Sultan of Muscat in 1817. Pop. 4,000, many being engaged in boatbuilding, dhows, or small coasting vessels, being constructed here.

PATAGONIA, pat-a-go'-ni-a, the most southern country of South America, bounded N. by the Argentine Confederation and the Rio Negro; S. by the Strait of Magellan, separating it from Terra del Fuego; N.W. by Chili; W. by the Pacific; and E. by the Atlantic. The shore on the Pacific side is very broken and precipitous, and it is skirted by numerous mountainous islands, and on the Atlantic coast are extensive bays and inlets. The principal islands are CHILOE, Desolation Island, Wellington's Island, and the archipelago of CHONOS, Madre de Dios, and Queen Adelaide. The Andes divide the country into two districts of unequal size, and very different in character. The eastern portion is by far the larger, extending eastward to the Atlantic. It is but imperfectly known, but appears to consist generally of undulating plains and table-lands, with intervening valleys and rivers, and huge isolated hills. On the banks of the rivers, and at the base of the Andes, are fertile districts and extensive forests, but the high lands are sterile. Several large desert tracts are near the coast. On the western side of the Andes, is a narrow strip, a steep slope from the mountains to the Pacific, with dense forests. There are two active volcanoes, one of which—Minchinmavida—is 8,000 feet high. The climate is very moist, falls of rain, snow, or sleet being almost of daily occurrence. Large herds of horses and cattle are bred.

Rivers and Lakes.—The principal are the Rio Negro, Chupat, Rio Chuca, and Rio Desire, rising in the Andes, and flowing east or south-east into the Atlantic. On the western side of the mountains the streams are only short mountain torrents. There are several lakes, the largest being Nahuel-Huapi, on the north; Colguape, in the centre, and Viedma, in the south.

Area.—About 350,000 square miles.

Pop.—With Fuego, 24,000; Tehuelche Indians, divided into ten tribes. Those inhabiting the southern portion appear to be the finer race. In height they are above the average of Europeans, with fine muscular frames, capable of great endurance, and their complexion is reddish brown. They make harness and lassoes, but pay little attention to other industrial pursuits. In numbers they are steadily decreasing, through the combined effects of disease and liquor, obtained from traders. They have various notions of religion and a great belief in magical arts and the existence of evil spirits.

Settlements.—There are a station at Patagones, at the mouth of the Rio Negro, with about 2,000 inhabitants, composed of Spaniards and other Europeans, negroes and converts; a colony and penal settlement belonging to Chili at Punta Arenas, in the Strait of Magellan; and a small settlement of Welshmen at the mouth of the Chupat.

PATAK, or POTOK (NAGY), pa'-tak, a market town of Hungary, on the Bodrog, 14 miles S.W. of Zemplin. There are a castle, two churches, Protestant college, and Roman Catholic and Jews' schools. In the neighbourhood is a large millstone quarry. A trade is carried on in corn, wine, cattle, and fish. Pop. 5,000.

PATANI, pa-ta'-ne, a native state on the eastern side of the Malacca peninsula, to the south of Siam. Pop. 50,000.

PATEL, PETER, pa'-tel, a French painter, commonly called by his countrymen the French Claude, from his imitation of that master. His landscapes are very beautiful.

Born in France, 1654; killed in a duel, 1703.

PATERCULUS, CAIUS VELLEÏUS, pa-ter'-ku-lus, a Roman historian. He commanded the cavalry in Germany under Tiberius, and was rewarded with the prætorship. He wrote an epitome of the Roman history, which is extant, and which commences with a period anterior to the foundation of Rome, and concludes with the times of Tiberius and Sejanus.

Born about 19 B.C.; died, it is supposed, 31 A.D.

PATERNO, pa-tair'-no, an ancient town of Sicily, at the foot of Mount Etna, 10 miles N.W. of Catania. It has a trade in wine, oil, flax, and hemp. It contains tombs, baths, a grotto, aqueduct, and the ruins of a large bridge, all of great antiquity. Mineral springs and a salt mine are in the vicinity. Pop. 17,162.

PATERSON, WILLIAM, pat'-er-son, the originator of several celebrated projects in the 17th century. Of his early life scarcely anything is known, but he became a merchant, carrying on a considerable trade with the West Indies, and other places. He first came into notice as the projector of certain schemes in trade and banking, which he submitted to the merchants of London, after having proposed them, without success, to the trading communities in the Low Countries. His banking projects are said to have been the foundation of the Bank of England, which was incorporated in 1694; but it is asserted that the rich capitalists quarrelled with and discarded him, after they had availed themselves of his suggestions. His next scheme was the famous Darien expedition, for the purpose of establishing, on that isthmus, a trading colony, which should rival the English East-India Company. Paterson obtained an act of the Scottish parliament, in 1694, for the incorporation of "The Company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies." The scheme was stoutly opposed in England, and as warmly supported in Scotland, where it became quite a national speculation; but the selection of the Isthmus of Darien as a central point where the commerce of the East and the West was to meet, proved a most disastrous choice; for the expedition ended in total failure. He took an active part in bringing about the union of Scotland with England, and represented the Dumfries burghs in the first united Parliament. In 1715 he was awarded by Parliament an indemnity amounting to about £18,000, for his losses by the Darien scheme; but he had suffered greatly from disappointment, and his health being affected, he did not live long afterwards.

Born at Tinwald Dumfriesshire, 1658; died 1719.

PATERSON, a city of New Jersey, United States, at the falls of the Passaic river, which affords good locomotive power, 17 miles N.W. of New York. There are 39 churches, and good public buildings. Manf. Silk, cotton, flax, hemp, locomotives, machinery, and paper. Pop. 51,000 nearly, one-third being foreigners.

PATH-HEAD. (See KIRKCALDY.)

PATJITAN, pat'-ji-tan, a province of Java, on the south coast. In 1812 it was ceded by the sultan of Djokjokarta to the Dutch.

PATKUL, JOHANN REINHOLD, pat-kul', a Livonian gentleman, who defended the liberties of his country against the oppressions of Sweden with great firmness, and in 1689 was deputed to address a memorial on behalf of the distressed people of Livonia to Charles XI., who took it as an act of treason, and caused a process to issue against Patkul, who was condemned to be beheaded. Thereupon he fled to Russia, and afterwards to Poland. When Charles XII. forced Augustus to make peace, he made it one of the conditions that Patkul should be delivered up; and this brave and unfortunate man was broken on the wheel.

Died 1707.

PATMOS, or PATIMO, pat'-mos, an island of the Grecian archipelago, one of the Sporades, belonging to Turkey in Asia, near the coast of Asia Minor, 20 miles from Samos. It has a circuit of about 45 miles, and is famous as the place to which St. John was banished by Domitian, and where he wrote the book of Revelation. A monastery dedicated to St. John is on the summit of a favourite mountain, about half way up which is a cave, in which, tradition asserts, the Apocalypse was written. Lat. 37° 30′ N. Lon. 26° 40′ E.

PATNA, or PATTANA, pat'-na, a city of India, and capital of a division of the same name, in the province of Bahar. It is situated on the right bank of the Ganges, with a European quarter on the west side, and extensive suburbs on the opposite side. There are a Roman Catholic cathedral, government offices, the nabob's palace, several mosques and tombs, and a large tank. It was at this city that the English first established a factory in the eastern provinces. Its markets are well supplied, and it has a large trade in opium, table-linen, wax-candles, nitre, indigo, and sugar. Pop. 170,655. Lat. 25° 37′ N. Lon. 85° 15′ E.—This is the ancient Padmavati, the capital of Bahar.

PATON, SIR JOSEPH NOEL, pat'-ton, a modern Scotch painter, who studied at the Royal Scottish Academy, and first attracted notice by his cartoon of "The Spirit of Religion," which obtained one of the £200 premiums given at the cartoon competition at Westminster Hall in 1845. Two years later he won the second class prize of £300 for his paintings "Christ Bearing the Cross," and "The Reconciliation of Oberon and Titania." He has since produced many works of high merit; was appointed queen's limner for Scotland in 1865, and knighted in 1867. He is also the author of "Poems by a Painter."

Born at Dunfermline, 1823.

PATRAS, or BALIABARDA, pa-tras', a seaport of Greece, in the north-west of the Morea, in the nomarchy or government of Achaia and Elis, on the eastern shore of the gulf of Patras, 12 miles S.W. of Lepanto. It is built at the foot of an eminence, and is commanded by a strong citadel, on the side of the ancient Acropolis. The places of worship are a synagogue, and churches of the Greek faith. There is an insecure harbour. Currants, oil, raw silk, cotton, wool, hides, and wax are exported. Pop. 25,494. Lat. 38° 33' N. Lon. 21° 43' E.

PATRAS, GULF OF, an inlet of the Ionian Sea, on the northern coast of the Morea, 22 miles long, with a breadth of 13. It receives the rivers Fidari and Karninitza.

PATRICK, ST., pat'-rik, the apostle of Ireland, is variously asserted to have been a native of Scotland, France, and of Wales. His original name is said to have been Succath, Patricius being the Latin name by which he was known. He was, at the age of 16, carried away by pirates, and sold as a slave to a petty Irish chief, but after six years' captivity escaped to France, where he became a monk. In 431 he went to Rome, and was chosen by the pope as a missionary in Ireland. He was eminently successful, baptizing chiefs and people, to the number of 12,000, founding 365 churches, and ordaining bishops. He died near Downpatrick, his age being variously stated from 93 to 116.

Born about 373.

PATRICK, PETER, a native of Thessalonica, who was employed by Justinian in important negotiations, for which he was made master of the palace. He wrote "The History of Ambassadors," in the collection of Byzantine historians.

Lived in the 8th century.

PATRICK, SIMON, a learned English prelate, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, and, on entering into orders, obtained the living of Battersea, in Surrey, and afterwards that of St. Paul, Covent Garden. During the plague of 1665, he continued in London, administering the offices of religion to his parishioners. He became dean of Peterborough in 1678, and, in 1689, bishop of Chichester; whence he was translated to Ely, in 1691. He is well known for his valuable commentary on the Old Testament. He was also the author of some controversial tracts against the Romanists and dissenters, and several books of practical divinity.

Born at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, 1626; died 1707.

PATRICK, a county of Virginia, United States. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 12,833, about 2,500 being coloured. The capital is Patrick Court House.

PATRICROFT, pat'-ri-kroft, a town of Lancashire, 5 miles W. of Manchester. Manf. Steam engines, silk, quilts, and cotton.

PATRIZI, FRANCIS, pa-treet'-ze, an Italian philosopher, who taught at Ferrara, Padua, and Rome, with great reputation. He was a vehement opponent of Aristotle's philosophy, and published an edition of the works attributed to Mercurius Trismegistus, and wrote "Paralleli Militari," or a parallel between the ancient military art and the modern. He likewise distinguished himself as an orator, geometrician, and poet.

Born at Cherso, Istria, 1529; died at Rome, 1597.

PATROCLUS, pa-tro'-klus, in Homeric legend, one of the Greek chiefs during the Trojan war, son of Menœtius, who, having fled from Opus, where his father reigned, retired to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the most intimate friendship with Achilles, the monarch's son. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war, Patroclus also accompanied them. He was the constant companion of Achilles; and when his friend refused to appear in the field, Patroclus imitated his example, and, by his absence, was the cause of the overthrow of many Greeks. But, at last, Nestor prevailed upon him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. He soon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for safety. Apollo, who interested himself on behalf of the Trojans, instigated Hector to attack him. The engagement was obstinate; but, at last, Patroclus was slain by Hector, with the interposition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, but his body was recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the greatest lamentations. His funeral was observed with the greatest solemnity. Upon the death of Patroclus, Achilles forgot his resentment, and entered the field to avenge the death of his friend.

PATRU, OLIVIER, pa-troo', an eminent French lawyer, whose talents procured him a place in the French Academy in 1640; on which occasion he made an eloquent speech, which gave rise to the custom for all new members to deliver introductory orations. The critical judgment of Patru was so great that he was called the Quintilian of France; it also gained him the friendship of Racine and Boileau. His works consist of Memoirs, Letters, and Discourses.

Born at Paris, 1604; died 1681.

PATSCHKAU, patch'-kow, a walled town of Prussia, on the right bank of the Neisse, 47 miles S.W. of Oppeln. There are a town-house, two churches, and a synagogue. Manf. Gunpowder and flax. Pop. 3,900.

PATTESON, JOHN COLERIDGE, pat'-te-son, an English missionary bishop, educated at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1854 he went to New Zealand as a missionary and was consecrated, in 1861, bishop of the Milanesian Islands. He warmly opposed the system of kidnapping natives of these islands by Queensland and other Australian colonists, but, so great was the fear of all white men, that, on attempting to land on the island of Santa Cruz, he was killed by the natives.

Born in London, 1827; died 1871.

PATTI, pat'-te, a town of Sicily, near the fine bay of Patti, standing on a height 33 miles S.W. of Messina. The principal public building is the cathedral, and there are remains of a fine abbey. Manf. Earthenware. Pop. 4,400.
